"Show me into a waiting-room, then, and let him know that a gentleman must see him on business of importance."

"The judge, sir, is very busy."

"Yes, I know."

"It is a party you see, sir."

"Never mind that. My business will quite satisfy the judge, that I am justified in disturbing him. The world don't stand still because people have parties."

"My good, sir, will you step this way?"

Claude followed the footman, and was shown into a waiting-room close at hand. In another moment he was alone.

"How will all this end, now," he said to himself. "Shall I get clear of this most perilous adventure, or shall I by some cross accident find that by trying to to do good I have brought upon myself evil? Well, well, we shall see. We shall see."

The room was well lighted, although not brilliantly, that is to say it was not lighted as though it formed any part of the fete but only in the ordinary sufficient manner.

The door suddenly opened, and the servant who opened it announced the judge. Claude advanced towards him and bowed. He felt rather surprised that the judge did not, as a gentleman both by education and habits he must be, he did not make the least show of returning the compliment.

"Well, sir," he merely said.

Indeed, thought Claude, this is not exactly the man whose feelings Grace need have been so very particular about sparing."

"It is of your daughter, sir, I come to speak," said Claude.

"Well, sir!"

Claude was thunderstricken to find the indifference of the judge upon such a point; and for some moments he was silent. How very unworthy is this man, he thought, of such a child as Grace.

"Well, sir," repeated Judge Manning, with still more harshness and abruptness than before.

"Shame upon you, sir," said Claude, "that the name of your fair child does not call up gentler emotions. Were I the father of such a piece of gentleness and excellence as Grace Manning, and a stranger came to me with her name upon his lips, my tenderest feelings, my deepest anxieties would be raised. I am sorry that she has such a father."

The judge clutched the back of a chair for support; as in a voice that shook with passion, he said—

"Where is she? What do you demand?,'

"Demand?"

"Yes, speak, ruffian, name the extent of your demand."

"Ruffian! How dare you?"

"Peace. No more of this. I know you, I say—I know you. You may well taunt, to find that it is so, and that by a circumstance quite sufficiently extraordinary to enable me to think it almost a kind interposition of Heaven. I know you, and therefore I say without further parley, how much do yon demand villain?"

"Sir, if you do know me, you may congratulate yourself upon knowing a more courteous, and possibly honester man than yourself."

"Dare you thus insult me?"

"Ay, I dare."

"In my own house?"

"Your own house? What is there in the atmosphere of your own house, I should like to know, what gives you a license to use intemperate language without the ordinary consequences? Tell me that."

"You incorrigible rascal."

"I am sorry to call the father of Grace Manning an ill mannerly old idiot," said Claude.

The judge sank into a chair as he said, in gasping tones—

"I thought I should be equal to this interwiew, but I am not. No, I am not. I feel that I am not."

"That is quite evident," said Claude.

"Torture me no more."

"Torture you! I torture you! Is this man mad?"

"You will drive me mad. What sum of money do you demand for the restoration of my child? Answer me that. Let your demand be exhorbitant and you shall have it."

"There is some horrible mistake here," said Claude. "Sir, the conviction is momentarily creeping over me that by some means, Heaven only knows how, we are at cross purposes."

"Cross purposes?"

"Yes, that is quite clear. I come here not without some risk, to do you a great service, and am met by personal abuse, and some of them strangest questions one man could put to another. You ask me to name a sum; I want no money of you."

"What do you want then?"

"To restore to you your daughter."

"Where is she? I demand to know where she is?"

"Stop," said Claude. "In the first place indulge me by briefly explaining to me, who and what you take me to be."

"Read that, and tremble," said the judge, as he laid a crumpled note before Claude, who took it up and read it with astonishment. It was addressed to Phillip Manning, Esq., and was as follows—

"Sir—Knowing you as the nephew of the much respected Judge Manning and knowing that, notwithstanding some wildness of behaviour incidental to youth, you entertain the greatest respect and love for your uncle, I apprise you of an affair that very nearly concerns his happiness.

Some villains, by way of raising a sum of money, intend by a false tale of your illness, to get your cousin, Grace, to accompany them from her aunts at the Lodge. They will hide her somewhere until your uncle's fears for her safety induces him to pay a large sum, literally, for her ransom.

One of the gang will call upon your uncle this evening, to open the affair as regards the money. It is for you to take such steps, contingent upon this piece of intelligence as your affection for both your uncle and your cousin, may dictate to you.

You may rely upon the perfect authenticity of this intelligence."

"From your well-wisher,"

"A. B. C."

"P. S.—Do not seek to know who I am, as the gang of rascals, whose proceedings in this case I inform you of, would murder me if they knew I had betrayed them."

"Now, sir," said the judge, when he saw that Claude had perused the letter. "Now, sir, are you convinced how far my knowledge extends?"

"I am astonished!"

"And you do not blush at your infamy? Alas! alas! My poor nephew upon the receipt of this letter, which was slipped into his hands in the street by a woman, who immediately fled, took horse and went to the lodge. He was too late. Too late."

"Too late for what, sir?"

"To save my child. The villains had already got her away with them; and I—I.—But name your price."

"And your nephew, to-night, brought you this letter?"

"Only a quarter of an hour ago."

"Is he here?"

"He is; and I will confront you with him."

"Stop, hear my statement first. It was your nephew, Phillip, himself, who planned this adduction of your daughter. He, himself, is the writer or the dictator of this letter."

"Impossible!"

"Yet true. I rescued your daughter from his hands, at her her own earnest, and imploring solicitation."

"I will have him here to confute you."

The judge rang the bell, and when an attendant appeared, he said—

"Tell Mr. Phillip that I want him."

"He is not within, sir."

"Not within?"

"No, sir. He left the house about a quarter of an hour ago. Indeed, directly after he had seen you, sir."

"And left no message?"

"None, sir."

"Of course not," said Claude. "It would have transcended even his impertinence and assurance to have met with me before you face to face."

"I cannot for a moment," said the judge, after ordering the servant to leave the room, "I cannot for a moment believe your statement. What proof can you bring me of it?"

"What proof has Phillip Manning brought you of his statement, sir?"

"Your presence here is amply sufficient."

"Well, thank God, I, too, have proof of the truth of my statement. Proof before which he would quail, and before which your scruples must vanish into thin air."

"What proof?"

"Your daughter's testimony."

"Ah! That indeed—but no—no—Phillip could not—dared not——"

"Suspend your judgment, sir. Close to the railings of the square garden, and a little to the left only of being exactly opposite to your house, is a plain brown travelling chaise. A great coat is thrown over one of the horses—in that chariot is your daughter."

"My Grace? My child?"

"Even so, sir. After rescuing her from Phillip, her worthy cousin, I only paused sufficiently long to enable her to take some refreshment at a farm house at Ealing, for she was faint and weary, and then I brought her direct to you. Send your servant to bring her here, and I will stand or fall by the statement the young lady may please herself to make."

The judge rang the bell violently, and several servants rushed into the room at once.

"My secretrry!" he said. "My secretary!"

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

THE STRONG CELL.

THE judge seemed to be quite exhausted by the violence of his emotions, after giving utterance to this order, and he sat in a large chair, looking as pale as death itself.

"The company, sir, ask for you," said a servant.

The judge only waved his arm, as though he would deprecate any attempt to withdraw him from the business he then had in hand, but the servant was not used to the language of signs, or he thought the entertainment that was going on above stairs was too important a matter to be disposed of by a wave of the hand, so with more pertinacity, he said—

"Sir, the saloons are full, and Lord John Muscle has twice asked for you, sir, if you please."

"Let him ask again. Begone!"

The servant retired, but those who had gone in search of the secretary presently announced Mr. Atkinson, who was the secretary in question.

A middle-aged respectable-looking man was this secretary, with a remarkably soft voice, and much suavity of manner.

"Atkinson," said the judge, speaking with difficulty on account of the deep emotion he was suffering under, "Atkinson, I am informed that Miss Manning is in a coach close at hand. Will you fetch her?"

"With the extremest pleasure, sir."

"Go, go—let no one know——"

"You will find the young lady," said Claude, "in a plain travelling chariot, without any arms upon it; and you will know it by a great coat being thrown over the off horse."

"Perhaps," suggested Mr. Atkinson, "this gentleman will accompany me?"

"No, no," said the judge.

"No," said Claude, "I am a sort of hostage or gage here for the truth of what I assert regarding the young lady being in the carriage at all."

Mr. Atkinson stared.

"But I am willing to be such bail for such a fact," added Claude; "and you will better please both me and the judge by being prompt in your mission, sir."

Mr. Atkinson left the room hastily.

"He will bring her in by the side door," said the judge, "which opens into the next street, if she be there to bring."

"She is there to bring," said Claude.

"Sir, if you should turn out to be right, I shall give you what reparation I can for my suspicions of you."

"And nothing for the service I have rendered you in rescuing your child from the hands of such a scoundrel as your nephew."

"Oh, yes; much—much. Name the price, and I——"

"Price? Price? Really, my lord judge, you seem to think that all human nature may be bought and sold, and to subscribe to the doctrine that every man has his price."

"We will settle all this, sir, when Mr. Atkinson returns," said the judge. "Do not let us enter into what in either event must be a profitless discussion. If you have saved my child, you will find no occasion to taunt me with any want of gratitude. If your statement on the other hand be untrue, your own imagination may depict to you what a father is likely to feel, and likely to do in consequence."

Claude slightly bowed, and then the conversation stopped.

The judge with difficulty rose, and proceeded towards a door opposite to that by which the room seemed to be generally entered. He opened this door and held it partly for self support, and partly to keep it open, as he said—

"This is the way, she will come. Of course if she be there at all, Atkinson will bring her at once to me. This is the way, she will come. Oh, God, if anything has really happened to my girl?"

The fatherly anxiety of the judge, and the evident affection with which he named his daughter made a favourable impression upon Claude, and quite effaced anything in the shape of irritation which his mind had felt upon the occasion of the few words that had passed between them.

"Be at ease, sir," he said. "All is well."

"I hope so."

"You may be assured so. Your child will be restored to your arms pure and spotless, as when she left them."

"She is my only child, sir, and if anything were to happen to—but no, no that is impossible."

He shrank back from the door, and again sank into a chair.

"I hear footsteps," he said.

"Then she comes," said Claude.

"I—I only hear the footsteps of one person, and they are not hers. Do you think, sir, a father's ear would not recognise the footsteps of his child."

Claude approached the half open door. In another moment Mr. Atkinson appeared. Claude grasped him by the arm tightly, as he said, in loud clear accents.

"Miss Manning, sir? Where is she?"

"I only wish I had the supreme happiness of knowing. There is no such coach as you mention—no such horse with a great coat thrown over him, and I grieve to say no Miss Manning."

The judge uttered a deep groan.

"This is false," cried Claude. "It is too absurd. It is—is—good God—it is possible——"

"What is possible," said the judge. "Speak now—speak. I command you to speak to me. What new horror would you suggest?"

"That your nephew, Phillip, may have dogged your child and me to London, and while we were here engaged in profitless discourse, he may have again seized her."

"Oh dear, oh dear," said the secretary, "that I should live to hear that. The blood of the Mannings, sir, would not stoop—could not bear down as it were in a manner of speaking to——"

"This is trash!" cried Claude impatiently. "I will go and search for her myself. Do not despair, sir, I have promised, myself, to bring you your daughter, and I will keep my word."

Claude was moving towards the door, but the judge rising with a sudden energy, cried in a fierce tone—

"Stop that man! Do not let him escape! Seize that man!"

"Is this possible," said Claude.

"Stop him! Seize, I give him into custody!"

Claude had reached the door, when Atkinson shouted—

"Stop thief!"

Stung by the injustice that was being done him, Claude drew a pistol from his pocket, and cried—

"Take your reward for that cry!"

He pulled the trigger, but the weapon was faithless. During his drive from Ealing, the powder in the pan got scattered, and so Mr. Atkinson was saved. It was the only weapon Claude had about him, for at the moment he recollected with a pang of anguish that he had placed his other pistols in the pocket of the great coat he had flung over the back of the horse.

"Ah, I am supremely fortunate," said Atkinson. "Stop thief!"

"Are you," said Claude, as he flung the pistol in his face with a force that sent him retiring to the floor with an awful contusion upon his nose. "Are you. Let him who sets small value upon his life try to stop me!"

The cries of the judge, and of Atkinson, had by this time reached the saloons and the hall, so that Claude, when he gained the threshold of the room in which this singular conversation had taken place, found himself in the midst of a throng of persons.

With a conviction of his fate he said to himself in a low voice—

"I am taken."

But it was only to himself that he made this remark, and not to his foes.

Dashing forward, he endeavoured to make his way through the throng of persons, for he felt that in so doing, upon the spur of the moment, lay his only chance of escape.

He was nearly successful, but in fighting his way he quite forgot that there was a rather steep step at the door, His foot slipped, and he fell.

In another moment he was a prisoner.

"Thank you, Phillip Manning," said Claude, bitterly to himself.

"Hold him tight—hold him," cried Atkinson. "Where's a constable, hold him tight. He seems a desperate fellow!"

Some half dozen men held Claude until a constable came up, who said in a voice of authority—

"What's the charge?"

"Felony!" cried a voice, and the old judge appeared to be in the hall. You know me, officer?"

"Yes, your honour."

"Then I give this man in charge, and you will take him upon my personal responsibility?"

"Certainly, your honour!"

Claude was forcibly held while a pair of handcuffs were put upon him, and then Atkinson coming up to him, said—

"I have the supreme satisfaction of congratulating myself upon the fact, that you will be hanged."

"No," said Claude. "Not this time. You and I will meet again and without witnesses, too, before that happens. You may affect to smile, but you will find me a true prophet."

"Ha! ha!" laughed, or rather tried to laugh, Atkinson, for it was only a try after all.

"Take away your prisoner," said the judge.

"Now, young fellow," said the officer; "come along."

"Where to?" said Claude.

"Where to? Why the lock-up of St. James's to be sure, and there we can accommodate you with a strong cell. Perhaps you know it?"

"No."

"You don't? Well, then, you will another time, if you should escape being lagged or scragged this time, which ain't very likely, you see; for if anybody ought to know what they are, stout old Judge Manning ought to be that individual. Oh, that's you, Morgan, is it; I'm glad you are come, for I don't much like this customer single-handed, though the darbies are on him. There's no knowing how many palls he may have about this ere place."

These words were addressed to another officer who came up at the moment.

"What's he been amusing himself with doing?" said Morgan.

"I don't know."

"You don't know? Then how came you to take the charge? Is he a warrant customer?"

"Not a bit of it; but Judge Manning gave him to me, and says it's felony, and orders him to be well looked after."

"Oh, that alter's the case. I'll come with you."

Morgan walked on the other side of Claude and after some time, he said—

"And pray what do you call yourself, young fellow, when you are at home?"

"What will you give me for that information?" said Claude.

"Give you?"

"Yes. How much will you give me?"

"That is a good one. Well, if you ain't a cool hand. Come, old fellow, just to honour the joke, how much do you want?"

"£500."

"What?"

"£500, and that's cheap too; there's many would like the bargain."

"Well, of all the pieces of impudence that I ever heard of, I think this beats them," said the officer.

"And I too," said the other. "£500! Well that is a good one—and all for the pleasure of knowing what a man's name is."

"We shall see," said Claude.

At that time in the evening there were few, indeed, in the streets to take any notice of Claude and his captors, and probably if there had there would not have been many who, in the prisoner, would have recognised the famous Claude Duval, over whose head there hung rewards equal to within a trifle of £3000.

The old watch-house of St. James's was soon reached; as the constable for the night had just taken his seat, Claude was brought before him with no small amount of affected bustle.

"Hilloa! hilloa!" cried the night constable on duty; "what's the charge against this gentleman? Accommodate him with a seat."

Claude's appearance had had its effect, and the constable no doubt thought it was some street row or practical joke, concerning which, the distinguished-looking personage—for Claude was distinguished-looking—that was brought before him, was about to be charged with.

"Why, your worship," said one of the constables, "this ain't my charge, but Judge Manning has given the prisoner into custody, and desires he be kept fast, and he will make it all right."

"You don't say so?"

"Yes, that's it, your worship."

The night constable—who was called worship, from the same strained courtesy that folks in the House of Commons are called Honourable Members, or in the House of Lords, Noble Lords, or on thrones, miracles of beauty and virtue—turned a fierce look upon Claude, as he said—

"You ill-looking rascal, what have you been doing?"

Claude did not condescend to return any answer.

"What is your name, villain?"

"Don't you know me, any of you?"

They all looked at him, and shook their heads.

"Will any one here give £500 for a knowledge of who I am? I will impart that knwoledge to him secretly, and I don't want to be paid immediately."

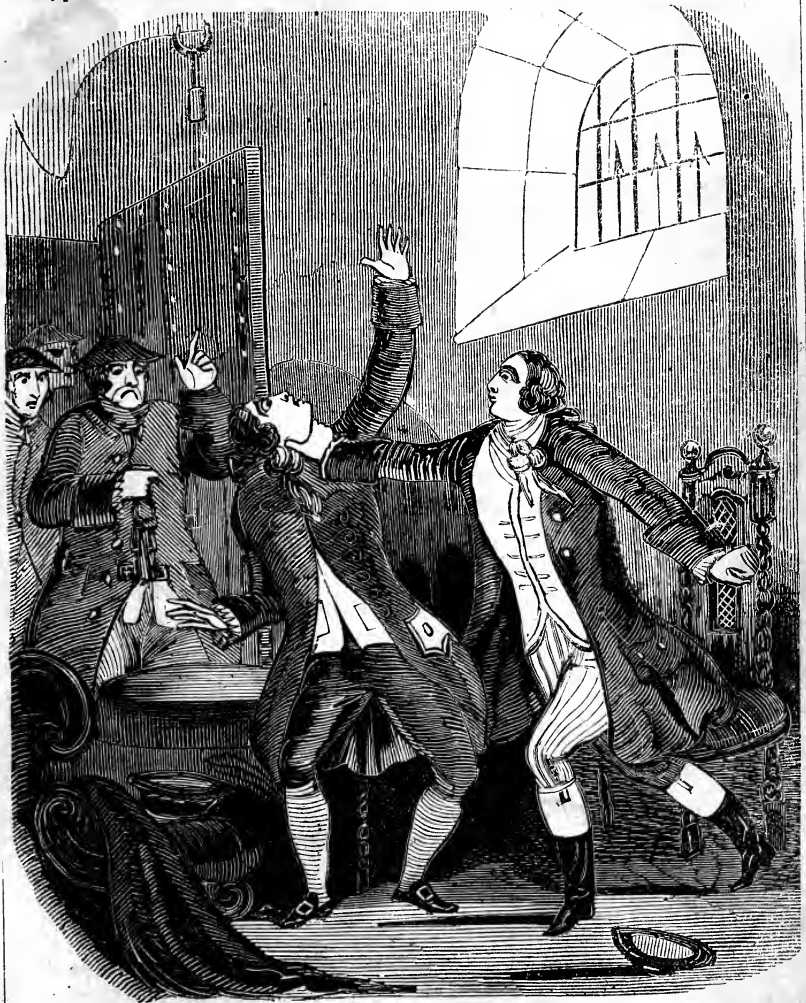
"Ha! ha!" laughed the night constable. "Ha! ha! That's good. Oh, what a ruffian this must be, to make jokes in St. James's watch-house, actually."

"Well," said Claude, "if you will persist in considering it merely as a joke, I cannot help it. You can have your own way."

"Ah, my fine fellow, that's just what we mean to have, and what we generally have. There's no doubt you are a great rogue, or Judge Manning would not have taken the trouble to have anything to do with you. Ha! ha! You shall be put in the strong cell, my fine fellow. Jobkins! Jobkins!"

"Yes, sir."

"Is the strong cell vacant?"



"Yes, sir. All's right; but it lets in the water woundily."

"That's no matter. It's refreshing. You will put this fellow in, and in the morning I will wait upon Judge Manning myself, and ascertain what he has done."

CHAPTER CXLIX.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL SESSION.

This was certainly a novel mode of administering justice, to lock up a man in a strong cell over night, and then go in the morning to inquire what he had done; and, probably, even the non-astute mind of the night constable might have been a trifle shocked at so unusual a mode of doing business, had he not had the authority of a judge for it.

Mr. Jobkins, who was a great, hulking-looking, good-humoured fellow, with a face about the size and colour of a warming-pan, escorted Claude to the strong cell, according to the orders he had received that way tending.

That anything but desirable location was situated under ground, and reached by a descent of twelve steps. An iron door then opened, and then there were two steps more, after which the strong cell was gained.

It would have been more to the purpose if they had added another syllable to its name, and called the strong cell the strong cellar, for a cellar it was to all intents and purposes.

Now, Jobkins was kind in his way, and he said to Claude, as they descended the stairs together—

"I don't know what you have done; but there's no need that you should be more uncomfortable than needs be, I'll take of your handcuffs for you."

"Thank you," said Claude, "thank you. I will remember this act of kindness, and it will go hard with me but some day I will find a means of requiting it."

"Oh, that's no matter."

"Jobkins took of the handcuffs, adding, as he did so—

"If the cell ain't strong enough to hold a man safe for a night without a pair of darbies on him, it ain't no good at all."

"That is true enough," said Claude. "You spoke of it letting in water, did you not, my friend?"

"Yes I did, and not without reason too. Don't you hear it."

They both paused upon the threshold of the cell, and Claude heard quite distinctly the dripping of water.

"That's anything but pleasant," he said.

"Quite the reverse of pleasant," added Jobkins. "It's not common to put anybody in here at all, unless they have shown fight."

"How do you mean by showing fight?"

"Why made a row up stairs, and tried to get away, but you have not done that at all. Howsomever I suppose the night constable thinks he'll please the old judge by telling of him in the morning what an amazing lot of care he took of you."

"Very likely."

Claude stepped into the cell. It felt sloppy under his feet, and a natural feeling of indignation arose in his mind at the idea of it being a part of the barbarous policy of the state, to confine prisoners in such unwholesome places, and that too before they were convicted of any offence against society.

"You stand still a bit," said Jobkins, "and I'll try to make the place a little more comfortable for you."

How he was to succeed in doing that, Claude could not divine, but he waited for about a quarter of an hour with patience. Then the door of the cell was opened, and a truss of straw was thrown in.

"All right," said Jobkins.

"Yes," said Claude. "Thank you, all is right as you say, and I am very much obliged to you, indeed."

"Don't mention it."

The cell was locked up, and Claude was alone.

Under the circumstances in which he now was, his reflections were not likely to be other than of the most painful character. In addition to the mental aggravation of being apprehended upon a charge of which he was most particularly innocent, he could not doubt but that upon his appearance in the morning at a police-office, some one would be able to recognise him; and in that event he would be at once hurried to Newgate, and his death determined upon as soon as possible.

When he came to consider, he much doubted if, even upon his recognition by any one, that person would get any reward, since he (Claude) was already in custody; but after all, that was a matter that did not much disturb him.

He began quite plainly to understand how the whole affair had been managed by Phillip Manning. That unscrupulous individual had got to town just a little before him (Claude) by some means, and prepossessed the mind of his uncle with the story that had induced the judge to give him (Claude) such a strange, and, at the time, incomprehensible reception.

Then Phillip had—probably by the assistance of some persons in his service, while he (Claude) was talking to the judge—left the house, and got possession of the young girl, and driven the chariot off with her.

And even amid all his own troubles, serious and affecting his life as they were, Claude felt heart-stricken at the idea of Grace Manning being in the hands and at the mercy of her abandoned cousin.

"And thus," he said, "for a time does wickedness triumph."

After a while he stirred himself to see if there were any means by which he could possibly escape from the cell. He tried the door; but destitute of implements as he there was, any attempt to force it would be utterly futile. The walls he struck in all parts; but from the dead sound they returned he felt certain that the cellar he was in was a mere excavation, and that all around him was solid earth, so that he could only hope that on the morrow something would turn up of an advantageous character, so as to induce the judge to side with a belief in his innocence before any discovery of who or what he really was could be made.

And Claude had some confidence in the usual stupidity of the police. He well knew their great anxiety to identify any one whom they were asked if they knew, and he likewise well knew how stupid they were at anything in the shape of recollection.

Of course, when he reasoned thus of the police, he excepted some of the old experienced Bow-street men, who, if they were to see him, would at once be able to name him.

Wearied with such agitations, and worn out by the great fatigues he had gone through for the last twenty four hours, Claude, at length, lay right in the centre of the truss of straw, that had been so kindly given to him by Jobkins, and fell fast asleep.

The probability is, that he enjoyed a far sounder repose than Phillip Manning, notwithstanding that villain had so successfully, for the time being, got the better of him, by fixing his own guilt upon his (Claude's) innocent shoulders.

Daylight at bright noon, and midnight, were alike in the strong cell of the St. James's watch-house.

Claude started, and rubbed his eyes, when some one called "Hallo! hallo!—Get up, unless you are fond enough of the damp to lie here and rot."

It was not Jobkins who made this speech. Claude rose, and felt his limbs much stiffened by, no doubt, the damp air in which he had slept; before trying to turn his head he found that he had got that most unpleasant companion, a stiff neck. He could not help uttering a malediction upon the place.

"Ha! ha!" said the officer, who came to fetch him, "you don't seem to like it at all. But come on; it's time you made an appearance at the police office."

Claude did not condescend to make this man any answer, but followed him up the twelve steps.

It was broad daylight.

A tin mug, half full of water, and a lump of very brown, coarse looking bread was given to him for breakfast, and then he was permitted at a pump to wash his face and hands.

"Now, you rascal," said the night-constable, bustling up to him, "I have seen the judge."

"Have you?" said Claude. "Is he pretty well after it?"

"After what?"

"After the infliction of a visit from such an ass as you are."

The officers did not want to laugh; but they could not stand this, and a general roar testified their appreciation of the joke against the night-constable, who was not celebrated among them for any large amount of wisdom.

"You villain, do you dare to make a laughing-stock of me?"

"Oh, yes," said Claude.

"I wonder I don't knock you down."

"It's no wonder at all. The simple explanation is, that you are afraid to try it."

The night-constable looked ferocious; but he turned away muttering to himself—

"If I can do you an ill turn, master, I will; you may make up your mind to that. I never was so insulted in all my life."

Claude felt that now was coming the time when he would have to run the risk of detection in his true character. He wished much to prolong the period during which he should be unknown; and he so disposed his hair, and the upper part of his clothing, that he looked as unlike what he usually looked as possible.

He thought it would be prudent to give some name to the magistrate, however; if he did not, he knew that the officers would all be put upon the mettle to find out who he was, and some one might make a shrewd guess, who otherwise might not have his attention directed towards him (Claude) at all.

Police vans were at that time things undreamt of, and the charges over night at the various watch-houses of the metropolis, were taken through the streets properly ironed, and the procession headed by a couple of officers, while two more brought up the rear; and in this way was Claude Duval conducted to Bow Street.

He had hoped that some other less conspicuous police office would have been chosen; but Bow Street it was.

His was not the first case called upon, but when he was conducted into the court, he saw Judge Manning on the bench talking to the magistrate. The judge, looked old and worn.

A general feeling of curiosity was manifest upon the countenances of all who were present, for it had got whispered about that the case was a curious one, and Claude found himself very uncomfortably the centre of attraction.

The magistrate was a short, bloated-looking man with an immense projecting under lip, and features indicative of sensuality in the highest degree. His voice was harsh and discordant.

"Well, prisoner," he cried, "what is your name?"

"John Smith," said Claude. "What is the charge against me?"

"Oh, you want to know the charge, do you?"

"I trust that that is not a very unreasonable amount of curiosity in one so situated as I am."

"You are a scoundrel, sir! Hold your tongue."

"You are a fool, sir, and a liar," said Claude; "and if holding my tongue, in your vernacular, means keeping silent, while you make me the subject of silly and impertinent remarks, I will not do so."

The face of the irritable magistrate turned of a purplish hue. Never had he been before so defied in public, and, like most bullies, he had, when such a circumstance really took place, hardly anything to say for himself.

Judge Manning interposed.

"Pardon me, your worship," he said, "for interferring; but I am quite willing to state the charge against the prisoner at the bar."

"Very well—very well," said the magistrate, wiping his face with a flaring silk handkerchief. "Very well—as you please, my lord. Let it be so."

He spoke as though it was some great indulgence to the prisoner at the bar to state the charge against him. What a famous inquisitor such a magistrate would have made; but then, all this was in the olden time. Ministers are now forced to place men of education and some judgment on the magisterial bench; but it is only the force of public opinion that has made the change, as only the force of public opinion makes all changes in this country of corruption, and dominant rascality. All ministers go into office with but one motto, and that is "Resistance to all change."

"The charge," added Judge Manning, "is for the abdication of a young lady."

His voice faltered as he spoke.

"Not guilty," cried Claude.

"Silence," said the magistrate.

"Not guilty," cried Claude again, in a voice that might have been quite conveniently heard in Bow-street.

"Allow me to state the charge and to call my witnesses," said the judge.

The magistrate waved his hand as though he were the emperor of all the world, and only graciously gave his permission for other folks to breathe a little to keep life in them.

"I charge this man," added Judge Manning, "with the abdication, from the house where she was residing, some distance from London, of my daughter, Grace Manning."

He then briefly and very clearly went through the particulars already known to the reader; namely, the mysterious commission to Phillip, and the arrival of Claude at the mansion in town, with his accusation of Phillip, and assertion that Grace was in a chariot without, and would substantiate it; when no Grace and no such chariot could be seen at all in the neighbourhood.

Claude listened to all this without the least interruption, and then the judge said—

"If the prisoner has any question to ask of me, I shall of course reply to him."

"I would merely ask if your nephew Phillip enjoys your confidence?"

"My confidence?"

"Yes. Is he a person of that character that you consider him worthy of belief?"

"Yes—yes—Now."

"Then there was a time when such was not the case."

"There was."

"I have nothing further to ask of you, sir. I have only to say that you are much deceived."

"Well," said the magistrate, "this is quite clear. The prisoner at the bar has committed a most heinous offence, and I shall commit him for trial."

"Perhaps you will condescend," said Claude, "to hear any witnesses first that may depose to what the prosecutor has stated, and which, with all due deference to him, I would suggest is not yet proved."

"I will call my nephew," said the judge.

"Ah," said Claude. "I shall be glad to see him."

Phillip was in the body of the court; and now looking as pale as death itself, he made his appearance. It will easily be conceived how reluctant he must have been to come forward and confront Claude, and yet how impossible it was that he should not do so under the circumstances.

The oath was tendered to him and duly taken.

"Now, Phillip," said the judge. "You will oblige me by stating as briefly as you can all that you know of this affair; and you will be as temperate as you can."

"I will, sir."

"Proceed then," said the magistrate.

Phillip had time to muster up courage to look Claude in the face, but he could not do so; and the conscience that the eye of the innocent man whom he was going to do all that perjury could do to condemn, was upon him, dazzled him like sunlight.

There surely is something in the very nature of truth that makes it apparent and infinitly superior in its very essence to falsehood; for notwithstanding Phillip had a good tale to tell, and was well backed by both the magistrate and his uncle, no one in the court could listen to him without a lurking suspicion that all was not right with his evidence.

CHAPTER CL.

CLAUDE'S FRIENDS BECOME ACTIVE.

We shall see how he got on with his vile and slanderous tale of infamy and calumny.

Phillip Manning put in the letter that he said he had received, and which pretended to warn him of the projected abduction of his cousin Grace; and then he went on to say how he had tried to thwart the design—been too late, and finally, just managed to get to London again in time to put his uncle in possession of the frightful fact that Grace was actually carried off.

"Look at me," said Claude.

By a good effort, Phillip managed to do so.

"Where have you seen me before?"

"At my uncle's house, last night."

"And when and where before that?"

"Nowhere."

"Then I will refresh your memory. We met in a green lane near to Ealing, yesterday. Do you deny that, upon your oath?"

"I do."

"Do you keep a carriage?"

"Certainly not. My income will not permit me to do such a thing."

"But your income will no doubt easily permit you to hire one now and then, Mr. Phillip Manning, and that was possibly the case as regards the one in which I stopped you when you were conveying off Miss Manning."

"This is monstrous," said the magistrate; "what does the prisoner mean?"

"Ay," said Phillip, "what can he mean?"

"Simply," said Claude, "that I rescued Grace Manning from you yesterday, and brought her to London. By her own request, I left her for a few moments outside her father's house while I went in to prepare him for her sudden appearance, and during those few moments she disappeared. Where she is now, you Phillip Manning can best tell."

"I?"

"Yes, who but you?—who but you stole out of your uncle's house, while he and I were talking, and made off with her?"

"Surely, surely this cannot be true?" said the judge.

"It is all false," said Phillip. "I should be worse than the worst if I could do such acts."

"You would, indeed, Phillip."

"And are," said Claude. "That such has been the case I am now quite certain; and a time will come, I hope, when the only witness who can clear up this affair will do so, to my honour, and to Phillip's confusion."

"What witness?" said Phillip, looking round him with apprehension, as though he feared that from the crowd in the court some one would step forward and confront him, bringing proofs of his duplicity and villany.

"This man asks what witness?" said Claude; "and I declare that the witness I hope yet to see will be Grace Manning."

"Where is she?" said Phillip.

"What!" said Claude, "have you forgotten where you took her to last night?"

"I—I took her nowhere—I don't know anything about her."

"Prisoner," said the judge, "restore me my child, and, even now, I will abandon this charge, and you shall go free."

"I wish I could," said Claude; "ask your nephew."

The judge sunk back upon his seat again, from whence he had partially risen, and uttered a long-drawn sigh.

"I will commit him," said the magistrate. "Prisoner at the bar, you stand committed to take your trial for——"

"Stop a moment," said Claude. "Has Phillip Manning a servant—a stout man with red hair?"

"Yes, yes," said the judge, "he had."

"Then that servant was with him, when I met him in the green lane, and rescued your daughter from him. He was then playing the part of a postillion."

"Well, my servant is here," said Phillip; "put him upon his oath, and let us see where he was last night at the time you mention. Peter! Peter!"

"Here. sir," said a voice; and the identical man who had driven the chaise, and who, it will be recollected, crawled away in the bustle attendant upon Claude's rescue of Grace Manning, made his appearance.

The oath was taken by this man; and Claude said to him—

"Where were you yesterday, about sunset?"

"I was in London all day, and all night too. My master gave me a guinea to go and relieve a poor family with, and that took me all day, for I could not find where they had moved to."

"But you found them at last; and, I hope, relieved them?"

"No; I couldn't for the life of me discover where they had moved to. Please, sir," turning to Phillip, "here's the guinea, as I could not find the poor people."

"That will do," said Claude. "I have nothing further to say to this witness. Time alone can put this affair to rights. I pity you, my lord judge, more, if possible, than I feel for myself, for you, after all, in the uncertainty as to the fate of your child, are the worst victim of this most foul conspiracy."

"But it shall be found out," cried a voice from the body of the court.

"Ah!" said Claude.

He knew the voice. It was Jack's.

"Who was that?" said the magistrate. "Seize that man, and bring him before me—officers, seize that man; I have not the slightest doubt but that it is one of the prisoner's abandoned accomplices."

An active search was made, and a vast amount of bustle ensued, but the officers with all their exertions were unsuccessful in discovering who had spoken the words.

Claude was very anxious to say a word or two to Jack; but all he could venture upon was a few words of a general character.

"If any friend of mine," he said, "be here, let him try to find Grace Manning as well for my sake as for her own and her father's consolation."

"Yes!" cried the voice again.

"Hush!" said Claude. "Hush!"

"Upon my life!" cried the magistrate, "this is very strange and very annoying. Officers, I demand that the person who interrupts the court in this manner be brought before me immediately!"

The officers now felt the necessity of laying hold of somebody, so, as they could not find the real offender, they laid violent hands on the most stupid, inoffensive, harmless-looking person they could see, and dragged him forward, exclaiming—

"Here he is, your worship. Here he is!"

"Well, fellow," said the magistrate, "what have you got to say for yourself for this indecorous interruption of the court?"

"It wasn't me, your wuship!"

"Come, come—be careful what you say, sir."

"Of course he denies it, your worship," said one of the officers.

"Of course," repeated his sapient worship. "I have a great mind, sir, to commit you to prison for a month; but as it is, I will let you off this once with a fine of forty—— Eh?"

The clerk had whispered something to the magistrate, who, after a whispered consultation with that functionary, added—

"A-hem! Will anybody swear that this was the man who disturbed the court?"

The officers had some sort of dread that the real offender might come forward; and they nudged each other to take the necessary oath, which the magistrate observing, induced that potentate to say—

"Well, prisoner, for this time you may go; but don't let me see your face here again—mark that."

"Yes, your wushiip; but I didn't speak."

"Go away, sir, and be thankful."

The man slunk away, and then the judge said, in a low tone, expressive of much dejection—

"May I request that your worship will remand the prisoner for a week? I hope, during that time, that by indefatigable exertions, something may be brought to light that will elucidate the mysteries in which this painful affair is enveloped."

The magistrate assented; and Claude found himself formally remanded for one week.

Claude was rather anxious regarding what prison he was to be sent to; for he knew that there was rather a paucity of jail accommodation in London, and that it was a very common thing for even remanded prisoners from all parts of the metropolis to be taken to Newgate.

"Where am I to be taken?" he said.

"To Newgate."

Claude looked upon his recognition at Newgate as certain, and all he said was—

"I protest against all this proceeding, Judge Manning. You will be sorry, sir, for sacrificing one who has run into much danger to save you much sorrow."

"Save me much sorrow?"

"Yes. I tried to do so by restoring to you your daughter. I failed in that, perhaps, mad-brained, too chivalric enterprise, and here I am!"

Judge Manning was evidently shaken.

"Would to God," he said, "I could see my way through all this tangle of incidents! I shudder to do less or more than justice!"

"The time will come," said Claude.

"Now, young feller," whispered an officer in his ear. "This way, if it's all the same to you."

In another moment he was led from the court. As he passed out he was quite close to Phillip Manning. That rascal glanced around him to see that his uncle was not nigh, and then he saluted Claude with a grin of malice as he said,—

"I triumph now."

"Yes," said Claude, "you fancy so."

"I know it."

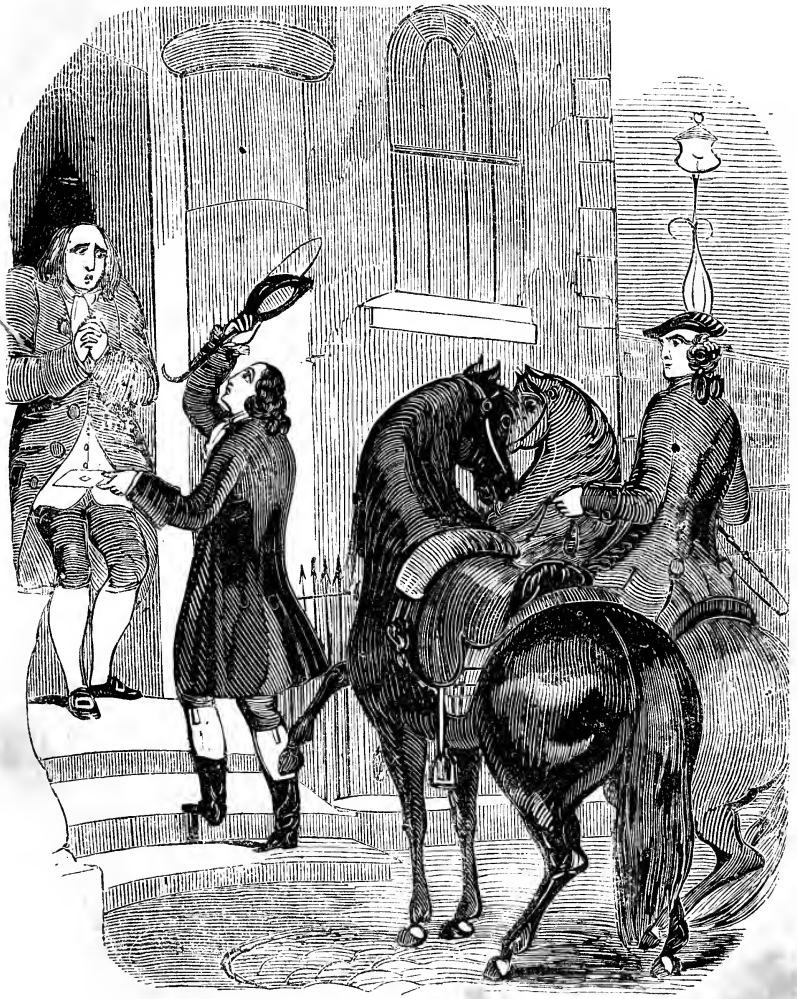
"But you dread the result, and that will surely come. Triumph, do you say? Is that cowardly hang-dog-look one of triumph? Why, you are shaking with fear, to your inmost soul. Officers, look at us and say which, in your experience, is the guilty, and which the innocent man?"

The officers only looked at each other, but they made no reply to this remark of Claude's. It was not at all likely, under the circumstances, that they would. As for Phillip he walked away as quietly as possible.

"Shall I keep up my incognito or not?" was the question that Claude now put to himself. After a few moments council, he answered, and in the affirmative.—A coach was procured. He was told that that was done by order of Judge Manning, and in the course of about five minutes more our hero was on his road to Newgate.

He was carefully handcuffed.

If such had not been the case he might yet have made some sort of effort at escape, upon the principle, that it ought to be much easier to get out of a coach than out of Newgate.



The gloomy portal of the prison was soon reached, and then came the most anxious moment of all—a moment which would decide whether Claude would be recognised or not by the officials.

"What sort of a lot have you got there?" said the man at the wicket.

"I'll be hung if I know," said the officer who had special charge of Claude.—"But I don't suppose it's of much consequence; I'm to give this letter to the governor. Is he up and about?"

"Not he. Didn't you know he's been confined to his bed for a fortnight?"

"Not I."

DICK TURPIN PRESENTING HIS CARD AT THE QUAKER'S.

"Well, it's a fact then, and our fellows say here that he sickened when Claude Duval got away the last time, and has never been his own man again, and won't be, 'till we have Claude under lock and key.'"

"Then the letter must be taken to him."

"Ay, that can be done. Peter, take this letter to the governor; I suppose it's about the prisoner?"

"Not a doubt of it as it's from old Judge Manning. The charge though don't seem to be much, and between you and I and the door-post, Bill, this chap, in my notion of things, isn't the right party."

"You don't say so?"

"Yes, I do. You take a look at him."

Claude had managed, by stooping, to deceive his real height very much, and by slightly puffing out his cheeks, he certainly materially altered his personal appearance, so that one would have needed to be very familiar, indeed, with him to have recognised him.

"Humph!" said the man who was, as it is technically termed, on the lock.—"Humph! It seems, to me, as if I had seen somebody like him somewhere; but I'll be hanged if I know where.

At this moment the lad, who had been sent to the governor with the letter, came back with it opened, and said,—

"The governor is too ill to attend to it; but he says 'I'm to shew it to Mr. Blain, and he is to attend to it.'"

Then, it's no secret," said the turnkey. "Let's have a look at it."

"Ah read it out," said the officer, who had brought Claude from Bow-street. "Read it out."

"You read it, Peter."

Peter, in a school-boy-like drawling tone of voice, without the smallest regard to punctuation, then read as follows:

"Judge Manning present his compliments to the Governor of Newgate, and would feel obliged by the remanded prisoner, John Smith, being placed in a private room, and shown all the indulgence consistent with his safe keeping; as Judge Manning has not sufficient evidence to pronounce confidently on his guilt, and is anxious to commit as little injustice as possible."

By this time some half dozen officers had repaired to the vestibule, and no one seemed to recognise Claude. They all heard the letter read, and then turned away with looks of indifference, as though they would have said—

"Oh, this is nothing; this will turn out no case."

The one named Blain now took the letter, and intimated to Claude that he was to follow him.

Claude did so, affecting to be quite lame of one leg.

"Are you hurt?" said the officer.

"No," said Claude, "this is an old affair."

"Well, you can rest yourself as long as you like in the place I'm going to take you to; I suppose it's all some mistake?"

"Yes," said Claude, "quite so."

"Ah, well you will have nothing to complain of in Newgate; and when you see Judge Manning again, you can say that Blain made you as comfortable as he could."

"I will; and yet it's an awful thing to be put in Newgate."

"Stuff, I live in it. This way—this way.

I'd work not by night nor by day,
But back on my fortune I'd fall,
If I could but find out the right way,
To say 'wanted' to famed Claude Duval.

Ah, sir, he's the fellow we are all sighing after, here."

"Really," said Claude.

CHAPTER CLI.

DICK'S VISIT TO NEWGATE.

If Claude could in those adverse circumstances in which he was placed, have been amused at anything, probably the regrets, both in prose and verse, of the officer in Newgate, at the impossibility of capturing such a prize as Claude Duval, would have had that effect.

But his heart was too full to enable him to do more than faintly smile.

The room into which he was now conducted, differed very much indeed from those sad and dreary portions of the prison which ordinary malefactors, who had no one upon any ground or with any authority to intercede for them, were placed by the officials.

The letter from Judge Manning had done much more for Claude in Newgate than all the appeals to the humanity and sense of justice that could have been made, would have accomplished; and when it is recollected that many an innocent man is taken up and committed to jail until an investigation of the charge against him is made, it is a disgrace to the jurisprudence of this country, that his punishmet should begin before the law has declared him guilty.

But yet such is the case.

It is said in England to be an axiom that the law preserves all accused persons to be innocent, until, by the regular course of judicial investigation, they are clearly and distinctly proved to be guilty; but to any one who has paid attention to the subject, it is quite clear that the administrators of the law, from the lowest policeman to the governor of Newgate, are of a different opinion.

They presume that the suspected and the accused are in all cases guilty, and therefore there is no difference between the convicted thief and the man whose neighbour has "borne false witness against him," in regard to treatment.

Any man in England, who chooses to take a false oath, may place any other man in prison—put handcuffs upon his wrists—associate him with thieves, and characters worse than thieves; and although in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the innocence of the man falsely accused, would eventually be brought to light, who is to undo what is done?—Who is to say that he has not suffered as much up to the point when his innocence becomes apparent, as though he had been guilty?

Hence, then, we say that the treatment of accused persons in England is in all cases most gross and unjustifiable.

That Judge Manning felt this to be the case, is pretty manifest by the care he took that Claude should not undergo it.

The judge had doubts of Claude's guilt, and hence he had sent the letter, which the reader has heard read, to the governor of Newgate. No doubt, in the clear and astute mind of the judge, as the case or presumed case against Claude had developed itself, there had arisen many circumstances to cast a doubt upon his nephew Phillip's statements; and from all that was taking place, Claude entertained a sanguine expectation that if he happened not to be recognised, he might soon find himself at liberty.

There was a carpet upon the floor of the room to which he was consigned, and in other respects it bore evidence of regard for comfort. In a small closet adjoining was a bed, and indeed the only circumstance that really gave it what might be called quite a prison-look was that the windows were well defended by iron bars both within and without.

"What do you think of this?" said the turnkey, as he glanced round with quite an air of pride like the owner of some palace. "You may be as comfortable here as the day is long. Don't you think you can now?"

"I should not wonder," said Claude.

"Only look. Here's a fine view of a bit of the outer wall, and if you only get to this corner of the window and squint downwards, you will see a little bit of one of the enclosed yards."

"Very lively, indeed," said Claude.

"Ah, you may say that. I don't know how they are going to manage about your grub, but I suppose as they have put you into such good quarters as regards your lodging, that will be all right."

"I don't know," said Claude, "what they mean to do, but I know what they ought to do."

"What's that?"

"Why, compensate an innocent man in every way that is possible for an unjust detention here. Liberty is the dearest possession in the world, and if a man be deprived of that, he may well, provided he be innocent, expect other indulgences."

"Humph!" said the jailor, "as for the innocence, that's neither here nor there. We never yet had anybody in Newgate that, according to their own account, wasn't one of the most injured of individuals; and as for innocence, lord bless you, new born babes afore they begin squalling can't be more innocent than they. Ha—ha—!"

"Ah," said Claude, as he threw himself upon a singularly hard couch that was in the room. "You look, my friend, upon all these things with a professional eye."

"I rather think I do. However, I wish you well; and if I can do you a good turn, I will, for to tell you the truth, I like the looks of you."

"You have my best thanks."

The man smiled and withdrew. Claude heard the sound of the lock of the door as it was carefully secured on the outside, and then there was the unequivocal bang of an iron bar into it's place.

"These indulgences," said Claude to himself, "are not without the usual severities, but this is better than a cell. I wonder now if I owe this to the honest convictions creeping over Judge Manning that I have told the truth and that his nephew is a rogue, or to his fears about his child?"

By a natural movement enongh now Claude commenced a careful examination of his prison.

No place could so little reward a scrutiny. There was literally nothing that could invite a second glance. The walls were stone. The floor was stone. Hobs or cupboards, with the exception of that which held his bed, there were none, and that might be called something between a hole and a cupboard. Less than five minutes sufficed to convince Claude that there was nothing to glean in the way of hopeful information from an examination of the room, if it might be called so, in which he was.

He cast himself upon the hard couch again, and gave himself up to reflections, some of which were of anything but a pleasant or consolatory character. It seemed to him to be next to an impossibility that he should escape recognition from some of the authorities of Newgate, and in that case he, of course, knew that the very worst might be expected. There was only one gleam of consolation amid the sombre darkness of his position, and that was the conviction that Cicely was safe and well cared for.

It cost him much thought, however, and many pangs to know how and in what way he should communicate to her his perilous position.

When he came upon that subject, the tumult of his thoughts would not allow him to be still, and he rose and paced the small apartment to and fro, with rapid and uneasy steps.

In the midst of this state of things, he was startled by the sudden opening of the door, and Phillip Manning stood upon the threshold.

"You will find him there, sir," said a voice. "I will wait, and you have only to call out in a loud voice 'Very,' and I will come and let you out."

"Thank you," said Phillip.

The door was closed, and he stood a couple of paces within Claude's particular prison.

At this moment, the impulse to knock him down certainly came strongly over Claude, but by a powerful effort of his judgment, he restrained it, for he felt how important it was to him not only to hear what Phillip had to say, but likewise to avoid making any commotion in the prison, which might have the effect of summoning round him some who might know him.

He would not speak first, however, but he looked Phillip in the face with a stern defiance, before which the conscious villain shrunk and trembled.

At length, finding that Claude would not ask him the purport of his visit, he was compelled to commence the conference himself.

"You may make me your friend, if you like," said Phillip.

"No," said Claude. "If such a thing were possible I would decline the process. Speak out at once, and say what new circumlocution of villany brings you here?"

"I regret the turn affairs have taken."

"Indeed."

"Yes, in truth I do; and I think, upon mature consideration, we had better back out of it now, with what we can get."

"We?"

"Yes; I say we, because I am quite willing that you should be a sharer in the full proceeds, you see."

"Go on. Explain yourself more fully," said Claude, controlling as well as he was able, which was not very well, the indignation that was swelling at his heart.

"Why, I don't mind telling you because no one else hears me, and if you repeat it, nobody will believe yon, that I did, while you were talking to the Judge, pass out and get possession of Grace."

"I know it."

"That is to say you guessed it."

"Well, well, Phillip, I guessed at it.—What next?"

"I can't help stopping to tell you how well pleased I am to find you so reasonable about this matter; for, to tell you the truth, I fully expected you would have stormed and raved in good style."

"You see how calm I am?"

"Yes, I perceive. Well, as I was saying, I recovered my prisoner and have her safe, but—but the thing is a failure rather, and—and——"

"How a failure? If you have her safe, what do you mean by a failure? You must explain yourself more particularly."

"Well," said Phillip, with a toss of his head. "You know so much of the affair already, and you suspect so much more, that the safest way, if any good is to be done with you, is to tell you all."

"Much the safest," said Claude.

"So I think. In the first place I want money. In the next I was not without a certain amount of admiration of my cousin Grace.

"Good."

"Well, as we were first cousins, and so within the legal bounds of consanguinity, I did not see the least objection to marry her. She is my uncle's only child, and will inherit all his wealth, to a certainty, and he is rich. I proposed to Grace."

"And was rejected?"

"Yes, with great scorn. From that moment I promised myself revenge; but I likewise promised myself that I would be careful in my manner of exacting it. Grace went to stay with a distant relative, from whom I got her away by the story of her father's illness, as you are well aware. You met us and spoiled my plans, or I should have taken her where she would have been quite safe, and I would have forced her into a marriage or blighted her existence in such a way, that it would have been a relief to have had even me to have called by the name of husband."

"The situation," said Claude, "must have been indeed desperate that would have made that a desirable resource."

Phillip continued without heeding this bitter sarcasm.

"But things have turned out differently. She is as obstinate as twenty mules, and I am afraid that she will kill herself. All I have got her to consent to, is, that if she is restored to her father, she will, provided you likewise consent, bury the whole affair in oblivion, and not accuse me. But that is only half the battle gained. I want money, aad surely you cannot be quite indifferent to the claims of a couple of thousand pounds."

"Not at all."

"Well then, I know that for the restoration of his child, the judge, if you ask him, will hand you a draft for £4000 or £5000, and consent to ask no questions.

He will be with you here in the couse of an hour. I ask you to adopt that course. Ask him for the money. Promise him his child by twelve o'clock to night; and then when you hand me the cheque, I will restore you, and to-morrow morning we will meet and share the proceeds."

"Ah!" said Claude. He could not trust himself at the moment to say more.

"Well, is it a bargain?"

"Where is she?"

"You must excuse me there, my friend. That is a secret worth knowing, so I intend to keep it to myself."

Claude covered his face with both his hands and thought. Shall I, he thought, consent in appearance to this villany for the sake of restoring the child to the father, and then afterwards proclaim it? No—no. He, this Phillip, will bind Grace to secresy by some oaths, which her pure spirit will not break; and then I should denounce him in vain; besides, could I go through the interview with the judge? No—no. A hundred times no. The words in which I should cloathe the proposal for the restoration of his daughter for a sum of money, would stick in my throat. I could not—I could not!

"Have you decided?" said Phillip.

"Yes!" cried Claude, with startling energy.

"And you will do it?"

"You will find what I will do. Villain! Monster!"

Claude made a dash at him and caught him by the throat. Phillip raised a stifled cry, but it sufficed to reach the ears of the turnkey, who opened the door just as Phillip was turning black in the face.

"Holloa! What's this!"

"Keep off!" cried Claude. "Keep off! There will be one scoundrel the less in the world. Keep off, I pray you."

"No, no, this sort of thing won't do," said the turnkey.

As he spoke he drew from his pocket a whistle, and blew a shrill note, which had the effect of bringing half-a-dozen turnkeys to his aid, and by their united exertions, Phillip Manning was torn, more dead than alive, from the grasp of Claude.

For a few minutes the scene of confusion was most intense; and several of the officers were of opinion that Phillip Manning was dead.

"You have let yourself in for it now," said one; "you will swing for this."

"Such a villain," said Claude, "deserved death from the first hand that could be raised with sufficient power to inflict it."

"Ah," said an old officer shaking his head sagely from side to side. "If all the villains were to be throttled, what would become of the population I should like to know. That would never do."

The door of the room was again closed upon Claude, and fastened securely, while the insensible, and as some thought, the dead Phillip was taken to the Infirmary, for the purpose of seeing if the surgeon could do anything for him.

It was only a case of suspended animation. A little blood-letting soon recovered him. Such folks as Phillip Manning, somehow, always do take a deal of killing, while people whose lives are of both public and private consequence, most easily

"Shuffle off this mortal coil."

There is surely a special Providence for the conservation of blackguardism. Do we not see daily instances of men whose lives, as far as society is concerned, are perfectly worthless, running risks and escaping dangers which would be the instant destruction of any really estimable and valuable member of society? There are men who ride across horses, who patronise gigs, who ride steeple-chases, and daily expose themselves to all the chances of death and accident, and yet upon such men's safety, you may freely wager—and why? Simply because their deaths would be a gain rather than a loss to society.

And so Phillip recovered with his heart full of such unmitigated hatred to Claude, whom, it must not be forgotten, he only knew as John Smith, that nothing short of his complete destruction would now satisfy him.

It was about half an hour after these events, that Claude's door was opened again, and the turnkey said—

"Here's your brother, Tom Smith, as he calls himself. I suppose you won't go far to throttle him!"

CHAPTER CLII.

JACK UNDERTAKES A PERILOUS MISSION.

"My, brother!" exclaimed Claude.

"Yes. But if he isn't, why we can——"

"Stop! Stop!" cried Claude, "it's all right; I only thought he was out of town. That's all. Let him come in directly."

"Ah, John," said a voice, "I knew you would be glad to see me."

It was Dick Turpin.

Claude, at the moment, deeply congratulated himself that he had taken the hint about a brother, and not said anything to breed a suspicion that such was not the case; but he was, at the same time, full of wonder to know how Dick could possibly have found out what had happened to him.

"I am, indeed, glad to see you, Tom," said Claude.

"Oh, it's all right," said the turnkey, as he closed the door. "There will be no throttling this time, I suppose."

The moment they were fairly alone, Claude said,—

"Dick, I am pleased, and afflicted at this visit."

"How afflicted?"

"At the danger you thrust yourself into."

"Oh, don't think of that. Danger is the element such men as you and I live in. It comes as natural to us as water to a fish; but, speak low, and don't pronounce my name, nor will I yours. Walls have ears they say, and I don't feel much trust in anything, even being quite alone in Newgate."

"I will be careful; but how did you find me out?"

"I have many and some very strange sources of information. At some other time we will talk about that. Moments are precious just now; for, although, it is contrary to their orders to forbid me to visit you, upon my stating my near relationship; yet they will cut that visit as short as possible, you may depend."

"True—true!"

"Then tell me, Claude, at once, what is best to be done, and Jack and I will do it. Bother my tongue! I uttered your name just now, after myself giving you the caution not to do so."

"Never mind. You spoke in a very low tone."

"I hope I did."

"Be assured you did, and that, as yet, all is well. There is only one course of conduct that you and Jack can adopt to aid me, and that is to follow Phillip Manning, and find out where he has bestowed Grace."

"He has her, then?"

"Yes; the villain has been here and confessed as much. I have half choaked him, I believe; but I hope I have not wholly done so. The restoration of Grace to her father, untramelled by any promise to keep secret Phillip's share in the infamous transaction, will be the signal for my instant liberation; and if that can take place before any awkward recognition of me takes place here, the whole affair will end well, and do to laugh at on a winter's night.

"It shall be done."

"Then I feel easy; for well I know that if it can be done at all, you and Jack are the persons to do it: and now, as regards Cicely, merely tell her that I am engaged for a day or two upon a matter that has suddenly sprung up; but it is quite needless to mention me in any connexion with this dreadful building, which is already sufficiently a bug-bear to her imagintaion."

"All shall be as you wish in that respect."

"Hilloa! is the gossiping over?" cried the turnkey. "Ten minutes is all we allow."

"Yes, yes," said Dick. "Good-by, John."

"Good-by," said Claude. "All's right. They are very civil to me here, Tom, and this man has been particularly so."

Both Claude and Dick felt the importance of propitiating the officials of the prison, so Dick at once handed the man a guinea, saying—

"Take that as an earnest of another, when my brother here is declared innocent, which he is."

The turnkey tossed the coin in the air by a dexterousmovement of his thumb; and as he caught it in its descent, and placed it in his waistcoat pocket, he looked aside at Claude, saying—

"He won't fare the worse; but mum is the word about the spangle."

"All's right," said Dick; "I know. God bless you, brother John.—You will soon be out of this."

Claude was again alone, but his reception of visitors was not yet over. Phillip Manning had spoken for once in a way, just because it happened to suit him, the truth, when he said the judge was about to pay Claude a visit, and sure enough, Dick had hardly got well clear of Newgate, when the judge was announced.

Claude rose and received the old man with respect, for he could not quarrel with him, knowing well, that in his conduct towards him he acted as any one would have done under the circumstances, and probably with much more consideration, than any ordinary person would have brought to bear upon the subject.

Claude was aware that the judge placed his own back to the light, which gave him the advantage of seeing Claude's features fully, while his own were partially shrouded; but Claude had no sort of objection to such an arrangement. He had no emotion of his mind, that might find expression upon his countenance, to conceal.

"You will perhaps be surprised at this visit," said the judge.

"No, sir. Your nephew told me of it."

"What, Phillip?"

"Even so, sir."

"Then he has made already an attempt to move you to compassion for a father's sufferings? What has been your answer?"

"Phillip has made no such attempt."

"Do not try to deceive me. For what other motive could he seek you in this gloomy prison?"

"To add to his villany by attempting to get me to participate in a scheme of robbing you."

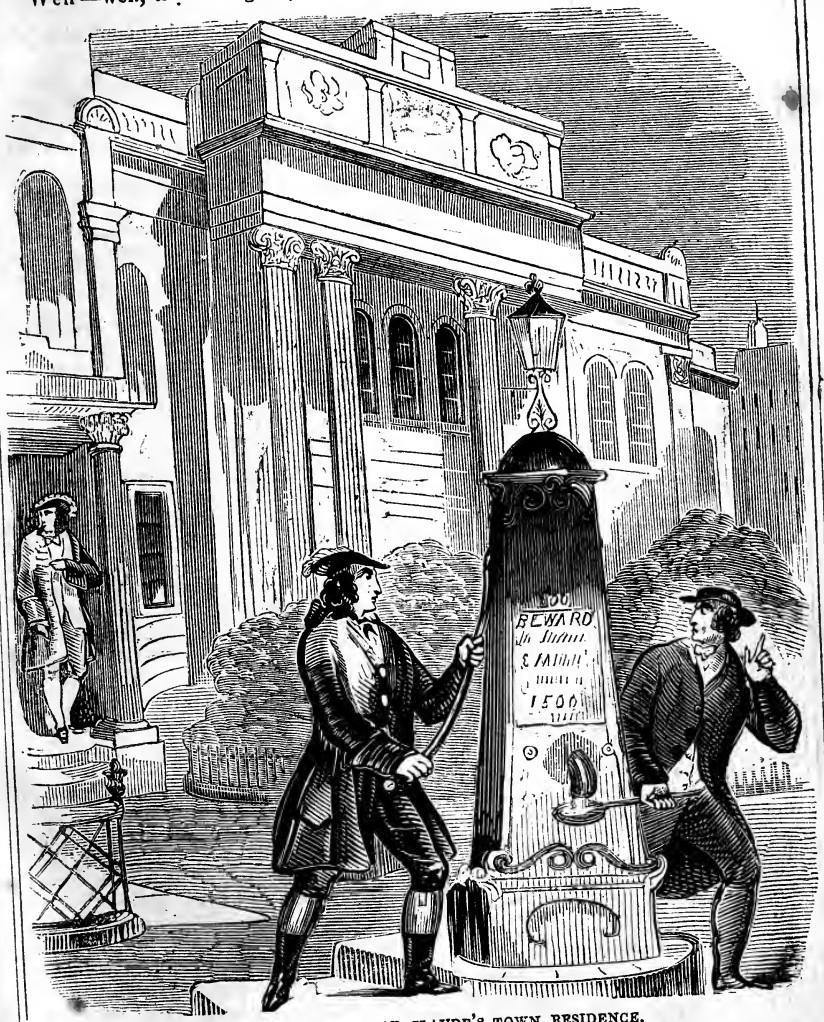
"Impossible!"

"And yet true, sir. I took him by the throat as my answer. They wrested him from me, or he would not have lived to deny the new charge against him as, of course, he will most freely and distinctly."

"Alas! alas! What am I to think?"

"Nothing is more natural than that you should be thoroughly confused by all that has happened. You would need to have the prescience of the Almighty to see your way through the conflicting evidence that is brought before you. Nothing but the evidence now of your daughter, Grace, can be conclusive to your mind."

"Restore her to me—restore her to me!"



"I would that I could."

"Hark your, sir; this child—this Grace—is the child of my old age. My only one. Without her I am desolate. God who looks into all hearts as into an open book, only knows if you be guilty or innocent of her abduction; but you must confess yourself that circumstances are strong against you."

"They are."

"Well—well, if you be guilty, I implore you, as you wish that Heaven should overlook that guilt—as you hope for all, ay, more than all, the advantages you even expected to accrue from that guilt—I entreat you to restore her to me upon your own terms; you have only to speak."

"This is hard, indeed."

"What is hard?"

"To be thus appealed to upon the presumption of my guilt. I tell you, sir judge once for all, that I was your child's defender—that I rescued her; but that she has been torn away from me and from you again. Look to Phillip for a further answer."

The judge groaned.

"Yes, sir; I add, and I add it most emphatically—Look to Phillip, whom you have loaded with benefits—to Phillip, whom you have had occasion to forgive for much, and whom you have so forgiven. Look to him, and to him only, for your child."

"I am as one in a maze, I know not what to think, nor which way to move," said the judge, mournfully.

"Hark ye, sir," said Claude, after a slight pause. "I do not feel any degree of bitterness or resentment against you for this imprisonment which I innocently suffer. I admit it was forced upon you."

"If you be innocent," said the judge, "you are the most generous of men. But if guilty, you are——"

"Go on, sir. Being innocent, I can very well bear to hear what you would say of guilt."

"You are, then, of guilty, the most artful and spurious."

"Excepting one."

"What one?"

"Your nephew, Phillip, sir."

"If I were once only assured of his guilt in the present instance, he should never again reach my heart; but it is too improbable. What could he, of all men, have to gain by the abduction of my child, but shame and want?"

"He knows that you are rich, sir."

"Granted that I am. What then?"

"He knows that Grace is your only child, and that upon her will devolve the greatest amount of your wealth. Thus calculating, then, his great object was to get her to consent to an union with him."

"You are wrong. She has already explicitly refused him."

"Yes, but he hoped that by taking her from all who would befriend, he should be able to place her in such a position that even marriage with him would be far better than the shame which would be her position otherwise."

A flush of angry colour came to the judge's cheeks.

"No, no," he said, "that is too much."

"In what way?" said Claude, speaking quickly. "Do you think that anything in the way of wickedness, that you and I may imagine is in reality, too much for Phillip to perpetrate? I tell you, sir, he has been to me to-day."

"I know it. He has tried to move your heart."

"Move my heart? In good truth, sir, he did move both my heart and brain to that extent, that I could not keep my fingers from his throat. I did not kill him; but it will be some time before Phillip Manning forgets the clutch with which I held him, in consequence of moving my heart."

The judge glared at Claude with an expression that looked almost like insanity, as he said—

"And what is your account of the interview you have had with Phillip?"

"The true one?"

"But its substance?"

"That you will not believe it if I tell it to you; and yet you shall know that he admitted to me he knew where Grace was, and his object in coming to me was to get me to take the guilt off his shoulders, by owning that I was the criminal, and asking of you a large sum for the restoration of your child, which sum he proposed to share with me. That was his errand."

The judge looked astonished.

"And your answer?" he said.

"Look for it upon Philip's throat."

"I know not what to think. I am bewildered. Your tone and manner is so like innocence, and yet the circumstances are so strongly against you, that you may well suppose that even, with all my experience, I know not what to think."

"Granted, sir. And now I will make to you a proposal."

"Name it. If it tend to the restoartion of my child, you may make your own terms. Go on. Go on!

"The first condition of my proposal is, that you will not insult me by supposing that what I am about to offer to do is for money. Do you consent to that?"

"I do."

"Then, sir, I will make an effort to get back your daughter from the hands of your nephew Phillip, if you will aid me to do so. I have friends without this prison. It matters not who or what they are, but for my sake they will do their utmost to find out where Phillip has bestowed Grace. Their exertions will be something worth thinking of, but from you I must have certain facilities for them."

"Name any sum required."

"It is not money. What I demand is that they come and go as they please to me in this prison, without question or hindrance."

"Granted."

"'Tis settled then. I demand too, that I may correspond with who I please without my letters being subject to the surveillance of the authorities of the prison."

"Send any letter you please, addressed to whom you like, under cover to me, and I pledge you my honour as a gentleman to forward it."

"I am quite satisfied, sir."

"Then you will try your best?"

"Sir—sir. Remember that you still suspect me guilty."

"No, hardly now."

"Why am I here then? Nay do not look confused, sir, at the seeming inconsistency of your acts. Were I in your place, and you in mine, I daresay I should do as you do, and with that feeling, I of course find no fault with you. As soon as I can get any intelligence for you, satisfactory or otherwise, you shall hear it."

"I thank you, and be assured that if in this matter I have done you an injustice, I have both the will and the power to amply indemnify you for it. You shall want for nothing here."

"I thank you. I am certainly not partial to prison fare."

"Then you know what it is?" said the judge, quickly.

"Yes," said Claude, "and I can well see that that admission tells much against me in your mind. But let it go. You will find that there are worse men out of prison by far, sir, than in them, and that piece of knowledge may be of the first importance to you upon the seat of judgment."

The judge rose and went to the door of Claude's cell. A turnkey was within call, to whom he said—

"Is the governor up?"

"Yes, my lord judge," said the man, "and he will be happy to see you."

"Very well. I wan't to speak to him." Then turning to Claude, he said—"You may write to me with safety, and you will find, by the free egress and ingress of your friends, if you send for them, that the agreement is being carried out."

Claude bowed.

The door of the prison room was closed, and again barred and locked, and Claude was alone.

"All may yet be well," he said, as he paced the narrow confines of the apartment. "If Dick and Jack can be but the means of restoring Grace to her father, the tale that she will have to tell will complete my justification, and all I shall then ask will be an instant release. Oh, that I were on the road again, breathing the free air of Heaven from the back of my gallant steed."

The very first thing now that Claude wished to do was to make Dick and Jack aware of the sort of bargain he had made with the judge.

This could now easily be accomplished by writing to them and putting the utmost confidence in the promise of the judge to forward his letters without any examination, provided they were addressed to him, he wrote the particulars of the conversation we have worded, ending by saying—

"To save me, detect Phillip Manning. I leave it to the skill and the friendship of you both, to do so much for me."

CHAPTER CLIII.

JACK AND DICK GO UPON THE TRACK OF PHILLIP MANNING, AND MAKE A DISCOVERY.

The cogitations of Phillip Manning, after his interview with Claude, could not be of a pleasant character. In addition to being half choked, he had, by his folly and his criminality in the whole transaction, placed himself in a most uncomfortable situation.

Gladly, most gladly, would he now have backed out of the affair, if he could possibly have done so without compromising himself beyond all power of redemption with his uncle.

Whatever scenes or follies of extravagance the old judge might from time to time be inclined to forgive his nephew, it was not at all probable that if he came before him in the character of the abductor of his much-loved child, that he could feel anything but the most intense indignation.

Phillip felt this.

We will, preceding the receipt of Claude's letter by Dick and Jack—by-the-by, it was addressed to the latter, for Claude felt that Jack deserved the compliment at his hands—take a peep at the proceedings of Master Phillip.

We have already stated that while Claude was carrying on that most inauspicious dialogue with the old judge, Phillip had gone into the street, and found the carriage which contained Grace.

The young creature had been waiting most anxiously for the return of Claude, and when the coach door was opened, she looked for nothing but to see him, and to hear some message from her father.

When the hateful countenance of Phillip Manning met her gaze, she seemed as though her life were evaporating, and she could only gaze upon him with a speechless despair.

"You are mine," he said. "You are mine. Ha! ha! I have you once again, and your are mine."

Overcome completely by the sound of these terrible words, a dimness, as if the world were enveloped in a mist, came before her eyes, and she swooned, falling to the bottom of the carriage.

"Good!" said Phillip. "Good!"

He at once closed the carriage door, and having carefully fastened it, he mounted himself on the box, and drove off.

Where and how she was bestowed, will be best understood by a slight detail of the circumstances that ensued, upon her coming to her senses again.

When Grace opened her eyes, all was darkness—darkness, too, of the most profound character—so that although she held up her hand before her eyes, she could not see it.

At first her memory was so confused that she could not recollect the various circumstances of the last twenty-four hours; but this state of inertitude did not last long, for gradually circumstance by circumstance then came back to her in detail, all the events that had placed her in her present position, but what that position was she could only conjecture.

She at first felt fearful that she was in some sort of bondage that would prevent her from rising; but she found that that was not the case, and she gained her feet.

"Father! father! Help me!" she cried.

The echo of her own voice was the only answer that was returned to her cry for aid.

"Just Heaven!" she cried, "what will become of me?"

She sank upon her knees, and remained for some time in that attitude of supplication to the Deity, begging for that mercy and consideration which, if extended to any one in this world, surely should be to one so pure and so faultless as she was.

When she rose from this act of devotion, she felt greatly refreshed in spirit, and much more able to reason calmly upon her perilous situation. She did not entertain the smallest doubt as to the fact of her being again in the power of Phillip Manning, and she resolved that, let what might occur, he should not see any evidences of fear upon her part now.

"If I subdue him," she said, "it will only be by showing no fear. His dastard spirit would rejoice in my despondency, as much as it will be cowed by an appearance of courage."

There could not possibly be a juster mode of reasoning than this, as regarded Phillip Manning. His was just the sort of disposition to indulge in weak triumph where he found submission, but to be abashed and shrinking before that real courage, which even in the midst of his power should defy him.

Having come to this resolve, Grace began, as well as the intense darkness would permit her, to feel about the room, in order to ascertain its proportions, and, if possible, find some window or other aperture, by which she could get light.

After a time she did find the window. But the shutters were fast closed. She could only tell by the feel that a window it was; but all her exertions did not enable her to find any means of unclosing the shutters.

Suddenly, while she was engaged upon the attempt, she heard a rattling noise and from beneath a door, she saw a thin pencil of light.

Clasping her hands, she waited in expectation of what might then ensue, fully, determined to defy Phillip to the utmost.

She heard a key rattle in a lock—she heard a heavy bolt drawn from the outside of a door, and then it opened, and Phillip Manning, conveying a lamp in one hand, appeared before her.

The sudden glare of light from the lamp, after the intense darkness she had been in, was painful to her eyes at first; but in the course of a moment or two, that feeling wore off, and she was able to move her hand from before them. Phillip had paused upon the threshold, and was looking into the room with an inquiring gaze.

"Grace! he said, "Grace!"

She would not answer him."

"Good Heaven!" he exclaimed, "she has not escaped?"

He rushed into the room with vehemence, but when he saw her standing by the window he drew a long breath of most exquisite relief, and holding the lamp above his head, he said—

"So you are here?"

Still she would not answer him.

"This obstinacy," he said, "will not avail you. Grace, do you know where you are?"

"Yes," she replied.

"Ah! you know?"

"I am in the hands of a villain, so far as he thinks, but in reality I am, as he too is in the hands of Heaven."

"Let Heaven open the door, then, for you," he said, with a sneer; "but I am not going to quarrel with you, Grace. I come to bring you freedom and happiness."

She started and felt her colour come and go at the delightful prospect, but fearing some villany, as, indeed, she had abundant cause to do, she said nothing.

"You have but to acquiese in what I shall propose to you," he added, "and you will be never again subject to such an annoyance as you now suffer from; your fate is in your own hands."

"Go on," she said, finding that he would not continue speaking unless she made some sort of reply to him—"go on."

"You encourage me to proceed," he said. "'Tis well that you should do so, and I am glad, indeed, to find you so reasonable. Now, Grace, you know that I love you."

"You—love—me?"

"Yes, and why not?"

"Oh, no, no, no!"

"You doubt it? I ought to be able to convince you of your error."

"No, Philip, no. Love desires the happiness of its object, but you do not, cannot love but one. It is not in your nature."

"And that one is you?"

"No, no."

"What absurd story have you got hold of to my prejudice? Who could have dared to tell you falsely that I love another? Name at once the author of the calumny? Who is it you would say that I love?"

"Yourself, Phillip. Only yourself."

He looked abashed.

"Pshaw!" he said, after taking a few moments to recover himself. "Pshaw! This is only some foolish delusion. My love for you is so great that, you see, in the face of the most serious obstacles, I have taken you away; and now, Grace, you have only to consent to be mine, and you shall be at liberty."

"Look you, Phillip. Where death by some lingering torture upon the one hand, and you upon the other. I would gladly, if no other mode of escaping from you presented itself, endure the bitterest pangs."

"You only say this, Grace."

"I think it, too."

"No, no, or if you do, your mind will change some day. Perhaps the beauty upon which you, no doubt, pride yourself, will fade after the confinement of a year or two in this place, and you will be right glad to embrace my offer. I will keep you here until you go mad and your father dies, and then I will produce you, and as your next of kin, claim the benevolent care of you and all your property. Ha! ha!"

"O, Phillip do you, can you think there is a God above us?"

"I care not."

"The time will come for you to care, indeed."

"Ha! ha! You would attempt to frighten me by religious terrors, would you? but such a course will not do for Phillip Manning. I am long past all that. Let us kiss and be friends."

"Away! do not pollute me by your touch."

"Now by all that's —— I've half a mind. But no; that would be folly. You will think better of all this, Grace. I am willing to restore you to your father, upon condition that you immediately give me your hand, and likewise to tell to him, to account for your absence, such a tale as I shall concoct for you."

"Never—never!"

"Beware—beware!"

"Beware of what?—Of you, poor villain? No! You have the heart to think of deep crimes, but not the courage to perpetrate them! I am not afraid of you, Phillip Manning, and I never shall be. My first act the moment I see my father's face, will be to proclaim to him you villany, and to ask his utmost gratitude for him who rescued me from you some time since, and to whom some sad accident must have happened, or I should not have again fallen into your power."

"He's in Newgate."

"Newgate?"

"Yes, charged by your father, at my instigation, with your abduction. Your father is fully possessed with a belief that he has secreted you somewhere, and will no doubt, exert the utmost rigour of the law against him. But you can save him."

"I?"

"Yes; by consenting to become mine he shall be released. All that is required is that your father should be to a certain extent mystified in the affair, which will do him no harm."

"Once and for all," replied Grace, "I reject with scorn your proposals. If I suffer—if my generous and gallant preserver suffer—if my father suffer, let the account of all these deeds be asked of you at the judgment seat of the Almighty. It is your work, Phillip."

"We shall see," said Phillip, "we shall see."

He glared at her with such fiendish ferocity, that even boldly as she had hitherto maintained herself towards him, she almost shrank before him, fearing that he might descend to personal violence.

This no doubt would have been the result of the interview, but really, Phillip felt a degree of terror at the young girl, half a child as she was, which kept him back; and besides, he knew that there could be no hope of anything in the shape of a reconciliation if he once laid his hand upon her in anger.

He drew back.

"Thank my clemency," he said.

She did not condescend to contradict him. Her attitude and the expression upon her face were fully sufficient to show him what her feelings were upon the subject.

For a few moments now, a death-like stillness subsided in the room; and finding she was not likely to break it, Phillip said—

"Perhaps you are not quite aware, that by the law as it stands at present, it is death to abduct from her home a person of your age? When he who now lies in Newgate upon that charge, suffers on the scaffold, I will bring you an account of his last moments.

Without waiting for her reply to this, which he thought likely enough might be one he did not wish to hear, he abruptly left the room.

All was dark again.

When she found herself alone, the feelings of Grace underwent rather a sort of revulsion, and she trembled excessively and wept. But her natural good sense—her education and her courage, soon rose up against the longer continuance of such a state of depression, and she rallied amazingly.

"No—no," she said, "I may suffer, and all who are dear to me may suffer, but I will not deviate from that path which I know and feel to be the right one."

She found her way, notwithstanding the intense darkness in which she was, to the couch upon which she had been lying before her recovery, and sitting upon its edge, she began as calmly as she could to think over her position, and its meagre prospects.

While she was thus occupied, she heard the voice of Phillip in the passage, if passage it were, outside the door of the room, saying—

"Be quick—be quick!"

The door was opened, and while he held the light, an old decrepid hag of a woman came in with some bread and a pitcher of water.

"Here, my honey," she said, in a strong Irish accent, "don't say we starves you, any way."

"Peace!" cried Phillip.

"Musha! master, I was only saying to the little ladybird that any how we——"

"Peace, I say.—Come away."

The old woman hobbled out of the room again, and Phillip carefully fastened the door. She heard him fumbling at it for some time, and it was clear he was most particular about the fastenings.

CHAPTER CLIV.

JACK REPLENISHES CLAUDE'S PURSE.—THE PURSUIT OF PHILLIP.

THE letter that Claude sent through the orders of Judge Manning to Jack came duly to hand.

Dick had completely forgone his intentions of leaving that part of the country, and now signified to Jack, that he would devote himself entirely to the service of Claude, in the matter of his most unjust imprisonment.

To say that Jack was pleased at this determination is to say very little, for in point of fact he was overjoyed at it.

"It is such brave friends as yourself," said Jack, "that Claude wants, now he is in difficulty and danger."

"Well," replied Dick, "he shall not be either in difficulty or in danger for long, if our exertions can rescue him. Let us set about it, Jack, with good will, and if we do not succeed in finding out where this rascal, Phillip Manning has bestowed the young lady, it will, indeed, be an odd thing to me."

Where there's a will, there's certainly, in a vast number of cases, a way, and so Dick and Jack set about placing themselves upon the track of Master Phillip.

They both remounted at the farmhouse, where Cicely was in comfort and security, and at a brisk trot went towards London. Jack seemed to be considering something, and suddenly he said—

"Money is a good thing to have plenty of in Newgate."

"In good truth it is," replied Dick. "The power of money by no means ceases at the vestibule of Newgate."

"Well, then, I know it is quite impossible, what with one thing and another, that Claude can be even moderately well provided; so the only thing I can think of doing is to get him some."

"I understand you," said Dick, with a smile; "you would levy a contribution upon some traveller?"

"I would."

"Don't let me, then, be at all in your way; and if I can render you any assistance, depend upon me."

"Many thanks. I am resolved to stop the first traveller we meet, who shall look worth the robbing. If there are two, I shall, of course, be glad for you to tackle one of them while I make free with the purse of the other; and who knows but we may be lucky enough to get him a good round sum by our exertions?"

Dick could not help smiling at the seriousness with which Jack spoke of their exertions, as though it was some legitimate business affair; but he said, jocosely—

"Yes, Jack, and I promise you that I will manage to keep up the supply to Claude, as long as he is not in a position to help himself. Who knows but some of these fine nights I may get a wound which may so far disable me as to make me fall into the hands of the Philistines myself?"

"It may happen to any of us," said Jack.

"Well," added Dick, "you may rely upon my co-operation with you, if it be necessary."

Jack expressed his acknowledgments with infinite gravity, and the two made their way at an easy canter to London.

At that period, the environs of the metropolis, to the west and to the north in particular, presented a strikingly rural appearance, and you got quite among the houses before you lost the aspect of the country. To a greater extent than any other roads out of London, these environs now present rural aspects; for when the traveller reaches Hampstead or Acton, he might, by a very small stretch of imagination, fairly enough fancy himself many miles from the giant city.

PHILIP MANNING RESOLVES TO MURDER GRACE WHEN DICK SEIZES AND SECURES HIM.

Thus, then, although both Jack and Dick were very close to Oxford-street, they by no means despaired of meeting with some one whom they might ease of a little ready cash. They were passing through a long avenue of trees, not far off what is now called the New-road, leading towards Acton, when they became conscious of the sound of wheels behind them.

"I hear the sound."

"Shall I leave you to the adventure if it be only one man?"

"Yes, if you will be so good, and another time I will give you the road in the same way."

"Don't mention that. I know your motive, and am quite contented that you should have all the spoil, upon this occasion, to take to our mutual friend, Claude."

Dick accordingly left the side of Jack, and rode so close to the trees on one side of the road, and with so quiet a step, too, that it was next thing to impossible he could be seen.

Jack posted himself in the centre of the road.

In the course of a few minutes the sound of the approaching wheels became very distinct, and Jack's experience told him that it was only a two-wheeled vehicle that was coming. A feeling of great disappointment came over him, for it might only be some commercial traveller, after all, with nothing worth the stopping him for. Still he resolved upon making the experiment, and when the gig, for a gig it was, came sufficiently near, he called out—

"Stop!"

The voice in which he spoke was quite loud enough to have reached further than the gig, and its occupant, and the result was an instant draw-up of the vehicle.

Jack galloped towards it, and when he got quite close, he said in calm determined tones—

"Your money, or your life and money both?"

The person who had been driving was evidently in such a state of terror that he could not speak; but Jack could hear his teeth chattering together like a pair of castanets.

"Comply with my demand quickly," he said, "and you are in no danger."

"I—I have only got eighteen-pence—"

"Pho! pho!"

"Oh, good Mr. Highwayman, it's a melancholy fact, it is, indeed. I'm a very poor fellow, upon my word I am."

"Who are you?" said Jack. "I fancy I have heard your voice before, somewhere; and if I know any good of you, I will let you off. I cannot see your face. Why don't you have lights to your gig?"

"Yes—yes, good sir, I had."

"Where are they, then?"

"They—they blowed out, good Mr. Highwayman. I've only got a small matter of eighteen-pence. Indeed, that's all."

"We shall see. Who are you? Speak at once, or I shall take some means of unloosening your tongue that you won't like."

"My name, sir, is—is Thomas."

"Thomas what?"

"Brereton, sir. I'm usually called plain Tom Brereton, sir; of course, a gentleman like you, sir, may call me what he likes. Take my eighteen-pence, and spare my life."

"Ah," said Jack, "I thought I knew your voice. Why, you are a terrible rascal, Mr. Tom Brereton. I have heard of you. Do you know anything of Claude Duval?"

"I'm done, I'm done. I'm a dead man! I'm as good as done for. The Lord have mercy upon me. It's Claude Duval himself. Oh, don't cut me off in the flower of my youth, don't; I'm too great a sinner, indeed I am, and ought to have time given me to repent."

"You are a sinner I know," said Jack; "but don't be going off with the idea that you are stopped by Claude Duval, for I am not he. You ought to know that well enough by my voice, which is so strikingly different from his; nor is he in my company, nor in any way connected with this affair. Yet by chance I happen to know you are a great rascal, and have behaved yourself as badly as possible to him."

"Oh, no, no, no——"

"I say yes."

"Good Mr. Highwayman, you really are quite mistaken. You don't know how fond I am of Claude Duval."

"Fond of him?"

"Yes; I value him next to the apple of my eye, indeed I do. If you come near him, pray give my respects to him, and tell him how glad I shall always be to see him. Good night, sir, good night. I hope you may do a good stroke of business to night. Good night, sir."

"Move one inch, and I will blow your brains out."

"Oh, dear—oh, dear. What's that?"

"What?"

Quite involuntarily Jack looked in the direction that Tom Brereton pointed to, and at that moment, relying probably upon having a fast horse in the gig, Tom made a desperate attempt to be off, but Jack was one too many for him at that game, and darting to the horse's head, secured him in a moment.

"This is very uncivil of you," said Jack; "you wanted to leave me, did you, without any acknowlegements for your civility? but I will put it out of your power to play such another trick. I have wasted too long a time upon you already."

Tom translated these words into a direct threat to murder him, and throwing himself out of the gig, he fell upon his knees in the road, crying—

"Spare my life, and take all I have. I have got a £100 with me, good Mr. Highwayman, that I stole myself, for you can't think how I have been taken in in marrying."

"You deserve any fate," said Jack.

With this he at once cut the traces of the horse, and set the creature at liberty from the chaise, so that Tom Brereton had no opportunity of again trying to give him the slip. He then approached him, and clapping a pistol to his face, said—

"The money. Give it up at once."

"Here, Sir. Here good Mr. Highwayman. Here. Do you know, sir, I stole it from my wife, who stole it from the dressing room of a lady, that she has gone to live with as maid. I was going to make off with it, sir, if you please, out of the country; and I stole the gig too, sir, and I stole the horse."

"Why, you incorrigible rascal, you will tell me next that you stole the coat that is upon your back."

"Ah, sir. I stole the whole suit, that I did, sir."

"Then you can't blame me," said Jack. "You may depend upon my giving your compliments and kind regards to Claude Duval, if ever I should come across him, and in the meantime I wish you a very good night."

"Won't you give me back some of the money, sir?"

"Give you back some? How absurd. No, Mr. Tom Brereton, you must do the best you can with what you have left."

"Left! Gracious! I have not one farthing."

"Nonsence, you know you have eighteen-pence in change which you were kind enough to offer me, so don't tell me you have nothing. Good night."

Tom Brereton fell with a groan to the ground, and Jack galloped back to join Dick, who, by going at a very easy pace, gave him an opportunity of easily doing so.

"Success," said Dick.

"Yes. Ample. A £100 in gold."

"Hurrah, that is good. It will relieve Claude from many a disagreeable in Newgate, that otherwise, without money, he would be compelled to submit to. I congratulate you."

"Yes, and what makes it more pleasant by a great deal," said Jack, "is that I have taken it from an old enemy of Claude's, and a man whom I know to be one of the most contemptible scoundrels the world ever saw."

"That is better and better."

"It is; and now we have nothing to do, but to push on for London as quickly as possible, for I long to put myself into communication with Claude."

"Will you venture within the walls of Newgate?"

Jack gave a slight shudder, and then he replied—

"Yes, I will to see Claude; and perhaps it will do me good, by preventing the thought of that building being such a bugbear to my imagination as it is now."

"There can be no doubt of that," said Dick, "and I encourage your visit, for I am quite convinced Claude would not have told you in his letter it might be made with safety, unless he had had ample reason to say so."

"That is precisely my opinion."

By this time they had reached Oxford Street, and Dick proposed that they should halt for a moment or two at a noted hostel on the left-hand side of the way called "Hercules's Club," where knights of the road were accustomed to bait.

"We shall hear the news of the day there," said Dick. "For my own part I am full of apprehension that Claude will not be able to preserve his incognito in Newgate; and in such a case, the whole aspect of affairs will be changed, and any visit to him might be attended with the most dangerous of all consequences."

"What?" said Jack.

"The arrest of the visiters. But here we are at the 'Hercules's Club,' and we will take a glass without dismounting, and ask the news of the landlord."

"Does he know you, Dick?"

"Perfectly well, and if he knew you likewise it would be no matter, for you would be as safe as you are now. But do not fancy that upon that account I am going to tell him a word about you. Your secret is your own, not mine."

Jack was quite satisfied with this assurance.

A very few moments brought them to the door of the hostel, which Dick had spoken of in such terms of commendation; and in answer to his call, a man appeared at the door, who said in rather a crusty tone.

"Who are you, I wonder?"

"Look again," said Dick.

"Eh? Bless my soul, yes it is you. Well, who would have thought of seeing you in this quarter of the world. Come in?"

"No, thank you. I can come in. It is not my part of the country this certainly. But I have business in London. Bring us out a cup of wine, such as I know you have at hand for a friend, and then we must be off again."

"That will I," said the landlord.

The wine was brought in an antique silver flagon, and Jack and Dick divided it between them. Then Dick, in a careless way, said to the landlord—

"Is there any news stirring?"

"No. None that I know of."

"By-the-by, have you heard anything of Duval's lately?"

"Only that he is still on the Western Road, that is all."

CHAPTER CLV.

THE RESCUE OF GRACE MANNING.

From this reply of the landlord's, both Dick and Jack were quite satisfied that up to that time Claude's incognito had not been blown upon. If he had been discovered in Newgate, the news would have got to no place with greater alacrity than to the "Hercules's Club."

"Thank you," said Dick, as he returned the empty flagon to the landlord. "The next time I come I hope I shall be able to step in, and have a gossip with you about old times."

"I hope so too," said the landlord; "you have been a good friend, Dick, to me, and mine, and there is no man I should be more glad to see at all times."

Dick shook hands with him, and then Jack and he rode off at a rapid pace down Oxford Street.

"I will take Claude the money, Jack," said Dick, "if you in the least way feel any repugnance to going into Newgate."

"No. I have made up my mind to it," said Jack; "and I am so bound up in the service of Claude, that I feel confident now I shall be able to go through with the affair."

"Very good. I am glad to hear you say so. We will find a place to put up our nags, and I will make what changes we think necessary in our costume; and we will, in a serious manner, undertake this job of unasking the villany of Phillip Manning."

"And we shall succeed Dick."

"In good truth it will go hard with us, as well as with others, if we don't; for a trifle don't stop me when once I undertake a thing."

"Nor shall it stop me."

"And in addition to my feelings," added Dick, "for Claude in this matter, and my great anxiety to see him safe out of the stone pitcher, in the Old Bailey. I have got used to the road, and the free balmy air of the open country, and the sweet smell of the hay, and the songs of the birds, that it is quite a sacrifice for me to spend twenty-four hours in London."

"I, too," said Jack, "love the open air, and the birds, and the trees, and the flowers."

"Ay, Jack, as all must, who compare such beauties with the grimy town; but business, my friend, is business, and must be attended to. We will see Claude free, and then hurrah for the road again, and the open sky. After all, Jack, what life is like ours?"

"What indeed."

"We enjoy existence with very few of its cares. With a good steed; a pair of pops that can be depended on, and a light heart—we are happier than kings."

"Yes," said Jack, "I was once, but I am now spirit-broken."

"Not so, old fellow. You will come round again in good time, and the name of Sixteen-string Jack will yet be spoken as it was once spoken of. Why, folks used to delay journeys on your account once upon a time; and you were as well known upon the great north road, as any old sign. It was always a question if any one came off a journey in that direction, 'Did you meet the famous highwayman, Sixteen-string Jack?'"

Jack's face glowed for a moment with the remembrance of old times, and he said in a voice of emotion—

"I never was grasping, or cruel either."

"No, Jack, I never heard that you were, either. It is not in your nature to be cruel or grasping. But here we are."

"Where?"

"Why, close to Soho, where I will find you a lodging in which you can sleep securely, and where our cattle will be well taken care of. In the morning, then, you can make yourself up for your visit to Newgate; and after that we will be like bloodhounds upon the track of that scoundrel, who has got Claude into this mess."

"We will."

Jack fully expected to find Dick stop at some house of ordinary entertainment, the landlord of which he knew; but to his surprise Dick drew up at the door of a quiet looking house in Dean Street, which, from its private and respectable exterior, looked as though it belonged to some people who were highly proper, and well to do in the world.

"Why surely you don't bait here?" said Jack.

"Yes," said Dick.

"Well, you know best, of course."

"I know the people, Jack. This is one of the safest cribs in all London. I don't mean to say that the master of this house will be quite delighted to see you and I; but for all that, he will pay us every attention in the world, and we shall be quite safe."

"Who is he?"

"I can better tell you, Jack, what he is than who he is. In plain terms, he keeps a fence."

"Ah, a receiver?"

"Yes, and one of the richest in London. He don't intefere with petty spoil, nor is he at all known to petty thieves; but to such as I and Claude, and to such as you, Jack, he is quite a patron, and keeps his house open to us, although he does not wish any of us to come except upon an emergency; but of that he can be no judge; so he will make us welcome, fancying this is one."

"Must he know me?"

"He does know all you have to tell him, I suspect."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, Jack; he told me the last time I saw him, although at that time I was far from believing it, that you were alive, and expressed a wish to see you, and a desire to be of what service to you he could. How he came by the secret of your resuscitation I know not; but such men as he have a thousand unknown resources of information. At all events, you may depend upon your absolute safety in his house."

Jack was a little shaken at the idea of his being known; but the assurances of his safety, which he knew Dick would be the last person in the world to make if he did not feel quite confident upon that subject, reconciled him.

"In that case then," said Jack, "I prefer that I should be named to him at once. If a man be trusted at all, let him be trusted wholly."

"That is good, both in principle and in practice, Jack," said Dick. "There is no knowing the mischief that results from half-confidence; I will at once introduce you to Josiah Franklin."

"Oh, is that his name?"

"Yes, and he is one of the most respected quakers in London."

"Quakers?"

Dick laughed.

"I thought, Jack," he said, "that would surprise you; but our friend here is a quaker. He knows Claude very well, and has upon more than one occasion accommodated him with a suit of quaker's apparel."

"I have seen him so attired," said Jack.

"Then he got the clothing from Franklin; and after that I hope you trust in his good faith, and in your own perfect safety, beyond a doubt."

"It was beyond a doubt before, Dick; and yet I am glad to hear that Claude knows and trusts this man. I wonder he never mentioned him to me."

"He could not. Franklin makes his intruders promise that they will not mention him to their nearest and dearest friends; and I should not now have dreamt for a moment of bringing you to his house, if he had not, as I have already mentioned, expressed a wish to see you."

Jack held Dick's bridle while he dismounted, and when Dick rung at the door bell, it was answered by one of the most serious-looking domestics that could be imagined.

"Is Mr. Franklin within?"

"Friend," said the servant, "hast thou a card?"

"Yes," said Dick.

He took a card from his pocket-book. It was an odd enough card, for there was nothing upon it but a diamond, such as is used in playing cards. In fact, he presented to the serious footman the ace of diamonds.

"Verily, humph!" said that personage. "Wilt thee walk in?"

"Yes, and my friend likewise."

"Has thy friend a card?"

"No, but he will have. It's all right. We want the horses taken care of for a day or so."

"Leave them to my care, friend, and thou shall not be disappointed," said the serious domestic, without altering a muscle of his countenance.

Dick beckoned to Jack to come in, while the serious domestic called some one up from the lower part of the house, who took immediate charge of the cattle.

In another moment Jack and Dick were both in the passage or hall of the house, and the door was closed.

This house, which for many years was inhabited by Josiah Franklin, the quaker, is still standing in Dean Street, Soho. Perhaps the present proprietors would not thank us for pointing it out, so we will content ourselves by saying that it is a large one, and on the right hand side of the way going southward.

The hall—and it was not a mere passage as is too often the case, dignified by the name of one, but a really large space—was handsomely got up. Dingy-looking busts, with a respectable amount of dust upon them, stood grimly upon brackets looking down upon the intruders; and some large pictures hung against the ample wall.

"I will announce thee, friend," said the serious domestic, "if thou wilt have patience for a short time."

"Don't hurry yourself," said Dick.

"Well," said Jack in a low voice, when they were alone in the hall. "This is a place worth knowing. I suppose Franklin makes it well worth his while?"

"Not a doubt of that. When a quaker is a rogue, he is an outrageous one, you may depend. The garb of sanctity in this world forms one of the most admirable cloaks for all sorts of iniquity."

"Not a doubt of it."

"Now, Jack, I look upon you and I as bold, honest men, compared to such a fellow as this Franklin. It is true that we say, 'Stand to a true man upon the king's highway,' but we say it boldly, and he may have a shot at us for our pains; but there are thousands of men in this great city of London, who rob their neighbours with a smirk and a smile, and go to church regularly, who would, if you were to call them anything but honest men, be ready to leap down your throat."

Jack was rather amused at the vehemence of Dick, but he could not help fully agreeing with him in what he had just said. It was too true to be disputed.

In about three minutes the serious domestic came back to them, and said—

"If thou wilt follow me even to the room that is at the back of the dwelling, I will introduce thee to Mr. Franklin, as the vain and the giddy call him, but to plain Josiah as he is called by the devout."

"Lead the way, then, you hypocritical rascal," said Dick.

The serious domestic did not seem at all put out of the way by these words. He only shook his head and uttered a sort of groan, which might be supposed to be deprecatory of the sinfulness of mankind in general.

Dick and Jack were presently ushered into a large, handsome room, situated at the back of the house, and they found there seated a small man, plainly attired in a quaker's costume, who rose at their entrance, and with a grave air said—

"Be seated, friends. Thou both art welcome. Leave us, Aminadab."

When the door was closed, Dick pointed to Jack, and said—

"This is Sixteen-string Jack."

The quaker did not suffer the least emotion to be visible upon his face, as he said—

"Friend, I am glad to see thee, to which end indeed I did express a wish to thy friend, Turpin, here. I heard that, notwithstanding thou hadst been hanged by the neck at the place called Tyburn, that thou wert still in the land of the living."

"Yes," said Jack. "I was recovered after execution."

"Truly friend, thy case is a singular one. Hast thou any swag?"

"No," said Jack; "I have nothing."

"No doubt, Turpin, thou hast some."

"Not a scrap," said Dick.

"Then what the devil, friend Turpin, I ask thee, didst thou come here for If thou hast no swag, d—n thee, why didst thou trouble me?"

"Be patient," said Turpin, "and I will tell you. Claude Duval is in the stone pitcher at last."

A slight shade of increased colour at these words seemed to pass over the face of Franklin, but he did not speak.

"Yes," added Dick. "He is there, sure enough, and it is about that business that Jack and I, much otherwise against our own inclinations, have come to town."

"It is very strange," said Franklin, "that I did not know of this. Thou must, friend, be misinformed thyself. My information is generally tolerably close upon the fact. I will ring and inquire."

"Spare yourself the trouble," said Dick, arresting the hand of the quaker as it grasped a bell-rope. "Spare yourself the trouble, friend Franklin, and you will soon find out from what I shall tell you how it is that you know nothing of it."

"Proceed, friend."

Dick, then, in as few words as possible, told him the whole story of how Claude had got into his present condition, and how, up to the last intelligence he and Jack had, he still continued, to preserve his incognito; Franklin listened with evident displeasure; and when Dick had done, he said—

"And, pray, what business was it of Claude Duval's if all the Phillip Manning's in the world ran off with all the Grace Mannings? His only duty to himself and to me was to stop them and ease them of their valuables by the way. I never heard of anything more absurd, friend, in all my life, than his conduct."

CHAPTER CLVI.

PHILLIP MANNING GETS UNEASY, AND MAKES A RESOLVE.

Plain Josiah Franklin was so incensed that he rose and paced the room for a few moments quite in a fume.

Dick let this feeling subside before he spoke again; and then he said—

"It's done, Franklin."

"What dost thou say, friend?"

"I say, it's done, now, and it is not the part of a wise man to fret and fume about the past. The future is our own, but the past is gone for ever, and may not be recalled."

The quaker stopped short in front of Dick; and then, after regarding him for a few moments attentively, he said—

"Thou art right, friend."

"I knew you would see the thing in a proper way soon."

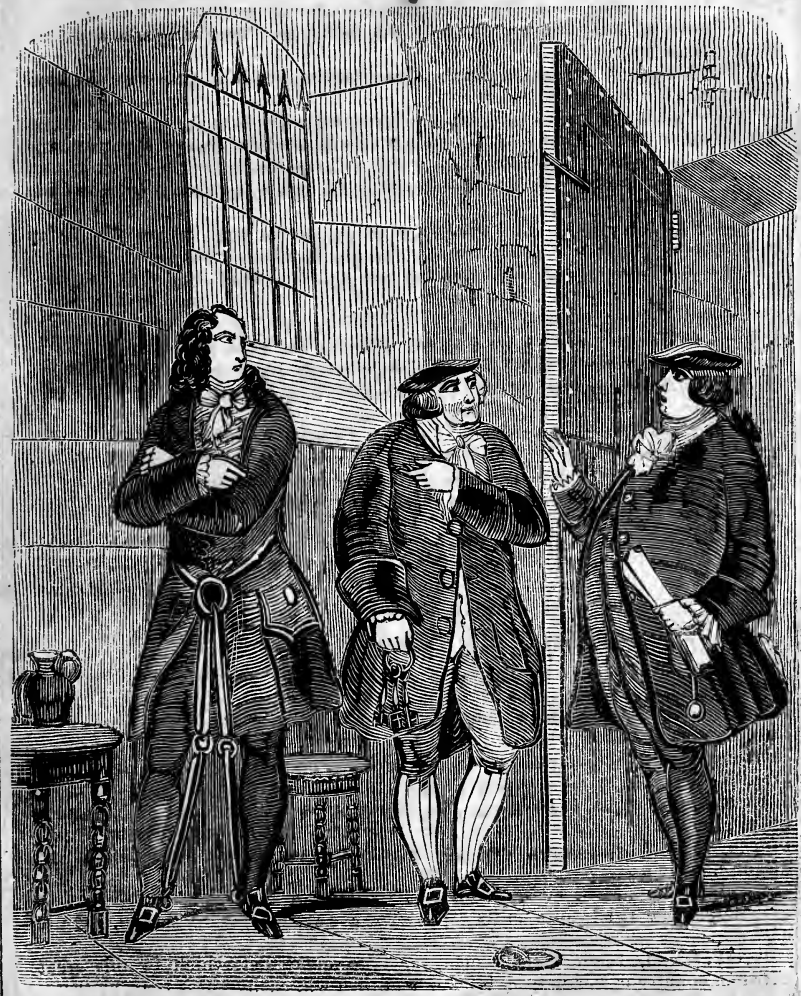
"I do see it, and I see that Claude Duval will be hanged at Tyburn."

"He is not yet even discovered," said Jack.

"But he will be, friend."

"I should not like to feel so confident of that," said Dick. "If Jack and I are, as I hope and trust we shall be, successful in tracing the hiding place in which Phillip Manning has placed his fair young cousin Grace, all will be well. Three words from her lips will exculpate Claude, and his instant release, as the falsely accused John Smith, will follow."

"No, it is too much to expect, friend," said Franklin. "I look upon the fate of Claude Duval as settled."



"Then mine is settled likewise," said Jack.

"How dost thou mean, friend?"

"Why, I don't intend to survive Claude. I will find my death in some desperate attempt to rescue him, even if it should be at the foot of the gallow itself. That is my determination; and I care not who knows it, or hears me avow it."

The quaker looked at Jack for a moment, and then he shrugged his shoulders, as he said—

THE QUAKER VISITS CLAUDE UNDER THE DISGUISE OF HIS SOLICITOR.

"Every one to his taste, friend."

"Come—come," said Dick, "we need not quarrel about what any of us may do in the event of such a contingency. It may not happen, and if it does, it will then be time enough to think of it."

"Exactly, friend," said Franklin; "and now I presume that Claude will want something in the way of help with money while he is in his present situation, and you have only to ascertain from him how much, and I will immediately produce it."

"You will?" said Dick.

"Ay, friend, I will."

"Th s is kind of you," said Jack.

"Nay, friend," added Franklin, "it is nothing out of the way. I am a man well to do, and I have made that which I now have by gentlemen of thy profession, friend; so it is but fair that I should help thee and such as thee in the hour of need."

"You have done yourself no harm, Mr. Franklin," said Dick, "by the kind offer—for it is kind, let you say what you will of it. Claude will have plenty of money for all his wants in Newgate. All that we require of you is a place of refuge for ourselves and our horses until we have traced this Phillip Manning, and so ferret out where he has bestowed the judge's daughter."

"That you shall have, friend. Think that my house is your own, and all within it at thy disposal."

"Many thanks—many thanks. Jack wants to go at once to see Claude in Newgate, and he wishes to be disguised."

The quaker looked at Jack scrutinisingly for a few moments, and then he said—

"If thou wilt follow me, friend, I will show the sort of disguise that I would recommend thee to put on."

"Go, Jack," said Dick; "I will wait here."

"Thou mayest wait with a perfect conviction of thy safety, friend Turpin, or thou mayest come with us."

"Then I will come with you, since I have the option."

The quaker led the way to the top of his house, and having selected a key from among several that he took from his pocket, he unlocked a back attic, which, all around it, was filled with presses, something like a linen-draper's shop, where every description of apparel was to be found, from the sooty habiliments of a sweep to the showy apparel of a general officer.

"Here, friend," he said, "I can make thee look like a very respectable grazier; and as to-morrow is market-day at Smithfield, it will favour the delusion, although I cannot quite comprehend how Claude has got leave to see whoever pplies to visit him."

"His letter," said Jack, "says that the judge has got him such leave."

"Yes, friend, it says so, but——"

"You doubt it?"

"Indeed I do, friend. But here is the grazier's suit, which, to my mind, will ompare well with thy cast of countenance, to which I can impart a more ruddy nge; and if any one speaks to thee, thou must talk much of south-downs and ort horns, and such like matters, with which thy natural wit will surely furnish ee."

So saying, the quaker took from one of the presses the costume he had menoned; and when Jack saw himself fully dressed and his face tinged with a mixre that Franklin produced, he was indeed surprised at the perfection of the sguise.

"This is capital," he said. "What do you think of it, Dick?"

"Simply that it is capital in its way. You are a genius, Mr. Franklin. Quite genius."

"Nay, friend, I am a plain man, trying to make that which in this great ristian country is worshipped by all, and thou wilt easily guess that by that I ean money."

"It is true," said Dick.

"I will now go at once," said Jack. "Only tell me, Dick, where to meet you er my interview with Claude, and I will come to you."

"Let it be at the judge's house-door. You have the correct address?"

"I have, and will be there."

Jack left the house of the quaker, feeling very easy about the before ticklish matter of keeping himself concealed as regarded identity from the inhabitants of Newgate, some of whom he well knew had a most marvellous faculty of recollecting any face they had once seen.

Dick took his way, dressed quietly in black, to the judge's house, where he thought that, either coming in or out, there was a chance of seeing Phillip Manning.

We will accompany Jack to Newgate.

If we were to say that he felt no trepidation at all as he ascended the steps leading to the lobby of the prison, we should certainly be going far beyond the truth, for not only did Jack feel emotion, but it was considerable emotion.

The only thing that supported him at that moment, was the thought that it was for one whom he so much valued, as he did Claude Duval, that he was doing what he did.

"Courage," he whispered to himself. "All may be lost by one shrinking action. All may be gained by boldness."

He tapped at the wicket of the old prison.

"Hilloa!" said a turnkey, "what do you want? Have you lost a cow, and do you think it has strayed into Newgate?"

"No," said Jack. "I want to see John Smith."

"John Smith—John Smith. Humph! Do you think he wants to see you, old fellow?"

"I know he does. He sent for me."

"Here, Gutty," cried the turnkey, "you know all about this. It's some one for John Smith."

"All I know," said Gutty, "is that there's an order sticking up there in the governor's hand-writing to let anybody go and come during the regular hours to John Smith, and you know as much as that yourself."

"Come in, then," said the turnkey, admitting Jack, and then muttering to himself—"I wonder what's the use of anybody on the lock at all, if anybody is to come in and go out as they like? There used not to be such doings in old times. We never thought of letting anybody in till they tipped, and that handsomely too."

Now, Jack was resolved to set his own mind at ease regarding his disguise, and to test thoroughly his own means, by doing something after which nothing could come amiss. He knew the turnkey very well by sight, and he said to him—

"Do you remember Sixteen-string Jack?"

"Do I?" cried the man. "Don't I? What do you know about him, master, eh?"

"He stopped me once."

"Did he, and what did he take from thee?"

"A canvas bag with twenty-eight guineas in it; but when I told him the loss of all would distress me on the morrow, he gave me back five again."

"Ah, then, you were the man he did that to? I have heard the story before. Well, he was not one of the worst."

"Ah!" muttered the man they called Gutty, as he lighted a lantern to conduct Jack to Claude's room. "Ah, Sixteen-string Jack suffered at the Gate, and they say his ghost haunts Newgate now, and has been seen in the long passages."

"That's very improbable," said Jack, as he followed Gutty from the vestibule, feeling convinced now that his disguise was perfect. The daring experiment he had tried had had all the effect he looked for from it. It put him quite at his ease, and he walked after Gutty with such an air, that no one for one moment could have supposed that he was in danger within the walls of Newgate.

"A visitor," said Gutty, as he opened Claude's room-door.

Claude looked up, and for the moment did not know Jack, who walked in, saying—

"How are you, John?"

The voice at once assured him of who it was, and stetching out his hand, he said—

"Ah, how are you? it is very kind of you to come to visit me, so busy as you must be."

The door closed, and they heard the retreating footsteps of Gutty as he went growling down the passage, Then, and not till then, did Jack and Claude cordially shake hands like true and staunch old friends as they were, and Claude said to him—

"Jack, you are capitally made up; I did not know you."

"Yes," replied Jack, "I believe my disguise is good. Franklin, the quaker, got it up for me."

"Old Jossiah? Then Dick took you there?"

"He did, Claude."

"Well, I should have done so, some day, when I got leave of him, only I did not know if he was at all aware of your singular story, and how far you would like me to mention it. But tell me, Jack, have you and Dick yet done anything in Grace's affair?"

"Not yet. Consider the time, Claude. My present business with you is to bring you this."

Jack laid a heavy purse upon the table.

"It was not wanted, Jack."

"Nay it is only £100. Give it about you freely to purchase all the indulgences and comforts that are not denied in Newgate any more than anywhere else in this world to one who has money, enough. You will be better pleased with it when you hear who it came from."

"Who, Jack?"

"None other than Tom Brereton."

"Tom Brereton? Impossible. That he should send me money, and that he should know I am here, is——"

"Stop—stop Claude. You are getting hold of the wrong end of the stick with a vengeance. He neither sent the money to you, nor does he at all know you are here. I took it from him on the road."

"That is quite another thing."

"I met him after a determination to pick up something from the first passenger with a heavy purse, to pay your expenses in Newgate, and luckily he had this £100 by him, which he admitted he had himself stolen; therefore I took it with the smallest possible feeling of compunction, I assure you."

"Well, that was strange."

"It was; but he under no sort of apprehension as to his malice. He tried to say that it was you who robbed him, but I took good care to put that idea out of his head to keep the money."

"I will have some of it, Jack. But how are you situated in that particular?"

"Well enough—well enough."

"I will only have half of it. You keep the other half, Jack. Of course it is a bad thing to have more than you want here, as it might provoke the cupidity of the officials, so fifty pounds will be all I will take."

Finding Claude firm upon this point, Jack yielded, and put fifty of the guineas in his pocket again.

After this was settled, he said—

"And now, Claude, Dick and I will not spare time or trouble in getting the better of that rascal Phillip Manning; so keep up your spirits. and hope for the best."

"I will, Jack; and yet——"

"Yet what, Claude?"

"It seems to me as if some great misfortune were impending over me. I am not, as you know, one of the desponding sort, and indeed I am always much more inclined to look upon the sunny, than the cloudy side of things; but I have a decided presenitment of evil."

Jack shook at this rather.

"Do not speak to me in that way, Claude," he said, "or you will upset me completely, and before I reach the gate I shall betray myself. I begin to feel already how artificial is the courage that has hitherto held me up."

The tone in which Jack spoke rather alarmed Claude, and he said to him in the most cheerful tone he could assume—

"Pho! pho! Jack; you know I am no believer in omens. Think nothing of the few idle words I have spoken. We shall be all right again upon the road, with a star-spangled sky above, many and many a time.

CHAPTER CLVII.

THE DISCOVERY OF CLAUDE'S IDENTITY.

Sixteen-String Jack had now for so long a time been in the habit of thinking that whatever Claude said or did must assuredly be right, that he was easily depressed by a few mournful words; but then he was almost as easily raised up again in spirits, when Claude spoke to him cheerily.

Having thus brought Jack to a different state of feeling than that which, with its gloomy presages, might really have produced very bad consequences to them all, Claude was anxious to close an interview which at the best was dangerous.

"Go now, Jack," he said, "and do your best. Remember that I wait here a prisoner until Grace Manning is in her father's arms again, and that from that moment I am well aware that I shall be an inhabitant of this place only for so long a time as will suffice for an order to be sent for my immediate release."

"Yes, Claude," said Jack. "We know and feel that, and knowing and feeling it, you, and you only, can imagine what an incentive to exertion that is to both Dick and I. Keep yourself in good spirits, Claude, and as you say, we shall soon enough be under the starlit sky of the open country, I hope. I am going now to meet Dick at the house of Judge Manning, upon which he is keeping a watch; and it is likely enough that even to-day we may succeed in doing something."

"Heaven speed you, Jack."

Jack knocked at the door of the room, until the turnkey, who was some distance off in the passage, heard him, and came to let him out. "Ah," said he with a discontented air. "Ah, then, here is fine doings in Newgate for folks to have who they like come and see 'em, and stay as long as they like, and nobody to say 'times up!' I never seed the like."

"Nor I," said Claude, as he placed a guinea in the rough hand of the turnkey; "but if every visitor pays you as well as this, you will be making money like a physician, my friend, and I promise you that every visit to me will be equally productive to you."

The turnkey's mouth widened into a broad grin, as he said—

"Oh, that's quite another affair. You may have all the world, and his wife, come and see him if you like; and arter all, when you come to think, it's a hard thing that a cove as is shut up in a stone pitcher can't have his friends about him."

"Particularly," said Jack, "if he can pay well for the little indulgences."

"In course."

After this, the turnkey was all smiles and sweetness to Jack, and told him, as they traversed the narrow gloomy passages to the gate, "That he never seed sich a real gemman as his friend, Mr. Smith, and he only hoped as he (Jack) would make it a pint to come often and see him, just to keep his spirits up a bit, and tell him the news out o' doors."

And so, without the smallest accident, or any shadow of suspicion as to who he really was, Jack got out of Newgate, and found himself in the open streets of the city, after what may be truly called his perilous visit.

Of course, now, he had the greatest confidence in his disguise, and walked along with a much more calm and confident air than he had done before; all which was favourable to his situation, and the carrying out the character which he had assumed. He made his way as directly as he could to the square in which the judge resided.

The distance was not great, and Jack was well enough acquainted with London not to increase it by going an inch out of his way, so he soon, from a side street, emerged into the square, very close to Judge Manning's house. The first thing he saw, was Dick standing nearly oppos te by the iron railings of the centre garden, apparently intently reading a bill that was stuck upon the face of a pump that was there.

Jack at once crossed over to him, and Dick, who had by a rapid side-glance seen him coming, said—

"Read this, Jack. I'll keep an eye on the judge's door while you do so."

Jack cast his eye upon the bill, and found that it offered no less than £500 reward for the apprehension of either of three persons; one supposed to be the notorious Claude Duval, the other Richard Turpin, and the third unknown. They were all personally described, and it was stated at the foot of the bill, that the full amount of £1500 would be paid to any one who would lodge the whole three in any jail without waiting for their conviction.

"What do you think of that, Jack?" said Dick; "ain't we a capital prize for some one! Here is £1000 standing by a pump in London, and not a soul to stretch out a hand to take it. That is really extraordinary, is it not?"

"It is no joke," said Jack.

"Joke? No. They who might try to earn the money, should find it no joke. I am well armed, and it is not two, or three, or four men that would find it a very easy task to fasten upon me."

"And I, too," said Jack, "would sell my life dearly."

Of course. £500 sinks in value very much to a man with a bullet or two in his inside. But we are getting on well. How did you find Claude?"

"Quite well."

"And confident of his release, I hope?"

"Yes, he knows us well enough for that, Dick."

"He does, and he shall not be disappointed. The man we seek is in the judge's house now; I watched him in, and when he comes out, I will follow him, and you, Jack, will follow me."

"I will."

"Of course, it is just possible when he does comes out, that he may not be going direct to visit Grace Manning in the place of concealment he has found for her; but visit her at some time or other during twenty-four hours, he surely will; and our duty will be, now that we have once set eyes upon him, not to lose sight of him until he houses himself; and then if we feel that that is not the place of the concealment of the girl, we will wait for him until he comes out again, acd stick to him like his shadow."

"Is that him, Dick?"

"Yes, yes!"

Phillip Manning came out of his uncle's house. There was a gloom upon his brow, and he glanced cautiously around him before he descended the steps. If ever a man was thoroughly wretched, not from regret at his own guilt, but from a conviction that it was, as regarded its promised and expected results, a failure, that man was Phillip Manning.

In the interview he had just had with his uncle, although, the old judge had not said one word to put him upon his guard, yet Phillip, with that acuteness of perception that often belongs to the guilty, had not failed to see that he was more than suspected, and that his uncle's faith was much shaken in the truth of the story that he had told of the abduction of Grace.

How the judge had been so shaken, he, Phillip, had no means of knowing; but the fact, combined with the firm resistance, and the dignified and indignant rejection of all terms of compromise by Grace herself, made Phillip endure the torments of the damned.

There he stood upon his uncle's door-step, a thorough picture of a foiled villain—of one who, for a great object to himself, had committed a great crime, but utterly failing in the object, was left standing, as it were, with nothing but the crime to console him.

While Phillip Manning there stood looking around him for food for suspicion, Dick was pumping away at the pump, while Jack was holding the iron ladle, and they both seemed only intent upon slaking their thirst.

The eyes of Phillip wandered over them, without exhibiting the slightest trace of suspicion, and then descending the remainder of the steps, he walked on.

"On," said Dick to Jack, "keep as far behind me as you can, so as to keep me in sight at all; and mind, Jack, if you see me go into a shop, or knock at the door of any house, or otherwise appear to give up the chase, it will be from a suspicion that I may be observed, and in that case you may go on and follow Phillip: I will soon come after you."

"I understand," said Jack.

By this time Phillip Manning had reached the corner of the square, and after casting around him one last glance, he seemed to be quite satisfied no one was dogging him, and he disappeared round the corner.

It was only for a moment that he was lost to the sight of Dick, for he was quickly at the corner, and then he saw Phillip walking down the street at a quick pace, without once looking behind him. From this time, the chase of the villain might be said fairly to have begun.

Dick kept about fifty paces behind him, and Jack about twenty paces behind Dick.

Phillip made for the northern part of London, and soon began to get into what was then open country, to the north of the New Road that is now. He then crossed the fields to Islington, which then was really quite a suburban district, and by no means of such close acquaintanceship with the bricks and mortar of London as it is now.

To any one not so well acquainted with the locality as Dick chanced to be, the task of following Phillip would have been one that now would have almost ensured detection, for it would look more than accidental for any one to keep upon the track of another, both in town and country. It was quite clear however to Dick, that Phillip was taking a short cut across the fields, where there was a foot-path, that would bring him out at a particular part of Islington, High-street, and he knew that by making a little detour, and traversing a lane which is now a street, he could reach that point.

He accordingly at once struck off from the direct pursuit of Phillip Manning.

Jack at first took this as a hint to him to follow, but Dick caught his eye for a moment, and gave him a sign to follow him, so that Phillip was to all appearance left quite alone; and if anything could tend to completely assure that doubtful character that he was safe, certainly this manœuvre would.

In a few moments both Dick and Jack were together in the lane, which was a very verdant one, and on the side of it, next to the meadows that Phillip was traversing, there was a row of tall poplars, which completely hid the lane, and cast a sort of twilight into it.

"He suspects nothing," said Jack.

"Nothing at all. We shall meet him again easily; but we must push on, for the route this way is nearly double that he is taking, and he walks fast."

They ran swiftly for some distance, and then Dick said—

"If we get upon the bank here, we can take a peep at the rascal through the hedge without his being able at the distance he is off, to have the least chance of seeing us."

Jack was as anxious as Dick to look at Phillip, and when they had scrambled up the wild flower-decked bank, at the side of the lane, they easily through the trees saw the whole extent of the meadows.

Phillip Manning had reached a stile and had stopped. His hand was up to his eyes to shade them, for the sun had peeped out, and he was looking southward. He seemed to be taking a long and earnest glance at the path he had come, in order thoroughly to assure himself that no one was upon his track. He sat upon the stile then, and took from his pocket a small telescope, and with that placed at his eye he made an acurate, and no doubt, very satisfactory examination of the route he had taken. Just for fear he might turn the telescope in the direction of the lane, and no knowing what its power might be, both Jack and Dick crouched down among the tall grass and flowering shrubbery, so that it would have been next to impossible for them to have been seen, even if Phillip had looked that way, which he did not.

To be sure, he did just take a sweeping kind of glance all round him with the telescope, but he did not fix his regards sufficiently long upon one spot to make our friends be in any danger of discovery in their secure hiding-place.

CHAPTER CLVIII.

PHILLIP MANNING'S CLEVER PROCEEDINGS.

After this, Phillip, with all the air of a man who is thoroughly satisfied, pocketted his telescope and walked on.

"Now we shall have him," said Dick, "and I call all this very satisfactory, inasmuch as it assures us of one thing, which is, that we shall not have our trouble for nothing.

"Are you sure of that, Dick?"

"Pretty sure, Jack, unless we miss him. You may depend he would not take one half the trouble to assure himself that he is not followed, unless he were going upon some important errand; and I doubt if Master Phillip has anything else upon his hands just now half so important as this affair in which we feel so deeply interested."

"Most probably not, Dick. I see now what you mean, and I do begin to think that our work is already half done."

"Without making too sure," said Dick, "I confess now to being sanguine; but we must put the best foot foremost now, Jack, for Phillip has not far to go to get to the opening into the High Street, and, if we lose him at all, it will be there."

They now proceeded at such a rate that they soon got quite clear of the lane, and skirting a piece of waste ground, they then emerged into Islington, a little above what is now called The Green.

There they slackened their speed a little, and Dick went on in advance as before, Jack keeping upon the other side of the way, so as to break the connection between them to the eye as much as possible.

Suddenly from a narrow turning, out came Phillip. Dick took no notice of him, although he was so close to him that he could have touched him; and to avoid any suspicion, he had to walk on past him. He well knew that Jack would see the necessity of such a step, and would keep an eye on Phillip.

So completely, however, was the rascal satisfied that he had come in perfect security, that he took no notice of any one, and had quite lost the air of lurking suspicion which had before been the grand characteristic of his proceedings. He walked in the most direct manner to a house with a little garden in front of it and a small green gate.

This place looked like a better sort of cottage; and they—for Dick had now looked round, after walking quite far enough to lull all suspicion—saw him take a key from his pocket, open the door, and go in.

Dick beckoned Jack to come to him.

"Well," he said, when they were together, "we have housed him at last. What do you think of that place, Jack, into which he has just now gone?"

"That it certainly is not where we shall find Grace Manning."

"That is precisely my own opinion."

"It is too small and too public," added Jack; "she could alarm the whole neighbourhood from such a place as that by a cry for help. I think you will see Phillip come out again soon from that cottage; but we shall easily know it again."

"Oh, yes; and at another time, Jack, we will know all about it—but just now Phillip claims all our care. We will not lose sight of the green gate for a moment."

Even while they spoke they did not look at each other, but kept their regards upon that cottage; and this state of things lasted for about twenty minutes, when the cottage door opened, and an old woman, with a basket on her arm and pattens on, came out. She crossed the road, and disappeared down a lane opposite.

"Is it worth while asking any questions of that old dame?" said Jack to Dick.

"No, it would be dangerous. The grand thing, I take it, is to avoid exciting in the mind of Phillip the least certainty of his being watched—suspicion he already has; and if we follow and question yon old woman, how are we to prevent her from telling him of such a suspicious occurrence?"

"True enough, Dick—true enough. I only wish the rascal would come out, that's all."

They waited with the most exemplary patience for nearly a whole hour, but still there was not the least appearance of Phillip Manning emerging from the cattage.

"There is something more in this than we can just now divine," said Dick. "We are done for this time somewhow. He cannot have left the cottage by the back, for you see, Jack, it is open to the fields, and we must have seen him."

"Decidedly," said Jack.

"And by the front we know he has not. Confound it, he may be upon quite some other errand to day than that of calling upon poor Grace Manning."

"That is possible," said Jack. "But I begin to have an idea."

"For Heaven's sake then, Jack, let me have the benefit of it at once, for if it be anything that will abridge the monotony of the watch we are keeping here. I fear in vain it will be most welcome."

"You shall have it, Dick. I don't in the least wonder at your getting impatient, for nothing in the world can be so annoying as this sort of thing. You may laugh at me, but my idea is——"

"Hush! There's the old woman again."

"Humph," said Jack. "That is my idea."

"Why—why—what do you mean, Jack? Out with it."

"I think the old woman is Phillip Manning."

"The devil!"

They were both silent as they watched the seeming old woman with the basket and the pattens, cross the road-way to the little cottage with the green-gate. Then they saw her take a key from her pocket, after some rummaging, and place it in the lock. For one instance she held up her head, and took a glance around her.—It was Phillip!

"Done!" said Dick.

"For this time completely," said Jack; "but we have made a good two hours' work of it for all that, for now we know Phillip disguises, and that it must be somewhere close at hand to this spot that he keeps Grace a prisoner. You may depend that in that basket he took her provisions until this time to-morrow."

"Oh, yes," said Dick, in a tone of deep chagrin. "I see it all now. It is as plain as your hand before your eyes, Jack; but that you and I should be taken in is rather too bad. I warrant now if Claude had been with us he would have detected Phillip's disguise."

"He might. But the game is over for to-day, Dick."

"Iti s, I fear; and yet if you have no objection we will wait here, as we are well sheltered by this chesnut tree, and see Phillip go home again, and then I should like to go down the turning opposite, and see what one can."

"And so should I, Dick. We shall see what sort of a place it is, and where it leads to, at all events."

Phillip emerged from the cottage in his usual apparel in much less time than it had taken him to put on and perfect the disguise that had been good enough to deceive Jack and Dick. He did not look about him at all, but banging the door of the cattage to, he made the best of his way to town again, by the same way he had come.

When he was fairly out of sight, Dick and Jack emerged from the sheltered spot they had found among some chesnut-trees, and looked at the cottage.

"I would not disturb that place," said Dick. "If there be any one there, it may have the effect of putting Phillip on his guard; and if no one, all we could find would be his disguise, and that we know already. Let us go up the lane."

"Certainly,"

They had now no trouble in looking after Phillip, so they could pay the most undevided attention to the place they were in. It was a pretty rural lane enough, with, at the top part of it, that is to say that part at which they entered some small cottages that seemed to be in the possession of laundresses. Further on it seemed to straggle right away into the open country.

There was some open country at Islington then.

Feeling quite certain that none of the cottages at the entrance of the lane were worth their examination, Jack and Dick passed on at a quick pace until they got clear of the houses, and reached a stile that seemed to go into the meadows. There they both paused.

"This voyage of discovery," said Jack, "does not seem to promise many results, Dick."

"It does not, indeed. I can see chimney pots among the trees, yonder; but it is rather an awkward thing to go to a house, and say, 'Have you got a young lady a prisoner here? and does a man, disguised as on old woman, come to see her?"

"Rather awkward, indeed," said Jack. "It is tolerably clear to me, Dick, that our best course most decidedly is to wait until to-morrow, and then come here and follow Phillip. We know he comes down this lane."

"Yes, and the plan will be to wait in the lane, Jack. Let us pitch upon some spot now that we are here, that we can come to direct to-morrow, and wait at until the rascal arrives."

They crossed the stile with this intent, and soon found a kind of copse, in the intricacies of which they could be effectually concealed, while it did not prevent them from looking out and keeping a good watch upon the stile, over which they had very little doubt that they should, on the morrow, have the satisfaction of seeing Phillip Manning get.

Having settled all this, then, as far as they could, they felt that their presence there was no longer required, and that their best way was to proceed to London again at once. They made for the quaker's house in Dean Street, Soho.

They fond the "friend" anxious concerning them, as they had been absent for a much longer period of time than he or they had expected; for when Dick had gone to wait for Jack in the square where the judge lived, he had no idea that he should so readily light upon Phillip Manning.

"Friend," said Franklin, "I began to think thee and thy friend Jack had fallen into the hands of the Philistines."

"Oh no," said Dick, "we are making progress of a satisfactory kind, as you will admit when you hear what I have to tell you."

"It is ill talking upon an empty stomach, and with a dry throat, friend," said the quaker—"if thou will permit me, I will provide thee with a resource against both of those evils."

He rang a bell, and ordered a substantial repast for Dick and Jack, together with a couple of bottles of rare old wine, and he would not permit them to fatigue themselves by telling him their news, until they were thoroughly refreshed.

"I am, no doubt," he said, "friends, anxious enough to hear all that thou mayst have to say, but I am much more anxious that thy strength and thy courage should be kept up, for really now there are so few good men upon the road, that I cannot afford to lose either of thee."

the quaker took of the affair, and at the way in which he accounted for his profuse hospitality, which many men would have tried to make a kind of merit of facts own sake. Franklin however was far above any such petty feelings, and he found his account in letting the highwaymen and crackmens who dealt with him know that the assistance he rendered them was merely a matter of business, and had no other support or foundation.

When one of the bottles of wine was gone, and the other dipped into, Dick recounted to him all that had happened, to which he lent the most attentive ear; and when Dick had finished, he said—

"Thou must be cautious, friend."

"How?"

"Why from all I can hear of this Phillip Manning, he is one who will kill."

"Kill!" exclaimed Dick, "kill! And do you fancy for one moment, Mr. Franklin, that I am afraid of his killing propensities? and I am sure I may say as much for Jack here. We don't care one straw about the malice or the resistance of such a fellow as that, I assure you."

"Now, friend,' added the quaker, "that thou hast had thy say, allow me to state that I was not afraid of Phillip Manning killing thee or thy friend Jack of the Sixteen-strings. It was the young maiden called Grace that I spoke of."

"You are right, Mr. Franklin," cried Jack. "The same thought has more than once come across me, giving me a cold shudder as it did so. I think he is just the man to murder the young thing, if he found all his villany upon the point of being discovered."

"I really did not think of that," said Dick. "Pardon me, Mr. Franklin. It is a thing of great importance, and I thank you for the hint. I will take good care it is well seen to. It would be too terrible."

CHAPTER CLIX.

AN ADVENTURE AT THE QUAKER'S.

TINGLE! Tingle! Tingle!

"What's that?" said Dick.

There was just a slight change of colour upon the face of the quaker for a moment, and then he said, in a quiet voice—

"It is a warning, that's all. It is only a warning. You have been traced here by some means: you are either known or suspected, I cannot say which. Truly the Philistines are at hand even now."

"The deuce they are!" said Dick, as he sprung from his seat. "What's to be done?"

"Nothing, friend, just now, by violence," said the quaker. "Everything, probably, by discretion. Please to remain precisely where you both are, until I come to you again. You will consult your safety by so doing, whereas, by removing from this room, thou may'st remove to thy own destruction."

With these words, the quaker rose, and left the room in a moment, Jack and Dick remaining, staring at each other, rather in a state of amazement.

"What shall we do?" said Dick.

"As he says," replied Jack.

"But—but I don't like this state of inaction. Did you see his face change colour when the bell rang? Do you know, Jack, I begin to have my suspicions."

"I have none. You ought to know Franklin much better than I do, Dick, so that of course, so far as that goes, you are the best judge by a great deal; but I do not myself entertain anything in the shape of a doubt of his fidelity to us. I feel that all his interests must be the other way."

"You have convinced me, Jack. We will wait here, although I had rather know what was going on below. Let us listen at the stair-head. There can be no harm in that you know, Jack. Come on. Are you a good one at overhearing anything some distance off?"

"Pretty well."

They opened the door of the room quite carefully, and crept on to the landing-place of the stairs. Even to do this much was in contradiction to the express recommendation of Franklin; but something must be allowed for men placed in the exceedingly ticklish situation of Dick and Jack. They could hear nothing for some time below but the murmur of two voices; but then they found Franklin and some other person were ascending the staircase together, and talking as they came on. They both turned into a room before they got to the height that Dick and Jack were.

"Did you know the companion of the quaker?" said Dick, in a low, hissing whisper, to Jack.

"No."

"It was Granby, the informer. He is an officer, but he goes by the name of Granby, the informer, because he makes all his captures and transacts all his business by treachery. He is rich, and he will pay two-thirds of what he will get by the job for the apprehension of any one by treachery, rather than attempt it openly and by force."

"Say no more," said Jack. "I have heard of the man. What do you suppose his errand is here?"

"Of course to see if he cannot make terms with the quaker. Stay here, Jack. I have more than once, perhaps very wrongfully, had a slight fancy—suspicion one can hardly call it—that Franklin may, upon some odd occasion, retire from business, and that, preparatory to so doing, he may want to dispose of his stock in trade: do you understand me?"

"Ay; and his stock," said Jack, "you would say, consists of such men as we are."

"Yes; cracksmen and knights of the road, as we are. Once for all, then, I should like to satisfy myself; so I will step down and listen to his conversation with Granby if I can."

Dick took off his boots, and went very softly down the stairs on his stocking soles. He reached the door of the room into which the quaker and the officer had gone, and applying his ear quite close to the keyhole, he found that after a few moments, he could hear pretty nearly every word that was spoken by the parties within.

The officer was speaking, and Dick heard him say, in a clear and very earnest tone of voice—

"Now, Mr. Franklin, it is quite needless to tell you that the police have had an eye upon your house for some time; and strange as you may think it, it is I who have saved you. You may look incredulous. Perhaps, if I were in your position, I should likewise; but there is a why and a wherefore for everything in this world, and I will soon explain it all to you."

"Really, friend," replied Franklin, "I shall be much indebted to thee, indeed, to explain it to me, for, as yet, friend, I am most truly and lamentably in the dark with respect to thy reasoning."

"Are you?"

"Yes, friend; and I beg that thou wilt go on with all convenient expedition with thy promised explanation."

"Ah, you are a deep card," said Granby.

"Eh, friend? A card?"

"Well, well, I don't expect that all at once you are going to drop into my mouth, Mr. Franklin. I tell you that more than one officer has had his eye upon this house, but I have always fobbed them off in some way or another, so that you have really hardly been at all disturbed—eh?"

"Humph!" said Franklin.

"Well, well," continued Granby, "I see you are a man of business, and I like you all the better for it. You will understand what I have got to propose in the right spirit. I have looked upon you as a nice little piece of property in my way for these last three years, and I think the time has now come, do you know, to realise you. Ha! You understand?"

"No, friend."

"Come, come, Mr. Franklin—you are joking."

"Friend, I can conscientiously aver that I never made a joke in my life, and that, knowingly, I never shall make one. If thou art joking, friend, thou hast come to the wrong party to show thy wit, for I assure thee thou wilt not get from me the ghost of a smile, friend."

"Ha, ha!" said Granby, with a forced laugh; "upon my life you are a strange man—you are, indeed; but come, you and I must understand each other soon. If you don't make terms with me you will have a rough search in your house at all sorts of odd times when you least expect it. All the officers have great faith in what I say. They think I have means of getting information that they know nothing of. And they are right. I have such means. You are all right and snug now, I tell you, for I have fobbed them off just because there being no one to settle with but me, you might afford to be liberal."

"If I were assured of that——" said Franklin.

"Oh, that's the point, is it?" cried Granby. "Well, I hardly know how I am to assure you of it. But you must see by my way that I am no fool, you know, and is it likely that I would let any one else have a share in the affair, when I could keep it all to myself? Now I tell you I know you harbour the great guns here now and then; fellows with £500, and, at odd times, £1000 reward hanging over their heads. The small pay don't come to you, and that's why I want to transact business with you. Now, at a word, I will go your halves."

"Halves in what, friend?"

"Hang it! you understand. How jolly green we are all of a sudden.—Ha! ha!"

"Thy saying 'Ha! ha!' and talking about green affairs, friend, does not enlighten me in the least."

"Don't it? Well, then, when you have a fellow snug here, for whom there is a good reward—anything over £100 will be worth while—you give me the office. I wont take him in your house or near it, but you give me sufficient information, and when I nab him you shall have your half down."

"Down, friend?"

"Yes, down."

"Before you get him tucked up, friend?"

"Yes. I'll give you a cheque for the amount. Everbody knows Jack Granby's cheque is a bank-note."

"Humph!"

"Is it a bargain?"

"Wilt thou stand half the forty-pound blood-money likewise, friend, when the individual whom I may be instrumental in giving up to thee is duly suspended by the neck until he be dead, friend?"

"I will—I will. That will be twenty-pound more always. Come, is it a bargain? I will stand half the blood-money, though it is rather a hard bargain to drive."

"Down, friend?"

"Yes down. Down on the nail."

"Of course, friend, then I consent. How could you doubt for one moment that I would? Good gracious, friend, I think the offer a most liberal one, especially as I am to get my half down; and of course, friend, as my house is to be the great rat-trap, you will be careful not to let the animals suspect it."

"Oh, trust me for that. It's a bargain? Give us your hand upon it!"

"Friend, I do not see the least occasion for giving thee my hand because we have agreed to be two thundering rogues, friend. Let us profit by our internal iniquity, friend, and have, at the same time, if it be all the same to thee, friend, the most hearty contempt and abhorrence for each other, verily."

"Well, you are one of the oddest fellows, if not absolutely the very oddest, that I ever heard of."

"Do you really think so, friend?"

"In faith I do; but that's nothing. We have made our bargain, and I am glad enough of it for one. It will be to the profit of both of us; and if in the next twelve-months we don't make an outrageous good thing of it, I am much mistaken."

"Truly, friend, the speculation looks well," said Franklin; "and I should like a little memorandum of it, for the purpose of making which, friend, I will presently get pen, and ink, and paper. But yet I have many doubts."

"About what? Not about my good faith towards you, I hope? for if you have, the sooner you dismiss them the better. There is nothing so well calculated to keep men faithful to each other as mutual interest."

"No, friend Granby, I have not the least doubt of thy good faith, so far as thy intentions go; but, even now, I fear that thy visit may bring down upon me and my house inquiry; and induce, perhaps, other of your fraternity to visit me.—Nay, the mere fact of thy visit to-day will act as a kind of provocation to induce some one else to come."

"Make yourself easy about that."

"But how?"

"Well, I will tell you. Thinking of course that you, as a man of business, would have the good sense to make a proper arrangement with me, I took the greatest precaution to induce everybody to think I was going somewhere else.—Even my wife thinks I have gone down the river upon some business. I believe you will admit that I am cunning enough, Mr. Franklin?"

"Indeed, friend, thou art as cunning as a badger."

"Ha! ha! Then all your scruples are removed now?"

"Completely, friend, and I am quite decided. I may almost say that I look upon thy visit here as quite providential, and the pains that thou hast taken to conceal it, so that thou shouldst not be traced to this house, are really, friend, quite delightful to think of."

"Well, well," said the highly gratified officer. "All's right. I rather think that when you and I combine for any purpose, it would take the devil himself to get the better of us. Ha! ha! ha! I am so glad I came, you can't think; I never felt so pleased with myself, or so comfortable in all my life, really, upon my word."

Dick thought now that it was high time to get up the stairs agian, for he expected the quaker might come up for pen, ink and paper, with which he wished to make the memorandum he spoke of to the officer. When Dick reached the landing, he whispered to Jack,—

"We are sold."

"Sold?" said Jack. "What do you mean by that?"

"Simply that our friend, Franklin, has even now made a bargain with an officer to give us up for one-half of the reward. You look to your pistols, Jack, and I will look to mine. They shall find that two to two is no odds; and if they don't bid the world good night, it shall be no fault of mine this day.

CHAPTER CLX.

GRACE MANNING'S GREAT DANGER.

While Dick uttered these words, Jack looked at him in perfect astonishment. He found the gratest difficulty in bringing himself to believe in the perfidy of Franklin, and he said with earnestness—

"It's a fact. I heard it with my own ears. It is no opinion, no surmise. It is a fact. We are bought and sold."

"Then, Dick, I think we will make them repent of their bargain. Only say what you think is best to be done, and I will place myself entirely under your direction in the matter."

"Are your pistols fit for active service, Jack?"

"They are. I have only fresh-primed them a little while ago, and my hand is unusually steady. Dick, I feel that I am fit for anything, for if we fall, of course poor Claude falls likewise, for who will find out Phillip Manning, and restore Grace to her father, if we do not?"

"You are right enough there, Jack. What I propose is, then, that we go down stairs, and shoot them both. The quaker has gone to get writing materials to make a memorandum of his infamous bargain with the officer, respecting not only a treacherous giving up of us, but of all who may come here, relying upon him for safety. He has himself said, that this house shall be a sort of rat-trap; but I think he will find that we decline being the rats. Come on. I will shoot the quaker, and you may shoot the other."

"Agreed—agreed. It is for Claude as well as for ourselves."

If it had not been for his feeling towards Claude, there can be very little doubt but that Jack would have shrunk from this deed of retributive justice, which the sterner nature of Dick suggested; but he felt certain that Claude's fate would be sealed if he and Dick were not at liberty to trace out Grace Manning, and so triumphantly vindicate him from the charge brought against him by Phillip Manning. Hence, then, although with a certain degree of reluctance, Jack followed Dick down the stairs with a well-loaded pistol in his hand.

When they reached the landing below, Dick whispered to him—

"It would be a great thing, Jack, would it not, to get the document, which will at any time prove the treachery against which me are now armed. Would it not?"

"I should like by all mean," said Jack, "to have such a written justification of this fearfully necessary deed, Dick."

"You shall have it. We will listen a moment."

They did listen, but rather to their surprise, all was most profoundly still within the room where the secret conference had taken place between the quaker and the officer. After a few moments, both Dick and Jack began to think that their prey had escaped them.

They looked at each other for a moment or two, as though each were anxious to read what the other thought by the expression of his face, and then Dick laid his hand upon the handle of the door, and whispered—

"Come on."

He opened the door, and at once dashed into the room with the pistol in his hand. The quaker alone was there. He was standing by the window, very quietly and composedly washing his hands in a basin that, when the hinged-top of the window-seat was down, was completely concealed. The expression of his countenance, as he glanced round upon Dick and Jack, was appalling. All the mild, quiet, firmness of look, which was his usual characteristic, had fled, and his every feature was indicative of passion. His eyes were flashing, and indeed, as he then stood with his coat off, no one not well acquainted with his features, could for a moment have ventured upon his recognition.

"Well," he said sternly. "Is this obeying my orders."

"You are a villain," said Dick.

"Villain in your teeth, highway robber," he replied. "How dare you apply such a term to me? You are only existing upon sufferance."

"Where is your companion in guilt? Where is he with whom you have made an alliance for our blood?"

"Oh, you are a listener at keyholes, are you?" said Franklin. "Only wait until I have washed my hands, and I will soon answer you."

"I came here," said Dick, "to shoot you, and I don't know what hinders me at this moment."

"You are afraid," said the quaker, drying his hands very deliberately upon a large towel. "You are afraid—that's the reason, friend, why thou dost not do it."

He was rapidly recovering his usual manner.

"Afraid?" said Dick, as he advanced two steps. "Afraid?"

"Yes, friend. A brave man is always afraid to do a base and cowardly action."

THE RETURN OF GRACE MANNING TO HER DISCONSOLATE FATHER.

Dick slowly lowered his hand, as he said—

"You are a riddler. What am I to think? I heard enough to convince any one of your treachery; even now, for all I know, the officer, Granby, may have left the house, only for the purpose of concocting measures for our apprehension."

"He has not left the house, friend."

"Where is he then?"

"Through that half-open door, friend, thou wilt find him."

"Jack," said Dick, "he is your victim. Shoot him if you see him there, while I keep an eye upon our friend here."

Jack passed through the half-open doorway, and then in a moment he came back with agitation in his looks—

"He is there, indeed," he said, "but he is dead."

"Dead?"

"Yes, Dick. He lies in his blood."

"And this, friend, is some of it," said the quaker, as he pointed to the water in the wash-hand basin, which was of an ensanguined tinge. "This is some of it!"

At that moment the face of Franklin again changed to the awful expression that it had worn at the moment that Dick and Jack had made their way so roughly into the apartment; but it was but transient; gradually subsiding, he looked cold and quiet as usual. Dick hastily made his way to the adjoining room to make sure that Jack had not been mistaken, but there he saw Granby lying in a pool of blood, although he could not well perceive by what means he had come by his death. The face was uninjured, but it had upon it an awful expression of agony, as it was upturned to the ceiling. The eyes were fixed and opaque, and the hair hung in disordered masses, partially dabbled in blood.

Dick made the best of his way back to the other room, and in a voice indicative of emotion, he said—

"Franklin, what is the meaning of this?"

"He," said the quaker, proceeding towards the dead body, "he would tell you if he had a tongue that he could wag now."

"But—but——"

"Tush! The explanation stares thee in the face, friend. That man insulted me by an offer, that it appears you overheard. Well, he has signed and sealed it now with his blood. Are you satisfied?"

"I am, indeed. You have killed him instead of allowing him to betray us. We are safe, and we owe it to you. How can I, for it was all my saying, how can I sufficiently apologise to you for my most unjust suspicions of you?"

"Say no more about it. It was very wrong and very imprudent of you to come out of the room above at all; but as you did come, and it has turned out that no particular mischief has resulted from it, let it drop. Our friend, Granby, still has to be disposed of. He was the most dangerous man to me in all London; and now I can breath a little freely that he is no more. Mark me, friends, I do not consider this to be a murder, although the law would. Come."

Dick and Jack followed the quaker with amazement at his calmness so immediately after such an act. He pointed to the body, saying—"Drag it aside."

Although with reluctance, Dick took hold of the heels of the dead man and dragged him aside, when Franklin, by stamping upon one of the floor-boards where there appeared only to be a simple joining of two pieces, caused it to lift up at the other end, and after displacing that one board, he lifted several others with ease, disclosing an opening right through the floor to an immense depth below.

"This goes to the cellars, friends," he said, "and there Mr. Granby may lie and rot, or be food for rats. I hear them at times screaming and fighting far down below. Be so good as to pitch him down, friend Jack of the sixteen strings."

"Don't ask me," said Jack, "I could not touch him for the world. If he were alive you would not find me backward in grappling with him; but now that he is no more, I should not like to touch him with the top of my boot."

"Nay, friend, I particularly wish you to do it. I killed him. Dick, here, has already dragged him from above the trap, and it is thy duty, friend, to poke him down."

"If it come at all in the shape of a duty," said Jack, "I'll kick him down; so that you shall not say that I had no hand in the business as well as yourself."

With this, Jack urged the dead body to the opening with his foot, and soon overbalancing it, away it went out of sight into the depths below. Franklin carefully replaced the boards, and then remarking that he should have to get out the stains of blood, and that he knew a mode of doing that, he led the way to the other apartment.

"How did you kill him?" said Jack.

"Do not trouble thyself, friend, to ask unnecessary questions," replied the quaker. "Let it content thee that he is dead, friend."

* * J * * * *

While all this was transacting at the quaker's house in Dean Street, Soho, the situation of Grace Manning was getting most critical. If any one had peeped into a small chamber in the house where Phillip Manning had a private lodging in the city, somewhere at the back of where the post office now stands, they would have seen that he was rather singularly occupied.

This lodging of his consisted of but one room, in which was a sofa bedstead; and there it was that, known only by the name of Smith, he used to commit his villanies. At this time, however, he was very differently employed, and he is worth looking at.

At a table by the window he sits, with before him a small glass apparatus for distillation, such as is used for chemical purposes, consisting of a retort and a receiver, well supported by a stand. Under the bulb of the retort was a spirit lamp, flickering and burning with its peculiar faint flame. Phillip was resting with his chin upon his fists, and his elbows upon the table. He was watching the boiling up of some liquid in the bulb of the retort, in which, too, there were some herbs.

"This will do," he muttered. "As soon as a great part of the water has gone over in vapour, what remains will be a tolerably concentrated production from the poisonous herbs I have collected; and they must destroy life. Ha! ha! I am not so foolish as to purchase poison—I make it!"

His face at that moment was perfectly diabolical in its satanic expression.

After a time he removed the spirit lamp from under the retort, and put upon it its glass cap, and extinguished it; then he poured cold water over the bulb of the retort to cool it, and was soon able to handle it. He took from it three drops of a greenish thick fluid, and poured them one by one into a pint bottle of wine. He then held the wine up to the light, and looked at it scrutinizingly.

"No," he said, "it is to the full as clear as it was, and yet what a deadly draught it will be. What an enemy to life would but a small portion of the liquor now become. She shall bid adieu to the world by its means. I will not try to induce her to take it, but I will leave it with her, and at some moment when she feels faint both in body and in spirit she will fancy that a glass of the wine will revive her; and then, Grace, you will be no more, and I shall escape from the perplexity of an affair which, if it go on much longer, will be certain to end in my destruction."

He carefully corked the bottle, and then dashed dust upon it to give it an appearance of age. He dragged it through a cobweb that was in a corner by the roof of his room, and then he said—"This shall be the death draught of my fair cousin, Grace."

CHAPTER CLXI.

PHILLIP'S DISGUISE.

We will take a look at Grace Manning in the prison-house to which the villany of her cousin Phillip had consigned her in that sweet spring-tide of her existence. She almost began to despair of aid.

It was a room in which she was now confined. Phillip had blindfolded her thrice, and changed the apartment in which he kept her prisoner. He was afraid to let her be long in one place, partly for fear she should concoct some plan of escape from it, and partly lest some one else might find her. Each of these times that he had changed her abode he had taken her into the open air to make her believe that she had gone to another house entirely; but she had smelt the odour of flowers, and she felt quite convinced from the feel of the ground, and the character of the air, that she had only been traversing a garden, no doubt attached to the house in which she had been in the first instance brought.

From all this manœuvring one thing was quite evident, if even other circumstances had not tended to confirm it, and that was, that Phillip Manning was in a state of the greatest fear and tribulation for the consequences of his criminality.

Upon the occasion of his last visit to the house in which he had her in durance—that visit, in the making of which he had successfully foiled both Jack and Dick—he had used the most awful threats towards her.

"Your life," he said, "is in your own hands. You will, if you please, easily force me to become your executioner. If you are so vindictive as still to assert you will ruin me with your father, by telling him all that has really happened, what can you expect but that, in common self defence, I should prefer to kill you in this place?"

"I will tell the truth, and the whole truth," said Grace; "nothing shall induce me to depart from it."

"Wretched girl, do you not tremble?"

"No, Phillip; but I can well perceive that you do so."

"And so, you even dare to taunt me?"

"It is not taunting. I tell you that I will intercede for you with my father, if, even now, you restore me to him. I will say for you, in asking him for mercy, what I can."

"Mercy! What do you mean by mercy? What do you expect as the result of your intercession? tell me that; and let me judge of what I am to expect from you. Speak to me fully—your life hangs upon a thread."

"By my intercession I hope that my father may be induced to spare you from that legal prosecution which your crimes merit. I do not know what the laws of your country would condemn you to for this great iniquity, but I would make an effort to spare you that."

"Yes, and leave me to disgrace and destitution!"

"It is you, Phillip, who will leave yourself to disgrace. No one can lift the disgrace of such acts as yours off the shoulders of him who perpetrates them. As for destitution, I do not think that my father would let you starve, whatever might be his abhorrence of your crimes. Perhaps in some other land you might live a life of repentance."

Phillip laughed loudly and discordantly.

"No, girl," he said; "upon one condition only will I place you in your father's arms: it is, that you will point to me as your preserver, and accuse that man who is now in Newgate upon the charge of your abduction, of really being the person who tore you from home. I will then ask your father for a sufficient sum of money, which no doubt his grateful feelings will prompt him to give me, and with it I will leave England for ever. When I am gone you can tell what tale you like; so that, after all, it will only be costing your father a few thousands, and that is no harm to him."

"No, Phillip, no."

"You will not?"

"I dare not."

"What do you mean by dare not? Who is to hinder you, fool that you are? What do you mean by dare not?"

"I dare not go to my father with an untruth upon my lips, even for one hour."

"Then die in you obstinacy, idiot, for die you shall!"

"Heaven help me!"

"Heaven! Ha! ha! Wait for Heaven to help you until you lie and rot. Ha! ha! I have you now; but it is only to bind more tightly around you the meshes of my power, and to take more effectual steps for the destruction of him who had the audacity to intefere with me in the country lane. To-morrow I will visit you again, and if I do not find you more tractable, that day will be your last in this world."

With these words, and without waiting for an answer, for anything she said was gall and wormwood to him, he left the house, and full of dark and evil thoughts he made his may to London again.

It was after this visit to Grace, that feeling how utterly impossible it was to move her from her fixed integrity of thought and action, he fairly made up his mind to her murder. Then it was that he drugged the wine, which he hoped would be a speedy means of relieving him from her presence in this world.

But notwithstanding all that was happening to them, in the meantime Jack and Dick were not unmindful of the principle business they had in hand, namely, the rescue of Claude from Newgate, by the thorough establishment of his innocence as regarded the abduction of Grace.

By establishing that fact, they not only anticipated an instant order from Judge Manning for his release, but they hoped that in the judge they should make for him (Claude) such a friend, as upon some other important occasion might really stand him in good stead.

They were both at the spot in Islington, from whence they could command a good view of the cottage, where Phillip Manning went to put on his disguise, long before the hour at which they expected him to make his appearance there.

"Do you know, Dick," said Jack, "I scarcely ever felt so nervous in all my life as I do now, about the probable fate of that young girl. It seems as if something whispered to me, that to a certainty that rascal would take her life in spite of us."

"No, no, Jack, if he come here, you may depend she yet lives; and so sure as he does come she shall be saved, for we can then take pretty good care not to lose sight of the villain. I grant you if he were not to come, I should have the most dismal forebodings upon the subject."

"Alas! Dick, if you began to have forebodings, I should feel and have certainties. I hope to God it will not be so. Ah! what a delightful thing. There he is, Dick."

"Sure enough. All's right. Yes, that is the fellow. What has he got in that bag, I wonder?"

"Some provisions, or a fresh disguise for himself."

"Perhaps both, Jack; but as we are pretty sure there is no one in that bit of a crib, which we may call for convenience sake Phillip's cottage, but himself, we will follow whoever comes out of it, let them be in appearance what they may. We have already had evidence that Master Phillip is a skilful actor, and we positively must not let him do us again, Jack."

"We will not."

Phillip advanced with the utmost possible caution. He seemed quite to have some sort of notion that he was being followed, for he looked many times behind him, and passed the cottage twice before he ventured upon going up to the door of it, and opening it with the key he took from his pocket.

When he did open the door though, he disappeared within the cottage, and closed it again with truly marvellous celerity.

"Good," said Dick. "We have him now, Jack, as safely as though he were in our hands. I will now go up the lane opposite and hide for him, while you come after him, but at such a distance as shall take off all idea that you are after him. Don't you look for me, as I will keep an eye upon you as you come up the lane, and join you in good time."

"That will do, Dick. Good luck go with you."

"That it certainly ought to do now, Jack, for this is, to tel lthe honest truth, rather a difficult sort of adventure to those that generally engage our attention.

For the love of everything now, mind whatever you do, that you don't follow Phillip too closely."

"Trust me."

Dick at once started over the way, and in a careless manner, for fear Phillip should be looking from the window of the cottage, he stalked up the lane. It is highly probable, however, that he might have gone in any way he liked, for Phillip was by far too busy with his own disguise, to pay the remotest attention just then to anything else.

We will in the forthcoming adventure watch the conduct and proceedings of Phillip, leaving our friends to act as their good feeling and judgment may direct them in the defence of the beautiful young girl who was in such danger.

Phillip then quite satisfied himself, before he went into the cottage, that nobody saw him, so that when he did get in, he thought he had nothing in the world to do but to put on the disguise with which he was in the habit of going up the lane; but upon this occasion, having a horrible guilty knowledge of what he meant to do, he shook to that degree, that it was with the greatest possible difficulty he could put on the apparel, which was to make such a transformation in his appearance.

In about double the time, however, that he usually took to make the change, he did at length effect it, and then placing the drugged bottle of wine in a small hand-basket, he, with that upon his arm, left the cottage.

Now he did not look to the right or to the left, for he felt confident in his disguise, and he really believed that the only person he had to deal with was Grace herself. He went across the road quickly and up the lane as fast as it was at all prudent to go, considering that he personated an old woman, and perhaps a little faster.

The inhabitants of a few of the cottages at the commencement of the lane, had got to know him through seeing him several times, and one said, as he went along—

"Well, old Goody, how are you to-day?"

"Poorly, poorly," replied Phillip, in a very well acted voice indeed, as he went on.

He then pursued his way until he came to the pailings of the garden of the large house that was to let, and then he slackened his pace and only crept along. He pretended to be gathering something in the hedge, but in reality he was carefully looking about him to see if any one were at hand. After getting in this way a handful of chickweed, he quickened his pace a little, still skirting the pailings.

It was well that Dick was capitally hidden, and it was well that Jack was not too hasty in following Phillip, so as to come into sight before the rascal got housed; for if he had, without the smallest doubt, Phillip would have turned back, and posponed his visit to Grace for that day.

Everything, however, happened as it was wished to happen, and after a few minutes more skulking along the pailings, he suddenly whipped a little key out of his pocket, and opening a small door in it, disappeared in an instant.

"I am safe here," he said, as he closed the little door, and locked it on the inside.

It was rather curious that at that moment Dick popped from behind a hay-stack in a meadow on the other side of the lane, and said—

"Now he's nabbed."

The place where Phillip now found himself, was in truth a neglected garden. The trees had grown tall and strong, the shrubs had got wild and straggling, and the flowers had run in all directions, disdaining cultivated art, and rapidly lapsing into their original wild habits.

To him the place had no charms either of retrospection or anticipation. All he knew and felt was, that he had come there to commit a murder, and that each moment, although he felt his nerves fearfully shaken, he likewise felt more and more inclined to do the deed.

There was nothing whatever to interrupt him, and he made his way, regardless of the remains of the old pathway, towards the house, which, with its weather-stained walls and its closed windows, looked grim and desolate.

"There was a murder, they say, committed in this house once," mutterred Phillip Manning, as he reached its threshold; "and so no one will live in it. Now there will be two. Yes, now there will be two; for nothing can, and nothing shall, save Grace Manning from death to-day. She shall never be a witness against me."

CHAPTER CLXII.

STARTLING INCIDENTS.

So said Phillip.

"She shall never be a witness against me; and nothing can, and nothing shall save Grace Manning from death!" Impious man! did he think that Heaven slumbered while he was about to destroy one of its masterpieces of creation?

Before he crossed the threshold of the house, he placed his hand up to his eyes, and took a long look around the garden. He felt quite satisfied that he had it all to himself. Like Alexander Selkirk, the original Robinson Crusoe, he might have said—

"I am monarch of all I survey."

"'Tis well," he muttered. "I always thought that even the highest crimes could be committed with perfect ease if people were but commonly careful. I shall do this deed and no one will be a bit the wiser. Indeed it is as good as done, and beneath that mulberry-tree I will bury the only mute witness of my crime. Yes, there shall the body of Grace lie and rot while I comfort her father's and my uncle's declining years, bidding him look upon me as a son, although he has lost his only daughter. Then of course grief will soon kill him after he has made a will in my favour, leaving me all his property, which is truly immense, and I shall have my heart's desire—unbounded means of enjoyment. Oh, how I will play the tyrant and trample on all who come within my power."

While he indulged in this day-dream, he was fumbling in his pockets for a key to open the door of the house with. He found it at last, and then he disappeared whin the ill-omened structure that had earned so bad a name and which he fully intended should from that day be entitled to a worse one.

He did not fasten the door behind him. What was the use? He was so very safe.

The hall in which he now was consisted of a large space, paved with alternate black and white marble squares, and from the centre of this hall sprang the principal staircase of the house. There was, however, numerous rooms opening from the hall itself, and into one of those he went. Phillip never appeared in his disguise before Grace. He always felt that that would be useless, as a tone—a look—a gesture might discover him, and probably would do so to one who knew him so well as she did. Into one of these rooms, then, leading off from the hall, he went, to get rid of his disguise. Wrapped up in the bottom of the basket he had brought with him from the cottage was his coat, and that was the only article he found necessary to alter his present appearance with.

In that side room, which had been a pretty enough looking breakfast-room, he quickly effected the change in his apparel which he thought necessary, and then, with the drugged bottle of wine and some biscuits he crept up the staircase. Concealed in his breast was a double-barrelled pistol loaded carefully.

"Should she refuse the wine," he muttered, "she shall die by a more violent means; but in all cases die she shall."

The whole of the upper part of the house was in darkness, for Phillip had taken great care to close all the shutters so that no ray of light should by any sort of accident reach the room in which poor Grace was kept a prisoner. That room was an inner one, with but a small window to it.

"Now," he said, as he began to make his way towards her by unlocking the door that led to the little room in which she was, "now I have a part to play and we shall see whether the complaints that have been paid to me on the score of my acting be genuine or not."

By the aid of a phosphorous match he got a light in the outer room. A half-burnt candle stood in a piece of wood, by way of a candlestick, on the floor. He ignited it; and then waiting a moment until it had burnt sufficiently to be beyond the danger of sudden extinction from being moved, he crept towards the actual door of the room in which Grace was a captive.

He unlocked it and flung it open. Then shading the light from his eyes with his hand, he called—

"Grace! Grace!"

There was no reply for the moment, and the idea that she had fled from the house came across him like a death-pang. He rushed into the room.

"Grace! Grace! Speak! Speak, I charge you. I pray you do not drive me mad by this silence! Oh, you are there!"

She stood at some few paces from him, calm and still.

"Well, Phillip Manning," she said, "what would you with me? I am here, as you see."

"Yes," he said, and he trembled violently. "I now see that you are here. But—but why did you not speak to me at once? It is no matter though. It is no matter. Oh, Grace! Grace! Pity me!"

"I do pity you."

"You do pity me?"

"Yes. Guilty creatures surely may well be pitied. May they not, Phillip Manning?"

"Well, well, Grace—perhaps you are right. I have come to-day to you with very different feelings from what I had when last I saw you. Then all the evil passions of my soul were up in arms; but better thoughts have since come over me, Grace; and if a true and a sincere repentance for what I have done, and such atonement as I can make will—will——"

He affected that his feelings would not permit him to finish his speech; but placing the candle upon the chimney-piece he audibly sobbed.

"Is this change indeed sincere?" said Grace.

"You may well, indeed, doubt it," added Phillip, pretending to speak with great difficulty, and to gulp down his sobs as he did so. "You may well doubt it, Grace; but it is sincere; and you cannot see a more wretched man than I. Some demon surely must have possessed me to make me behave to you as I have behaved. I cannot myself understand it."

"If, indeed, Phillip," said Grace, "I could think that you had awakened to a proper sense of your wickedness, it would not cost me an effort to forgive you."

"Ah, can you be so good—so angelic?"

"You may prove to me your repentance by the commencement of your atonement. When you restore me to the arms of my father, I shall then, indeed, believe that you are sincere."

"I will do so. I have come now to do so. Without condition other than a claim upon your pity, and your mercy, I have come now to take you from this place, and to restore you to your father. In some other land, as you yourself suggested to me when last we met, I shall hope to find that peace of mind which will now for ever be denied to me in my own. You, Grace, will be my intercessor with your father; and while I feel that it will be impossible to say one word in extenuation actually of my offence, still my bitter and heart-felt repentance may be pleaded."

"And it will not be pleaded in vain."

"Ah, think you so? What happy words!"

"I am certain of it. But do not delay, Phillip. Take me home at once, and for yourself fear nothing. I will make it the first of my requests to my father to forgive you, and to make some sort of provision for you out of England. Let us go now at once, I implore you. Every moment that I remain here is another moment of misery to me, and of deep anxiety to my father."

"Ah!" said Phillip, wiping his eyes, "how well I can understand this anxi

CLAUDE, WHILE ESCAPING FROM NEWGATE, FINDS PHILLIP MANNING A PRISONER.

Come, you shall take a biscuit and one glass of wine to strengthen you, my much injured cousin, and then we will be off."

"No, no; I want nothing."

"Yes, you do; I feel certain that after even the few days only that you have passed here you must be weak and ill. You will find that when you get out into the fresh open air you will be ready to faint away. But one biscuit, soaked in a drop of wine, will restore you, and keep up your strength and courage."

"I have no need of courage now, Phillip, that you have repented; and strength I feel I have enough."

"Nay, but ——"

"Excuse me, Phillip; I will not drink; I have a great objection to wine—I do not like it. Do not ask me."

"To oblige me, Grace. Only one sip—just a sip will be sufficient. You will not, surely, make a quarrel between us at such a moment as this, and for such a trifle as the taking or the refusing a glass of wine? Surely you would not run the risk of throwing me back again into my former frame of mind regarding you for such a trifle?"

"Your repentance, Phillip, must be but skin-deep, indeed, if it can vanish because I refuse a glass of wine."

"Well, well, that is an uncommonly true remark. But yet you will take the wine?"

"No, Phillip."

"Curses on you! You shall take it!"

"Ah, Philip, now I know you again!"

"Know me again? What do you mean?"

"I mean that from the first I knew that your pretended grief and repentance only served as a cloak to hide some object. Why, you cannot even deceive a poor simple girl like myself. Your grand object to-day is to get me to drink that wine, and I will not take one drop of it. No, Phillip, I tell you, no; I will not taste it."

"Wretched girl! Have you twenty lives, that you feel you can afford to trifle with them in this way? If I be not a repentant man, you shall, in good truth, find that I am a desperate one. The question between us is your life or mine; and I tell you now, Grace, that, with all your youth and all your beauty, your last hour has now come!"

"If it be the will of Heaven, it has."

"It is my will—that is now sufficient."

She burst into tears.

"Oh, Phillip," she said, "you cannot be so very wicked as to take away life. If even now there are times when you feel as though you would give anything for innocence of mind and purpose, what will be your feelings when you have done murder? Ordinary crimes may, in some measure, be atoned for; but who shall restore the dead? Who shall bid the grave give up its tenant, because the murderer is repentant? Pause, Phillip, for your own sake, pause, before you commit an act that is, in its awful consequences, irrevocable. Spare my life—oh, spare me, Phillip!"

"No; curses on you! You have yourself goaded me to this act, and you shall die."

"No, no—oh, God!—no."

"I say yes. There is no help for you. You are shut out from all the world. If you and I were upon some desolate island in the midst of the great sea we could not possibly be more isolated than we are from all human nature. You may cry, pray, rave, and shriek, but there is no help for you. You are my victim—it is a settled thing. You have rejected the terms upon which I offered you your life and freedom, and I will kill you. You have your choice—poison or a bullet?"

He took the pistol from his breast-pocket as he spoke. The young girl clasped her hands before her face, and sank upon her knees in a paroxysm of terror.

"Spare me!—spare me!"

"Will you drink the wine?"

"I cannot. I dare not."

"Then there is but one other alternative—you will die a more violent death; but die you must, and shall. I say, that there is but one other alternative—"

"Liar!" cried a voice of thunder; and in a moment Dick Turpin, as though he had been shot out of a cannon, sprang upon Phillip, and knocked him to the floor.

"Hush!" cried Jack. "Have you got him?"

"All's right," said Dick. "Twist the pistol out of his hand. That will do, Jack. Why I do believe I have knocked all the breath out of him. Cheer up, my lass—cheer up."

"Grace has fainted," said Jack.

Dick got hold of Phillip by the throat, and there he held him, while Jack tied his hands securely, so that he was quite incapable of further mischief. He did not speak a word, but looked from one to the other of them, like a man only half awakened from some dreadful dream.

"Murder!—murder!—mercy!" he cried. "Oh, murder! Help!—help!"

"Why, you vagabond!" said Dick, "it is we who ought to cry murder. But your career is over now, and you may as well take your fate easy, for hung you will be to all intents and purposes."

CHAPTER CLXIII.

A MOST UNEXPECTED CATASTROPHE.

Phillip Manning was not the sort of man to attend to Dick's advice, of taking his fate easily. So long as he was at all successful in the prosecution of his villany, he got on amazingly, and was upon the most capital terms with himself; but the instant any reverse happened he was lost to all firmness, and gave himself up to despair.

"Kill me—kill me, at once!" he cried. "It will now be nothing but slow death to me for the time to come."

"Very well," said Dick. "I will blow out your brains in a moment, since you are so good as to request such a thing, which is very liberal upon your part; for it certainly will save a deal of trouble to society at large, and cheat the hangman."

"Oh, no—no—no!" shouted Phillip Manning, when he saw Dick draw a pistol from his pocket. "Oh, no—no, I did not mean it—indeed I did not mean it. I cannot die. Let me cling to life while I may. Oh, spare me!"

"Miserable wretch!" said Dick. "Do you fancy for one moment that I would have your death upon my shoulders? No, I know well enough that you would not have the courage to allow me to do more than to show you the weapon of death. The law will wind up the miserable thread of your existence."

Phillip licked his lips, and with a groan he spoke to Grace, saying to her, whose life by that time he would no doubt have taken, if he had not been hindered from so doing by Dick and Jack—

"Oh, cousin Grace, say something for me. Tell them to let me go. I—I did not intend to harm you. It was only a joke, after all."

"The best joke will be when you are hung," said Dick. "Don't speak to him, Miss Manning. You should not condescend now to say one word to such a man. His murderous intentions as regarded you were only too apparent."

Grace shuddered as she replied to Dick—

"Yes," she said, "but for you and your friend he would have no doubt have killed me; I feel now like one rescued from the grave, and can hardly believe in the reality of this scene."

"I don't wonder at that, Miss Manning," said Jack; "but you will soon be in the arms of your father, and then you will, indeed, feel that, in reality, you are rescued from this bad man, who would have murdered you, merely to cover his lesser crime of imprisoning you in this dismal place."

"Yes," said Dick, "in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, murder is done to cover the consequences of some other crime, which, compared to it, is a piece of the most unblemished and spotless innocence. But come, Jack, let us be going; I will take care of Master Phillip, and do you escort Miss Grace."

This was, no doubt, a politic arrangement, as far as it went, for he, Dick, was much better qualified to hold a tight grip of Phillip Manning than Jack was, while Jack could very well escort Grace.

At first Phillip could not be got to move. He flung himself upon his knees, and, in the most abject manner possible, begged for that mercy and consideration which he never yet showed to any one.

"Spare me," he cried, "and you will not—you shall not repent of doing so. Only let me go, and I promise you all most solemnly that I will leave England at once, and no one shall ever hear of me again. In some other country I will bitterly repent of my past errors. Oh, what will be the good, now that Grace is rescued, of bringing me to justice?"

Grace would willingly enough have listened to the appeal of the abject wretch, and she looked at Dick, as much as to say, "Shall it be as he says?" Dick understood her, and, shaking his head, he said,—

"No, no, Miss Manning, you leave this fellow to your father; he will do what is right and proper; but at present I consider that, until he decides what is to be done with Philip, we ought, none of us, to interfere in his fate. It is our duty to give him up to your father, whom he has so bitterly offended, and he alone should decide upon his fate."

This reasoning was so clear and conclusive, that it quite convinced Grace, who no longer looked imploringly at Dick, in favour of Phillip. She carefully avoided the looks of Phillip at all; and Jack offering her his arm, they all left the room together. To be sure, Dick had some difficulty in making Phillip walk, but finding such to be the case, he whispered to him,—

"If you positively will not come along, I can only tell you that my friends tell me I am a very short-tempered man; and when you or I least expect it, I may lose patience, and blow your brains out; so be warned. I won't answer for myself; and after this, whatever happens in that sort of way, you have only your own obstinacy to thank for it, and you lose your chance of the judge acting with any degree of clemency towards you, on account of your relationship to him and his daughter."

"Oh! yes, yes," said Phillip, catching, or pretending to catch at the idea; "how very good and kind you all are to me!"

"Hold your row," said Dick.

"Yes, but I was only saying how very grateful I am to you. It is such a good idea, that of yours, about the relationship. Of course, it would not be pleasant to the judge to have his nephew hung—would it?"

"It would be to me, if I were he. There's nothing would give me so much real gratification."

"You don't mean that—you really don't mean that?"

"Indeed, but I do, though."

"But I thought you thought the judge might be merciful to me, on account of my being his nephew?"

"Yes, he may do such a foolish thing as take that into his account, but I would not; and all I said to you was that if I had to blow your brains out previously, you lost the chance—that is all."

"Oh, yes, my dear sir, I quite understand you; and how very facetiously you put it too."

"I put it facetiously! Now, I consider that to be an insult, Mr. Phillip. I never was facetious in all my life."

"No, no, certainly not. I did not mean facetious, my dear sir—not at all. God bless me, no. I meant that—that you put it quite—quite ——"

"Seriously?"

"Yes; ah! seriously, to be sure. That was it—that was what I meant, of course. I'm so much obliged to you, you can't think, for being so good as to suggest to me what I really did think."

Dick made a gesture of impatience. The fulsome and disgusting adulation of Phillip was too much for his patience.

"I wish I had given him to you, Jack," he said, "to take care of; you would, perhaps, have had more patience with him than I am blessed with."

"No," said Jack, "I really don't think I should. I have a tolerable stock of patience under ordinary circumstances, I fully admit; but I think it would fail in the company of such a man as Phillip Manning. So do you keep him, Dick, to yourself, for, in good truth, I don't at all want him."

They now made the best of their way out of the house, and Grace could not refrain from shedding tears of joy, as she once again found herself in safety and in the garden. The sight of the trees and the flowers—always agreeable and affecting objects as they are to the sensitive and educated mind—was to her one of the richest of treats; and notwithstanding that garden had gone to such decay as it had, she saw a thousand beauties in every struggling plant that spent its luxuriance in that deserted place.

"They say a murder was committed in the house long ago," said Jack; "and that that is the reaason why it is deserted."

"Alas!" sighed Grace. "The poor murdered one had not such friends as Heaven sent to me."

"Yes," said Jack; "no doubt Phillip would have added to the evil repute of the place by your death likewise, had not our anxiety, both for you and for our friend, brought us early upon his track."

"Anxiety for your friend? Can it be true, as Phillip told me, that the gentleman who rescued me from Phillip in the country lane is prison on my account?"

"It is too true."

"That gives me truly a heart-pang. Oh, let us hasten that we may rescue him. My father will not lose one moment in procuring his release; and such rich compensation as he can make to him for the great injustice that has been done him, he will make, you may be assured."

"Of that," replied Jack, "we are quite certain."

By this time they had got into the little lane, and they soon emerged from that into the high street of the then suburban Islington, where Dick's object was to procure, as quickly as possible, some conveyance to London. They stopped at an old inn—then it was an old inn, but now, to the regret of all lovers of the past, it is gone —and inquired for a post-chaise.

The Angel, for that was the name of the inn—it was no where near the site of the modern Angel Inn at Islington—could only produce one vehicle of the sort; and as Jack did not choose that Phillip should ride in the same vehicle with Grace, they had to get another chaise from another inn, and so, the two vehicles keeping tolerably close together, they set off for the house of Judge Manning: Grace and Jack being in one, and Dick with his prisoner in the another.

The greatest depression seemed to seize hold of Phillip as they neared London. He began to reflect upon the rigidly just character of the old Judge, and to fear that, notwithstanding the relationship, he would let the law take its course as regarded him, Phillip. His principal hope rested in the expectation that, despite the character of his conduct to her, the gentle disposition of Grace might induce her to plead for him to her father. Of course, anything like a re-instalment in his former condition he now felt was impossible; and, like some ruined and disappointed gambler who has played a stake with fortune and lost, he let his head rest upon his hands, and groaned aloud.

"Those who commit such acts as yours," said Dick, "should make up their minds to the consequences of detection. Whining will do you no good."

"I am lost—lost!"

"Probably enough;—but here we are at the house of your uncle, and to him I will deliver you. If he like to let you go, well and good. I shall consider it no affair of mine, although I shall think it a scandalous shame."

CHAPTER CLXIV.

CLAUDE IS FULLY LIBERATED, AND YET CHANGES HIS CONDITION FOR THE WORSE IN ONE HOUR.

The two post-chaises stopped simultaneously at the judge's door, and one of the drivers knocked loudly. The agitation of Grace was extreme, and she at once sprang from the vehicle, crying, in a voice shaken by her feelings—

"Father! father!—Where is my father?"

The servants in the hall were delighted to see her; and for some few moments they were so astonished at her sudden arrival, that they could do nothing but crowd around her, without answering one of her anxious question as to whether her father was within or not. She could bear the suspense no longer, but breaking away from them she rapidily ascended the staircase. She knew that if her father were within he would be in his study, which was a small room at the back of the house, for quiet sake, where he spent a great portion of the time that he had to spare from his official duties.

It was thither, then, that on the 'wings of affection' she sped.

The door of the little study was shut; and, overcome for a moment or two by her feelings, Grace was compelled to pause at it before she could summons strength enough to open it. It must be recollected too, that she had been greatly weakened by the few days imprisonment she had endured in the deserted house. Indeed, nothing but the natural elasticity of youthful strength and spirits had kept her up so well as she had maintained herself. After a few moments she recovered herself sufficiently to open the door gently.

Her father was there!

The old judge was leaning upon the study table with his head resting upon his hands. He did not hear the study-door open. His thoughts at that moment were with his child; and he was asking himsef if he should ever in this world again have the joy of looking into her eyes, and of blessing her.

Grace gently touched his arm.

"Father!" she said.

If a spark of elictricity had produced the effect the judge could not have started from his seat with greater precipitancy than he did.

"Do not mock me!" he cried. "Oh, do not mock me. Who called me father? I have, alas! no child now."

"Yes, yes!" cried Grace, as she flung herself into his arms. "Yes, father, yes. I have come back to you. I am your own child. Your Grace. Look at me."

There are scenes and situations which it would be profanity for the pen of the novelist to linger to depict. Such scenes should be sacred. In the deep recesses of every human heart there are affections and passions which no language can paint. Over the interview between the father and child so happily restored to him, we draw for a time a veil.

* * * * * *

While this was going on within the judge's house, Dick and Jack had dismissed one of the coaches, and both of them sat in the other along with Phillip Manning, who, now that he found himself fairly at his uncle's door, appeared ready to go mad with shame and vexation.

Had he not been well secured there is no knowing what act of desperation he might not have been guilty of.

"I envy the feelings of Judge Manning, now," said Jack to Dick. "It is almost worth while to have suffered what he must have suffered, to feel the joy that he must now feel, in the restoration of his child."

"You are right, Jack; it is really worth while. We never know real joy but by its contrast with some previously experienced misery, so you see, Jack, these folks who tellus that pleasure in this world, is of itself merely a negative, implying the absence of pain, as night implies merely the absence of day, are about right."

"I think they are quite right," said Jack.

"Listen to me," said Phillip.

"Well, say on," replied Dick.

"You have now restored Grace to her father. By her testimony, of course, your friend who is in Newgate, will be free, and so you will have accomplished all your wishes. I will give you £100 if you will let me go."

"No," said Dick.

"No," said Jack.

"I will give you £200.—Yes, I will make it £200. I have some little savings and I will make it into £200.

"I would not let you go," said Dick, "if you were to make it two hundred hundred, so you may spare yourself the trouble of increasing your offer."

"Lost! lost! lost!" cried Phillip.

"You may be lost. But if you are hanged, society will be considerably the gainer in the long run by your loss, I only wish your uncle would come out and say what is to be done with you, now at once."

"He comes," cried Jack. "He and Grace. Look Dick, look at the old man's face. Did you ever see such an expression of satisfaction? I'll warrant now that Grace has told him all."

"Not a doubt of it."

Jack was right; Grace had in a few words told her father all, and he was coming to the chaise to thank and to welcome those who had brought back the joy of his heart to him, by bringing back his child.

They both, that is Dick and Jack, alighted to meet him, and he embraced them, while with tears standing in his eyes, like sentinels over his feelings, he thanked them over and over again.

"I do not know," he said, "I cannot know how I shall be able to repay to you the obligation I owe you, but be assured that you will not be able to draw too largely upon my gratitude. Come in both of you; come into this house, which at all times, I beg you to consider your own."

"Phillip, is in the carriage, sir," said Dick.

"Yes, I have given orders concerning the prisoner."

"Uncle, uncle!" cried Phillip, from the carriage, when he saw that the judge was fairly going away without so much as exchanging a word with him. "Uncle! uncle! I want to speak to you!"

"Yes," added the judge, continuing his conversation with Jack and Dick, as though there was no such person as Phillip in the world. "Yes, I beg that you will both henceforward reckon me as a friend who may always be relied upon."

"Uncle—uncle! Good God, uncle!—will you not speak to me?"

"And likewise your friend, who is now so unjustly confined in Newgate. It will be my study to make him the most ample compensation."

"Grace—Grace! Oh, speak for me. Uncle—uncle! you will drive me mad if you say nothing to me."

"And believe me," added the judge, as they all four reached the door of the house together. "And believe me, the unjust detention of your friend shall terminate within the succeeding hour to this."

Phillip raised his voice to a shriek, but the judge would take no more notice of him than he did of one of the post-horses. A couple of stout lackeys came out of the house, and one got on the box of the coach with the driver, to whom he gave some directions. The other sprang into the vehicle and seated himself opposite to Phillip, and then away they all went, Phillip's cries and shrieks to his uncle, to take some sort of notice of him, dying away in the distance.

Both Jack and Dick were inexpressibly amused at this mode of treatment to Phillip upon the part of his uncle, for it was certainly the very best that could have been devised, inasmuch as any conversation or altercation with him would really have been a humiliation to any one. They would neither of them say one word to the judge about him, and if Grace had in any way interceded for him they were quite delighted to find that such intercession had had no effect upon the just resolves of the father, for that Phillip had gone off to prison they did not for one moment doubt.

Refreshments were immediately ordered for Dick and Jack, but the former spoke to the judge, saying—

"In truth, sir, the most refreshing thing to us in all the world now would be to see our friend free from prison."

"That you will see shortly," said the judge; "but you know that, in all these affairs, there are certain forms to go through, which even I cannot dispense with. I have, however, sent my secretary to see into the matter, with instructions that there should be no delay."

"That is sufficient, sir."

"Make yourselves quite easy. You will soon be introduced to your friend."

Both Jack and Dick fully expected to see Claude come into the house soon, but presently the sound of carriage-wheels without sounded upon their ears, and the judge rising, said—

"Will you now accompany me upon the business of taking your friend from durance?"

They were both willing enough to go upon such an errand, and would have bidden adieu to Grace, but the judge interposed, saying—

"No—no. You and your friend, who will soon be a free man, shall come back here and pass a few hours with me. I want to learn, so far as you will tell me, who and what you all are, in order that I may best know in what way I can be of service to you."

Dick and Jack exchanged significant glances at this. It would be no easy matter to say to a man in Judge Manning's official position, "Why, sir, we are highwaymen; and the only good you can do us is not to give us into the hands of the police."

They both felt that this explanatory and confidential interview that the judge promised himself with them was to be courted, at any risk; but at that time they said nothing, hoping that Claude, when they were once more united to him, would think of some mode of getting handsomely away.

With this feeling, then, they got into the judge's carriage, which they found was waiting at the door for them. They fully expected to find themselves trundling along towards Newgate, so they did not take any particular notice of the route they were taking, until suddenly Jack looked out of the window, and said,—

"Why, this is Bow Street!"

"Bow Street!" said Jack. "What do we want in Bow Street?"

"I have yet to do an act of justice," said the judge. "As your friend was by me publicly accused of the crime of carrying off my daughter, I think his exculpation from the charge ought to be public likewise. He will be brought from Newgate to the police-office here, and I will publicly proclaim his innocence."

Dick and Jack looked at each other, but they did not say anything, although if the truth were told they felt very uneasy at the idea of this public exculpation, and would have rather met Claude at the door of Newgate, and been off with him at once to the country.

"Our friend," said Dick, "is very much obliged, and I am sure he will be just the man to appreciate such a very delicate attention from you, sir; but as I know he has friends in the country, who are so anxious concerning him, I feel assured he will esteem it a great favour to get away from the police-office as quickly as may be consistent with your feelings on the subject."

CHAPTER CLXV.

THE POLICE OFFICE.—AN AWKWARD RE-ENCOUNTER.

THE judge replied to Dick in the most courteous manner in the world, and made a gratuitous offer of his own carriage to convey any or the whole of them where they pleased, as soon as they had been at his house for some time and refreshed themselves, and he had fully arranged with them what he could do for them, out of gratitude for the immense service that they had rendered to him.

There was, under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, no such thing as gainsaying what the judge thought proper to do. Had Claude been actually there and then with his friends, the police-office business might easily have been avoided; but as he was not, but, on the contrary, had to be fetched from Newgate, both Dick and Jack felt how utterly helpless they were just then. At one moment entertaining the desperate expedient of making the judge a confidant, at that the eleventh hour, as it were, and letting him know exactly who and what Claude was, came over Dick; but he did not like to do that while there was a chance of the affair settling itself comfortably and safely another way; so he let things take their course, comforting himself with the idea that the explanation in the police-office would not last many minutes, and that then it would be much better the judge should know nothing more than he did know, and that was little enough.

A glance at the countenance of Jack was sufficient to tell Dick how full of apprehension he was for Claude; and indeed he, Jack, was so much affected at this abominable idea, as he thought it, of going to Bow Street, that the judge could not help observing it, and said kindly to him,—

"You seem indisposed, my friend?"

"No," said Jack, making a desperate attempt to rally his spirits, and smiling in a very strange and grave kind of way; "no, thank you, sir, I never felt better in my life, I assure you—never better."

Dick gave him an admonishing kick to say as little as possible, on the good old principle that the least said is the soonest mended; and then the judge's coach drew up at the door of the Bow Street police-office. Poor Jack could not suppress a groan as the vehicle stopped.

"I am certain you are not well," said the judge, "but the great natural courage of your character will not permit you to admit as much. Is it not so?"

"Oh! dear, no," said Jack; "I—I am quite well and delighted; only I am so much attached to my friend, who is about to be liberated to-day from his unjust imprisonment, that I own I feel a little nervous and excited."

"The feeling does you honour," said the judge, as they alighted.

The officers and other official persons about the police court soon found out that it was one of the judges that had come; and they were painfully profuse in their attentions both to Dick and Jack, as well as to him; for they could not but see the very friendly and familiar terms upon which the old judge treated his two companions, different as they looked from him.

"If there be no immediate recognition," thought Dick, "all will be well, and we shall pass through this rather troublesome affair with flying colours; but from my heart I do wish it were all well over."

The judge was accommodated with a seat on the bench, and both Dick and Jack would, if they had chosen, likewise enjoyed that honour; but their natural modesty must have stood wonderfully in the way, for they both positively declined; and far from wishing to make themselves at all conspicuous, they took up a very retired position near the door of the court.

"I don't like this at all," whispered Jack to Dick.

"Nor I, Jack. But what are we to do, old fellow? We are in for it now, and we must just go through with it."

"Yes; but really it's very uncomfortable."

"Rather so. Hush! There's Claude coming. I hear a coach stopping. I hope, now, that five minutes more will see us all out of this confounded place, the very air of which appears to me difficult to breathe."

"It's the same to me," said Jack. "I feel as if I were half choaked."

"Hush! don't say any more. There's a fellow with as long ears as a donkey, trying might and main to listen to what we are saying."

"The d—l he is! Can't you——"

"Throttle him?"

"No—no. Can't you say something a little louder to allay any suspicion?"

"It ain't worth while, Jack. Here is our friend. Hush—hush! It will soon be all right now, I hope."

Claude was brought into the court by two of the official personages from Newgate, and placed at the bar; but the judge immediately rose, and said—

"No, no. That is not the place for an innocent man. Let me beg that he may not be made to stand there for one moment."

Claude was removed to where the witnesses stand usually, and then the magistrate said to him—

"It is with peculiar satisfaction that I see you here to-day, John Smith, as an important, a very important communication will be made to you by this gentleman on my right hand."

"My entire innocence," said Claude, in a calm, clear voice, "of the charge brought against me is fully established?"

"It is," said Judge Manning, rising. "It is more than estab'ished; for not only, your worship, am I now in possession of ample proof that this gentleman had no hand whatever in the abduction of my daughter, who is now most happily restored to me, but I am satisfied that in the most gallant manner he rescued her once from the real criminal, and protected her well up to the moment when low cunning and most unheard-of villany got the better for a time of truth and justice."

Claude bowed.

"I have come down here purposely," added the judge, "to make my retraction of the false charge against Mr. Smith as public as I can, and I feel, at the same time that I declare his entire innocence, that I owe him every reparation and apology, as well as a heavy debt of gratitude, for the gallant manner in which, while it was in his power, he protected my daughter, who is now safe and well at my house."

"You have found the real criminal, sir?" said the magistrate.

"I have; and to-morrow, when my child is sufficiently recovered from her alarm and her fatigue, she will be able to appear before your worship to depose to such facts as will bring him within the grasp of justice."

"So much for Phillip," said Dick to Jack.

"Well," said the magistrate, "this is one of those gratifying occasions which very seldom occur in the course of magistrate experience. When we are forced to discharge a prisoner, I am sorry to say that, in the vast majority of cases, it is not from any doubt of his moral delinquency, but because the circumstances attendant upon his crime are not such as to bring him fairly within the operation of the law; but in this case it is to me a sincere pleasure to say that you, John Jones——"

"Smith," whispered the clerk.

"Yes. John Smith leave this court without a blemish upon your character, and you are discharged forthwith. Mr.—a—a—Smith, I have very great pleasure indeed in discharging you."

"Sir, I thank you," said Claude, "for the kind expression with which you accompany this act of justice. The consciousness of my innocence, and the firm conviction that it would very shortly become apparent, have supported me during my most unjust incarceration in Newgate; and I beg to assure you, sir," turning to Judge Manning, "that the pleasure I feel at hearing that your amiable daughter is restored to you, is much greater than my satisfaction at my own release from imprisonment."

The judge stretched out his hand and shook hands cordially with Claude, while the magistrate nodded his head, and smirked and smiled in the most amicable way he could command at a short notice. Everything seemed to be going merry as a marriage bell upon that really pleasant and auspicious occasion.

"Fully discharged," said the magistrate.

"And nothing to pay," said the clerk.

"Now then," said Judge Manning, "allow me the pleasure of calling you my friend, and of conducting you to my house, where my daughter will herself thank you for your chivalrous conduct towards her."

The last few words which the judge uttered were nearly drowned in the sound of some riot that was taking place at the door of the court. It seemed as if the officers were trying to keep some one out who would not be kept out on any account, and a loud voice cried—

"I have been robbed—robbed on the highway. Robbed of all I had in the world, and now I am a miserable wretch again. I want to see the magistrate.—I want money.—I wan't justice.—I wan't somebody to be hung for robbing me.—Let me in, I say.—I will have justice.—I'm a miserable wretch now, for I have lost all my money, and I will come in."

"What is all that, officers?" cried the magistrate. "What is all that?"

"A man who wants to lodge a complaint, your worship; but we thought he would be intruding just now, your worship."

"No—no. This case is over. Let him come in, and put a stop to all that clamour at the door, will you?"

His hair in disorder—unshaven, and his clothes in a state of the greatest neglect, who should rush into the court but Tom Brereton, who had been so successfully stopped on the highway by Jack and Dick, so short a time before. He made his way up to the magistrate, gesticulating furiously as he came, and exclaiming—

"My money—my money. It was all I had, and nobody knows what I had to go through to get it. I want justice. I want my money, or to see somebody hanged for taking it!"

"Well, well, sir," said the magistrate, "I will take your complaint in a moment. Don't make such a noise in the court. I have the honour, my lord judge, to bid you good-day—silence there—and you too, Mr. Smith. Good-day.—Silence! This is a most delightful occasion, I assure you, Mr. Smith—

"Smith!" cried Tom Brereton, as he pointed with both his forefingers at once in the face of Claude. "Smith!"

"Yes," said Judge Manning; "Mr. John Smith, my friend."

"And an innocent man," said the magistrate.

"Who has nothing to pay," said the clerk

"Smith?" raved Tom Brereton. "Smith, your friend, sir?—An innocent man, your worship?—Who has nothing to pay, you idiot? Why—why this is the notorious highwayman, Claude Duval!"

Judge Manning staggered back to the seat on the bench that he had occupied, and sunk into it with a groan. The magistrate turned as white as a sheet, and propped himself up against the wall; and the clerk put his head under the table, and pretended to be looking for something in the waste basket, while in reality he thought he was keeping out of danger.

"Yes," roared Tom again, "that's Claude Duval, and I shall get the reward, and make up all my losses. Ha! ha! I shall get the reward. That is the notorious Claude Duval. Seize him, or he will murder all of us rather than be taken. Lay hold of him. Ha! ha! I shall get the reward, I must have the reward! Oh, what a lucky dog I am!"

Half a dozen officers made a rush upon Claude and laid hold of him, but he raised his voice, speaking quite calmly as he said—

"Hold off! I am indeed Claude Duval, and I am notorious. I did not think to be ever taken with a breath of life in me. I did not mean that it should ever be so, but then I did not calculate being in the toils like this. It would be suicide now to resist to death, and that is the cowards resource. I yield, and proclaim myself, as yon shrinking coward names me, Claude Duval!"

"Alas! alas!" cried Judge Manning.

"Hold him tight," cried the magistrate—"hold him tight. Ah, something kept running in my head that his name was not Smith. For the love of goodness hold him tight."

"You need not be afraid," said Claude; "I shall make no foolish attempt to escape. I congratulate you, Tom Brereton, upon your cleverness; and remember, you don't get all the reward until I am hanged."

"And you will be," answered Tom, "so it's as good as in my pocket, Duval. I'm as pleased as possible that after the way you have served me out at different times, I am able to be down upon you at last, that I am, and especially as I shall make a good thing by it, too."

"Well," said Claude, "of what am I charged with? Is it of robbing this man while I was a close prisoner in Newgate?"

"No," said Tom Brereton, "but it was some of your sort."

"This may be all wrong after all," said Judge Manning; "where are the two friends of the prisoner whom I brought with me in my carriage?"

"Officers," cried the magistrate, "take them both into custody, and bring them before me at once."

The most active search was made for Dick and Jack, but neither of them were to be found. Upon the first appearance of a recognition of Claude, on the part of Tom Brereton, they had made their escape. They felt that they could possibly do something for him while they were at liberty, but shut up with him in separate cells in Newgate, they knew that they could do nothing.

"They have escaped," said Claude. "Misfortunes have all some bright side, if we will but look for it."

"We will soon have them, your worship," said one of the officers. "We wil be off after them at once, and soon have them both in custody."

Claude smiled faintly, and then turning to Judge Manning, who was evidently very much affected by what had taken place, he said—

"Do not fancy, my Lord Judge, that because this cross accident has happened I am, or shall be indifferent to the kind and honourable motives which prompted you to bring me here this day. You could not know that this was an atmosphere dangerous to my liberty and life, and in the public capacity which you stand, I had no right to perplex you, and place in opposition your duty and your feelings by any such confidence. What is done is done; and, at all events, come what may, I am delighted to think that your daughter is restored to you."

Judge Manning wrung his hand as he said—

"Oh, if you had been anything but what you are—if you had been ever so lowly or ever so poor, I could have done much for you; but now my hands are tied, though my heart continues open, and I can do nothing—nothing."

"I know it, my lord, and feel it keenly," said Claude. "There is a gulf now between you and I, which you dare not and I cannot cross; but from my heart I still thank you, sir. That is all I can say; and I will not, let the issue of this adventure be what it may, I will not regret the cause of it, since it has restored Grace to your arms."

The old judge seemed upon the point of saying something, but he suddenly checked himself, and merely bowing to the magistrate, he at once left the court.

"A-hem!" said the magistrate, clearing his throat, "it is my pleasing duty, John Smith—that is to say, Claude Duval—to commit you to Newgate, until I can have an interview with the Secretary of State, and ascertain from that distinguished personage in what manner you are to be disposed of. I say it is my pleasing duty. Clerk, make our a warrrant of committal to Newgate. A-hem! It is my peculiar and pleasing duty."

CHAPTER CLXVI.

CLAUDE'S DANGEROUS POSITION.—JUDGE MANNING'S GRATITUDE.

Claude stood in the place assigned to witnesses still, and of all the persons in that now crowded court, he really looked the least concerned or interested.

No one would have fancied his life at stake, and that he was the person around whose fate the whole of the agitation of those who were so fully betraying such agitation revolved. And yet there was not one present who would not have wagered £100 to £1 that he would be a dead man within fourteen days from thence.

And there he stood in the very prime of life, looking so calm, so thoughtful, and so full of real courage, that he enforced the unwilling admiration of many a one who would not have expressed the feeling. The coarse and vulgar exultation of Tom Brereton became loathsome.

"Ha—ha!" he cried. "He's nabbed now, and I shall see him hung with all the pleasure in life, though he is now a sort of relation of mine by marriage. You would hardly think it now, would you, to look at him and to look at me, that we were relations at all?"

"No," growled an old officer. "I should as soon think of a relationship between a monkey and a fine old English mastiff. Can't you hold your stupid tongue? We ain't all such curs as you are. If a knight of the road is taken at last, he meets his fate and there's an end of it. I never heard much very bad of Claude Duval yet, and between you and me and the post, I think he was hunted on that last affair when he went to Southampton."

"And so do I," said another. "I wouldn't a-gone on that job for I don't how much, and I'm glad it turned out a failure."

"So am I."

"Silence in the court," cried the magistrate. "Now, officers, get a coach, and take your prisoner to Newgate as quick as you can. Keep an eye upon him, for they say he is as slippery as an eel, and has as many tricks as an old fox."

"Now, Duval," said the old officer, as he touched Claude on the arm. "If you are ready for a start, we are."

"Quite," said Claude. "They will stare to see me again at the old jug, I think. Good-day, Tom Brereton; you and I will settle the reckoning of to-day some other time."

"Pish!" said Tom Brereton, snapping his fingers, "I don't value you that, now you are taken care of. I could find it in my heart to give you a good kick, if they would let me."

"Well," said one of the officers, "I have heard o' a hass kicking of a dead lion. Haven't you, Morgan?"

"Often—often," said Morgan, as he trod heavily on Tom Brereton's toes; "often. Lor, my little man, I hope as I haven't smashed you, really!"

"You are a set of rascals," growled Tom, "and you are all out of your minds almost with rage, because none of you will get the reward, and I shall. That's it."

Tom Brereton was so delighted with this discovery of the selfish motives of the officers in sneering at him, that if they had said ten times more to him than they had, it would have produced no effect upon him; and it was truly ludicrous, now that he had an expectation of filling his pockets by the reward he would be entitled to on account of Claude's apprehension, to see him arranging his hair and rubbing his chin with an idea of getting shaved.

"It's all right," he said. "It's all right. I shall make a capital thing of it now; and what is as good, I shall get rid of that abominable fellow, Duval, who has really been quite, as one may say, a kind of ogre to me, for I don't know how long. Wherever I went, I was perpetually frightened of him, and at every corner I ever turned, I used to shake at the idea of coming face to face with him; but now he's in Newgate, and done as brown as a cinder.

Hurrah! hurrah! for the old stone jug,
And its massive walls so strong.
Who picks his way to the outer day,
His nails must be rather long.

Upon my life, I am becoming quite a poet, and I didn't know it. I shall be rich as a Jew, with guineas not a few; and to be sure I'd no call, to let off Claude Duval."

In this happy frame of mind, Tom Brereton left the police-office, after registering his address in the clerk's books. Whether he found any very continuous cause for so much self-felicitation, will be quickly shown as we proceed with a narrative of the events of this most eventful and extraordinary portion of the life of Claude Duval.

In the course of the next half hour he was an inmate of one of the strongest cells of Newgate, and the whole prison was full of gossip upon the extraordinary way in which he had been discovered and denounced to justice.

Some of the turnkeys were almost ready to tear the hair out of their heads, at the thought that Claude Duval, for whose blood, as it were, there was such a handsome reward offered, had actually been for days within the walls of the prison, and they not to know it. It was really almost enough to make a turnkey weep, and after that, it might very well draw tears from a stone.

"The idea," said one fat man, wiping his bald head. "The idea of me letting of him out at this very lock, and thinking as he was John Smith only, when he was as good as £1500 to anybody as could only have laid hold on him and said, 'I have got you, Claude Duval!'"

All the others groaned in unison, so that upon the whole, there was anything but a feeling of exultation in Newgate at the capture of Claude, for, as one officer said—

"He'd a thousand times better have got away, because then he would still have been to be nabbed by somebody in the 'purfession;' whereas, now the game was up, and that prize was drawn out of the wheel of Fortune."

The number of extra pots of beer brought into Newgate that day, was something prodigious, and previous to the vanishing of each of them, some very elaborate maledictions were heaped upon the head of Tom Brereton.

The fat turnkey whispered to the officer who had made the speech we have recorded—

"Sup with me in the larder to-night, off of some tripe, and we will talk it over. I'll have Bill Flukes, and Soloman Bones, and Morgan, to meet you. We will talk it over then. It's a robbery."

"So I think, Mungo. But can anything be done?"

"Mum is the word! We will talk it over. Why should the 'purfession' be done brown in this sort of way? If anybody had shot him, we must have grinned and borne it; but he aint dead yet. He's alive, and kicking, Mr. Wilks."

He's alive, certainly; but about the kicking, I don't think he'll find kicking of much use against the stone walls of Newgate. However, I'll come, and as you say, we can talk it over. Mum's the word!"

"It is—it is. I feel a little better now."

They separated with mutual winks and nods, and what all this winking and nodding meant, we shall find out when we introduce the readers to the supper in the larder of Newgate. This was a kind of indulgence that the turnkeys did not often treat themselves to, as it was rather against the rules; but, then, the governor was ill, and confined to his house, so that a great many little liberties were taken by the lower officials of the prison.

Dick and Jack no sooner found that the game was up for the present, as regarded Claude, than they left the court at the Old Bailey, and in that noiseless manner, without being missed until they were actually asked for, they made the best of their way to the quaker's, in Dean Street, Soho. To him they related all that had happened, and he listened with a face of grave apprehension. When they had come to an end, he said,—

"Truly, friend Dick and friend Jack, I consider the situation of our friend Claude, as rather critical."

"Rather critical?" said Dick; "is it not fatal?"

"No, friend."

"I only wish you could give me anything like a substantial reason for that," replied Jack. "You would be conferring upon both me and Jack no insignificant favour, if you could convince us that there was anything like a rational hope of Claude's getting over this affair. If you have anything cheering to say to us, pray say it at once, Mr. Franklin, if you please,"

"I will, friend Dick. In the first place the greatest exertions will be used to get Duval hung, for he has many enemies on account of his gallantry to the ladies. Every husband—every father, and every lover who has suffered a pang upon that account, will prosecute him to the death. Moreover, he has robbed a bishop; and churchmen never forgive anything or anybody."

"Why," said Jack, "you are giving us all the reason you can for despairing of Claude's life,"

"Yes, friend Jack, I am; but I shall come to the other part of the question directly. I think I have said all that need be said about the great jeopardy in which Claude stands; and now, on the other side, he has a great friend in Judge Manning, who will do all that he legitimately can do, to save him; and he has a great friend in Grace Manning, who will do all that she can do, legitimately or otherwise, to save him. Then, the whole of the officers will be as mad as fury at his being caught by any one out of their profession; and then he has you two, and then he has me to befriend him; and he has a couple or three thousand pounds to pay his way to liberty, if that amount should be wanted, and should be likewise sufficient for the purpose."

"What," cried Dick, "two or three thousand pounds? What do you mean by that? He has not a tithe of the money, although I and Jack may be likely enough to get him a good round sum by our exertions on the road."

"There is no occasion, friend Dick, for any exertions on the road just now. They would be dangerous; and neither you, friend Dick, nor you, friend Jack, are in a fit frame of mind to follow the business just now. I will produce all the money that can possibly be wanted; and I will trust to the honour of all of you to repay me when it may be convenient."

"We are indeed immensely beholden to you," said Jack; "you shall not lose a farthing by the transaction if I live. And so you really think that there is a hope of rescuing Claude even yet?"

"I do. At present I make it a particular request that neither you nor Jack will attempt anything or stir out of this house. I will now go forth and get all the information I can about Claude's position. I will even find out to a square foot in what part of Newgate he is placed, I will know who attends upon him, and what he says, and how he looks, before I see thee again."

Both Dick and Jack could not but stare at the quaker to hear him talk in such a strain; but they well knew that in his case it was no boasting or vain assumption. The extent of his resources they had had reason to believe were extraordinary; and if he had said "I will bring you back Claude Duval to supper," they would have been tempted to have believed him; although they knew that the massive locks and walls of Newgate were between them and the realisation of such an event. But the quaker never promised more than he could perform, and when he said what we have worded, he had certain means of getting the information he desired.

Truly, gold will do wonders in this world. It melts the hearts of gaolers—it opens prison doors with its master key—and it throws down stone walls without so much as touching them.

Mr. Franklin did not delay a moment longer, but very calmly taking his broad-brimmed hat from a peg in the hall of his house, away he went, leaving Dick and Jack in a state of puzzled expectation.

There was now but one other person upon whom the discovery and identity of Claude and his consequent committal to Newgate produced a powerful effect; and that person was Judge Manning. We have recorded how abruptly he left the court, and when he did so, he hastily entered his carriage, and ordered the coachman to drive him home.

On his route all he said was—

"I must save this man! I must save this man!"

The moment he reached his own house, he repaired to the library, and then summoning Grace to his presence, he said to her—

"My dear, now sit down by me, and from first to last, give me as clear and detailed an account as you possibly can, of the whole of your recent adventure.

I want particularly to know every word that this Mr. Smith said to you, and I want a very minute detail of his actions towards you.

Upon this, Grace related all to her father, and the whole narrative said so much for the courage, and the chivalrous honour and delicacy of Claude, that the old judge was compelled to rise and pace the room to and fro to recover his equanimity and at last pausing before Grace, he said—

CLAUDE RETALIATES UPON TOM BRERETON.

"And this man—and this man, Grace, who rescued you from Phillip in the green lane—this man, who with the utmost delicacy brought you to town—this man, who protected you all the way, and who only left you at the door for a moment because he would spare my feelings too sudden a shock from the joy of your recovery—this man, my dear, did all this at the risk of dying on a scaffold, for he is no other than Claude Duval the celebrated highwayman; and now stands committed to Newgate, from whence he will only step forth to death, and a terrible death, at the hands of the hangman!"

Grace uttered a cry of despair, and sank fainting on the floor.

"No! no!" cried the judge, "rise my child. Comfort yourself. It must not be, it shall not be! He who has done so much for you, shall not suffer death in such a shape. It is our duty to save him."

"Ah, father, and you will?"

"I will."

"I breathe again. Oh, would it not imbitter the remainder of our lives to think that because he was so self-denying, so kind, so generous to me, he met with death. No, no, it must not, shall not be. You will save him father?"

"I will, my child."

CHAPTER CLXVII.

THE OFFICIALS OF NEWGATE SUP IN THE LARDER, WHICH IS IMPORTANT TO CLAUDE.

THAT night at ten o'clock, when all the cells were closed and the most active business of the day was over, the old larder in Newgate was worth looking at.

This larder was a place of some extent. The unhappy wretches who are to expiate their crimes upon the scaffold, are brought through it on that, to them, fearful morning, when they find no sympathy within Newgate, and when they know that there is a glaring crowd without waiting to see them die. But upon these occasions they do not absolutely see the larder.

No, a portable partition, for the reception of which there are grooves in the ceiling and on the floor, converts their progress, instead of being through a room, into one through a narrow passage, and then they step out to die, without having taken a last look, in their immediate progress, of pots and kettles, and coffee stew-pans, and all the etceteras of a large kitchen. But upon this present occasion the larder is in all its integrity and beauty. A rousing fire is in the ample grate, and some most appetizing steams fill the ambient air. You would not suppose yourself in Newgate at all were you there, which proves satisfactorily, that one kitchen is very like to another.

We have before stated that this supper in the larder was contrary to rule, and that it would not by any means have been ventured upon, if the governor had not been known to be confined to his bed, or all but that; so that he could not pounce upon them at unawares; and as regarded each other, and the minor officials, they had too good an understanding among them to fear any treachery at all.

By a quarter past ten, then, they were assembled—only five of them; but then that five consisted of men who, if they pleased, could do something in Newgate, and from their looks it was pretty clear that something they meant to do. The cook was acustomed to these little gatherings in his domain; and as they always resulted in providing him with an unlimited amount of strong drink, he never made any kind of objection to them, but bustled about, and took good care that the solid portion of the entertainment should be none of the meanest the prison stores could afford.

Now, this cook had a failing, which was decidedly to take what folks call the other glass, which is generally considered to be the glass which is over and above that one at which a man may still preserve the equilibrium of both mind and body. Upon this occasion it was the special object of the officers and turnkeys to give him that other glass as speedily as possible, for they had matters of deep moment to consider of which it would not be wise to trust to cooks.

"Come, Bill," said Morgan, as he pushed a dish of exquisitely stewed oysters towards his friend, "you don't eat, man."

"Don't I?" replied Bill. "It's Jukes who takes nothing; and as for our good friend here, the cook, he is the most abstemious man in the world, and won't drink."

"Ha! ha!" laughed the cook, as he pushed his white night-cap up upon his brow, "don't I drink. Come, Mr. Morgan, pass the bottle, and I'll drink to your very good healths, all of you. Here's lots o luck, and may business never fail. Ropes will be cheap when all the world grows honest, I think."

"When all the world grows honest, they won't want cooks," said Bill. "But you don't eat anything."

"Why, as to eating," said the cook, "I can't say I do in a regular way eat much. I now and then take a taste of one thing, and a taste of another; but what with the fire, and the smother, and one thing and another, I don't give way to eating."

"And the bottle?" said Jukes.

"No—no, Mr. Jukes. There you do me an injustice. I take a little, only a little, to keep me up agoing, that's all, gentlemen; so here's good luck again; and all I can say is, that you are as welcome to a quiet little feed in the larder as can be. You have only to tell me before-hand that you are coming, and it will be all right. So here's to all again, and—and I only wish you all luck—l—luck, I—do. This is not bad brandy, wherever it came from. Hurrah for the Road. That's a Highwayman's chaunt ain't it, Mr.—Mr.—Ju—Ju—Jukes?"

"Yes, to be sure."

"I—I thought so, and as I was saying, here's better luck still. God bless you all—all the lot of you. I'm a poor fellow in my way, but I know—I—I—know—yes, that's it, I know. It's enough to make anybody cry it is. I—I—God bless you all."

"That will do," said Morgan, as the cook suddenly, losing his equilibrium, fell into a corner. "That will do. And now friends and mates, lets to business."

"Ay, ay—to business," said the other.

"What do we live by?"

"Why, by grabbing the gentry and the cracksmen, to be sure. By the family, take 'em all in all, we live," said Bill, "and that's a fact. Now the idea of a parcel of rascals, out o' the profession, grabbing of a cove is 'promiscous'—it is. They might as well grab us. I tell you what it is, mates—Claude Duval must get on the road again."

The others nodded.

"He's the chap for us. He belongs to us," said Morgan. "It's a robbery for anybody to meddle with him but us, and they shan't. The profuse rewards belong to the profession. I'm not a chap to say, let me have everything, but I don't like to see things go out of the profession. Are we agreed, comrades—are we agreed?"

"We are—we are."

"That's all right. Suppose Claude Duval escapes from Newgate? It will be no more than other folks have done before him; and if we choose to wink at things, why off he is. He's just the sort of chap to make the try at it."

"He is."

"And if he can be given ever so slight a hint that on some particular night we shall all be remarkably blind and deaf, don't you think he'd be likely to take advantage of it?"

"To be sure he would. Why not? If ever there was a man in Newgate likely to get out his own way, it's Claude Duval; and if we choose to say yes to it, it's as good as done. How is it to be managed? that's all we have got to consider now. Who is to let him know? for, after all, it must be only a broad hint."

"That's all. But Duval is no fool. I will see him when I am on duty to-morrow, and I'll be bound he will quite well enough understand then which way the cat jumps. Only, of course, he mustn't get out by the regular way."

"Confound it all!" said Bill, "we are making a trouble about nothing at all. Trust him, I say, and take him clear out, and give him a fair start. It can easily be done through the chapel, and over the wall, by the corner of Newgate Street, if he has anybody to help him. I know it can't be done otherwise; but I will see him off the first regularly dark night, if you like."

"But what can you say to him?"

"Say to him? Why, the exact truth. If we don't, Claude Duval is the man to guess at it; and it is always better to tell a fellow what you really mean, than leave him to find out, and know it when you have said something else to him."

The others seemed to think this rather a bold proceeding on the part of Bill; but the more they considered of it, the more they felt induced to come into it; and at last it was fully and completely agreed that upon the first occasion when it could be done, Duval was to be offered his freedom from Newgate upon the express ground that he had been taken by one who was not in the profession; an argument which, knowing the amount of rewards offered for him, he would be able fully to appreciate.

How far this might have the effect of interfering with Tom Brereton and his claims to the reward they did not stop to inquire. It was for them sufficient that Claude should once again be in "the market."

By the light of the lantern that swung above their heads they saw that their friend, the cook, was still in the land of dreams; and then having made a very tolerable clearance of the supper, they left the larder to the cook and to repose.

If the reader will now please to reflect for a moment or two, he will not fail to perceive in how singular a situation Claude is placed, and how strangely that situation contrasts with his position but a short time previously.

Here was the man who had been hunted almost to death—who had not been permitted to leave for ever the scene of his crimes, and lead a different life in another land—who had been interrupted in every way—whose life had been a darling object to extinguish—a man who had been pursued by fire, and secured at last in the very grasp of the authorities—enclosed within stone walls, and yet how many now were plotting and planning his rescue!

Truly may we say

"All the world's a stage,
And men and women merely players;"

for who could have supposed or expected for a moment to find the very turnkeys of Newgate and the officers of the police to come out in so very different a character?

But it all only goes to prove what Claude had himself, upon more than one occasion, asserted, namely—that he was simply and only pursued for the price that was set upon his life. It became a matter of business to hunt him down. It was now equally a matter of business to let him go.

Of course Judge Manning, who was as truly anxious as any one could possibly be for the release of Claude, felt and acted from pure motives of deep, heartfelt gratitude towards him. He had, perhaps, promised his child more than his cooler judgment could tell him there was a possibility of performing, when he said that Claude should be freed; but if that promise be qualified by saying that he would do all that he possibly could to bring about such a result, there is no doubt but he will keep it, both in the spirit and to the letter.

But the struggle in the mind of the judge between his sense of public duty was long and severe. The feelings of the man and the father, however, triumphed over those of the judge, and he said to himself—

"I will, if it be in my power so to do, rescue him who was the champion of my child, and then it will be fit that I retire from the performance of those public duties which my private feelings have stepped in to nullify."

After once coming to such a conclusion as this, it may be very well guessed that the judge would not allow any circumstance to prevent him from doing his very utmost in the case; and accordingly, within one hour after the conversation with his daughter, which we have recorded, we find him closetted with a small, prim-looking man, dressed in most plain black, and with such a quiet manner about him, that one would have supposed him quite incapable of anything in the shape of either mental or bodily resistance to anything.

This individual was the private solicitor of Judge Manning, and one upon whom he knew he could thoroughly depend. The subject upon which he had summoned him will be quickly apparent, although to judge from the faint look of surprise upon the attorney's face, one would fancy it was something much more out of the common way than it really was.

"And, my lord," said the attorney, "you really mean that you will do anything to rescue this man?"

"I do mean it, Mr. Sago. I do mean it; and I sent for you to entrust you with the affair. Mind, I do not mean to be so absurd as to say that I will force this business on you. Far from it. If you have any disinclination to it, say so candidly and at once, and I will seek some other less scrupulous practitioner."

"My lord—my lord," said Mr. Sago, placing his hand upon that part of his waistcoat, beneath which he presumed his heart was situated, "it is quite impossible you could find a less scrupulous attorney than myself. I am strictly and entirely professional."

Just the faint ghost of a smile crossed the face of the judge as he heard these words from the lips of the attorney—words which he so well knew how to interpret; and then, after the pause of a few moments, he said to him—

"We perfectly understand each other, then, Mr. Sago, upon this case. You will do your very best in it, and you will charge me with the expenses, together with £500, for your own professional services."

The attorney bowed, made some important remark about the weather; and then, without once again recurring to the subject, he took his leave of Judge Manning.

When he was alone, the judge leant his head upon his hands for a few moments, and then said, in a desponding tone of voice—

"I have done all that I can do, and more than I ought to have dared to do I may be successful, and yet much do I doubt it. Time—time alone will show. I will now tell Gace that I have set this matter in motion."

It was strange that at the very same time that the judge was in consultation with his solicitor, concerning the saving Claude Duval in any way, both Dick and Jack were in deep and solemn converse with Franklin the quaker upon the same subject, and the turnkeys and officers of Newgate had as good as agreed that the highwayman was to be free in a short time.

Franklin had, with amazing tact, found out all that there was to know about Claude's present position. He could tell the two friends that he in whom they were so deeply interested, was committed to the prison of Newgate for safe keeping, until the authorities had fully decided upon what was the course they should think proper to pursue towards him. He could further tell them that Claude was in a strong cell, but that he was not ironed, although, no doubt, he would be, and that he would be carefully watched. He could not, however, with all his cleverness, and all his means of information, tell them that there was actually a conspiracy within the very walls of Newgate to set him (Claude) free.

"We then," said Jack, "are utterly hopeless; for, alas! what can we do in the matter?"

"Little enough," said Dick. "All we can hope to do is to convey to Duval some tools which may help him to make an escape from Newgate, or to attempt to do so."

"We will easily enough let him have tolls," said Franklin. "I will hand them to him when I see him in his cell."

"When you see him?"

"Yes. There is no difficulty in that. I will show you how I can procure an interview with him, if you will be guided by me."

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

CLAUDE, BY GENERAL CONSENT, COMMENCES HIS ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.

"You rather astonish me," said Dick.

"And me likewise," said Jack.

"Oh, pho!" said the quaker; "nothing can be easier than that. You know that the only person from without who is allowed to visit a prisoner in Newgate, without hinderance, or being well searched at the lobby, is the solicitor whom he may pitch upon to conduct his case, and who must produce a written retainer from him."

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, you, Jack, or you, Dick—it don't matter which—must write to Duval in Newgate, urging him to send a written retainer to a Mr. Alfred Jones, addressed to this house. With that in my hand, and properly made up, I will present myself at the gate of Newgate, and I have no sort of doubt but that I shall at once get an interview with Claude, and of course I can then carry him in anything I please."

"But will they if I write," said Jack, "deliver to him my letter?"

"They must, as it will contain nothing but what is perfectly unexceptionable in every way."

"Then let it be done at once," said Dick, "and you, Jack, can write it more perfectly than I, as you are by far the oldest friend of Claude; and when you go to him, Mr. Franklin, you can tell him all the news, and how gladly we would do anything in the world that he can think of to procure his freedom."

"Truly, friend, I will," said Franklin.

The letter was speedily written by Jack, and although it contained not one word that could be construed by the prison authorities into anything that it would be improper or imprudent to communicate to the prisoner, yet, from the style of it, Claude would have no difficulty in seeing that Jack wished him to send the written authority to Mr. Alfred Jones, for a very special reason.

The address, too, to the quaker's house, which would be sure to strike him, would of itself be sufficient to assure him that the missive came direct from his friends, and meant more than met the eye.

In two hours the answer came back. It merely contained a few lines to Jack, and kind remembrances to all friends, and the order of retainer to Mr. Alfred Jones, solicitor.

"Now my friends," said Franklin, "you may wait here while I pay a visit to Newgate, and tell me before I get ready what out of all this box of tools and implements you think will be most useful to Claude Duval."

As the quaker spoke, he dragged from under a table a small chest, which, upon being opened, disclosed a beautiful collection of house-breakers tools of all kinds and descriptions, most of them being of the most exquisite workmanship and the most ingenious design.

Dick and Jack made some selections, and handed them to the quaker, Dick saying—"There, if you can manage to give him only these five tools he will not be kept in Newgate by the power of locks, or hinges, or fetters, I'll be bound."

"He shall have them, friend. He shall have them. I do not in the smallest degree anticipate any difficulty, for the name of Alfred Jones, as a solicitor, appeareth in the law list, and it is most unlikely that they should know that individual at the gate of Newgate; but as in all human enterprises, friend Jack, there is some little chance of failure, I will risk that much."

With this the quaker went off to Newgate capitally dressed in black, and looking so cool, and so collected, that no one for a moment could possibly have suspected him of any ulterior designs, or of being anything but what he represented himself. With that easy confident air, which a man has who goes upon an errand that he knows and feels he is all right regarding, Franklin ascended the steps of Newgate and rapped smartly at the half-door.

"Well, what now?" said the man who was on the lock, as it is technically termed.

"Open the wicket," said Franklin, with an air of authority. "I am a solicitor. Open the wicket."

The turnkey mechanically obeyed, and when he was in the lobby, Franklin took out a large pocket-book, and after a pretended search among its multiferious papers that nearly exhausted the patience of the turnkey, he affected, at last, to find the written authority from Claude, constituting Mr. Alfred Jones his solicitor.

"Oh, here it is, at last," he said. "Be so good as to get some one to show me to Duval quickly, for my time is of importance."

"Oh. This here ought to go to the governor," said the turnkey.

"Well, be quick about it."

"Yet, I daresay it's all right. Joe, look at this. You are more of a schollard than I is. Is this a proper torney's thority?"

Joe looked at the paper as wisely as possible, and then in a very oracular kind of manner, declared his opinion that it was as right as ninepence, and that he'd better show the gemman the way.

"That's the thing, my good fellow," said Franklin, "and if ever I am in here for anything, I'll he as liberal among you all as a prince."

"Ah," said Joe, "catch you lawyers a-coming here, 'xcept on a visit only, that's all. You knows how to manage things, you does. This way, sir, this way. We hasn't no objection to drink your health, though, for all that."

"I always do things regular," said Franklin. "Wait till my client has paid me something, and without it I don't come again, I can tell you, and then I'll stand a crown."

"Ah," said Joe, with a look of admiration, "I never seed you here afore, sir, but you is one of the deep ones; I can can see that any way. This here's the way, sir. Hilloa, Foxey. Here's a lawyer come to see Duval. Just show him in."

Foxey, who was enjoying a quiet snooze in a little watch-box sort of place, jammed up into a corner of a narrow passage leading to the range of cells in one of which Claude was confined, awakened, and growled out—

"What is you arter now? Can't a man shut his eyes for a matter of a minute, but you are forced to come with your larks and botherations? Be off."

"Not till I have seen my client, Mr. Foxey," said Franklin. "Then I shall be off as quickly as I can, but not before."

"Eh? oh, eh? I begs your parding sir. I thought as it was only a bit of Joe's gammon, that's all; 'cos, you see, sir, they often pokes fun at me, pretending as I'm give to going to sleep, when all the while there ain't a wider awake follow than me in the whole stone pitcher."

Foxey led the way to Claude's cell, and opening the door, he said—

"A wisiter," and then he banged it to again upon the quaker, who stood a few paces within its threshold. His first act was to place his ear against the massive door at which the officer had departed, to be sure that he was gone, and then being quite clear upon that head, he turned to Claude, saying—

"You know me, friend?"

"Ah," said Claude, springing up, "Mr. Franklin?"

"The same. Dick and Jack are at my house. I find I have been misinformed regarding your condition."

"Misinformed? As how?"

"You are in fetters, and I was told that such was not the case."

"They only put them on a quarter of an hour ago, because they found me examining the stanchions of the window, and they have a perfect horror of my escaping."

"And yet it may be done."

"Of course it may. What has been done may be always done again, and many things that never were done at all will be done in the fulness of time. But tell me—how is Jack, and how is Dick, and what has become of Phillip Manning? Grace is, of course, in perfect safety with her father?"

"Jack is well," said the quaker, answering all the questions of Claude in the most methodical manner; "and Dick is well. Phillip Manning is in this building and Grace is happy with her father."

"Thank God."

"Your own situation is now of the greatest importance. Do you despair, or do you hope, Claude Duval?"

"Despair? Who that knows anything of me ever found food for the opinion that I should despair? Who that ever heard of Claude Duval, accused him of abandoning hope even under the most cheerless circumstances? Do not, Mr. Franklin, ask me such a question. Something seems to whisper to me that my time has not yet come."

"I do not think it has."

"I thank you for that thought. No, I shall, I think, sniff the night air again, and breathe the soft odour of fruits and flowers; I do not think that I shall only pass from this cell to death."

"Nor do I. I have promised Jack and Dick that all that man can do to save you, I will do, and I will keep my word. Here is a plan of Newgate, accurately laid down, for your information; and here are such tools and implements as no doubt you know well how to use."

"Let me see them."

Claude ran over with an eager eye the five exquisitely made tools that the quaker had brought him, and then with a deep sigh, he said—

"Yes, these will do much, but there is yet something wanting."

"What is that?"

"Rope. I can do nothing without a good coil of rope. If I had that I do think that, favoured a little by fortune and a dark night, I could really now bid adieu to Newgate."

"You really think so?"

"From my heart I do."

"'Tis well, friend," said Franklin, suddenly, as at times only it was his humour to do, adopting the quaker phraseology. "'Tis well, friend; and truly it giveth unto me some gratification to be able to say to thee, friend Claude, here is the rope that thou seekest."

As he spoke, he unbuttoned his top-coat and exhibited, nicely wound round his waist, a complete coil of rope, of evidently many yards in length.

"Thee will find, friend Claude," he said, "that this is a bit of good stuff, and will not fail thee. Double, ay, treble thy weight and mine together, might hang to it without fear, slender as it looks; and now what dost thou think of thy chances?"

"Think? Why I think I can almost say, that I know I shall get out of Newgate. Have you any small grapples or hooks to give me to fasten to the end of the rope?"

"Yes, friend Claude, I have not forgotten those; and it striketh me that thou art as well provided as any man can well be, friend Claude. What thinkest thou?"

"I think, Franklin, that I shall owe my life to you, and that the time will come when you will not look back with any regret upon having done me this favour."

"Then, friend Claude, I will bid thee good day, and remember I am Mr. Jones thy solicitor; and if thou shouldst want to see me again, pray send to me in that name at the address in Dean-street, which thou knowest. And now, dost thou want money? for if thou dost, thou hast only to name the sum, and it is now at thy disposal."

"No," said Claude. "I think I will try this escape quite unaided by any one in the prison. If a trial to bribe a man fails, one's situation is only much worse, for he gains information, and that begets increased caution, and perhaps they might find somewhere to place me which would preclude the possibility of getting away at all."

"Thou art right. I wish thee all manner of luck, friend, and wish thee good day."

The quaker tapped at the door, which had been locked upon him; and as the sound reverberated through the passage that communicated with the cells, the turnkey heard it, and came up with his huge bunch of keys.

CLAUDE PAYS HIS DEBTS AT NEWGATE, AND MEETS TOM BRERETON.

"Your client, Mr. Lawyer," he said, as he preceded Franklin along the passages to the lobby; "your client is booked, I take it."

"Very probably," said Franklin.

"Ha! ha! He will dance upon nothing."

"Yes, friend, I do not think that either you or he need fear drowning, even

"Me? What do you mean? Why should I be hanged?"

"That, friend, is best known to yourself; but I have had such immense professional experience, that I am enabled to say at a glance whether a man is bound for the gallows or not."

"But—but you don't mean to say that I look like it?"

"No, friend, not like it, but it itself. I don't entertain the smallest doubt upon the subject."

"The devil!"

"Yes, the devil is the ultimate distinction, but comfort yourself, it may be a year or two yet."

"A year or two? What a comfortable idea, to be sure! Confound you, I wish you would keep your mighty cleverness to yourself. Who asked you to be so wonderfully prophetic?"

By this time they had reached the lobby, and Franklin then saw a small thin man who was conversing with one of the officials, to whom the quaker heard him say—

"You will perceive that this is an order from Judge Manning to permit me to see the prisoner Claude Duval. Pray satisfy yourself that it is all regular."

"Oh, I dare say it's all right enough," said the turnkey. "Here, Foxey, you have been once to the cell; just show this gentleman Claude Duval's lodgings, if you please."

"Humph!" said Franklin, as he passed out of Newgate, "That, then, is a messenger from the judge. What does he want, I wonder?"

CHAPTER CLXIX.

MR. SAGO HOLDS OUT PROMISES TO CLAUDE, AND DOES A LITTLE BUSINESS FOR HIMSELF.

Claude was rather surprised at Mr. Sago's appearance, and he looked all the surprise he felt. The manner of the cautious attorney was certainly not in any way calculated to decrease that surprise. The first thing he did upon getting into the cell was to place himself in a crouching attitude, and to listen attentively to the retreating footsteps of the turnkey. He even went the length of counting them upon his fingers as the man slowly tramped down the narrow stone corridor into which the cells opened. Then he went all round the walls, examining them up and down with the greatest attention.

"Pray, sir," said Claude, for the attorney had not spoken one word to him, "pray, sir, is it usual to send lunatics into the cells of Newgate, to annoy prisoners?"

"Hush!" cried Mr. Sago. "I really do think that it is all right and safe, I do, indeed."

"What is all right and safe? What do you mean?"

"Why, sir, I mean that I think there are no ear-trumpets, or peep-holes, from this cell."

"Ear-trumpets and peep-holes! Are there are such things in Newgate!"

"Bless your innocence, yes. Lots of 'em; but, I say, I don't think that there are any such here, so we may speak freely, although in a low voice—mind you, in quite a low voice. We cannot be too cautious in these sort of communications, and when I have anything very particular to make you acquainted with, I will use this."

As he spoke, the attorney took a little slate from his pocket, and a pencil, and then he sat himself down opposite to Claude, and rubbed his hands together like a man thoroughly satisfied with himself, and with what he was about.

"If," said Claude, "it is all the same to you, sir, I should be glad of some little hint as to what you mean by all this."

"My dear sir, you shall have not only a hint, but the fullest and most complete information. Do you know ——— ?" Here he wrote the name of Judge Manning upon the slate, which Claude replied to with a nod. "I come from him, my dear sir, so far as an order to see you goes, and he wishes me to tell you that situated as he is, he don't see how he can do you any good."

"Nor I neither," said Claude. "Pray give my best respects to him, and say that I feel I ought not, and cannot, expect anything from him in the way of aid, situated as he is with regard to his public office."

"Good, my dear friend; but I—I—." Here Mr. Sago put his finger by the side of his nose. "I have an idea."

"You don't say so?" said Claude. "Pray, what is it, sir? I shall be much obliged by your letting me know it as quickly as possible, so that I may have the pleasure of bidding you good day, as I prefer being alone."

"Good. Of the two I am a man who generally prefers being alone; but my idea is, that for a consideration I could put you in a way of bidding good-by to Newgate, and you will recollect that in so doing, you include the gallows in the tender adieu."

"True," said Claude.

"Well, sir, about the consideration. Can you manage the insignificant sum of five hundred?"

"It gives me great pleasure," said Claude, "to hear that five hundred is to you an insignificant sum; and if you will tell me in what way you prefer assisting me to escape, I will give you an answer."

"I shall open the front door for you, my dear sir, and let you walk out at your ease."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. That is the way I will manage it. I will find some one, for a consideration, who will come here and let you go out in his clothes. For a consideration I will so blind the eyes of the turnkeys with gold dust, that they will suspect nothing until you are off and away upon the road again; but it will, to pay everybody, take about five hundred."

"I will think of it," said Claude.

"Very good. My name is Sago. I will call upon you to-morrow at this hour, and then you can give me a definitive answer upon the subject. Remember, if you cannot find the money at once, I will advance it, until, from the profits of your business, you can conveniently repay me; for I really do think that to hang a man for doing a little business on the highway, is nothing better than murder. You will easily comprehend that my feelings alone have prompted me in this affair. I do not, of course, expect to get for myself one penny piece of the money. But no matter: while I have the approval of what is here—" Mr. Sago gave his chest a thump —"I shall be satisfied."

"You are quite a remarkable man," said Claude. "Be assured that I shall be in a situation to give you an answer to-morrow at this hour, if you can get at me."

"Humph! I will try that. My dear sir, I wish you a very good-day, indeed. Keep up your spirits, and hope for the best, my dear sir. I have been keeping an eye upon the walls of this cell, and I really do believe it is a genuine one, and that there are no ear-trumpets or peep-holes about it."

With this Mr. Sago left the cell, rather congratulating himself upon the idea that with what he would get from Judge Manning, and what he would get from Claude, he should be able to make a pretty good job of the escape from Newgate, always provided the officers were not such miracles of virtue as to resist bribery. When he reached the lobby again, he took from his pocket rather an elegant snuff-box, and handed it to the man on duty at the wicket gate, for him to take a pinch from, at the same time saying—

"I think there are seven of you altogether, on and off duty, about the lobby here, and the stone passage leading to Duval's cell?"

"Exactly seven," said the man, "and werry good snuff this is, sir."

"Seven," added Sago. "Humph! seven times twenty makes one hundred and forty, which, in guineas, has a nice bright look. I am now going to the Ram's Horn and Cartridge Box, opposite, to take a quiet glass. I shall be there for half an hour; and if you and the others have a fancy that twenty guineas apiece will be pretty for merely dozing a little, and running any risks, why one of you can come over, and say as much to me there. Ask for Mr. Sago."

The turnkey, with a grin, as he opened the wicket to let the attorney go, said—"It's about Duval?"

Mr. Sago nodded.

The turnkey nodded; and then they both winked; and Mr. Sago, as he walked over the way, said to himself—

"It's a done job, and very cheap, too; very cheap, indeed. Well, I rather think I shall make a good thing of this; and everybody will be so much interested in keeping the affair snug, that the judge will never be a bit the wiser. Sago—Sago, you are a genius, that you are; and you always were, from the first day that you began life by sweeping out the office of Shark & Co., in Gray's Inn; and studied law by listening at the key holes to their private consultations."

We need not follow the officers—two of whom went within the ensuing half hour to the public house—in their bargaining with Mr. Sago. Nothing pleased them better than to find that some one was willing to pay them for what they had made up their minds to do for nothing, namely—to set Claude Duval at liberty.

With their motives for so doing gratuitously, the reader is already fully acquainted; so that, what with one thing and another, Claude found himself thoroughly surrounded by persons not at all anxious to keep him in Newgate; but plotting and planning in every shape and way for the best means of getting him comfortably and quickly out of it. The only thing the officers made as a special bargain with Mr. Sago was, that they were to have the twenty pounds apiece, provided Duval got clear away, let it be done how it might. They had their own reasons for preferring a different mode to that which Mr. Sago proposed. They much preferred a regular prison-breaking to the substitution of another person for Claude in his cell, in whose power they might all be to an inconvenient extent.

It was the gentleman named Bill, who, about two hours after the visit of Mr. Sago, made his way into Claude's cell, and gave him a hint of what he might, if he chose, set about; and as Mr. Bill's mind and perceptions were not of the most delicate or highly cultivated order, the hint was a pretty broad one.

"I tells you what it is, Duval," he said; "you haven't been nabbed in the riglar way, and fair play is a jewel whether in or out of Newgate; so, you see, if so be as you thinks as there is a chance of giving the old stone jug the go-by, don't say that me or any of my mates stood in your way, nor don't say that any of us stood out of it either, that's all I have got to say to you."

"I understand," said Duval.

"Very good. A nod is as good as a vink to a blind oss. In course, you'll want tools. Well, perhaps this here bag will be left here by me quite promiscuous. Perhaps you will want to know the way; well, it's through the chapel, which is at the end of this here passage, then into the yard, and over the wall by the corner of Newgate-street. But, perhaps you will say, how are you to get on the wall and down on t'other side? Well, perhaps you'll find a rope a-hanging, and when you climbs up by it, you can pull it up and let it down on the other side. But don't be fancying that I am telling you how to get out of Newgate."

"Oh dear, no," said Claude. "That would be very absurd. You may depend upon it I shall not take anything so ridiculous into my head as a consequence of your visit."

"And you never will, so help you, let out a word about it?"

"Upon my life I will not. There's not a man living who can say Claude Duval ever broke word or paltered with it in any shape or way."

"I believes it," said Bill, giving the table a thump in the enthusiasm of the moment; "I believes it. Look you here, Duval. You are took—nabbed—grabbed—flummaxed—and nailed; but it was not in the fair and regular way of business. I hate that sneaking rascal as peached upon you at Bow Street. It's a wrong thing, and we of the purfession is biled at it, and can't stand it, and won't stand it, as you see, Duval; we have made up our minds that you shall go to the road again, for you haven't been took off of it in the proper way, not by no manner o' means."

"I quite understand you," said Claude, "and know your sentiments. Only tell me one thing. Will Tom Brereton get the reward?"

"He will."

"I am sorry for that."

"So am I; and so are all of us; but we can't help it. It's only a clear five hundred pounds for lodging you in jail. He'd get a thousand pounds more if you were turned off some fine morning, but that he'll lose. The five hundred pounds though he'll have, and nobody can help it."

"Then listen to me," said Claude. "When I am free, as I suppose now I may conclude I shall be, I will haunt Tom Brereton like his shadow. He can't get rid of five hundred pounds all at once, and I'll have it from him again as sure as my name is Claude Duval; and when I get it, I'll come to the lobby of Newgate and share it among you, if you will pass me your word that I may do so with secrecy."

"Done!" cried Bill. "If anybody lays a hand upon you, or says a dangerous word about you when you come, they shall walk through me to do it."

"I am satisfied," said Claude.

"Werry good," added Bill. "Perhaps you'd set to work as soon as it's eleven o'clock to-night? You have got a ticker in your fob, and will know the time."

"I have. All's right."

"Good again," said Bill; and having thoroughly concluded his mission in what he called a highly satisfactory manner, he abruptly left the cell.

"Truly," said Claude, when he was alone, "for strangeness, this beats all my adventures put together. Here, I may say in a manner of speaking, I am almost jostled out of Newgate and forced upon the road again, whether I will or no. Alas! alas! what a world is this! Here am I made the puppet of circumstances, all because a price is put upon my head. The very thing which was intended to crush me, and destroy me, conspires now with other circumstances to save me. Yes, Cicely, I shall see you once again. Fate has not entirely separated us in this world. My own Cicely, if now, after this escape, I could but find a means of quitting England for ever we might be happy; but no—no. Fate, after all, is but a dream. Fate has in too unequivocal a manner pronounced a negative upon my adopting such a course. I must remain in England and fulfil my destiny, let it be what it may."

From this time until eleven o'clock at night, the minutes seemed to lag very slowly with Claude. He did not think proper to make any attempt to move from his cell previous to the arrival of that hour; for he knew that the officer must have had some sufficient and ample reason for naming it; but he employed the time in freeing himself from his fetters, which, with the admirable tools brought to him by the quaker, he found no difficulty in doing.

The only thing he took from the basket of tools left him by Bill, was a small wrought-iron crow-bar of about fifteen inches in length; and then, for fear of accidents, coiling the rope the quaker had brought him round his waist, he waited for the hour of eleven to come.

CHAPTER CLXX.

CLAUDE MEETS AN ACQUAINTANCE IN NEWGATE, AND THEN ESCAPES.

St. Sepulchre's clock struck eleven. Even in his cell, so still was the prison, Claude could hear the faint drowsy echo of the chimes, and then the more full sound of the hour striking.

"It is time," he said.

For fear of an accidental visit from any one, Claude had kept his fetters in such a position that they did not look to have been disturbed at all; but now that the hour for action had come, he at once shook them off, and they fell with a clatter to the ground.

He then took up one of the tools that had a sharp point, and, upon the wall of his cell, he wrote the following lines:—

"Claude Duval was in Newgate thrown,
But he laughed his fill at iron and stone;
He broke many locks, and he cleared the wall:
Heigho for the saddle! says Claude Duval."

"There," he added, "that will be something of a memorial of me in time to come; and may it put heart to attempt his liberty into any poor devil who may occupy this cell after me."

Among the things brought to him by the quaker, were matches of phosphorus, then pretty well understood by what was called "the family," i. e. cracksmen and knights of the road; and those matches, together with a small lantern which he could darken at a moment's notice, were likely to be eminently useful to him in his progress through the dark passages of the old prison.

"I almost regret," he said, as he lighted his lantern, "that these rascals of turnkeys and officers have made up their minds to wink at my escape; for I should have liked to get away in spite of them all, which I do think I could have done; but, perhaps, it's as well as it is, for I am now, in a manner of speaking, sure of my success."

His first task now was to unlock his cell door, and this he did not find to be a very difficult task, for he had the very finest tools for such a purpose that London could furnish him. The door soon yielded, for as Bill had been his last visitor, he had forgotten (?) to put up an iron bar that was behind it.

With his lantern in his hand, Claude traversed the corridor in which he now found himself, and he was upon the point of commencing an attack upon one of the double-doors leading into the chapel, when he was arrested by hearing some one weeping. The sound appeared to have come from one of the cells opening from the corridor.

"What shall I do?" said Claude. "Ought I to trouble myself about any one else at such a time as this? or ought I to reflect that I have it, perhaps, in my power to restore some one to life and liberty, who may either be wholly and completely innocent, or not very guilty?"

Such a discussion was not likely to last very long in the mind of such a person as Claude. His feelings soon carried the day against his judgment. He made his way to the door of the cell from whence the sobs issued, and placing his mouth to the key-hole, he said, in a low but distinct voice—

"Who are you?"

The sobs suddenly ceased, and all was perfectly still, until Claude repeated his question, and then a voice replied—

"I am a most unfortunate person indeed. Who is it that speaks to me in such a place as this?"

"One who can give you your freedom," replied Claude, "only he is not quite sure that you deserve it."

"Oh, do not say so," replied the voice; "I am merely placed here out of spite on account of some family differences. There is not in all the world, I assure you, be you whom you may, a more innocent person than I am; and if you can only restore me to freedom, you will earn my everlasting gratitude."

"I have no means," thought Claude, "of testing the truth of this man's assertions, but I will run the risk, and let him go with me as far as the street, poor devil."

With this determination, Claude took down the bar of the cell door, and speedily unlocked it. When he flung it open, he said—

"Make as little noise as you can, and follow me; I am, like yourself an escaping prisoner, and we shall require all our skill and caution yet to succeed."

The inhabitant of the cell now came crawling out upon his knees in the most abject manner. The light of the lantern fell upon his face, and Claude recognised Phillip Manning! At the same moment the wretched man caught a sight of, and recognised Claude Duval.

"Mercy! mercy!" he cried.

"Villain!" said Claude, "had it been any other man in Newgate I would not turn my back upon him, but you——"

"Oh no—no—no!—Spare me. Take me with you! Only free me from this dreadful prison, and I will be your servant—your slave. Oh, have mercy upon me!"

Claude turned away in disgust.

"Duval, Duval, do not leave me here. My uncle is cold, and stern, and harsh; he has made up his mind, notwithstanding all the exposure and all the relationship, to leave me to my fate and to the law. Oh, take me with you. You are bold and vigorous, and the stone walls of Newgate cannot hold you. Have pity upon me."

"No," Phillip Manning, "fight your own battles. Remain where you are, for me."

"But I cannot fight my own battles. I have already written a letter to my uncle threatening him that if I am put upon my trial, I will insinuate so much against the purity of Grace, that it shall stick to her while she lives, and he took no notice of the letter at all. Oh, save me! save me!"

"You consummate scoundrel! To your cell again!"

"No—no. I have once left it, and I will not return to it. If you will not save me by letting me go with you, I will raise the whole prison by my cries, and swear—for I am am ready at any time to swear anything—that I caught you in the act of escaping, and that you were trying to persuade me to go with you and rob on the highway."

Duval had only just patience enough to hear the end of this speech, and it was truly wonderful that he had so much, considering his temperament, but the last words were no sooner out of Phillips lips, then clapping the lantern to the floor, Claude sprung upon him, and lifting him bodily up with both hands, he flung him into the cell again as though he had been some piece of old lumber, and then banging the door to, he put up the bar again in a moment. All was still. Master Phillip had in all probability been too much stunned by the vengeance with which he was sent back again into his old quarters, to give any immediate alarm of what Claude was about.

Claude was really much more annoyed at this little incident than he chose to confess to himself, and he muttered as he set to work upon the door at the end of the corridor—

"Confound it, who would have thought of lighting upon that one rascal out of all the folks, good, bad, and indifferent, in Newgate? But it serves one right for at such a time meddling with the affairs of anybody one did not know."

The door he was engaged upon soon yielded, but that immediately behind it, which opened into the chapel, was secured by two strong bolts, one at the top, and one at the bottom of the door, so that he had his work before him to get that one undone.

It was only by boring a hole right through the door, and with the powerful tools he had, sawing a piece out of it both at top and bottom, that he succeeded in overcoming this obstacle of the bolts, and then having previously shot back the lock, he found himself within the chapel of Newgate, which, by the uncertain light of his lantern, looked of treble its usual size.

He knew that he could much easier leave the chapel, by a door immediately opposite to the one at which he had entered, than he had entered it, for now the bolts were upon his side, and he could withdraw then in a moment. The locks readily yielded, and he then found himself in a corridor, very similar to the one from which his cell had opened. It was at the far end of this corridor that he expected to find a door that would lead him immediately into the court-yard that he sought, and which was bounded by the wall, close to the corner of Newgate Street.

He found the door without any difficulty, but to get it open was rather a serious task. The lock was one of a peculiar character, and none of the implements that he, Claude, had, would in any way touch it as regarded opening it. He felt that there was no resource but to set to work getting the lock off bodily; and without a moment's delay he commenced operations. By dint of great labour, he succeeded, in the course of a quarter of an hour, in getting the wedge-end of the wrought-iron lever he had with him about an inch beneath the plate of the lock.

Slowly and cautiously he applied his strength to the other end of the crow-b and it was pleasant to him to hear the creaking and springing of the yielding lock. Then with a sudden bang, like the muffled report of fire-arms, the lock-plate came off, and there was no longer any difficulty to contend with, as regarded opening that door, so far as the lock was concerned. Duval did not expect that that door had any other fastening, and he was most disagreeably surprised to find that it did not yield. By a little shaking at it, he found out that there was a bar across it.

This was a serious obstacle, not as regarded the difficulty of removing the bar, but as regarded the time it would take to do so. There was no earthly resource but to absolutely saw through it, and that he immediately set about. Fortunately there was just sufficient space between the door and the wall for him to introduce one of the fine and exquisitely-tempered saws with which he was provided, so that he could begin the work at once.

Rapidly the sharp teeth of steel cut into the soft iron of which the bar was very injudiciously composed, and at length the last obstacle was removed, and the door creaked open upon its massive hinges. Then came a rush of cold air, which was sufficiently convincing to Claude as regarded the immediate proximity of the court-yard.

"Now," he said, "I have but the wall of Newgate to surmount, but that is not the easiest thing in all the world. I must trust to good fortune, however, and a stout rope. I wonder if the officer has been as good as his word, and left a rope hanging from the spokes conveniently?"

Claude thought it was expedient to put out his lantern; for although the night was dark it was not so dark but that with a little practice he could see objects generally in the prison-yard, and there might possibly be some official who, not being in the plot, would consider it a wonderfully meritorious thing to discover him. Besides, if a rope were there at all, it must be hanging close to the wall, so he could not miss it.

The court-yard was small, and Duval soon reached the wall, but scarcely had he done so, when he was somewhat startled by the ringing of a loud bell in the prison. He paused a moment to listen to it, and then suddenly from the deep shadow of an angle of the wall there came a man, who in a low voice, said—

"Quick, Duval, quick. Why, isn't you off?"

"Is it you, Bill?"

"Yes, to be sure; I've been awaiting for you this half-hour. Don't you hear the alarm-bell a-going? Somebody has found out that you are missing. Five or six minutes ago, they said there was a shouting from one of the cells, but that can't have anything to do with you, surely?"

"It's Phillip Manning," thought Claude, "who has given the alarm."

He did not think proper to say as much to Bill, but in the same cautious tone in which he spoke, he said—

"Show me where the rope is, and I'll be off, if I break my neck in the venture."

"This way—this way."

Bill led Claude to the rope, and then holding the end of it, he said—

"You get up it as fast as you can. I'll steady it here below, which will be half the battle. Confound that bell."

The alarm-bell was pulled by one who was not at all niggardly of his labour; and from various closely-barred casements that looked into the court-yard, lights began to flash, while the murmur of loud voices came plainly upon Claude's ears.

THE ATTEMPT TO CAPTURE CLAUDE IN SMITHFIELD.

He sprang several feet up the rope at a bound, and then with great agility commenced climbing hand over hand to the top of the wall.

It was a capital rope for climbing, thick enough, so that Duval was at the top of the wall in an incredibly short space of time. There he found that two strong hooks at the end of the rope had taken a capital hold of the chevaux de frise that was upon the top of the wall. It was a dizzy thing to look down upon the lights in the Old Bailey, and to see from that height and that frail, very frail, standing-place, the long perspective of lamps down Skinner Street and up Holborn Hill. He had to hold on to the complicated iron-work as best he could. To cross it was a matter of great danger and difficulty.

CHAPTER CLXXI.

CLAUDE ASTONISHES TOM BRERETON AND PLEASES HIS FRIENDS.

THAT was not exactly the time for reflection; and Claude, after shading his eyes with his hand, and taking one long look upon the streets below, from which rose up to him the roar and the clash of life in the countless crowds of London, proceeded to let the rope down on the outer side of the wall.

He tore his clothing and gave himself some slight scratches from the spiked iron-work at the top of the wall, and then he succeeded in fairly launching himself on to the rope. All he required now to do, was to keep himself from any too rude concussion against the wall, and that he managed tolerably well, by pointing his toes against it. In the course of two minutes he was in the Old Bailey.

A man having the dress and appearance of a porter, was the only person passing at the moment, and he, after pausing for a moment with a look of astonishment as Claude descended and reached the pavement, suddenly rushed forward and seized him by the collar, saying—

"Hilloa, my jail bird, you are taking to your wings, are you?"

"Yes," said Claude, "and my claws likewise."

Drawing in a full breath as he spoke, he struck the man such a tremendous blow in the face that he fell to the ground as though a cannon shot had felled him. Duval started off then at a brisk trot, and making his way down Skinner Street he soon gained Holborn-bridge. As he ran he heard the sound of the great bell of Newgate, as though it were pursuing him, but he was resolved to go the nearest way he could to the quaker's in Dean Street, and without deviating from his path in the least, he ran up Holborn Hill.

"Stop him!" cried a voice. "Stop thief!"

Claude glanced behind him and saw some men running. He had his doubts whether they were after him or not, but he did not think it worth his while to throw a chance away, and being close to Southampton Buildings he darted down that turning, and then taking the first turn he came to, to the right again he emerged into Chancery Lane. Not wishing then to make his way into Holborn or down the lane to Fleet Street, he thought his best plan would be to get through Lincoln's Inn, and so on by a back route to Soho.

Claude knew that the Inn was closed to all but its inhabitants after nine o'clock, but he crossed over the road and boldly knocked at the old gate.

In the course of about a minute the wicket was unbolted, and a surly-looking man with a nightcap on his head and a lantern in his hand, made his appearance. A sharp scrutiny into Claude's face satisfied the porter that he, Claude, did not belong to the Inn, and he said in a tone of passion—

"What the devil do you want here? You can't come in, I tell you."

"But you can come out," said Claude.

As he spoke he darted in his right hand, and seizing the porter by the throat, he dragged him through the wicket and hurled him into the middle of Chancery Lane. To step into the Inn and to bolt the wicket on the inner side was Claude's next step.

"Daniel!" cried a woman's voice from the lodge. "Daniel, what's the matter? What's the matter, Daniel?"

"Nothing," said Claude. "You be quiet, or I'll soon make you."

Without waiting for any reply, he darted across the old square and so on to the new, and then making his way up Cook's Court, he was duly let out by the porter there, for it is a rule after hours at the Inn to let everybody out but nobody in.

The cries of the men in Holborn, whether they had been directed at Claude or not, had long since died away, and he walked with a deliberate step through the silent purlieus of Clare Market. Drowsy watchmen calling the wrong hour, and asserting the weather to be anything that came uppermost to their minds, were the only persons he met, with the exception of some nymph of the pave who occasionally applied to him an endearing epithet or an abusive one, as her humour at the moment dictated; and so, in less than half an hour after leaving Newgate, he stood upon the quaker's doorstep in Dean Street.

Instant admission was granted him, and he found his hand grasped in that of Jack, who cried—

"Claude, Claude, this is indeed a happy meeting. Both Dick and I said we would meet you, but our friend Franklin declared you would be safer by yourself!"

"Thank you all," said Claude, "I am safe enough, and glad to see you all.—I don't think either—indeed, I may say, I am sure that there is no one upon my track, so all is right so far,"

"Then, friend, Claude," said the quaker, who had been fastening up the street-door, "let us to supper, for we have waited for you. I said you would be here, friend, at half-past twelve, and it is now not above twenty minutes to one. Didst thou meet with any cross accident?"

"Nothing to signify," said Claude; "but you shall have all the particulars while we are at supper. I feel as though I could do justice to it; let it be as good a one as it may, Mr. Franklin."

"Friend, there are four roast ducks, and a Westphalia ham, together with all sorts of varieties in the way of drink."

"Good; and now can anybody tell me what has become of my horse?"

"I can," said Dick "He is all right, and as fresh as a daisy on a Spring morning, Claude. You have certainly got the better of the Philistines this time, and no one can rejoice at it more than I do."

"I thank you all," said Claude; "and does Cicely know nothing?"

"She knows nothing," replied Jack; "but suspects much."

"Then, that shall be seen to after supper; I will ride to the farm, and set her heart at rest. Oh, how I long to be in the saddle again, and among the trees and meadows. God, I think I should die soon in the city. Short as has been my stay in Newgate, there have been times when I felt as though I should have gone mad; but that is past now, and in good truth I don't think they will take me again with the breath in my body. This time it was an extraordinary accident, or they would not have had me within the walls of Newgate."

They were now seated at the supper-table, and they all did ample justice to the good cheer of the quaker, after which Claude related to them what had taken place in the prison, regarding the interview he had had with Sago, the attorney, and the singular determination that the officers and turnkeys had themselves come to, to let him escape.

"Friend," said Franklin, "thou wert in luck's way. I know that Sago very well, and thou needest not trouble thyself about any arguments or promises with him. I will give him a call."

"Thank you; but can any of you now tell me anything of Tom Brereton, for I am resolved to keep my word with the officials of the prison, and whatever I can wrest from him of the reward I will take to them. It may serve me in good stead at another time, or a friend, if not myself, may profit by having well-disposed people to me within the four walls."

"That is true, friend," said Franklin; "and I very much applaud thy resolution; I can tell thee where thy old acquaintance, Tom Brereton, is; and I can likewise tell thee that he has only received £750 for thy capture. The Secretary of State raised a quibble wth him that thou wert already in custody, and kindly added, 'that if he did not like to take the £750 in full, they (the government) were quite willing to meet him in any Court of law upon the subject, for the term of his natural life;' so, with a rare wisdom, Tom Brereton took the money."

Claude laughed, and then he said—"And where may I have the pleasure of finding the rascal?"

"He has taken a lodging, friend Claude, at the next house to the corner one of the Edgeware road, and there, most undoubtedly, thou will find the rascal; for he makes no secret of his name or his whereabouts, as he looks upon thee as most comfortably bestowed in Newgate, and that thy first appearance in the open air therefrom will only be to be hanged."

"I am very much obliged to him," said Claude, rising. "It will be quite a charity to undeceive him. Mr. Franklin, I am extremely obliged to you; and for myself and my friends, I feel myself very much your debtor, indeed. I will take good care that you lose nothing by your share in these transactions,"

"Friend, I am quite satisfied," said Franklin, rubbing his hands together. "Business is business, and I am quite sure that I shall see thee all again very often. I wish thee all manner of luck, friend."

The servant of the quaker made his appearance, and casting up his eyes in a sanctimonious manner, he said—"Truly, the three animals are at the door."

"What the duce does he mean?" said Dick.

"He means," said Franklin, "that your horses are ready."

"And, am I, Dick," said Claude, "to have the pleasure of your company? Jack, of course, I counted upon."

"Even so," said Dick. "I am something like you, Claude. I am half dead for want of a sniff of the country air. I am for the road, again, and will ride with you some miles; I then think of going a good many miles off, and trying some of the first-class roads, some hundred miles at least from London. I think there is some fair business to be done."

"Probably enongh," said Claude; "but don't let me keep you off Hounslow Heath, if you have any fancy to it."

"No, thank you. I shall try the great north road, for a few weeks, and then who knows but we may meet again. However, I will now ride with you as far as the Edgeware Road, for I presume that is the direction in which you purpose going now?"

"It is; and I will drop in upon my friend, Tom Brereton, as I go along. I am very anxious to get that little piece of business comfortably settled; and I don't think it will take me very long to do it."

"Truly, friend," said Franklin, "you will find him in the first floor of that house that I have named to you; and as he certainly does not expect thee, the surprise will be all the greater, and, of course, quite an agreeable one."

"Very agreeable," said Jack.

They all mounted, and the only person who watched them do so was the drowsy looking guardian of the night, who threw the glare of his lantern upon them, and then as they were just moving off, cried—

"This is an odd time of night to ride. Who is you?"

"Just run on a few miles, and we will tell you," said Claude. "You can hold on to my horse's tail."

The watchman was waxing very wroth, as they trotted down Dean Street, and then emerging into Oxford Street, they went on at a brisk canter to the west.

"Ah," said Claude, "this is life, again. Now, indeed, I feel that the blood circulates in my veins. What a different creature to be sure I feel upon my gallant steed in the pure open air. That infernal cell of Newgate would have killed me in another week. Why, I can smell the fresh and beautiful vegetation of the country, already."

"Yes," said Jack, "so can I. I love the trees, and the fields, and every sight and sound of the open country. When death comes to me, let it come far away from the smoke and the din of London. But here we are, Claude, at the Edgeware Road, Do you still hold to your intention of dropping in on Tom Brereton, to night?"

"Certainly I do. The sooner the better. By to-morrow at noon the news of my escape from Newgate will be all over London, and upon the very first intimation of such a thing, he will assuredly be off, and I don't want a tedious dance after him. It must be to-night or never that he and I come to a reckoning."

"Here's the house, then," said Dick, as they all three paused opposite to the house that had been mentioned by the quaker as that in which Tom Brereton had taken a lodging, upon the strength of his seven hundred and fifty pounds. It was a respectable enough looking building, and the first floor was adorned by a pretty balcony, that ran all along the front of the house, and around the wooden rails of which some creeping plants were rather tastefully trailed and trained. The most profound stillness reigned in and about the place.

"I have an idea," said Claude, "that by standing on the saddle of my horse I can reach the balcony."

"Of course you can," said Dick, "and it will be, by all means, the best way of getting into the house. We will take care of the horse, and see that all is right below here."

"Thank you. I don't anticipate the smallest trouble in the affair. I know my customer pretty well."

Claude walked his steed to a spot exactly under the edge of the balcony, and then admonishing it by his voice to be still, he got upon the saddle and found he could reach the balcony easily enough. After, then, trying some of the bars, to see if they would stand his weight, and finding that, so far, all was right, he drew himself up in a moment, and was fairly in the balcony, somewhat to the detriment of some plants in pots that were placed there.

"Yes—yes; you need not keep the horse there, or stay there yourselves exactly by the house; it may attract attention, and when I have done all the affair I can jump down."

Jack took Claude's horse by the bridle; the creature knew Jack very well, and would go with him; and then he and Dick walked off some twenty or thirty yards, and waited the issue of Duval's adventure in the lodging of the man who had placed him in such peril.

There were two windows to the room which opened from the balcony, but as they both belonged to one room, it was of no sort of consequence which one he, Claude, opened; so he began operations upon the one that happened to be the nearest to him, and soon found that the fastenings were singularly insufficient.

CHAPTER CLXXII.

TOM BRERETON FINDS THAT LIGHTLY COME, LIGHTLY GO, IS A TRUE PROVERB.

It was a French casement, and in the course of three minutes Claude had open one of the halves of it, and stepped into Tom Brereton's drawing-room noiselessly.

It showed what an amount of confidence both Claude and his friends had in the accuracy of any information that might come from Franklin, the quaker, that he should make his way thus into a house, and not feel the least doubt upon the subject of his being upon the right track to find the man whom he sought. And he was quite right in this great confidence that he bestowed upon the word of the quaker, for he was sure enough then and there in the lodging of Tom Brereton, who would as soon have expected a visit from the Pope of Rome upon that night as from Claude Duval. The room was very dark, for it was the most obscure portion of the night; but Claude had with him some of the matches which he had used in Newgate upon the occasion of making his escape from that prison, so a small blue flame quickly made itself visible in the drawing-room of Tom Brereton, and illumined by its faint radiance every object.

The first thing that met Claude's gaze, upon the table in the centre of the room, was a decanter half full of wine, with an overturned glass by the side of it.

Two candles, very roughly put out, were likewise upon the table, so that there were pretty evident tokens that Tom Brereton had been enjoying himself a little freely during the evening.

Claude lit one of the candles, and then seeing a door a few inches open, which he judged rightly enough led into the bed-room, he cautiously and very noiselessly advanced, and pushing the door wide open, entered the sleeping-chamber of the man whom he had come to seek.

Claude need not to have been at all careful in his approach to Tom Brereton's bed-side, for that individual had taken sufficient wine to steep his senses in forgetfulness; and he was snoring at a furious rate, as he lay upon his back with a flush of unusual colour upon his vulgar and most menacing face.

Claude placed the candle upon the dressing-table, and then sat down very composedly by the bed-side. Tom Brereton had a nose in the full acceptation of the term, and it looked so convenient and handy a means of awakening him, that Claude reached his hand towards it, and taking hold of it with his finger and thumb, he gradually tightened his grasp of it.

Tom Brereton moved uneasily, he coughed, shook his head, tossed his arms about, and finally opening his eyes, he beheld, seated by his bed-side, his arch enemy. It is doubtful if he would not rather, at that time, have seen sitting by him the arch enemy of mankind, than Claude Duval, with his stern composed-looking face glaring at him.

Claude let go his nose, which was squeezed perfectly flat, and seemed as though it would never recover its former rotundity, and then in quite a casual sort of tone, he said—

"Well, Tom Brereton. Here I am, you see."

Tom Brereton rubbed his nose, and rubbed his eyes. He got half up upon his elbow, and then he rubbed his nose and his eyes again.

"A dream?" he said.

"Look again," said Claude. "Do I look very visionary? Were those fingers that compressed your nose those of a vison? I repeat, Tom Brereton, that I am here to pay you a visit and to square accounts with you."

The agonised coward fell back upon his pillow, and uttered a cry of horror and alarm. Claude drew a pistol from his pocket, and placed the cold muzzle of it right within the cavity of Tom Brereton's ear, as he said—

"Another such cry, and it is your last in this world. You know me, and that I keep my word. Answer we what I shall demand of you, and speak in a low tone, but clearly and distinctly; and as you value your wretched existence let me have no prevarication."

"The Lord help me!" groaned Tom. "I'm a dead man now—Our father which art in Heaven—For what we are about to receive the Lord make us truly thankful—Amen!"

"Peace, idot!"

"Yes—yes. I—I—am—peace. Oh, dear! Oh—oh!"

"How much did you get for denouncing me at the police office?"

"How—how much? Oh, my dear sir, you can't believe how very unhappy I have been ever since I had the misfortune to say it was you. Oh, dear, I regretted it so very much, for you know how very fond I am of you. I could quite cry, I could to think of it."

"My patience," said Claude, "is fast leaving me. I ask you how much you got by way of reward for denouncing me at the police office? I worn you now. My finger is upon the trigger of the pistol, and if you tempt me too far by any lies, you are a dead man, and the wall there will be plastered with your brains, if you have any."

"Oh, gracious, I got seven hundred and fifty pounds. Here's a horrid fix."

"It is a fix. Where is the money?"

"Where is the money? Oh, don't I wish it was here, I'd give it all to you in a moment. It's in banker's hands."

"What banker? Quick—quick."

"What banker? Oh—why, it's in the hands of—of Smith and Company I assure you, in Lombard Street, No. 22 and a half, next door to a cake-shop. Oh, dear."

"Tom Brereton!"

"Yes, my dear, sir. Yes, I am paying all the attention in the world."

"You have told me a lie about the money."

"Oh, no—no—upon my honour—upon my soul. I have told truth."

"Well, I am sorry for it. I have come here with a determination to have that money or your life—do you hear that?—or your life, Tom Brereton, and I will keep my word. Do you understand that, Tom Brereton?"

"Oh, don't—oh, don't. Look in the carpet-bag. Look in the carpet-bag. It's hanging up behind that cupboard door. Only spare my life. I have not had time to repent yet. I know I'm a sinner. We are all sinners, my dear Mr. Duval; so spare my life do—Amen!"

"If I find the money I will," said Claude. "But first let me secure this pistol, the muzzle of which is in your ear, in such a way with a piece of whip-cord to the side of the bedstead, that if you make any movement it will go off, and blow your brains out. I shall so myself escape being your executioner."

"Oh, don't—don't. Oh, dear. You will find the money, all but about twelve pounds, in the bag, indeed you will. I'm a miserable sinner."

Claude saw upon the dressing table a large pair of steel snuffers, and an extinguisher of the same metal. The latter he pushed into Tom's ear, the largest part forwards, so that it felt like the barrel of the pistol, and he wedged it with the snuffers pretty tight.

"Now," he said, "your life is in your own keeping not in mine, and we will see what is in the bag behind the door."

Tom Brereton lay flat upon his back with his mouth wide open, and almost afraid to breathe, from the idea that the pistol was ready to go off, and blow his head to pieces upon the smallest amount of provocation so to do, while Claude hastily examined the carpet-bag, in which he found a pocket-book containing notes to the amount of seven hundred and twenty pounds. The defiency was not of much consequence.

"Hark you, Tom Brereton," said Claude. "Your life is spared because I have been successful in finding the money. If I had not, you must have died. I shall now leave you to your own reflections."

"But you don't mean to take it all?" groaned Tom.

"No. I shall leave you the remainder of the thirty pounds. You will then have had much more then I intended to give you."

With this Claude blew out the light, and was proceeding into the other room in order to leave by the balcony in the same way that he had made his way into the house, but Tom Brereton called out to him in the most piteous manner, saying—

"Oh, gracious! You are not going to leave me here with this horrid pistol sticking in my ear, that may go off when I least expect it? Only take that away with you, and you may rely on my not making the smallest alarm: indeed you may, my dear sir. Oh, take it away!"

"Ah," said Claude, as he shut the bed-room door; "very likely,"

He was not a moment now in reaching the balcony; and then swinging himself over it, he dropped easily to the pavement below. Both Jack and Dick made their way up to him, leading his horse.

"Is it all right?" said Jack.

"Quite," replied Claude. "I have got £720 of the money, and left Tom Brereton in such a fright as he will not get over for some time now, I think, and it has all been done without giving the least alarm. I shall be off now to the farm where Cicely is."

"And I," said Dick, "will bid you good night, or rather good morning, for I see a faint light in theeast at this corner. Claude, I dare say fortune, good or bad, as the case may be, will throw us together again some day."

"I hope so," said Claude, as he wrung his hand.

"At all events," added Dick, "if I ever hear that anything has gone amiss with you short of your getting a bullet in your brains, I will come to you, and do you all the help I can."

"And I promise the same," said Claude, "if there should be a thousand miles between us. There is no doubt now but that Jack and I will keep company upon the road together, and you may count upon us both at any time, Dick. We shall be only too happy to do you a service."

"I know it," said Dick, as he waived his hand. "Farewell!"

They parted, Dick pursuing his route alone up the Edgware-road, and Claude and Jack trotting together through Tyburn-gate, and making their way towards Notting-hill, then a very rural district indeed.

There is something indescribably painful in parting for an indefinite period of time with any one with whom we may have been upon a footing of social intercourse; but when danger such as had hovered about the career of Dick Turpin and Claude Duval had been shared together, and when, under circumstances affecting their lives and mutual fidelity, and a mutual friendship had been relied upon, to say "Farewell!" became, indeed, a saddening and a painful thing.

Claude and Jack rode a good mile before they exchanged one word with each other. It was Jack who broke the silence.

"It's very like death," he said, "to part from a friend in this way."

"It is," said Claude. "And yet something seems to tell me that I shall see Dick Turpin again, and that he and I will have yet together some strange and moving adventures. I am seldom wrong in these kind of presentiments."

"Success and good fortune attend him," said Jack; "and who knows, after all, but that he, and I, and you, and Cicely, and Mr. Mark Brereton, may not all get off comfortably from England, and be quite happy somewhere."

Claude shook his head.

"You doubt it, Claude?"

"No, Jack, I do not doubt it. I feel certain now about it. Fate—destiny—the will of Heaven—give the necessity whatever name you will—compels me to run out my allotted course in England. I have tried to get away, as well you know, Jack. I have tried as no man ever yet tried, and I have been foiled. You know I have been cast back as if by the hand of fate. You know that I have been held to England as though by some chain, the firm though invisible links of which are around every limb."

"Yes, it was so," said Jack, mournfully. "I admit that it was so."

"I will not try it again, Jack."

"Well then, we will run our race here, Claude. For myself I care little, so that we run it together; but yet I will confess, it has been often a pleasant day-dream to me, to think that some day, with Cicely, you could sit down and be serene and happy, and free from the constant alarms of this kind of life; but if it cannot be, why there is no help for it."

"None whatever, Jack. So don't let us make ourselves gloomy about what cannot be helped. I am free, and we are once more upon the road together, so let us be as light-hearted as possible. It is the parting with Dick that put us both into this serious strain of thinking, but we will yet hope that this parting will not be for long. We are sure to hear of him, and a dash across the country now and then, to shake hands with him and ask him how he is, although it may cost a hundred mile canter, will not be a very great object."

"I should never grudge such a ride, Claude."

"Nor I; but here we are at the old farm. It's an unlikely sort of hour to rouse people up at, but I know that here I am welcome at any time I like to show myself."

We need not particularise Claude's reception at the farm. We need not say that Cicely was delighted to see him, although his cheek was a little pale. How little did she guess that he owed that transitory loss of colour to a residence in Newgate! We need not say how very welcome Jack was made for Claude's sake.

During the remainder of the night, Claude gave to Cicely a complete history of all that had happened to him since he had seen her, to which she listened with a breathless and soul-absorbing interest. At the mere mention of the dreaded word, Newgate, her colour fled.

CLAUDE COMES ACROSS AN OLD MISER IN THE PINE-APPLE INN.

"Ah, Claude," she said, "how truly wretched I should have been had I only guessed one half of this. I should have gone distracted."

"There you see, Cicely, how much you have been spared by not knowing it; but the result ought to teach you never to give way to despair, let you hear what you may of me; for you will be able to say to yourself, 'Was he not in a cell of Newgate one night and was he not the next night restored uninjured to my arms?"

"Yes, yes," said Cicely, as she sank sobbing upon his breast; "and how can I be sufficiently thankful to Heaven that you are here, Claude?"

CHAPTER CLXXIII.

THE ROAD AGAIN.—A REMARKABLE ADVENTURE.

THE morning was misty, but yet fresh and beautiful, and Claude, as he sat at breakfast in the ample kitchen of the farm-house, could not help contrasting with a sigh, his mode of life with that of one who, apart from the din and turmoil of huge cities, lived a life of primitive simplicity, and was content to be a waiter upon Heaven's bounty, in the produce of the earth, for his chief good.

"I have often thought, my Cicely," he said, "since fate, or fortune, call it what you will, forbade us to leave England, that we might yet find some quiet rarely-visited spot, where we might almost fancy ourselves amid the wilds of nature, and there live a life of rural peace."

"Ah, Claude," said Cicely, "if such a dream as that could only once be realised!"

"Do you like the picture?"

"Yes, Claude; with you, it would, indeed, be happiness; but, alas! how is such joy to be ours? Should we not live a life of continual apprehension? Would not any chance passenger, who should look at our abode, humble though it were, with more than usual interest, be to us an object of dread?"

"Yes. Yes."

"That life of uncertain peace I almost think would be worse than the present one with all its terrors. And yet, it might endure until we both sunk into the grave, where at least we should know peace."

"I will think of it," said Claude. 'I will think of it. But now I have yet something to do, which must be done at once."

"What is that, Claude?"

"Nothing of danger, dear one, but something of honour; and there is Jack, I see, coming from looking at our horses. Pardon me a moment, Cicely."

Claude left the room, and met Jack upon the lawn in front of the house. "Jack," he said, "I must go to Newgate with the money that I took from Tom Brereton, and which is justly enough due to the officers, because I promised it to them; notwithstanding, I will admit that their assistance in my escape was little or nothing."

"I approve of the payment," said Jack, "and yet——"

"I know what you would say, Jack. You don't like the idea of my going to Newgate with it?"

"In truth, I do not."

"You think that that there is danger, but I differ from you," said Claude. "While, of course, I shall take what precautions I can as regards putting on an efficient disguise, in case anyone should see me who is not in the plot, I do not think if I went as I am that one of those to whom I really shall take the money would denounce me."

"I don't know," said Jack. "My faith in the fine feelings of police-officers, Claude, is not great."

"And I, Jack, have no faith in their fine feelings at all, but I have some faith in their cupidity and in their judgment. If they were to play any tricks with me, the affair would altogether come out in some way; but I will be well upon my guard. Get the horses ready, and let us be off to London."

"So soon, Claude?"

"Why, I don't quite expect to get to London very quickly, for to tell the truth,

I shall loiter on the road with the hope of an adventure; but be that as it may, I somehow feel that I wish to be on horseback. I will be with you in a few moments."

"Very good," said Jack, "I will bring the horses round, and if we must be off—why we must, that's all. But, Claude—"

"Yes, Jack."

"Would it not be the wisest plan to adopt some disguise at once, so that you would get into London without any news of your being in its neighbourhood getting ahead of you."

"I hope to be able to pick up some disguise on the road, Jack. The only person I have much to fear is Tom Brereton. He, I have no doubt, by his clamours will raise a pretty hue-and-cry at my heels; but I hope to outwit him yet. He is too contemptible to fight and kill, or that would long since have been his fate, Jack. I cannot bring my mind to do it."

"You are generous to your enemies, Claude, and ever were; but it will stand you in better stead in the long run to be so, than to kill all who stand in your way, I feel assured."

"I think so too, Jack."

Claude took a brief farewell of Cicely, assuring her, that now he was not going upon any undertaking of danger, but merely to pay a little debt that he owed, which would be thankfully received; and then, after a hearty shake hands with all at the farm, he mounted, and with Jack by his side, took the London road again.

Suddenly Jack laid his hand upon Claude's bridle, saying—

"Just look down the road, Claude. What crowd of horsemen is that that I see yonder?"

"Crowd of horsemen—where?"

"Don't advance. We are under the shelter of the trees here now. Do not advance another step, or they will see you. There are some ten or twelve of them, and they are apparently in deep consultation about something."

"It is necessary, Jack, that I should see who and what those men are. Hold the horse a moment, while I scramble up upon this bank and have a good look at them."

Jack held the horse, and Claude having dismounted, got up upon the bank that was close at hand, and being so elevated, he was able to take a good look at the party of horsemen, who certainly, as Jack had said, appeared to be in deep consultation about something. From the glances they repeatedly cast towards the farm-house, and from several of them actually pointing in that direction, Claude had very little difficulty in convincing himself that it was their destination, and such being the case, whom could they seek but himself?

It gave him a pang to think that that place of refuge for Cicely should have been discovered; and it was an additional pang to him to fancy that some evil consequences might possibly fall upon those kind friends who had from time to time, in some sort, jeopardised themselves by giving him shelter.

"Jack," he said, "we have been dogged. Some active enemy has been upon our track. We are not abroad a bit too soon this morning. Those men are after us, or, I should rather say, they are after me, Jack."

"No. Say us, if you say anything, Claude; for your fortune shall be my fortune—your prison shall be my prison; so, if they bode harm to you, it is to me likewise. Thank the fates we are out of range of their vision here."

"I think we are. But it will be prudent to keep a little back among the trees. Ah, they have determined to go by the meadows to the homestead, and they are leading their horses through a gap they have made in the hedge-row yonder.—Now, I'll be bound but those fellows think they have the reward for Claude Duval in their pockets already virtually."

"Not a doubt of it, Claude, and you may owe this speedy pursuit, you may depend, to Tom Brereton."

"Of that I feel assured. Dismount, Jack; They are looking well and sharply about them, and they may chance to see your head among the trees if you continue mounted."

Jack was off his horse in a moment; and Claude, although he still wanted to watch the movements of his foes from the top of the bank, crouched so low among the blackberry bushes that grew in great luxuriance upon the top of it, that it was next to an impossibility that they should see him.

"They near the house, Jack," he said. "They near the house now. They place sentinels around it. I can see the flash of arms. They have cutlasses and pistols. Ah, how sure they now make of their prey."

"Come down. Come down, Claude."

"Nay—no—no—not yet. Yet a little, Jack."

"Oh, come down. Mount and fly. When they find you are not there, they may be upon your track, and a mile between you and them may be worth your life. Come away, Claude, oh, come away; I implore you now at once."

"Jack! Jack! Cicely is there."

"I am answered, Claude—I confess it, I am answered. We will stay. I had forgotten. Yes, Claude, Cicely is there, and we will stay until you see them leave. Then you will feel that all is right. You will fly then Claude—will you not? Say that you will?"

"I will, Jack, Hush! They have surrounded the farm-house on all sides. They place their sentinels two together; and now four of them climb the gate, and get into the yard. Ah, the dog flies at them! They have killed the creature! Oh, that I were there! It fondled upon me but a brief hour ago!"

"It is a cowardly act, Claude. What are they doing now? Tell me, or I shall go mad down here with the horses. What are they doing now, Claude?"

"Hush—hush—don't be at all anxious; I will tell you all, Jack. They proceed through the farm-yard. There—there—now they turn the corner of the large wheat stack you recollect, and I can see them no more. They are gone."

"And those who keep watch?"

"They are are still in their places, but evidently full of fear. They seem to expect that at a moment we may pounce out upon them, Jack; and then I'll wager my head to a groat, but they would run one and all of them as hard as their legs would carry them."

"They would, Claude, they would; no doubt of that. But do not keep your eyes off them for a moment, Claude, I beg of you."

"Trust me, Jack. Ah! what is that? By Heaven, Cicely is out with them; one of them threatens her. Bravo! bravo!"

'What is it? What is it, Claude?

'Only one of my friends at the farm has knocked the fellow down with a pitchfork, that is all—that is all. It was well and nobly done. How can they think of taking Cicely prisoner? they can have no power to do that. Jack, my duty now is to rescue her. They are evidently bent upon taking her in charge; they cannot have any sort of authority for so doing, and I——"

"Hilloa! hilloa!" cried an angry voice close at hand. "Do you know, fellows, that you are trespassing?"

Claude looked down from the top of the bank on which he was, and saw a stout man with a florid bloated-looking face, and a scrupulously cut coat of parson's black, a bob wig, and in fact the whole accredited costume of a churchman of the period.

"Hilloa!" he cried again. "Are you aware that you are trespassing upon my land? Why the devil don't you keep the high road?"

"We shall be off directly sir," said Jack.

"Ay, ay, I daresay you will be off directly, you vagabonds; but that won't suit me. I believe that you are no better than you should be, either of you, if indeed you are not highwaymen. Of course you will be off directly if you can, but we will see about that. I don't exactly let fellows off directly that I find some twenty paces within one of my preserves, I can tell you. I am in the com-missio n of the peace, and I order you both to follow me to my house. We will soon see who you are."

Claude jumped down from the top of the hedge, and looked curiously at the parson. He walked quite round him once, and then suddenly sliding up to him, he placed himself back to back with him, and gave him a sharp rap on the back of his head with his (Claude's) head.

"The very thing," said Claude. "This is providential."

"You infernal rascal!" cried the parson, stamping with fury; "what do you mean by all this mummery!" If you think that impudence will serve your turn, you are very much mistaken. "I'll pretty soon have you both laid by the heels."

"Stop him, Jack."

Jack placed himself in the parson's way, so that when he turned off to go in quest of assistance, he fell right into Jack's arms.

"Gently, Jack," said Claude, "respect the church. I look upon this as a most providential occurrence, reverend sir."

"A providential fiddlestick, you rascal. How dare you detain me one moment? Do you know the consequences?"

"Yes," said Claude, "the consequences are of course all the mischief you can possibly do; and as for the right—I confess it is just now, as is too often the case, the right only of might. But you would be wise to submit, seeing that you are in a decided minority here."

"I will call for help—I will make myself heard. Help! help! hel—murder! murder! don't."

Claude had clutched him by the throat, and held him with a grasp that rather interfered with the reverend gentleman's breathing functions.

"Will you be quiet?"

"Yes, yes; but don't choke me—don't choke me. I will be quiet. Take your hand off my throat."

CHAPTER CLXXIV.

CICELY IS RELEASED, AND CLAUDE PROCEEDS TO LONDON.

"CERTAINLY I will," said Claude, as he released the parson from the hold he had taken of him. "There is no occasion for more choking than is just sufficient, my dear sir."

"What—what do you want? Be off with you, both at once. I don't want to have anything further to say to either of you. Be off."

"Not quite yet," said Claude. "Bring him along, Jack, further among the trees. This place is rather too open,"

"If you intend to murder me, I may as well resist here as further on in the preserve. I may as well chance my life here, and cry again for what help I can hope to get."

"Hark you, sir," said Claude. "I am no murderer. I am not a man to do any deed of violence, unless much pushed to it by those who are imprudent enough to force me to it. You will not have a hair of your head injured, but peculiar circumstances make it a matter of necessity that I should borrow your wig, and your hat, and your coat, and possibly your breeches."

The parson's mouth opened to a ludicrous extent.

"What!" he cried. "Rob me of my clothes?"

"Oh, dear no, my good sir. I'd as soon rob a church, and walk off with the pulpit on my back. I will only borrow them for the occasion, and you may depend upon having them again. Bring him along, Jack, gently. Mark me, sir, you are in no personal danger unless you wilfully create it for yourself."

The parson seemed to think that submission was now decidedly his best policy. He was in the hands of two strong well armed men, and from the language used by one of them it was quite clear, whatever might be his companions mode of operation, that he was not to be trifled with.

"My good fellow," he said, "if this is a joke it has been carried far enough. I promise you upon the word of a gentleman that I will take no notice of what has passed, but you must permit me to go at once."

"Sir," said Claude, "I would take your word in a moment, but I really have an use for the things I mention. All I can promise is that I will take them in as little offensive a manner as I can."

By this time Jack had led the parson some paces further into the preserve, which was uncommonly well wooded. The two horses followed of their own accord. The example of Claude's horse was having a great effect upon the civilization of Jack's steed. Claude then hastily divested himself of all his upper clothing, saying as he did so—

"Now, sir, pray make your choice: shall my friend here help you off with your things, or will you oblige us by taking them off yourself? Time is precious. Jack, open the vallise, and get yourself into your groom's clothing."

"That's soon done," said Jack.

"The deuce take it," cried the parson. "How many of my things do you want, sir?"

"Only your coat, waistcoat, cravat, wig and hat; I have a dark silk pair of breeches on that will answer the purpose. Be quick."

Rather sullenly the parson took off the required articles, and flung them to the ground. In a few moments he was divested of them, and Claude, who was just about his size, looked amazingly well in them. The wig and hat completely altered the whole character of his physiognomy; and Jack having procured his groom's coat and hat from the vallise, crammed Claude's other clothes into it, and was quite ready to personate a respectable domestic.

"Now, sir," said Claude, "when you tell this story, as of course you will have the impudence to do, do not say that we used the smallest violence of an unnecessary character to you. From the moment of your submission not a hand has been laid upon you except in courtesy."

"Confound your courtesy!"

"As you please; but it is now necessary that for one hour I should not be interfered with in my movements. How am I to know that you will not, the moment my back is turned, emerge from this wood, and raise a hue-and-cry after me?"

"Don't you expect me to do so?"

"Certainly I do, but if you will give me your word of honour, as a gentleman, that you will not, I will take it."

"Oh, Claude," said Jack, in a low tone, close to him, "are you going to trust a parson?"

"I think me may, Jack."

"Let me go at once," said the parson, "and I give you my word of honour, that I will say nothing of what has happened here."

"I hope I shall not be deceived in you," said Claude. "It will be the worse for some unlucky man upon some other occasion, if you break your word."

"I will keep it. But will you tell me who you are?"

"Yes, if you wish it. I am Claude Duval."

"By Heaven, I thought as much. Your secret shall be safe with me, Duval. You stopped a coach once in which was a lady of my family, in delicate health. She told you as much, and you behaved with great forbearance. A fright would have killed her, but you did not alarm her. You may depend I will not say a word about you, and if I had but known it was you, I should not have interfered with you at first."

"Very well, sir," said Claude. "I am rejoiced that we part upon such good terms. Take your road home, sir."

"And with a price upon your head, you will really run the frightful risk of my raising my servants, and the whole country about you, in the course of a quarter of an hour?"

"Yes," said Claude, with true dignity. "I feel and I know that I owe my safety to running such risks. I am in the habit of trusting all sorts and conditions of people, and to that trustfulness I owe that I am now alive."

"It may be so. Good-day. Ah, what throng of persons is this coming this way. I can see them in the road, through the trees, yonder."

"Go home, sir," said Claude, "and keep faith with me. I have some business with those people."

The parson made a slight bow, and in his shirt-sleeves, went a roundabout way to his house, where he knew he could pass through a private garden to his study without being seen by any one of his household.

"Come, Jack," said Claude. "Those with whom we must exchange a few words, are upon the road, I think, now. Do you not hear them?"

"I do, Claude, I do."

Claude and Jack led their horses to the margin of the road, and then they mounted. Jack, as he was bound to do, to be in keeping with his character of groom, fell back about fifty paces in the rear, and at a sober trot, Claude advanced to face the horsemen, who were the same that had by this time searched the farm-house for him, in vain.

What a pang it was to his heart to see that two of them were dismounted, and that they had Cicely between them, who had hastily thrown a shawl over her shoulders, upon being told that she must accompany the party.

Close by her, came the young man who had struck one of the officers with a pitchfork. He was guarded by two of the party; and following the whole came some members of the family, who were resolved to see the issue of the affair, and justice done to Cicely and their own reation.

One and all appeared thoughtful, though they rejoiced that Claude had got clear of the premises before the arrival of such a force to capture him.

When Claude appeared upon the road, the party came to a halt. Cicely and her friends knew him by his horse; but as they saw that he was disguised, they had the prudence to forbear from making any exclamation, or giving their captors the least idea that he was known to them.

Claude, when he saw that he was fairly seen, put his horse to a canter, and came directly up to the party.

"What is all this?" he said.

One of the men, a London officer, and as it appeared, the only real officer among the whole, for he had merely got those who were with him to assist for the occasion, rode up to Claude, and touching his hat respectfully, said—

"I presume, sir, I am speaking to the Reverend Peter Rickman?"

"Well, sir?" said Claude.

"Oh, very good, sir. I was coming to your house, sir, which they told me was near at hand. We have had a hunt for the famous Claude Duval, sir."

"And have you found him?"

"I am sorry to say, sir, that we have not. We had certain information that he was concealed in a farm-house, sir, close at hand to here, and we made sure of him, but, somehow; he eluded us."

"Who gave you the information?"

"Why, you will hardly believe it, sir, but it was Dick Turpin."

"Dick—Turpin!"

Claude at the moment nearly fell from his horse, so great to him was the shock of this information.

"Yes, sir. Here is the note. It came to me in London last night, and I, of course, acted upon it, as you see, sir, but missed the rascal. Of course, sir, I should not show the note to anybody but you, but it is quite at your service, sir. Here it is."

"Oh, certainly, certainly. Let me see."

Claude took the note, and read the following words:—

"Duval is at a farm on the Uxbridge road called Shaw Hill Farm. You will find him there for a surety. "DICK TURPIN."

"Ah," said Claude, as he put the note in his pocket, "so I see! exactly! Well, what do you want me to do now? You have not caught him, you say, so I can do nothing at all in the matter."

"No, sir, we have not got him, but we have got his wife, sir."

"Is she a highwayman likewise?"

"Oh dear, no, sir; certainly not."

"Then why have you taken her into custody?"

"Why, your worship, you see, I thought it would be just as well to commit her to prison for a week or two, and see if we could not get out of her, by frightening her, where Claude Duval was likely to be nabbed. That was my idea, sir; and besides, they say he is precious fond of her, and having her in the jail at Guildford would be sure to keep him in the neighbourhood."

"A very good plan, my friend, only illegal."

"Oh, sir, the London magistrates, with such sort of gentry, don't much mind whether they are on the right or the wrong side of the law. You know they are not the sort of people to bring their actions for false imprisonment and all that sort of thing."

"And do you fancy, sir," said Claude, in a tone of indignation, "that I am going to make Guildford gaol an Inquisition? Do you fancy I am going to expose myself to the censure of the Secretary of State by so glaring an act as sending a woman to prison because she was the wife of a man against whom I suppose you have a warrant?"

"Oh, yes, your worship; I have a warrant."

"For the apprehension of Claude Duval, but not for the apprehension of his wife, I presume."

"No, sir. I—I—certainly. A-hem! And your worship, then, thinks it's a mistake to take the—the female?"

"A mistake, sir? It's a villany. Release her directly. I order it. It's something new in this country, that the wives of felons are to be apprehended, merely on account of that connexion."

"Yes; but, your worship, you know it is felony to aid, and abet, and comfort, and so on, any one who has committed a felony."

"Why, who in the name of all that's wonderful, should comfort a man if his wife don't? Have you got a wife, sir?"

"Yes. I—I——"

"Release that woman directly, and let her go where she likes. Of course she will go back to where you took her from. What has this man been doing, that you have him a prisoner likewise?"

"Why, sir, one of my party—that one with the handkerchief round his head—only just laid hold of the arm of the wife of Duval, and said in quite a quiet way, 'Come along with us, and we will soon see how the air of Guildford gaol agrees with you,' when this young man ups with a pitchfork and knocks him down; so of course we took him, your worship."

"Then, my friend, of course you must let him go again, for your man who got the crack on the head with the pitchford was in the commission of an illegal act, so it served him right. I order that man's release."

"But, your worship—Really, your worship!"

"No words, sir. If you dispute my authority, you are perfectly at liberty to do so. Carry your prisoners where you like, and take the consequences of doing so. I am quite willing."

"Oh dear, no, sir. Your worship's authority is, of course, sufficient. I am only very sorry I have done anything that your worship disapproves of; but I will be more cautious another time."

CHAPTER CLXXV.

CLAUDE ASTONISHES THE VESTIBULE AT NEWGATE.

THE whole of this discourse was listened to by Cicely in a perfect fever of apprehension lest Claude should be discovered. It seemed to her as though it would be impossible that Claude could, in so very hazardous a conjecture, possess nerve enough to outface a dozen men with such a deceit. But even Cicely, well as she thought she knew him, yet knew not the amazing courage and coolness which he could exercise.

Most emphatically we may truly say, that Claude was never below the occasion.

"Very well," said Duval. "You will say that you met me, and that will be sufficient. There can be very little doubt but that Claude Duval is upon the Guildford road somewhere, and as I really feel strongly regarding his capture—indeed, I may conscientiously say that no one can possibly feel a stronger interest in his apprehension than I do, except it may be his wife here—I will give fifty-pounds among you if you catch him within twelve hours."

"Fifty pounds, your worship?"

"Yes, I have said it; and there are quite witnesses enough to hear me, should they be required. But, mind—you must have him within twelve hours from now."

"Come on!" cried the officer. "We are very much obliged to your worship, indeed. He can't be very far off, and if we don't have him it won't be my fault; I am considered one of the most wide awake officers in London, your worship, though I say it myself, who, perhaps, should not. But it's well known that it's quite impossible to take me in."

"You don't say so?"

"Yes, your worship. I have cut my eye teeth; I wish your worship a good morning. Come on, my good fellows. We shall make a good morning's work of this yet. Let the prisoners go. We don't want to be encumbered with them now. We all wish your worship good day, and hope we may come to speak to you of that little affair of the fifty pounds."

The men whom the officer had in his service, were all pretty well mounted, and it was quite a sight to see how they all rode off now, leaving behind them the very man, of all others, whom they would have galloped twenty miles to see; and notwithstanding all his courage, Claude, even with the assistance of Jack, could have had but a poor chance in the open road against so many.

With what a look of joy Cicely regarded Claude as all her foes thus galloped off upon a wrong scent, leaving to him the mastery of the field. When their horses' hoofs began only to sound faintly in the distance, and when it was quite out of the question that any of them should see what was going on amid the little group of friends they had left behind them, Cicely sprung to Claude, exclaiming—

"You are saved! You are saved!"

"Yes, Cicely, for this time I am, and you too."

"Do not think of me, Claude. All the danger is to you. But do not linger here. You cannot possibly maintain this disguise for long; and those men, who are in too great force to cope with, may return yet to your detriment. Oh, fly!—fly!"

"Yes, can well imagine," said Claude, "that this neighbourhood is not just now the safest for me, nor is it to you, Cicely; for when it is found out that you have been liberated without authority, there is no knowing what injustice may be perpetrated against you. I must leave here, but you must leave with me."

"That is true," said Jack.

"We will protect her with our lives," said the people who belonged to the farm. "You know, Claude, that we will protect her to the utmost stretch of our power so to do."

"I do know it, my dear friends," said Claude, "and that is yet another reason why I should not bring ruin and trouble beneath your roof by your being good to me, and to mine. Will you come with me, Cicely?"

"To the world's end, Claude."

"We shall be very loath to part with her," said the young farmer. "Will you come back again when the danger is blown over, which it soon will?"

"Yes," cried Cicely, "I will come back again, and when I shall return here I shall feel myself happy, for the happiest and serenest days I have known have been spent beneath the roof of yon farm-house. I am ready, Claude."

"If it must be so, then" cried the young farmer, "why it must, and I can't deny the reason of the thing. I will go and get a horse for Cicely from the farm stables, and then—Ah! To your arms, Claude.—Who have we here?"

A single horseman wrapped up carefully in a very capacious cloak, rode among the group.

"You are more bold than prudent, sir," cried Claude, as he dashed towards the intruder, but then he suddenly checked himself, for the horseman let fall the portion of his cloak that covered the lower part of his face, and disclosed that he was the very justice from whom Claude had borrowed the suit of clothes that he then wore.

"What, sir, is your errand here?" said Claude. "I am very unwilling indeed to quarrel with you."

"There is no occasion. Am I right in supposing that the group of horsemen who have just now passsed me on the road, after some rather nude scrutiny, have taken you to be me?"

"They have, sir," said Claude, "but I am very happy to find they have not paid you the doubtful compliment of taking you for me."

"That they certainly have not. Will you confide in me so far as to tell me what you have said and done in my name?"

"Willingly, sir."

Claude then in a very few words told the justice what had past, including the offer of the fifty pounds, and saying how he thought it necessary to take Cicely to town in consequence of what had taken place.

"You can do that or not do it," said the justice, "as you see fit; I have already told you that on account of a near and dear relation of mine, I owe you a debt of gratitude. I will make an attempt to repay it by taking upon myself all that you have said and done in my name. The arrest of your wife is surely illegal, and consequently the assault committed in her defence is no offence. So far, then, in your favour, I can go, and after that remember that I know nothing whatever of you. I now leave it quite to yourself to decide whether you need take your wife to London or not, only I hope you will be sufficiently careful of yourself, as to keep me from being called upon for that fifty pounds you have so liberally promied for the capture of Claude Duval."

Slightly touching his hat, then, and without waiting for one word in answer to this generous speech, the justice at once rode away from the spot, leaving them all quite astonished at his conduct.

"What an injustice that man did himself," said Claude, "upon our first interview together. How much of the gentleman it is evident he can really be. May I trust him? What is his character in the neighbourhood?"

"He is considered," said the young farmer, "a violent but not altogether an unjust man. He is passionate in the extreme."

"That will do," said Claude, "I will trust him, then. Cicely, I now, with the permission of our kind friends, urge your stay here, where you know and are known, in preference to concealment, with all its troubles, in London."

"Your will, Claude, is my law. I will stay, and you will come to me as soon as may be?"

"Trust me, Cicely. I will, I feel that I ought to place it beyond a chance, that the justice should not have to pay the fifty pounds; so, for fear our friends on horseback should chance to have any kind of misgivings, and come back again, Jack and I will be off at once at a good pace."

Claude stooped from his horse and kissed the brow of Cicely; and then smiling an adieu to his friends of the farm-house, he cried to Jack—

"Off, and away, Jack! Let us place a mile or two of ground between us and those who are so anxious to be better acquainted with me this morning than suits my convenience."

"Ready," said Jack.

They both put their horses to a gallop, but not a distressing one, and off they went.

"The parson did not ask for his coat again," said Jack, as they slackened their pace about a mile on the country side of Tyburn-gate.

"No, Jack; and do you know I begin to like that fellow."

"It's the first parson, then, Claude, that ever you did like."

"Yes, and it only shows us how careful we ought to be in condemning whole classes of men, even if the great majority should happen to be no better that they should be. That parson has, no doubt, a bad temper; but the great distinction between a bad-tempered man and a bad-disposed man, should never be forgotten. Pay the toll, Jack."

Jack paid the toll at Tyburn-gate, and they passed on to Oxford-street. As they got into that even then populous thoroughfare, they thought it advisable to keep up to a greater extent the difference between them as regarded the appearance of master and man.

"I will take my place," said Jack, with a smile. "I will, however, be sufficiently near to be of assistance in case of anything happening amiss."

"Thank you, Jack. You have only to say the word at any time, and you know I shall be quite willing to play the man while you play the master."

"Pho! pho! Claude. I hope we understand each other better than that. It is all right. Push on, and for my part I don't care a straw what part I play, so that we are as soon as possible clear of London."

"I shall not linger in it a moment longer than may be absolutely necessary Jack."

With this, Claude at a steady canter, still attired in the very respectable costume of the country clergyman, made his way down Oxford Street, and Jack kept at the orthodox distance from him that a groom ought to observe, and by the steady demure look which he put on, made himself in all respects a suitable attendant upon a gentleman of his master's presumed cloth and standing in the church.

To be sure there were several persons who knew a little of such matters, who paused to cast a glance of admiration at the superb horse which the supposed clergyman rode, and then to admire likewise the animal upon which his groom was mounted; but none of these had the least suspicion that they were either of them other than they looked.

In this wise, then, Claude and Jack reached Holborn, and keeping to the highway for the whole distance, they arrived at the corner of the Old Bailey. There Claude paused, and Jack in a moment was by his side.

"I think, Jack, I will dismount here, and walk to the gate of the prison."

"Oh, Claude," whispered Jack. "As I came along Holborn, the danger, and I might almost say the folly of this desperate expedition has come strongly across my mind. Up to this point, I do believe, although we have terribly tempted our fate, that we have come safely; but now I beg you to go no further."

"Nay, Jack, I must keep my word with the turnkeys, and the officials of Newgate—they must have the money."

"I don't speak for the money, Claude; but for you. Let them have the money; I think, under all the circumstances, that it is much better that they should; but you really expose them to too much temptation by going with it yourself.—I will take it."

"And what will they think, Jack? Why, just that I was afraid to go myself with it; and if once the feeling gets abroad that Claude Duval was afraid of anything, it will be soon all over with me. No, Jack, don't think that there is any danger. You wait here, with the horses; and you may depend I will cut the interview as short as I possibly can."

CHAPTER CLXXVI.

THE OLD COAL-HOLE IN FINSBURY.—STARTLING ADVENTURES.

Jack knew well enough, from old experience, that when Claude had made up his mind to anything, no appeal to his fears was at all likely to have the least effect in turning him from his purpose; so when he spoke so decidedly, Jack said no more, but, with a sigh, took the horse by the bridle and prepared himself to wait with what patience he might the return of his friend.

And now, who that had seen Claude upon that occasion—and there were many who saw him—could for one moment have supposed that he was going upon so hazardous an expedition? Who could have thought that there was the man, who, with almost incredible courage and skill, had so recently escaped from Newgate, and who had now ridden a dozen miles to come and tap at its wicket, and with a certainty of being known too?—for he did not mean to attempt to deceive the officers who might be in the lobby with regard to his identity.

But a little consideration will show that in the very boldness of this proceeding lay its security. No one but the officers to whom he intended to make himself known could dream that he was there; and, as cupidity and personal interest is well known to be the main-spring of action, it was quite clear that their best plan was to take what Claude now brought them, and let him go again, making sure of him, as they did, at some other time, when no charge of betraying their trust, or of being paid by Claude Duval, would be brought against them; whereas, if they now were to betray him, of course he would relate the whole affair, to their discomfiture.

Thus then was it, that, viewing the whole affair, Claude did not think that he was running a great risk.

When he reached the wicket-gate of Newgate he had to pause for a moment to allow some one to come out. It was a gentleman, very plainly dressed; and the glance at the face that Duval caught convinced him at once that it was Judge Manning.

An irresistible desire to speak to the father of Grace came over Claude, and stepping after him, he slightly touched his arm, saying—

"Have I not the honour of addressing Judge Manning?"

At the sound of his name, the judge turned, and bowing slightly, he said—

"I regret that I have not the pleasure of recollecting you, sir; I am the person you name."

"Is my disguise so good," said Claude, "that the father of Grace does not recollect Duval?"

The judge started as he said—

"Good God! what do you do here?—can you be tired of your life that you linger in this neighbourhood? I was in hope that by this time you were far away from London. Do you want money? Command me if you do so; or in any other way that I can be of use to you."

"Many thanks," said Claude; "but I can manage very well. I hope your daughter is well."

"Quite well; and full of gratitude to you and your friends for her preservation. Let me beg of you to come to my house, and speak with me about your future prospects. I think something may be done for you to withdraw you from the mode of life you follow, indeed I do."

"Alas! sir, I fear not."

"Nay, you are apt enough to think, that because you have been long in such a line of life as this, that there is no resource for you in any other; but in some other country, surely you might find peace and happiness, and honest prosperity."

"Sir, I thought so once."

"And why not now? You are young."

"Once, sir, I made the attempt to leave England, but I was hunted back, even from the coast; and in the attempt my wife—she who has consented to share my varied fortunes—nearly lost her life. The occurrences connected with me at Winchester must have reached your ears?"

"Yes, I certainly heard that by the courage and skill of the officers, you and some gang of accomplices were prevented from carrying off the sacramental plate from the old cathedral."

A bright flush of colour came to Claude's face, as he said—

"And is that the story told of that affair, sir?"

"It is indeed, and it was most industriously circulated by the authorities. I recollect it made no little noise at the time; but if you say it is not so, I will believe you."

"Sir, I thank you for that much. It is a base calumny. I had but one object in going to Winchester at all, and that was to make an attempt to leave England for ever; but a price was set upon my head, and I was worth too much to the officers and the blood-hounds of the law to be let escape them so easily. They hunted me back again, sir, and the consequence is that I am what I am, and what I ever shall be while life remains to me."

"Do not despair. Only say you will call upon me."

"I will, sir. Name your own hour."

"This day if you can. Now come home with me if it is convenient to you; I wish to do all that I can to repair the involuntary injury that I did you, by taking you to the police-office, and so giving the opportunity to your foes of declaring who and what you were. Will you come with me now?"

"I have a little business to transact in this neighbourhood, sir, and when that is done I will be with you."

"Enough. I will take such measures that you shall both come and go with perfect safety,"

"Expect me, then, sir, if nothing happens to stay me. Mine is an eventful life. The hands of many men are raised against me, and but few for me, so that in a great measure I am the slave of circumstances; but I will come to you, if nothing of a serious character happens to prevent me."

With this Claude and the judge parted, and the former once more made his way to the wicket-gate of Newgate. He ascended the steps, and tapped at the entrance.

"What now?" said a turnkey.

"Is Joliffe within?" said Claude, naming one of the officers whom he knew was in the plot for favouring his escape from the prison.

"Perhaps he is and perhaps he aint. Come in and we will soon see. Come in if you pleases. This here way, sir."

The highly respectable appearance of Claude induced an amount of unusual respect upon the part of the turnkey. The little gate was opened, and Duval was once again in the lobby of Newgate, and the key turned upon him. A couple of the officials of the prison were lounging about, and in one of them Duval recognised the man who was usually called Bill, and who had been the one that had come to his cell to give him a hint that he might escape if he would. Upon this Claude touched him by the arm, saying—

"I think there is quite enough present for the transaction of business. I have come to settle a little account."

"A little what?" cried Bill.

"A little account. Don't you expect something among you all from one Claude Duval?"

"By all that's outrageous, it's him," said Bill, staggering back. "Why, Duval, you have got the courage of ten men and a half, to come here in such a way. What do you expect we are to do?"

"Take your money to be sure, and not make fools of yourselves. All that Tom Brereton got was seven hundred and fifty pounds. There's seven hundred pounds. Take it all, and don't, then, say that I was worse than my promise. Divideit equitably among you, and when we do meet again, perhaps you will remember that Claude Duval is always as good as his word, and at times a little better."

The prison officials glared at him as though he had been same apparition. The idea of a man with such a price upon his head calmly coming to Newgate, was beyond their comprehensions; and the additional idea of his voluntarily parting with such a sum of money was to them quite staggering.

"Now," added Claude, "as I don't at all admire the architecture of this place, nor its air, I will bid you good morning."

"Duval," said Bill, as he flung open the wicket, "you are a regular game one. This here is a story that it won't do to tell; but we shan't forget it for all that. You is a trump, and if you are brought into the jug again, and I'm in the land of the living, you will find a friend here."

"But," said the man on the lock, "ought we—dare we—I say, Bill? blue murder to let him go agin. It's——"

Bill sprang at the turnkey and held him by the throat, as he cried—

"Cut it, Duval. Cut it while I throttle him. Cut it at once, afore some other wagabone wants to nab you."

Claude darted from the lobby; but it so happened that some one was ascendin the little stone steps leading from the pavement to the wicket-gate at that mo ment; and Claude came out with so much force and precipitation that he en countered the person; and at once upset him, and rolled him over steps and pave ment into the not over salubrious kennel of the Old Bailey.

"Murder! Murder!"

"The devil!" said Claude. "I ought to know that voice." He glanced at the fallen man, and at once recognised Tom Brereton, who at such a very inopportune moment had arrived at Newgate to hold a consultation with his friend, the Governor, about the loss of the money that Claude had taken from him, and just made so liberal an use of.

"Confound you," said Claude.

"Murder! Murder! Help!"

"Be quiet, idiot, will you?"

Probably Claude would have said something more threatening to Tom Brereton; but several people began to collect; and others from the opposite side of the way began to cross over, so Claude thought it prudent to get away as quickly as he could; for although he had not as yet been recognised by Tom Brereton, he did not know a moment when he might be; for that personage knew him rather in conveniently well.

Accordingly, then, Claude, with rapid steps, made for the corner of the Old Bailey, by Newgate Street, where Jack was, with no small amount of impatience, waiting with the horses. Jack, from where he was, could see that there was some sort of bustle at the door of Newgate; but when he observed Claude coming towards him, he felt it as a great relief to find that he was not in it in any way; but this was an opinion which he soon found the most ample cause to correct.

Tom Brereton, after rolling a sufficient time in the kennel to give himself the lively appearance of a man who had taken a mud-bath, rose full of ire and indig nation; and the mob that had, with the marvellous rapidity that mobs collect in London, giving way before so muddy an assailant, permitted him to rush after Claude at a furious rate.

"Stop! stop! you villain!" cried Tom Brereton. "You shall pay for my coat—you shall! Stop him! stop him!"

Claude sprang into his saddle.

"Good Heavens!" said Jack. "What is all this about?"

"Nothing particular," said Claude. "He don't know me. Push on towards Smithfield, Jack. He may recognise us yet."

"Stop him!" still shouted Tom Brereton. "Him on the black horse. Why —why that's Claude Duval's horse, the famous highwayman. Murder! That's Claude Duval!"

"Who—who?" cried the mob in chorus.

"Claude Duval, the highwayman. Murder! murder!"

Tom Brereton was knocked down, and trampled over by at least twenty people in a moment, and a whole chorus of voices shouted—

"Stop him! stop him! A highwayman! Stop him! There he goes—a high wayman! Stop him!"

"We are rather in for it, now, Jack," said Claude.

"We are lost!"

"Not at all. Push on, and follow me. This way—this way. Don't look behind you, and if any one should touch you or your horse, down with him with the loaded handle of your whip. We will show them soe spot y et, or I am much mistaken."

At a smart hand-gallop, Claude and Jack made their way up Giltspur Street, and dashed into Smithfield. The alarm had been so sudden, and the escape so quick, that the people on each side of the way looked about them in a scared kind of way, not knowing what it was all about.

CHAPTER CLXXVII.

THE THIEVES' KEN IN REDCROSS STREET.—A NARROW ESCAPE.

Jack kept as close to Claude as he possibly could do without impeding him in his flight, and so they got through the area of Old Smithfield with incredible rapidity. Jack had now—as, in fact, he always had—the most unbounded confidence in the resources of Claude, and so, when he found that they were really distancing the crowd rapidly, much of the fear that at first had taken possession of him dissipated. He held his bridle more firmly in his left hand, while in his right he brandished the heavy riding whip with which Claude advised him to clear his way.

"On—on!" cried Claude.

Some man with a metal badge upon his arm, and whose general ruffianly appearance without that would sufficiently have proclaimed his connection with the market, which was then almost as gigantic a nuisance as it is now, made a sudden rush at Claude from among the sheep-pens, crying, as he clung to his bridle—

"I have him!—I have him! He won't shake me off in a hurry."

Crack went the loaded handle of Claude's riding whip upon his skull, and down the fellow went as though he had been shot.

"One fool less in Smithfield, I think," cried Claude. "On, Jack, on! Follow me closely."

"I am here, Claude."

Claude kept an even, onward course, and before three minutes could have expired from the moment that the horse sprang from the corner of Newgate Street, he and his master were in Barbican

"Ah," thought Jack, I know where he is going to now. Claude, you will go to Stevens's?"

"Yes. Push on."

But now, the first panic and surprise of the people on the route of the two flying men had, in some measure, subsided; and they were able fully to understand what was amiss. The cry of 'A highwayman! a highwayman!' came from at least a hundred throats; and in that extraordinary manner that a whole population will, at times, without knowing very well why or wherefore, hunt some one person, the greater number of people in the streets joined in the race.

But still, the great advantage Claude and Jack had was, that they were sufficiently in advance to come continually upon fresh people who, although they heard that something was amiss, did not, until the two hunted men had passed, positively connect them with the tumult; and so they dashed on down Barbican and turned into Redcross Street.

The moment they turned the corner of that street, they were out of sight of every one who, with distinct notions that they were the parties to be apprehended, were pursuing them; and then it was that Claude felt that if anything was to be done for their safety, it must at once be attempted.

About half-way down Redcross Street was a small shop where cigars, then rather a rarity, and pipes, and various tobaccos, were sold, or pretended to be sold. The doorway of this little shop was rather lofty, although not so lofty as to attract any attention of a particular character to it. But it had its uses.

Casting around him a rapid glance, which assured him no one was observing him, Duval rode his horse full at the doorway of the little shop, and in he went, horse and all.

Jack followed him.

"Hilloa, Stevens!" cried Claude.

"Here!" said a man, half-dressed, rushing from a back room with great precipitation. "Here!"

"Is it all right?"

"As a trivet, master. That will do."

Stevens darted past the two horses and banged shut his door in a moment, and shot a couple of bolts to it. Then taking the bridle of Claude's horse in his hand, he shouted—

"Ann! Ann! Ann!"

"Here ye is," said a dirty-looking girl, making her appearance, and holding on her clothes, for they had the appearance that if she were to leave go of them, they would all tumble off together, leaving her like beauty unadorned.

"Take the horses to Phillips. Be quick. Ah, I hear cries. Why, captain, they are hard and fast on your track. Be off, Ann—no faster than you can."

Both Claude and Jack dismounted, and Ann took the bridles of both of the steeds in one hand, and in another moment disappeared with them down a long gloomy looking passage.

"A highwayman! a highwayman!" cried the mob in the street. "Stop him! stop him! A highwayman!"

"Is them your friends, captain?" said Stevens.

"I suppose so," laughed Claude.

"Ah, the poor deluded wretches! But, howsomdever, there's no saying but somebody may have seed you come in here, so come on, and I'll soon take yer by the old move to the Pine Apple. Lord bless you captain, you would hardly think how many gentlemen on the road, and off the road, have made their way to the old crib through my shop, and nobody none the wiser. If the hole in the wall was only better kivered up than it is, they would have found it out long ago."

"You still use the water-butt, Stevens?"

"Bless you, yes."

"It's a good plan."

"Lor, captain, there's nothing ekal to it. You know, sir," addressing Jack, "there's a big opening in the wall of my yard that goes bang through into the yard of the old Pine Apple inn, where the stables is, and agin the hole on my side, I put the water-butt, and they does the same on their side; but a hinfant could move 'em away in a minute; and the grabs have never touched 'em, though they have been here on the hunting lay twenty times."

"What's least hidden, is often best hidden," said Jack.

"I believe you, sir. I do think if they was to come every day, and if I was to live here in the old crib till I was as old as Methusela, they would go away agin as green as they come."

"I don't doubt it for a moment."

Into the back parlour, where not the most savory odours arose from Mr. Stevens's cookery, he led the way, and opening the window, he sprung out of the room into a dirty yard. Claude and Jack followed him instantly, and there they met the young lady named Ann, who came back from disposing of the horses in the stable of the Pine Apple.

"Don't touch the water-butt, my duck and a half," said Stevens. "The captain and the other gentleman is a going through. Is old Figgins at home?"

"Yes," said Ann. "He wanted to know who it was, very bad."

"We will soon satisfy him," said Claude, as he placed a guinea in Ann's hand. "Stevens, I shall see you soon at the crib."

"Yes, captain. It's a long time since you passed an evening in the old Ken; and there's many an old and many a young hand that will we glad to see you. You might do worse than stay a bit."

"You are right, Stevens. I ought to call upon old friends sometimes; and I will stay at the ken till an honr after midnight. Then I must be off."

"Very good, captain. We shall make a night of it, I'll be bound. Be off with you, for some one is knocking at my shop door like mad."

"The deuce there is. Good-by."

Claude and Jack passed through the hole in the wall; and Stevens and Ann quickly replaced the old water-butt in its place, from whence it did not look to have been moved for the last twenty years.

The inn-yard in which Claude and Jack now found themselves was tolerably extensive. A kind of gallery ran along one side of it, which could be reached by an old well-worn flight of wooden steps; and from that gallery opened a number of bed-rooms belonging to the inn. About the yard there was the usual amount of litter and confusion contingent upon a not very well ordered, but rather extensive range of stabling; but the two horses of our friends had completely disappeared.

In the course of a few moments a man came rather timidly down the stairs. from the gallery we have mentioned, and with a look of curiosity upon his face, he approached our friends.

"Good gracious! is this possible? Duval," he cried, "is it you?"

"It is, Figgins," said Claude, as he held out his hand. "Is your father well?"

"Quite. Quite. But if he were not he would be so glad to see you, that I think it would restore him. Was that riot I heard in Barbican anything to do with you?"

"A little. They hunted me across Smithfield, that was all; and so I thought of the old crib, and Stevens's shop, and in I popped.

"Right. Right. You could not possibly have done better. Who is your friend?"

"I will tell you that, or he will himself, I have no doubt, before we leave; but in the meantime you may be quite sure he is my friend."

"That is quite sufficient. Follow me, and I will take you to the old man. He would have come himself, but as I tell you he is not very well, and when he is at his best he is not now very good at getting up and down stairs."

"Our legs are young enough yet," said Claude, "to enable us to wait upon him. I long to see him, for I do not forget what a true friend he has been to me on more than one occasion."

Both Claude and Jack followed the young man up the old tottering staircase, and then having passed through several rooms they at last reached one which was very comfortably furnished, and in which sat an old man, whose hair was perfectly white, and whose face was a sufficient evidence that something a little stronger than pump-water had been in the habit of trickling down his throat for the last fifty years.

"Who is it, Dick?" he cried. "Who is it?"

"Duval, father," said the young man.

"What, Claude?" cried the old man, rising from his chair quickly, and then sinking into it again with such a howl that both Claude and Jack started back in amazement.

"Don't be frightened," said Dick. "It's only the gout."

"Only the gout! You hideous horrid rascal," cried the old man. "Only the gout! I only wish I had anything handy here to throw at your rascally head for saying, only the gout; but you will have it some day yourself, and that's a comfort. Duval, I am really glad to see you."

"And I to see you," said Claude, as he shook the old man by the hand. "Will you forgive me for not coming oftener?"

"To be sure, I will. Business, my boy, is business, and you can't be always making calls. But who is this you have with you? Is it an old friend or a new one, Duval?"

"Look well at me," said Jack, as he placed himself in the light. "Look well at me, Mr. Figgins, and I think you will know me again."

"Again?" said the old man.

"Yes, you knew me well enough once."

The old man shaded his eyes with his hands for a moment or two, and looked in Jack's face. Then he suddenly said—

"It must be true, though I didn't believe it when they told it to me. It must be true after all. You are Sixteen-string Jack."

"I am."

"Then you were not hung after all?"

"Yes, I was; but brought to life again, all of which I will tell you, at length, before I leave; and now, old friend, give me leave to shake hands with you and to tell you how glad I am to see you once again, although you don't look so young as you did twenty years ago."

"No," said Figgins, "you are right enough there, Jack. I do not look so young as I did twenty years ago; but it seems at this moment to have knocked off one-half that time to hold your hand in mine once again. Why, I can—Murder!"

"Good God! what's the matter?"

"Oh," said Dick, "it's only the gout. Father forgot it again, and was going to get up. It's only the gout in his toe,"

"Oh, you villain," cried the old man. "Duval, can you lend me a pistol to shoot this insulting scoundrel with, or can you, Jack? Only the gout, indeed!"

"Never mind him," said Claude. "Let us sit down here quietly, and talk over old times a little."

"Ay, we will; and Dick, my boy, go to number forty-two in the cellar, and get up a couple of bottles of the old madeira, my boy; and when you speak of the gout again, call it the gout; and not only the gout—Oh, don't—I wish you had it for an hour or two."

"Thank you, father."

Dick, the old man's son, soon brought the two bottles of the old madeira, and notwithstanding the gout, he (the old man) continued during the next hour to drink his fair share of the wine.

During this time, too, Jack told the old man the whole of his truly wonderful story, with which the reader is sufficiently familiar; and then, when there was a proposition on the part of old Figgins for two more bottles of the old madeira, Claude negatived it by saying—

"You know, old friend, that my avocations are not favorable to much repose; and, therefore, whenever I do find myself fairly housed for a few hours, I think it is throwing away my opportunities not to indulge myself with a nap."

"Certainly—certainly."

"Then, with your permission, as I mean to make my appearance in the Ken to-night, I will lie down for a few hours first, and, I dare say, Jack will be gld to do the same."

"I shall, indeed," said Jack.

"And you really will then pass some time in the Ken?" said Figgins. "That will be glorious. I'll go, and at once—Murder! Oh, you rascal! Dick, why don't you put me in mind of the gout, you villain! But you never do. You never do!"

CHAPTER CLXXVIII.

A FIGHT UNDERGROUND.—THE DEATH OF THE OFFICER.

Right under the bar-parlour of the old Pine-apple Inn, and extending for a considerable distance back beneath the stable-yard, was a large vaulted room or hall. The flooring was composed of flat red tiles, laid down very nicely, and the walls were of plaster, with, here and there, a plank placed in it flat-wise for the purpose of keeping it up, as immediately behind the plaster was nothing but earth.

Along the ceiling of this large apartment hung at regular intervals six hoops of tin, made each of them to hold a dozen candles, so that when the whole were lit, the place had a tolerably brilliant effect. Right down the centre of the place was a range of tables, and, at least, a hundred seats of various sorts and sizes were upon the floor.

This was one of the most celebrated Boozing Ken in the City of London. It could only be reached by going through the bar-parlour, and then there were two more playing the part of sentinels, who had to be satisfied regarding the propriety of admitting any one before they were allowed to go on, so that it was next to impossible for any officer or spy to make his way into the place ; and it was in such places that daring robberies were concocted—that assignations for burglaries and highway peculations were made ; and, in fact, all the business of the London thieves was conducted at the Boozing Kens, of which there were in London about six, and all of them perfectly well known to the police.

To those who are unacquainted with the mode in which Police business was then carried on in London, it may appear rather extraordinary that such nurseries of crime were allowed to exist; but the thing was a regular system, and the officers went upon the idea, that if there were no thieves, there would be no need of officers ; therefore, Boozing Kens, as nurseries for thieves, or Family Kens, as they were sometimes called, were no bad things in their way.

It was very seldom indeed that any of the regular officers intruded into such places, but they had, no doubt, their spies in most of them, so that when any gentleman was wanted particularly, they could dog him from one of the Kens and pounce upon him without his being aware that he was watched from his bacchanalian orgies in the Family Ken.

It was about one hour after dark that Duval and Jack made their appearance in the bar-parlour in order to go into the Ken, where there would be many that, no doubt, would know them both well, and where from all they would be sure to receive the welcome that their celebrity warranted.

Old Figgins had managed, by smothering up his gouty leg in many bandages, and then keeping it from the floor, by the aid of a long piece of list going round his foot, and then round his neck, to hobble, by the help of his son, down the short flight of twelve steps that led to the short passage at the end of which was the Family Ken.

A large blanket hung before the entrance, and it had hung long enough to have assumed a colour more resembling the back of a chimney than a blanket, but it was liked better than a door would have been by the frequenters of the place. It never made any noise, and it was always closed of itself, easily, silently, and closely. Its hinges and its lock were never out of order; and, moreover, it smothered noises much better than any door would have done, let it have been ever such a good one.

Already a sufficient number of persons was assembled to make a confused murmur of noises come upon the night air, even through the blanket entrance to the Ken. The two sentinels stepped respectfully aside, when they saw old Figgins.

"Getting better, Mr. F.?" said one.

"A little, Bill, a little."

"Oh, you will be all right again, soon," said the other. "They say the gout is a very healthy thing to have, and shows a man is in good condition."

"Do they? I should like to be out of condition a little then, so that I might give it the go-by. Open the curtain, these are friends of mine."

"Then they are of the right sort."

The blanket was pulled aside, and the roar of voices and the steam of tobacco smoke that came from the Ken were for the moment quite overpowering, and perhaps, to Claude and to Jack, who were much used to the pure air of the open country, the loaded atmosphere of that place was much more offensive than to any inhabitant of the city of London.

Neither Claude nor Jack, though, let those about them see that they shrank in the least from the atmosphere of the Ken. It would not have been policy so to do.

But little notice was taken either of Duval or of Jack on their first entrance into the Ken, but old Figgins, turning to his son, said—

"Now, Dick," and the young man, who was very powerful, at once lifted his father on to the end of the table nearest to him. Upon this he was seen by all in the Ken, consisting of about forty persons, and a loud shout arose, of—

"Figgs—Figgs! Old Figgs is on his legs."

"It's a lie," shouted Figgins. "I am only on one leg. I only wish you all had a touch of the gout, that's all."

"Thank you, Figgs."

"Stop a bit, that wasn't what I came to say to you all. Nothing at all like it. I came to announce 'Duval.'"

"Duval!" cried all the company at once.

"Yes, Claude Duval and Sixteen-string Jack."

"Stop—stop," said Jack. "Don't announce me, I am supposed to be dead, you know."

"Yes; but I'm very happy to be able to assure everybody here that you are not. Claude Duval, my family kids, and Sixteen-string Jack. Hurrah!"

A wild shout burst from the lips of all present, and the candles in the tin hoops shook again with the concussion of the air in that strange place.

"Sixteen-string Jack, poor fellow, suffered at Tyburn," cried a loud voice, "and it ain't the thing for any new hand to pick up an old pal's name."

"Ain't it? Well I——"

"For the love of Heaven say no more," whispered Jack. "I do not wish to be known to be in the land of the living, save to the few that I call my particular friends. Let the subject drop, I pray you."

"Very well—as you please, Jack."

"You will much oblige me."

"It shall be so. Now, my family men, I leave Claude Duval with you, and hope you will have a pleasant evening."

Another shout rose from the throats of the strange and motley assemblage, and Duval, turning to Figgins, said—

"A dozen bowls of punch as soon as convenient, old friend."

"And he has ordered a dozen bowls of punch," added Figgins, in a loud voice.

If anything had been wanting—which, in good honest truth, it was not—to add to the popularity of Duval, this would have fully supplied the deficiency. The shouting became quite prodigious; and it was not stilled until Claude raised his hand, and getting a brief silence, said—

"My friends, I beg of you not to create undue attention to the Ken to-night. I have many enemies, and I do not want them to fancy I am here. I know your good feelings towards me, and all I can do is for a few hours to take a glass with you, and then be off."

"To the road?" cried a voice.

"Yes," added Claude; "to the road!"

"Hurrah! hurrah!"

Another cheer was given, and then all was comparatively still. Claude and Jack went up to the farther end of the Ken, and a chair being placed upon a table, Duval was made to occupy it, whether he felt inclined to do so or not; and then, in the course of ten minutes, in came the steaming hot punch, which was welcomed with another shout of exultation by all present. Again Claude held up his hand, asking for silence, and the roar of voices again subsided in obedience to his wishes.

At this moment some ten or twelve new comers added to the boisterous hilarity of the scene, and the fun and frolic was at its height, when one suddenly cried—

"Bill Jinks is nabbed!"

There was a stillness for a moment or two, as though death had stopped the current of life-blood in the breast of every one present, and then a murmur of conversation arose, and another voice cried—

"Ned Soames has been shot, and left a blessed widder and eight babbies!"

"Let's have a collection, then," cried another. "We can give a shilling a-piece now, and a promise of future favours, can't we? Will you go round with the bag, Jerry?"

"That's your sort," said a tall man with a profusion of bright red hair. "I'll go round and collect the bobs. Now for it. Here's the bag. Anybody may put in what they please, but nothing short of a bob. That's the ticket. I knows the face of everybody here, so I shan't make any mistakes."

This individual produced a coarse canvas bag, and he then went from one to another of the company collecting the subscriptions, and giving the bag a shake as he came to each one, and making some jocose remark about the means of the party, which generally had the effect of extracting more than the shilling from him.

Suddenly he stopped before a short stout man, profusely marked by the small-pox, and in a puzzled tone said—

"Who the deuce are you?"

"Oh, don't you know me?" said the man. "I am called Ticklish Bob."

"Are you?"

"Yes, to be sure. There's a bull for the bag. Cut along."

"And pray what are you when you are at home? A cracksman, or a toby-hunter, or a knight of the road, or what?"

"Anything in a small way. I am a family man."

"Hilloa! who knows this one?" cried Jerry, raising himself up to his full height, and indicating the man with his thumb.

Everybody looked at him, but there was a general shaking of heads consequent upon the examination. It was quite clear that the man was not known, and it was equally clear—contingent upon that circumstance—that he was in a situation of some considerable personal peril.

"Oh, this is all stuff!" he cried. "Some of you must know me. Why, I've cracked a crib or two in my time. It's too bad to pretend not to know an old pal.—It's really too bad."

Some half-dozen strong men got cautiously between the suspected person and the door, or rather the blanket that did duty for a door, and one cried out—

"If anybody does know him, let them say so. If they don't, why in course he's a sneak."

"Me a sneak!" cried the man. "Oh, that is too bad; but if you don't like my company, I will be off at once. Gentlemen, I will go if that will be more pleasing to you. Only say the word, and of course I am off directly, gentlemen."

"We isn't gentlemen," said Jerry, "but we is family coves. Don't insult us by calling of us gentlemen, I begs; and as for going, old fellow, that's a thing as you'll do, when we knows something more of you. Does anybody know him?"

"No! no!" shouted the crowd of eager faces that crowded round the man, who now turned ghastly pale, and with a sickly smile upon his face, glanced around him, upon that throng of faces, in which he could not see one that bore to him a friendly expression.

"What have I done, pals," he said, "that I should be picked out to be made a butt of? How came I here, if I don't belong to the family? Come now, I'll stand another couple of bowls of punch. Only let us have harmony."

"That's just what we wants," said Jerry. "Lay hold of him, coves. Lay hold of him."

A couple of men seized the now trembling man, and Jerry striding up to him, said—

"Now, what have you got in your pockets, old chap. You say you are a cracksman, and if you are, perhaps you have got some of your tools about you."

"No—no. I am on no lay to-night, and so I have nothing with me. All I have is this guinea, and I am quite willing to spend it, and make an end of this affair. It will get a couple of right good bowls of punch, won't it, Mr. Figgins?"

"I can't go for to take upon myself all for to say," said Figgings. "It all depends upon circumstances, you see, old fellow. We shall know more about it in a little time."

"Now," said Jerry, "I flatter myself that I can search a fellow as well as any officer in England. In course, when I talk of searching, none o' this here honourable Family Ken knows what I means, but if you all looks you will all see'

A peal of laughter followed this joke of Jerry's, for to tell the truth, the honourable company were one and all admirably acquainted with the process of searching, very few of them having been exempt from that operation, at some time or another.

The unknown man now looked as though his last hour was come, but he did not make any opposition, for that he knew would be utterly and entirely useless. He only looked unutterable things.

"Let's see," added Jerry, as he proceeded with his search, and laid the various articles on the table, close at hand, amid roars of laughter from the whole Ken. "Let's see—a snuff-box, good—a handkerchief, one constable's staff, one pair of darbies, one pistol, one warrant.—Humph, when I was quite a little boy, my father and mother forgot to teach me to read. Here, Bill, what does the warrant say?"

"How do you know it's a warrant, Jerry?"

"Why, one day, a gentleman in a red waistcoat showed me one, and it looked just like this here, and arter that he wished me to stay a month or two in a very large house, and arter that some coves said, 'Not Guilty,' one day, and out I toddled again, that's all I knows about it. What does it say, Bill?"

"It directs all Justices, Headboroughs, Constables and others, to assist Mathew Mouldy to apprehend one Claude Duval!"

A shout of rage rose from the Ken, and the officer, for officer he really was, grew faint with terror.

"Let me go," he said. "It's of no use denying it now. I am an officer, and I came to look at Claude Duval, and to follow him and nab him if I could. I hid here in the daytime, under one of the tables, and only slipped out when the candles were lit, and now let me go. What good will it do you to do me any harm?"

"Mr. Mouldy," said Jerry, "your werry humble servant, I rather thinks as you is in for it now, and that you'll be blue mouldy afore anybody outside sees you again."

"You don't mean to murder me! You surely can't mean to murder me?"

"Oh, dear no; we will only—"

"Stop!" cried Claude. "I do not deny but that this is an affair that concerns you all; but still, you must confess that it more particularly concerns me."

"Anything but letting him go, Duval," said Jerry.

"Listen to me. He has come here for the purpose of having a good look at me, so that he might dog me when I leave, and take me. Let him have his look, and keep him here till I go; then, if he likes to come out with me and try his luck, I am quite willing."

"Knock him on the head here, at once," cried a voice.

"If you do," said Duval, "this is my last appearance in the Old Ken, and I leave it on the moment. Let him be here until I go: don't let him leave before me; that's all I ask of you, and then the danger is over."

"I give up the whole affair," cried the officer; "I give it all up. I swear to you, that I wouldn't touch Duval now if I saw him on the steps of Newgate.—Spare my life, and I will give up the whole affair!"

"No, no!" cried twenty or thirty voices. "Death to the spy! Death to the sneak!"

"It shall not be!" said Duval, in a voice of thunder.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

THE OFFICER'S FATE.—THE DISPOSAL OF THE BODY.

The tone of voice in which Duval spoke was one that quite convinced all who heard him of the complete seriousness of his intention to protect the officer, and a feeling of great disappointment came over the family men in the Boozing Ken upon that account. A dead silence prevailed for several minutes.

"Listen to me, my friends," added Claude. "I should be the last man in the world to say anything or to do anything contrary to your general wishes or intents; but it is beneath any of us to do anything to this man short of killing him, and that it would be base to do,"

"Why base?"

CLAUDE'S SURPRISE AT THE FIRE ON HOUNSLOW HEATE.

"Because, my friends, we are nearly fifty to one."

The officer shrank as close to Claude as he could.

"What will you do with him then, captain?" said a voice.

"Let him come out with me, and if he plays the traitor I pledge myself to bring him back again."

"Good, good," cried several; "let it be so. The captain knows best. Let him have his own way in the matter."

"My friends," said Claude, "I sincerely thank you for this confidence in me. Be assured that what I do, I do for the general good; and if I saw occasion that this man should die, my hand would be the first to strike him as my voice would be the first to condemn him. But let us all steer clear of murder if we can. It looks like murder for so many to take the life of one."

"So it does—so it does. Claude Duval for ever! Hurrah!"

"You are safe for the present," said Claude to the officer; "beware how you tamper with that safety. I may not be again able to stand between you and those who feel strongly concerning you."

"Thank you," said the officer. "Can you tell me if that clock there, on the Hall, is right or not?"

"I think it is."

The clock, which for the special convenience of the frequenters of the Ken had been put up on one of the walls, at this moment began to strike twelve, and naturally enough all eyes were directed to it. When it had finished striking the officer suddenly scrambled on to the table that was the nearest to him, and cried out—

"As you have been all of you so generous as to spare my life all of you, I should like to say a few words, if it is only to let you know how truly grateful I am for the favour."

"Hold your row," said Joe.

"Get down," shouted a dozen voices. "We don't want any gammon."

A great many, however, seemed to wish to hear what the officer could possibly have to say, and shouted to him to go on; and amid the tumult, Claude said to him—

"Why, you must be next thing to an idiot to court so much attention towards you. Have you as many lives as a cat?"

"Perhaps I have," he said.

"Well, the consequences of your own folly be upon your own head. I wash my hands of it."

"Gentlemen," cried the officer; "gentlemen, I—"

"Call us prigs," shouted a voice. "We aint no gentlemen here."

"I will call you anything you like, if you will only permit me to say how grateful I am to you all; and, as a proof of it, I here produce a pistol, which you missed in your search of me. It is loaded; and to show you the entire confidence I have in your merciful intentions, I here deprive myself of it, my only defence, by discharging it against the wall."

To the surprise of everybody there, who saw no occasion for such an exhibition of confidence, the officer discharged his pistol against the earthen wall of the Boozing Ken.

There was a pause of a few moments duration; for, somehow, there was a general feeling, that this shot was but the commencement of something in which they might all be more or less interested; and then, the landlord's son rushed into the Ken, crying—

"Douse the glims! The grabs are all round the house. Douse the glims, and cut it!"

"Bravo!" cried the officer, and he made a spring at the throat of Claude. It was a daring act; but Claude caught him round the neck with his open right hand, and, in a moment, clasped his throat, as though it had been in a vice. Claude saw the officer's face turning blue, and then every light in the place was extinguished.

The darkness in the Ken was most profound, and the Babel of voices was most prodigious. The members of the "family" were availing themselves of all their knowledge of the localities of the place, to make their escape, and the riot was terrific.

It appeared that at the sound of the officer's pistol, which was an agreed upon signal between him and a strong force of officers on the outside, in case anything should go wrong in his original arrangement, they were to storm the place with the hope of capturing Claude Duval by a rush.

That rush was now being made, and everything in the public-house was being upset by some fifteen well-armed officers, in their attempt to reach the Boozing Ken, where they only cared to make one prisoner; but that one was Claude, and in their estimation, worth all the rest.

Duval still held the officer by the throat, until he felt quite sure that he was no longer in the land of the living; and then he flung him a considerable distance from him.

Suddenly, Claude felt his arm clutched, and the voice of the son of the landlord sounded in his ear, saying—

"Follow me."

"Anywhere you like," said Claude.

"Hush!"

At this moment, as Claude followed wherever the young man chose to lead him, he heard the doors above in the house—doors that had been closed to keep back the officers, being broken open, with a crashing sound,

"Our friends are in earnest," whispered the young man. "Take hold of my coat, and keep as close to me as you can. We will baffle them yet, I think."

"I hope so."

Claude had not the least idea of where he was being led to; all he was at all aware of was, that the places through which he passed had a very peculiar earthy smell, as though damp and mildew had for long marked them as their own. But he knew that he could well, and truly, keep implicitly to his guide; and he felt a confidence, that not ten times the reward that was offered for him would induce either the old publican, or his son, to betray him.

"Don't speak," whispered the young man, "until I tell you that we are effectually out of all possible earshot of our foes. Then say what you like."

Claude upon this was profoundly silent, and continued to follow his guide wherever it might please him to go.

The gloomy, earthy smell of the passages continued, and at length the publican's son said—

"All's right, I think, now. You are safe, Duval."

"And I have to thank you. Where are we?"

"We are in the cellar of a house three doors off from our own; of course, we must be tolerably careful not to create any alarm, although, by this time, the inhabitants of the house are, of course, in bed."

"Then, you don't know the people?"

"Oh, no—only by sight and name. They have not the remotest idea that their cellarage is one-half so extensive as it is, nor that there is a narrow communication between one dark corner of it and the Ken. The fact is, this house once belonged to a man called Slashing Tim, who suffered at Tyburn."

"I have heard of him."

"Well, he and my father were old pals, and they made the communication between the cellars here and the Ken themselves; but that was long ago, in the old man's young days."

"So I should think. But how still everything is."

"Yes, expect the officers have met with a little disappointment. They have, no doubt, by this time found their way, with lights, into the Ken, and are rather astonished not to see you. They will not interfere with any one else; for, luckily, the only two or three they would have pounced upon, are not here to-night."

"In truth, I am glad of it; for it would have been my presence alone that would have brought the danger upon them; and now, the sooner I get off and away, and on the road, the better I shall be pleased. There is one thing, however, that gives me uneasiness."

"What is that?"

"My horse. I expect it is tolerably well known to some of the officers; and if they should chance to hunt your stables through, and find him there, they will guess that I am not far off."

"Make yourself quite easy about that, Claude. Has your horse three white feet and a white star on his forehead?"

"Nothing of the kind."

"Yes, Claude, he has, and if you were to see him now in our stables, you would find all those distinctive marks upon him."

"Ah, I understand you. You have been so good as to whiten him a little to prevent prying eyes from saying—'That is Duval's horse.'"

"Exactly so; and now will you exercise your patience a little, and stay where you are, while I go and see what is going on at the bar; I will not be away one moment longer than may be absolutely necessary."

"A thousand thanks. Don't hurry on my account."

Claude, in another moment, found himself alone in the cellars, and so profoundly dark were they, that he literally could not see his hand before his face, and it was only by cautiously feeling all round him, that he satisfied himself he was not quite close to some wall, against which he might hurt himself, if he moved a step.

Suddenly a faint starlike light broke the intense darkness of the cellar, and from quite another direction to that in which the son of the old publican had disappeared, there came a figure which filled Claude for the moment with astonishment.

A very little, old, decrepit man, attired in a miserable dressing-gown and carrying a candle-end stuck in a piece of cleft stick came tottering into the cellar. He was muttering to himself as he came, and Claude could just catch the words—

"Ay, ay, it all helps. It all helps. Who knows but I may get old some day?—I ain't at all old now. What is seventy-seven? Nothing—nothing, and it all helps.—Only another guinea, but it is another, that's a comfort. It is another.—Ay, ay—it all helps."

The old man repaired direct to a particular portion of the cellar-floor, and then with a knife, which he took from his pocket, he began digging, until at only a couple of inches or so from the surface, he dug up a small iron box. This he dug up and held in his trembling hands with quite a religious veneration.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

DUVAL IS ON THE ROAD AGAIN, AND STOPS TWO PASSENGERS.

Claude was quite astonished at the conduct of the old man, but when he saw him open the little iron box, and by the light of his candle-end, gloat over the sight of some gold that was in it, he fully comprehended that he was one of those miserable beings who submit to a hundred privations to accumulate gold, lest by some freak of fortune, they should be compelled to submit to two or three.

"All safe—all safe," muttered the old miser. "Here is my money and no human eye looks upon it but myself. Yes, all is very safe indeed, here."

How little he suspected that one of the most celebrated highwaymen of the age was within twelve paces of him!

"Yes, yes," he continued, "all's safe, and here goes the other to add to the store. Ah, my glittering beauties!"

Claude felt some one touch him lightly on the arm, and upon turning, he found it was the landlord's son. They both looked on with no small amount of amazement at the miser's proceedings.

"It would almost be a charity," whispered the son, "to take his gold from him."

"It would kill him. You had better take his life."

"I will take neither; but yet a knowledge of this secret of the old man may be useful some day."

"Hush! he is listening."

The old miser thought evidently that he had heard something, for as he knelt upon the cellar-floor, he put himself into a listening attitude; but as both Claude and the landlord's son remained now profoundly quiet, he thought he was deceived.

"It is nothing," he said. "Nothing; or, if anything, only some rat. Ha! —ha! I have no objection to the rats looking at me—it is rats on two legs that I dread. Ha!—ha! All his safe."

After this the old man covered up his little iron box of gold, and having patted down the earth above it, he took up the little notched stick, in the cleft of which the candle-end was nearly expiring, and hobbled from the cellars.

"All is right in the Ken," said the young man to Claude.

"What, have the officers left?"

"They have; and what is more, they have left without noticing the dead body of their comrade, which had rolled under one of the old tables and lay there quite hidden."

"He is dead then?"

"Yes. You, I suppose, managed that for him, after all."

"I fancy I did; and after the trouble I had taken to save him, it was perhaps more my business to do so than any one's else in the whole Ken. I am sorry he brought such a fate upon himself, but he amply deserved it. It was the fortune of war."

"It was. Follow me, Claude, and you shall soon see the night sky again."

"It will be very welcome. I assure you that if I am many hours without breathing the open air, I get unhappy; and the air that is loaded with the damp smell of vegetation, amid trees and flowers, is the most welcome of all to my senses."

The young man led the way from the cellars of the house into a small area, and then forcing a door, that had upon it a very flimsy bolt indeed, they found themselves fairly in the house. They then lit a dark lantern, and saw that it was a kitchen into which they had made their way.

After this, although the kitchen-door was locked, the difficulty of getting to the passage and street doors was not by any means great to persons so accustomed to overcome that class of obstacles as Claude and his friend were.

The street-door being made fast upon the inside, of course, opposed no obstacle whatever to their progress, and Claude, with his friend, soon stood in the open street.

"My horse!" said Claude. "Oh, for my horse!"

"It is here," said the young man.

As he spoke, a lad, leading Claude's horse, made his appearance; and the transformation created by the white marks that had been made upon the animal, was so complete, that even Duval himself, with all his intimate knowledge of the animal, would have hesitated to pronounce him his.

"If I were as well disguised," said Claude, "I should think nothing of calling at Newgate or at Bow Street to ask them what the time of day was. Will it come off?"

"It is only whitening and gum."

"Good. I will let it be until I get to the country. But where is Jack?"

"Here," said Jack, stepping up. "I am all right, Claude; for Heaven's sake, let us be off. I have a horrid tale to tell you of that poor devil of an officer as we go along."

"But he is dead?"

"Yes, now."

Jack shuddered as he spoke; and then he mounted his horse, which he himself had, and Claude mounted his; but before they trotted off, Claude shook hands with the landlord's son, saying—

"Remeber me to your father, kindly."

"I will; but the old man has a dismal presentiment upon his mind that he will never see you again in this word, Claude Duval."

"Has he? I will soon knock that out of his head. Wait for me a moment, Jack."

"What would you do?"

"Nothing particular. I will be back in a moment; I am only going to disprove my old friend's presentiment, that he will not see me again in this world, that's all; and if all the officers in London were in the way I would shake hands with him yet, and wish him good night, or rather early morning."

Despite the fears of Jack, that he would be running into the greatest danger by so acting, Claude must needs call upon the old gouty publican; and springing from his horse at the door of the house, he strode in, anxious to conclude the interview as shortly as possible.

"This way," said the son. "Father is this way."

"All's right," said Claude, as he ran up stairs after him; and then in another moment, he was shaking hands with the old man, and saying—"So you thought you would see me no more, did you old friend? but here I am after all."

"Oh, why did you venture?"

"To see you."

"But it is madness. I am certain as that I live that the officers are hiding in the house even now, and if they see you, or if they suspect that you are here, you are lost—lost!"

"I'm off in a moment. We are not all lost that are in danger. Good-by, old friend. You and I will meet again, depend upon it."

"No—no, I have a presentiment that we shall not."

"And I," said Claude, "have a presentiment the other way; so I am resolved that mine shall come true. Farewell."

Claude had only taken two steps towards the door, when it was slammed shut violently from without, and locked, and then a loud voice cried—

"I have him! I have him! He is in this room! Come on! I have him! Here! Here! I have him at last! This way, comrades, I have locked the door!"

"Have you really," said Claude; "but you forgot the window."

The window was a French casement, and opened on a low small balcony.—Claude was on that balcony in a moment, and Jack saw him.

"My horse," said Claude.

"Yes, yes," cried Jack. He understood fully what Claude meant, which was, that the horse should be brought under the balcony to facilitate his descent. Jack placed the obedient steed in the required position, and in an instant Claude disappeared on to the saddle.

"All's right," he cried.

"Thank the fates, it is," said Jack; "and now, let us be off out of London, Claude; for the risks of the last few hours have made me sick at heart. Off—off——"

"In a moment, Jack. Now for it."

In another instant, Claude would have been off, and would soon have distanced all pursuit; but suddenly, a man appeared at the door of the public-house with a thick holster pistol in his hand; and, levelling it at Claude, he cried, as he fired it—

"Take that! I don't miss often!"

The bullet struck Claude upon the left arm, producing a strange stunning sensation, but, at the time, nothing more, and in an instant Claude drew one of his pistols from the side of the saddle, and firing it at the man, cried—

"I never miss, where I mean to hit!"

With a yell, like the last cry of some wild animal, the officer fell back into the passage of the public-house.

"That's done," said Claude. "Now, Jack, for a trot."

They clapped spurs to their horses, and went at a rapid pace into Finsbury Square; and then, turning their horses' heads westwards, off they went at a gallop that soon left all chance of pursuit far behind them. The horses were perfectly fresh, and had been well looked to at the public-house, so that they did not flag in their pace in the least. The long straggling thoroughfare of the New Road was passed; nor did Claude materially slacken his pace until he found himself in the green lanes, and among the meadows, which now form the site of Cambridge and Oxford Terraces.

All danger from any pursuers had long since been passed, and it was with a face full of satisfaction that Claude now once again, after so many perils, found himself once more in the open air; and as the light of the early morning shone upon the tall trees in the hedgerows, and the wild birds began to sing their early songs, he felt that glow of the imagination which all true lovers of nature feel when in the midst of her glorious and beautiful works.

"I breathe again, Jack," he said.

"And I, too," replied Jack. "London is something to me very like a large prison, Claude."

"It can be compared to nothing else, Jack; for amid its wilderness of bricks and mortar, are you not shut out from all that is bright and beautiful in nature? How those who can fly to country sights, and country sounds, voluntarily submit themselves to the tiresome artificialities of city life, is to me inconceivable."

"And to me. Hark at that!"

A thrush was sitting upon a blackthorn bush not far from them, and was pouring out a gush of melody.

"Yes, that is better music than any over-dressed crowd ever heard in the heated atmosphere of a concert-room."

"It is, indeed; but where do you think of going to, Claude, now? We are rather too near town to be quite safe."

"We shall never be quite safe, Jack. But I intend to keep on the western road a little while, and do what business I can. I look upon the route from Tyburn Pike to Guildford as my manor, and I take toll of who I can. I am not over rich, and you must recollect that now I have all the responsibilities of a married man upon me. Ha! Who comes here? Don't you hear the sound of horses' feet, Jack?"

"I do."

They both rode a little on one side, and in the course of a few minutes a couple of mounted men came up. One of them was a thick-headed bully of a fellow, but the other had all the primness and neatness of a gentleman in his clothing, although a certain air of vulgar religious fashion about his clothing very much detracted from his general aspect. Upon observing Claude and Jack, he rode up to them, and said in a canting nasal sort of tone—

"My friends, have you been long hereabouts?"

"No," said Claude, "not above a couple of hours."

"I do not wish to offend you, but I have had information that the notorious Claude Duval will be in this neighbourhood shortly, and if you have no objection to a fifty-pound-note, and will assist me to capture him, you shall have it."

"I have not the least objection to the note, but is not this notorious Claude Duval—I suppose it is the highwayman you mean?—a very desperate fellow?"

"He is, but here are four of us, and although he has a companion with him, I think we may capture him."

"How came you to know he would be hereabouts?"

"Why if you must know, it was Dick Turpin told me."

"Dick Turpin?"

"Yes. He, you know—or you may have heard—is no better than he should be, and he gave me the information. How he got it I don't pretend to know."

"And pray where is Dick Turpin?"

"On the road here somewhere. I and my man took him prisoner; but upon his giving us the information regarding Claude Duval, we let him go, for, you see, no reward is offered for him."

"Quite a sufficient reason, I grant, quite sufficient. I should like to see this Dick Turpin, though; but as it is, I consent of course to your terms, and only hope you have the money with you."

"Oh, yes, I have it, and as soon as Claude Duval is taken and I have a good hold of him, you shall have it, you may depend. This is your servant, I suppose?"

"Yes, he is, and he will assist us very much. Of course, you will give him something, likewise?"

"I don't mind a ten-pound-note if we are successful; but mind you, I give nothing unless I have fairly hold of Claude Duval. Then the money is due, and you shall have it on the instant, for if he gets away after I have got a grip of him, I will give him leave, and say that he is the better man."

As he spoke, he stretched out a large bony hand, which certainly might, if its owner had courage as well as strength, be of some service in holding any one tolerably tight.

"Well," said Claude, "I have not a very long time to spare, and I must be getting on a little, so let us walk our horses westward. If we meet him, well and good. If we don't, of course it can't be helped; but somehow, it comes across me that we shall."

"So it does me, my friend. I dreamt it, last night, and my dreams generally come true."

"So do mine. Do you know, I dreamt that I met an idiot, who handed me a fifty-pound-note for nothing at all."

"And idiot, sir?"

"Yes, to be sure, and you are the man. Jack—Jack."

"Yes. I am here."

"Look to that fellow behind, and blow his brains out at once, if he stirs an inch. Now, my friend, your dream has come true, for I am Claude Duval; and my dream will come true, for you will hand me the fifty-pound-note; so you see what wonderful and providential things dreams are, at times."

The man glared at Claude, as though he had seen a spectre, and he repeated the words "Claude Duval!" as though they had only come to him floating on the air, and he had not the least idea in the world as to who had given utterance to them. Then, suddenly, in a screaming voice, he called out—

"Jenkins, catch the other one, I've got this!"

The great, bony hand was stretched out, and Claude's collar was fastened upon with no despicable grasp.

"You would be wise," said Claude, "to take your hand away."

"Catch the other one, Jenkins! Catch the other one!"

"I have got him," growled Jenkins.

"Call out murder, Jenkins! Call out murder, Jenkins!"

"Murder," said Jenkins, in one of the quietest tones in the world; then Claude darted forward his right hand, and caught the sanctified-looking person by the throat, with a grasp that seemed to be something superhuman.

"Let's see," he said, "who will hold on the longest."

The face of the would-be captor of the highwayman grew red, and he shouted—"Jenkins—Jenk—Jen—Je——"

Claude's fingers compressed his throat too closely to enable him to speak, and the hold he had taken of Claude's collar gradually relaxed, and finally fell off altogether.

"Fool!" cried Duval, as he gave him a shake, and then letting go his throat, he slid off his horse to the ground. "Jack, where are you? Is it true that you are a prisoner?"

"Not exactly," said Jack. "This fellow is as quiet as a lamb. I never met with a more favourably-inclined man."

"Who are you?" said Claude, riding up to the bullet-headed looking man, who was quietly seated on his horse, looking at Jack, who had levelled a pistol at his head. "Who are you, fellow?"

"Take it easy."

"But who are you?"

"Jok Jenkins; I always takes things easy. You are the biggest, so I lets you have your way. I always gives in to the strongest and biggest, I does. If I was to come across some little boy, I could whack him; but otherwise I takes things easy."

THE HORROR OF CLAUDE AND PARTY AT FINDING LUCY A CORPSE.

"Why, you are quite a philosopher, Jenkins."

"Anything you like, sir."

"Well, I will trouble you to dismount, and to take your master there, and throw him into yon ditch with the duck-weed upon it."

"Certainly, sir; oh, certainly. Take it easy. Of course, sir. Anything you like; you are a great deal the biggest, sir, as you will see when I get down. Then don't you see, I'm bound to do just what you like, you see, in an easy way, sir: Throw master in the ditch? Oh certainly."

"Well," said Claude, "you certainly are the drollest fellow ever I came near. Before our friend here goes into the ditch, Jack, just lighten his pockets of anything that would not benefit by a damping."

Jack rifled the half-insensible man's pockets, in a few minutes. He was slowly recovering from the insensibility that had been induced by the squeeze Claude had given his neck; and while jack was rifling his pockets, he glared at him with a stupid half-stunned sort of look, not knowing very well what was going on. Claude started both the horses, and they went off at a good canter down the green lane.

"Now," said Claude to Jenkins, "you can do what I told you."

"Yes, sir."

He lifted his master from the ground easily enough, for Jenkins had a good quantity of brutal strength about him.

"Help, help!" cried the sanctified-looking personage. "Help, murder, what are you about, Jenkins?"

"Take it easy. They are both bigger than we are, master. Take it easy; anything for a quiet life, you know. I am only going to throw you in the ditch. That's all, master. Take things easy."

"In the ditch? Murder—murder!"

"I must. Look at him. Big he is; and so it's quite right, and it must be done. It's of no use your kicking, master; there you go."

Splash! The sanctified-looking man was struggling in the ditch among the duck-weed, and it was well for him that he had recovered so far as he had, or he would inevitably have been drowned, for all Jenkins would have troubled himself in the matter.

"Ah!" said Jenkins, as he saw his master gradually struggling up the bank. "Ah, he don't look nice, but it had to be done. We must in this world give way to the biggest."

"Murder!" screamed the unfortunate wretch who had made in his mind so sure of capturing Claude. "Murder, I am smothered."

The duck-weed had stuck to him in the most eccentric manner, so that he seemed as though, by the touch of an enchanter's wand, he had been changed to green, including his face and hands.

"Is he to be pushed in again, sir?" said Jenkins to Claude.

"No," replied Claude, as he mounted, "I think he has had enough for this once; and I leave you now, Mr. Jenkins, with the most profound admiration for your philosophy."

CHAPTER CLXXX.

THE ENCOUNTER WITH THE MOCK DICK TURPIN.

"Come on, Jack," said Claude.

Off they both went at a sharp trot from the scene of the late encounter. There was not the least likelihood of either Jenkins or his master following them, seeing that those two worthies were now on foot, but still Claude and Jack thought it best to place as speedily as they could a few miles between them and their late adversaries. At length, with an explosion of laughter, which he could no longer resist, Claude drew up, and turned round to Jack.

"Did you ever, Jack," he cried, "in all your life and experience, meet with such a fellow as that Jenkins?"

"Never," said Jack. "He is the most extraordinary original I ever encountered. I wonder if that odd manner is natural to him, or only assumed as a result of a general feeling of disgust at society at large."

"Oh, it is natural, Jack."

"Can you really think so? It sounded to me like the most exquisite piece of grave irony that I had heard for a very long time indeed; bid extremes meet, Claude, and we can only say that our friend, Jenkins, is either a great fool or a great philosopher. When I held my pistol to his head, and told him to stir upon risk of death, he replied, 'Just so,' and from that moment did not make the smallest effort to take any advantage of me."

"He is, in truth, an oddity."

"Most surely. But look at the pocket-book, Claude, that I took from his master. I have not had time to examine it. I hope there will be something in it to make it worth the trouble of taking."

Jack handed the pocket-book to Claude, who opened it with all due gravity. The first thing he took out of it was a very carefully folded, but terribly worn, silk nightcap: the second thing was the unpaid bill of some laundress, amounting to two shillings and four pence; and that was all.

Claude looked at Jack, and Jack looked at Claude, and then the latter again burst out into an uproarious fit of laughter, while Jack pulled rather a long face, and quietly said—

"We are done."

"Yes, Jack, we are done; and upon my word this, to me, has been a most amusing adventure. I don't think the poor devil had one farthing in the world, and the offer of the fifty-pound-note to me for my own apprehension was only a magnificent piece of bombast to secure some efficient assistance. There is only one thing that I do not comprehend in the whole affair, and that, to tell the truth, does disturb me very much."

"And that," said Jack, "I can guess, is the use that has been made of the name of Dick Turpin."

"True—most true. I would stake my life upon the good faith of Dick; but it does puzzle me to find that, for the second time, information of my whereabouts is by two distinct people attributed to him."

"But you don't believe it, Claude?"

"No, upon my life, I do not, and until I have it from the lips of Dick himself I will not believe it. But come on, Jack. We are most magnificently done as regards the pocket-book, and the poor devil who owned it is very appropriately punished. Let us push on over Wormholt Scrubs here, and who knows but we may meet with better fortune?"

"Don't you think it would be advisable to change your costume, Claude?"

"Why hardly yet, Jack. I flatter myself that in this present dress I look very respectable, and like some gentleman of independent means, while I must confess your getting up as a first-class groom is exquisite. I do not think that we have any enemies close upon our track who know of this disguise, and to fresh foes it will carry us through anything."

"There is reason in that, Claude; so let us, as you say, push on over the Scrubs."

Wormholt Scrubs was then a very much wilder and more country-looking neglected a spot than it is now that a slashing railway passes through the middle of it; and when Claude and Jack came upon it, they could, in the wide expanse before them, see no sign of any human being save themselves. They took a direct route across the Shrubs in the direction of Hounslow, where upon a more mature consideration Claude intended to dine.

About three hundred yards to the left there was a small clump of fir trees, and it was about the only shelter for the space of a mile or more; and just as they passed this little clump of trees, there issued out from it a horseman, attired in a faded sky-blue coat with tarnished silver lace upon it. Huge jack-boots were upon his feet, and he wore likewise a slouching hat with a very large buckle. His horse was rather a smart-looking animal enough, and take him for all in all, he looked like some unattached drunken subaltern officer in the army, who upon slender means contrived to cut a sorry dash among a not very creditable class of society. Such characters—now happily extinct, for an officer is forced to be a gentleman—were very frequent even fifty years ago.

He came prancing on, with a devil-may-care sort of look, and as Claude had passed on, he encountered Jack, to whom he said, in an authoritative voice—

"Who is your master, sirrah?"

"A gentleman," said Jack.

"But his name and calling, sirrah? Answer me."

"He it just before you," said Jack; "and you had much better ask him yourself. Information is always best from the highest scource. Here he is."

"B——Sir, I'll remember your insolence. Hang it, sir, how dare you speak to me in this way?"

Hearing the altercation, Claude turned his horse's head, and trotted back.

"What is all this about?" he said. "Is the gentleman out of his mind? or has he lost his way on the Scrubs?"

"No, sir," said the fellow, "this gentleman is neither mad, nor has he lost his way upon the Scrubs. Confound my blood, sir, I am a gentleman, and in want of a little ready cash; do you understand that, sir?—Curse everybody—eh, sir?"

"Yes," said Claude, "I understand it, as well as your ridiculous and stupidly profane oaths will permit me."

"Oh, oh, you belong to the church, do you? Well, well, my fine dressed gentleman, we will borrow a few guineas from you. In a word—your money or your life!"

"What! Are you really, then, a highmayman?" said Claude.

"Call me what you like; but stand and deliver!"

The fellow produced a pistol nearly as large as a small carbine, which he levelled at the head of Claude, who, however, took no more notice of it than as if it had been a bit of stick; but turning to Jack, he said—

"Here is a highwayman, if you never saw one before. He is quite a curiosity in his way. Let's ride round him and have a good look at him. How often I have wished to meet with a real live, bragging, bouncing, cowardly rascal, such as this."

As Claude spoke he walked his horse slowly round the fellow, who, with a growing fear upon his face, kept turning and facing him, still keeping the immense pistol presented at his head all the while.

"Come, come," he said, "these tricks won't do for me."

"Nor for me," said Claude; "so go your way, and I will go mine. I have seen quite enough of you, my friend."

"But I have not seen enough of you, my friend; and so, I say again, your money or your life! I am one too accustomed to say 'Stand and deliver!' to be trifled with."

"Do you mean seriously to say that you want my money?"

"Ay, brother; and your watch and jewellery too. Ha!—ha!"

"If you will stand on your head for five minutes I will give you a shilling, but not otherwise, my fine fellow."

"Then you and your servant may as well say your prayers, for your two lives are not worth a minute's purchase. Perhaps, when I tell you who I am, you will come to a different conclusion. I am Dick Turpin!"

A sudden light broke over Claude's countenance. Here then, at once, was the mystery unravelled. This fellow was personating Dick Turpin in the neighbourhood; and not a doubt remained in the bosom of Claude but that it was from this man that the gentleman in the ditch had obtained his information.

"Dick Turpin?" said Claude.

"Yes. You have heard of me?"

"Oh, surely. Really, this is one of the pleasantest adventures that I have met with for a very long while, indeed. I am Claude Duval!"

The fellow reeled again in his saddle, and the gigantic pistol fell from his palsied fingers to the ground. Claude sprung upon him, and clutched his arm.

"Stir a step, and you are a dead man. I will blow your brains out with as little compunction of conscience as I would those of a mad dog."

"Oh, spare me! I—am—only a poor fellow!"

"I know it; and a pitiful fellow are you into the bargain, you vagabond. Tell me this moment why you assumed the name of one who is as different from you as Hercules is to a sick child? Speak, dolt! Jack, keep an eye on him. Pitch him off his horse, or he will give us a race after him yet."

Jack charged against the fellow, but he anticipated the shock by slipping off his horse on to the ground, and leaving the animal quietly to crop the scanty herbage on the common.

"Spare my life," he moaned, "and ask me what you like. I will tell you everything. Only spare my life!"

"Why did you assume the name of Turpin?"

"Because—I—found—that it frightened people, and so they let me rob them when otherwise they wouldn't."

"How comes it that you have given information concerning me to several people?"

"I—only—slightly—mentioned——"

"Come—come; let us have no prevarication. You gave certain information concerning my movements: why did you do so?"

"I will tell the truth. I was afraid of meeting you about this neighbourhood, and thought it would be a good thing to frighten you away to some other road—that was all."

"But your information—how did you procure it, for it has been strangely correct?"

"There is a girl named Lucy—you knew her once?"

"Ah!"

"Yes; she was your girl once, you know, Claude Duval, and when you cast her off, you thought she came by her death; but she didn't, and she is now with me; but she don't, and she won't forget you; and she says she will never rest until she sees you hung. She dogs you as much as she can, and when she knows anything she sets the officers after you. I warn you to beware of her, Claude Duval, for the passion of a jealous woman knows no bounds. This that I tell you you may rely upon. It is the whole truth."

"By Heaven," said Claude, "it must be so! It has the aspect of truth about it. Tell me—what does she know of me?"

"She knows, she says, that you are married, though I tell her that it is not very likely, because——" (Claude made an impatient gesture.) "Well, she says you are married, and I believe, if she could get at your wife, she would take her life."

Claude staggered a little.

"Do you hear that, Jack?" he said in a whisper.

"I do, Claude; and a bitter thing it is to hear."

"Very—very, Jack. What can I do?"

"Above all things, Claude, do not let the man see that you are so keenly touched by what he has told you."

"But you believe it, Jack?"

"I do. There is, I think, something about truth that carries conviction with it. I do not think he has deceived. In his fear he has spoken out the exact truth, Claude, and it is well that you know it."

"And yet I was happy in knowing it not. But no matter—no matter. He has, by truth-telling, disarmed me of all resentment against him now. I will speak to him again."

Claude turned away from his brief conference with Jack, and again addressed the man.

"My friend, I believe that which you have told me; and because I do believe it, I hold no enmity against you for what has passed. I advise you, for the future, not to take the name of Turpin, for he is a man of rather sudden and fierce temper, and should he encounter you, and know that you have played him such a trick, I would not give much for your life. So much I say to you in the way of advice."

"I thank you, Duval. I will no more personate Turpin. I am very much obliged to you. I was not always the disreputable devil that I am now."

"I don't think you were. Your language has a smack in it of something better."

"You are right. There was a time when—But, no matter. I am what I am, and to think even of the past, is like planting daggers in my heart. I have no friend in all the world now."

"You may make one in me if you like."

"May I indeed? Do you really mean it?"

"From my soul I do."

A change came over the face of the man, and he was evidently too much affected for some few moments to speak. Then he held out his hand, and in choking accents, he said—

'Will you take it?"

"Freely," said Claude, as he clasped it in his own. "Most freely. And now that we understand each other, tell me how I can serve you?"

"No way at present, Duval; but I can, I hope, serve you by keeping such a watch upon Lucy, that she shall have no opportunity of doing any harm to one whom I can easily imagine you value before all the world. That I think I can do for you, Claude Duval; and this, so help me Heaven, I will do for you."

CHAPTER CLXXXI.

CLAUDE SEEKS THE RETREAT OF LUCY.—THE LONE HUT ON THE HEATH.

Claude looked very serious for a few moments, and then he said—

"I have that degree of faith in what a madly jealous woman may do, that I shall not be easy until I see Lucy myself and speak to her."

"That you can do."

"Tell me, then, where I may be sure to find her."

"I will so describe the place to you that you cannot miss it. There is upon Hounslow Heath a pond, and near to it an old barn, with the roof blown off."

"I know it."

"Well, a few paces from that barn there is a cottage with a very small patch of garden-ground reclaimed from the heath, and there you will find her. But I would like to know when you purpose coming, for I would take care she shall be at home to receive you."

"I beg you," said Claude, "not to give her the slightest hint of my coming, as that would spoil all."

"Depend upon me, I will not."

"Then to-night, during the hours between twelve and one, expect me. If I get the girl's promise to rid herself of her wild resolve, I shall be satisfied, for I do not think she would break such a promise made to me."

"I am afraid, Duval, you do not know her so well as I do. While she thought herself yours, no doubt her behaviour to you was gentle enough; but now she is a very devil incarnate."

"Well—well, I will see her, and try what kind words will do, and if they will not, my duty to others calls upon me to adopt some course that will protect her, who is best of all entitled to my protection."

Duval and Jack very shortly then took leave of their new friend; and when they were alone again, Jack said, with much earnestness of manner—

"Take care of yourself, Claude, when you visit that girl, for at the sight of you in the bitterness of her rage she may try to do you a mischief."

"I will be careful, Jack. I must confess that her threats against Cicely fill me with uneasiness. But I will come to some conclusions upon that matter to-night. Ah, whom have we here now?"

Two persons on horseback, a lady and a gentleman, approached. The lady was young and handsome, but the gentleman in every part of his attire, and even in the manner in which he sat on his horse and held the bridle, showed the coxcomb. As he approached Claude and Jack, he put an eye-glass to his eye, where, by a curious contraction of the muscles, he held it fast, and glared at them both for a moment or two in silence.

Jack was, or this exquisite fancied that he was, in his way slightly, so he drawled out—

"Fellow, get out of the world, will you! Don't answer me—I can't hold any conversation with the lower classes. I think they ought all to be put out of the world. Out of the way, fellow."

"Did you address me?" said Jack.

"Ah, he speaks. Out of the way, fellow, and don't let me hear your horrid low class voice."

"Don't be angry, Jack," said Claude, laughing as he saw the colour mounting to Jack's cheek. "Dont be angry; he is only a curiosity. You should never be annoyed at any animal following its vocation, and its natural impulses, Jack. Men are men, apes are apes, as you see by the specimen before you."

"Good God," cried the exquisite. "I shall have to finish this fellow. Stand aside, my dear Helen, while I send him into another world."

With this the conceited personage drew a remarkably slender sword, and made a flourish with it in the air, no doubt fully expecting that Jack would start back in alarm; but when he found that such was not the case, but that with his hand raised, Jack watched him steadily, he said—

"Fellow, I will spare your life. It my be useful to you, fellow, so I shall spare it. Pass on, pass on, fellow. Low man, you are spared."

Claude was very much amused at what was going on, and probably much more so on account of the evident rage that Jack was in; a rage which he had the greatest difficulty in keeping under, but of the existence of which the dandified personage who had provoked it, did not seem to have the least idea.

"Are you going to get out of the way, fellow?"

"No," said Jack.

"Oh, ah. Then I shall go round, for nothing can be so very horrid, after all, when one comes to think, as to touch a low person, even if one has his own gloves on."

"You really think so?"

"Come on, Frederick, come on," said the young lady, most imploringly. "Why will you thus insult quiet people on the highway? Gentlemen, think nothing of it. Come on, Frederick, come on."

"But I do think something of it," said Jack.

"For my sake, I hope you will not," added the young lady; "now, Frederick, I hope this will be a lesson to you."

"For your sake I will forego," said Jack, "my just resentment in its full extent; but unless this coxcomb asks my pardon, he shall not pass me with his head on."

"My—head? Ah!"

"Yes, your head. I don't expect to find anything in it, tbu I'll knock it off if you don't ask pardon."

"Oh, I couldn't—I shall have to slaughter you, fellow, after all. I shall have to send you to another world."

With this the coxcomb made another intimidating flourishing of his sword, and Jack dashed at him, and took it from him in a moment. The young lady screamed, and Claude, as he hurried up to her, cried out—

"Moderation, Jack, moderation."

Upon which Jack only broke the sword in two, and flung the pieces in the owner's face.

"Do not be alarmed," said Claude to the young lady, "but you will act very injudiciously if you lay your commands upon my friend not to humiliate Frederick. Is he your brother?"

"No—no."

"Not your husband?"

"Oh no—nor never will be. He is a cousin."

"Oh, very well. Now, Mr. Frederick, I am quite sure all that my friend requires of you is to dismount, beg pardon on your knees, or else I assure you he is just the man to blow your brains out."

"Which I would rather do at once," said Jack, "and have no more bother about it."

"Murder!—blow my brains out?"

"Yes, if you have any. You prefer it, I see," added Jack, and he took a pistol from his pocket, and began to examine the priming very carefully indeed. Upon this, the dandified gentleman was so stunned, that he slipped off his horse, and plumped down upon his knees in the mire of the road, crying—

"Oh, ah! I beg pardon."

"Very good," said Jack. "Now, as far as I am concerned, you may pass on. What my friend may have to say to you is quite another affair, sir."

"I am not at all offended," said Claude, "and shall merely treat the gentleman professionally. Your money, watch, and jewels, sir, if you please, unless you prefer me taking them from your insensible carcass, after I have placed a couple of slugs in your skull."

"A highwayman, by Jupiter!" gasped the dandy.

"Exactly so," said Claude. "Be quick, sir."

In a moment a well-filled purse, a watch, and some rings, were, with an amount of nervous trepidation quite ludicrous to behold, handed to Claude, and the young lady said—

"I have nothing but a small watch, which is not of much value. Here it is, sir."

Claude bowed, as he said—

"I pray you not to do me the injustice of supposing that I could take it from you. I am only vexed to find so much beauty in such indifferent company."

"You are Claude Duval?" said the young lady.

"I am; but I do not know how you could be aware of that fact. I do not, however, deny it."

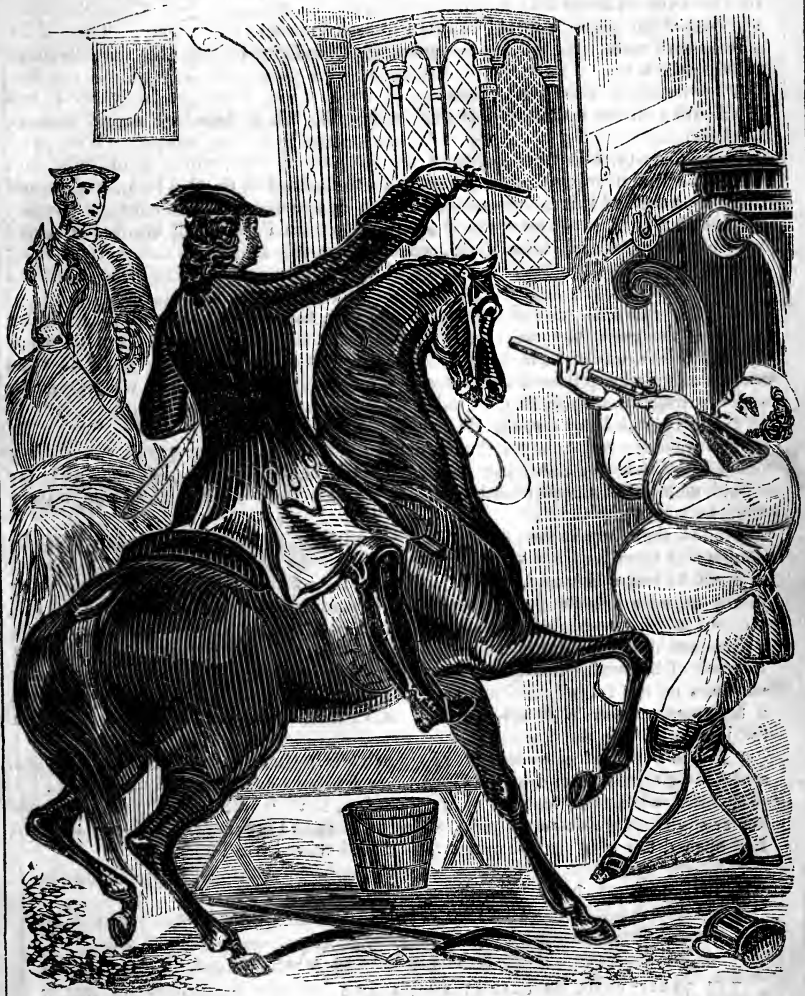
"I guesssd it from your manner, sir. A lady of my acquaintance was permitted by you to retain her watch in the same way that you permit me to keep mine, and so I made a guess which turns out to be correct. I hope I may ask of you the favour to let this young man go without any injury or any practical joke being played off upon him."

"Certainly. He is free as air. Jack, you have done with your friend, I suppose, now?"

"Quite so," said Jack. "He is too contemptible to have anything further to do with. Let him go."

"I would prefer," added Claude, as he bowed again to the young lady, "that the knowledge of my name should remain in your own breast."

A glance at the exquisite let the young lady know what Claude meant, and she bowed in acquiescence.



"Now sir," said Claude, "mount and be off, for we don't want your company on the road any longer."

Upon this, feeling quite happy to get off so well as he was, the dandy mounted again, and minus his sword, watch, purse, and rings, left the spot, accompanied by the young lady, who at the last moment looked her thanks for his being let go so easily, considering all things. When they were gone, Claude, despite the many anxieties that were then passing upon his mind, could not help laughing very heartily at the scene that had taken place; and after a time, Jack, although he really at the moment had been very much provoked, could not help joining in the laugh.

"Well, Claude," he said, "it was ridiculous."

"Most essentially so, Jack, and I really believe that if I had not been here to cry out moderation to you, you would have actually demolished that unfortunate young man, who, after all, was more ridiculous than noxious."

"I ought only to have laughed at him."

"Nay, Jack, I will not go quite so far as that. I think that in breaking his sword you served him quite right, but that was enough. And now until the time shall come for me to keep my appointment with our new friend, who will enable me to have a meeting with Lucy, I will go to the farm and pass a short time with Cicely. We are sure of a cordial welcome there."

"With pleasure," said Jack.

The fact is that Jack always lived in the hope that the time would yet come when Claude would find a means of quitting the perilous and most nervous profession, if it might be so called, in which he was engaged; and he, Jack, thought that if anything more than another could put such thoughts into Claude's head, and keep them there, it would be often to seek the society of Cicely. Thus, Jack was almost more than willing to encourage Claude in turning his horse's head towards the farm.

They both knew the bit of country in which they were amazingly well, and it was after all but a sharp trot of half an hour to bring them to Ealing Common, in the immediate neighbourhood of which was the place they sought. With great joy and alacrity, Claude dived down the little shady lane, which would take him by the back and unfrequented route across the meadows to the farm, and he and Jack soon passed through a well-known gap in a hedge, and made for the friendly shelter of that roof, beneath which poor Cicely found as much comfort as could possibly be hers in this world, considering the many anxieties that must naturally continually possess her upon Claude's account, knowing as she did the perilous life he led.

If Cicely had not chanced to be, as she was, the companion of Claude, during some of the most perilous of the scenes connected with his attempt to leave England, she would have been much more urgent to him than she now even was to abandon a course of life which was so full of perils. But whenever she did say much upon the subject, Claude had a ready answer by saying—

"Cicely, did I not try, and do you remember the result?"

Too well she remembered that result; and when he did so speak, the gloomy aisles of Winchester Cathedral would rise up before her imagination, and she would shudder at the recollection of the awful scenes of bloodshed and misery she had then gone through.

Hence, then, was it that poor Cicely led a life of continual anxieties, beset by doubts and fears, and not knowing whether to urge Claude to make yet another attempt to leave England, or to let him be for awhile, until some opportunity might arise to promise him a complete emancipation from his course of life, without any of the perils he had encountered in attempting before to leave it.

She had not seen him now for some days, and she had got naturally anxious to know of his welfare. When, therefore, upon glancing from one of the upper windows of the farm-house, she saw him and Jack leading their horses though a little gate from a small paddock into the farm-yard, her heart leaped for joy.

"He is yet safe," she said. "He is yet safe. Heaven has heard my prayers, and he is guarded from death. Once more I behold him free and unharmed!"

So intense were her feelings of gratification, that it was some few moments before she could go down stairs to welcome him, and previously to doing so, she had opened the window and called to him and waved her hand.

CHAPTER CLXXXII.

THE GREAT PERIL OF CLAUDE AMONG THE GIPSIES ON HOUNSLOW HEATH.

CLAUDE DUVAL had some happy moments of his life. One of them certainly was when he saw Cicely's face at the window, radiant with delight at seeing him.

"Well?" he cried. "Well?"

"Yes, Claude; and you?"

"Oh, yes!"

She disappeared from the window, and in the course of the next few moments was in his arms, and sobbing upon his breast.

"So you are quite well, Claude, and you are not hurt—you are sure you are not hurt? You have perhaps been in great danger though, while I was safe and secure. Ah! no I was not secure. I never am secure except I am thus—thus, Claude, close to you, and with the full assurance at my heart that you are not snatched from me by any unexpected blow of fate."

"And I, Cicely, am never happy except when I can look into your eyes, and know that I am with you; and feel that you are all my own."

"And you will, neither of you," said Jack, "ever be quite happy until the sea rolls between you and England."

"That is true," said Cicely. "Do you hear it, Claude?"

"I do hear it; and well I know that both you and Jack wish for nothing in the world so much as my happiness and safety; but we will not talk of this now. Neither time nor place are fitting."

"Come in, then," said Cicely, "come into the house. There is an old friend there waiting to see you."

"A visitor?"

"Yes; one who has come on purpose to see you, but who would have left this evening without doing so if you had not chanced to come."

"Tell me who it is, Cicely. I hope you have not been indiscreet enough to take any artful stranger into your confidence? There are many who if they did but know where to find you, would come to you under the pretence of knowing me."

"But this one really knows you. It is my brother."

"Mark Brereton?"

"Yes. It is he, Claude, and with him you know you are quite safe. Is it not so?"

"Yes, indeed; but I thought that he was very far away by this time, indeed."

"And so did I, Claude, and so did everybody; but here he comes himself to speak to you, and you may see by his looks how very glad he is to see you. It is partly for my sake, Claude, and partly because he says he cannot help liking you, whether he would or not. Mark, here is Claude."

These two men, with such dissimilar habits and pursuits, met and shook hands most warmly; nothing attaches men so much together as having passed through serious dangers in each others company, and Heaven knows that Mark Brereton had by the merest accidents and freaks of fortune, been thrown into many strange situations with Claude Duval, and he had had, consequently, opportunities of observing what a fine spirit was lost to some worthy career when he, Duval, took to the road.

"And so you are among us again?" said Claude.

"I am. I could not rest until I had seen you and Cicely; and believe me I am not a little pleased to see that you are so well, as you seem to be."

"I am quite well. And you? I fancy I see an improvement in your looks. It is so, is it not?"

"Oh, yes. My health is better. I have been travelling, and that, I find, is always beneficial to me. But I really began to think that I should have great trouble in finding you. I consider your dropping in here to be quite providential."

"Ah, Mark, if you had chosen to stay here a little longer, you might be sure of seeing me here. I only stay away when I cannot help it, and as soon as I feel myself with some hours of liberty upon my hands, my thoughts fly here, and I fly after them."

"I do not doubt it."

They all entered the house together, and then the farmer and his family began to welcome Claude in the warm and kind-hearted manner with which they always greeted him; and in answer to his inquiries, they said that since the little fracas with the parson, of which Claude was quite cognisant, they had not met with any annoyance from any quarter whatever, but lived in perfect peace and security, feeling quite sure that the reverend gentleman had so far kept his word towards them.

All this was pleasant enough news for Claude to hear, and turning to Brereton, he said—

"If all the world would be kind enough to forget me, and allow me to live in such a place as this, the quiet life of a lover of the country and of country pursuits, I should be one of the happiest of men. But they will not. No! Nothing makes the world so angry as any attempt to escape from it; and if you do but try it, slander will be busy with the past, and there are hundreds who will raise the hue-and-cry after you from very wantonness and mischief-loving."

"That is but too true," said Brereton.

"I have found it so, my friend," added Claude. "But we will not sadden any of the joy of this happy meeting by such reflections. The evening is but creeping on, and it will be midnight before I need leave you."

"Leave at midnight?" said Cicely.

"Yes, dearest, I have an appointment with a friend which I hope will not occupy me more than two hours, and if not, I will return here again, But I cannot swear to be back to night again."

"Ah, Claude, your visits are indeed to me like angels; few, and far between."

"Nay," said Claude, with a smile, "but what I am going upon is real business, which ought not to be neglected, as I will convince your brother. Mark, when I tell him; and you will not ask me what it is, I know, Cicely, if I do not freely volunteer to tell you."

"No, Claude, I will not."

"A model of a wife." said Jack, with a smile. "There is but one Cicely in the world, or I think that, tattered by fortune as I am, I might almost yet venture upon matrimony. What say you, Mr. Brereton?"

"You might do worse, Jack."

Claude stepped apart with Brereton, and told him evidently what he was going about at midnight, upon which Brereton replied that he ought not to go alone, and at once proffered his own services to accompany him, adding, that he and Jack would be company for each other while waiting for him, Claude, and that in case of any treachery or unforeseen danger, they could be close at hand to render him effectual assistance.

"I do not anticipate," said Claude, "the slightest peril, for I have ample faith in the man who gave me my information, and who might with the greatest ease have withheld it from me. But if you choose to come, I will not say no. You have a horse here, I suppose?"

"Yes, and a good one too."

"Be it so then; and Jack, who, as a matter of course, will follow me, will be glad enough of your company, and for the matter of that we can all ride together to the common."

"We can, and I sincerely hope, for all our sakes, you will be able to ward off any threatened danger from the desperate woman you mention. The passions of such persons are dangerous alike to themselves and to others."

"It shall be done," said Claude.

We must not follow the conversation that took place at the farm-house now, further than to say that it was of a most friendly and affectionate character among all these assembled, until Claude, upon hearing the old kitchen clock strike twelve, rose and said it was his time to go.

Upon this, both Brereton and Jack rose likewise, and although the cause of his absence at such an hour happened to be one which Claude did not like to explain to Cicely, she felt tolerably satisfied upon finding that Jack and her brother were going with him. He promised to get back with all the expedition in his power, and the fact of Mark Brereton accompanying him was of itself sufficient to assure her that it was no perilous, marauding adventure he was going on, for had such been the case she well knew that Brereton would have nothing to do with it.

The night was more than usually dark, and neither Claude nor his companion could have had much chance of reaching the high road, had not one of the family from the farm-house come with them as a guide that far. The young man who accompanied them led Claude's horse, and the rest followed until they were on the high road that goes along Ealing Common.

"Ah," said Duval, "I know where I am now. I could find my way where I am going blindfolded, if it were at all necessary, so well do I know every inch of it, and every tree, and every turning and winding it can take."

"Then I will leave you now," said the young man.

"You may, my friend, and I thank you for coming so far with me. I hope to be back at the farm in two hours. Now, my friends, a sharp trop will very soon take us to Hounslow Heath."

They all three set off at a trot that got over the ground very quickly, for the horses had been well seen to at the farm, and were consequently in first-rate condition. It seemed as though they reached Hounslow Heath in an incredibly short space of time; and when Claude suddenly cried out—

"Here we are."

Brereton said, "Where?"

"Why, on the heath," said Claude.

"Indeed! You must have brought us by a very near route in good truth, Duval,"

"Yes, both Jack and I know the way pretty well. But now, my friends, I will, if you please, go forward alone, and you can easily keep quietly in the neighbourhood of the spot to which I am bound. Jack, you know it well enough?"

"I do," said Jack; "but let us agree upon some signal, which if we hear will be a hint to us to ride up."

"Very well. If you hear a pistol shot, you may safely enough conclude that your presence will not be amiss. But I do not for one moment anticipate any danger, only I grant always that it is best to be prepared for the very worst that may happen."

"Unquestionably," said Brereton; "so we shall listen for the signal with the hope of not hearing it, for it will be much better if you are able to settle the affair amicably, Claude."

"Much, indeed. Farewell now for a brief space, I think, only. Yonder lies my route."

With this Claude rode off, and was in avery few moments completely lost to all view in the dense obscurity of the night, that seemed to hang over the heath like a funeral fall.

Before he had proceeded very far on his road, which he had to guess at more by instinct than anything else, he became conscious of a dullish red light some short distance ahead of him, and apparently just in the direction he was going, for it shone faintly upon the ruined barn which had been mentioned to him by the man who had personated Dick Turpin.

Claude could not conceive what this light could be, and it was so very near to the earth, too, that upon that account it still more puzzled him. While, however, he was straining his eyes to make something more of it, it suddenly disappeared.

"This, I suppose, is one of the mysteries of the heath," he said, "which probably my new friend may be able to tell me something about, when I am so fortunate as to see him."

He did not in the least relax in his speed on account of this phenomenon, and he soon felt conscious that he must have reached the old barn. He accordingly slackened the speed of his horse. He dismounted, and reaching out his hands, distinctly felt the wall of the old barn, and after a little time he found a place to which he could attach the bridle of his horse; and having done so, he went carefully on, on foot, until he suddenly, upon turning the angle of the barn, came upon the cottage, which was clearly enough observable by the light that streamed out from its little casement.

"All's right," he said, "that is the place."

He advanced rapidly, and tapped at the door with the handle of his heavily loaded whip. In a moment it was opened, and the man whom he had expected to meet stood upon the threshold.

"Ah, I am glad to see you," he said.

"Thank you," replied Claude; "is she here?"

"No, but walk in; I don't know what has come over her to-night, she has been in and out a dozen times at the least. She will be back very soon, I feel assured.

"Why, where has she got to go to?" said Claude, as he slipped into the cottage. "I don't know of another habitation within a good half-mile of this upon the heath."

"Nor I; but there are some gipsies' tents in the neighbourhood, and she seems to have struck up some sort of acquaintance with them."

"Nothing more likely," said Claude. "She always used to make a kind of joke of saying there was gipsy blood in her veins, and I suppose it was true enough. But I will wait for her, and talk to her, poor girl. I hope she will come soon."

CHAPTER CLXXXIII.

CLAUDE IS ATTACKED BY THE GIPSIES, INCITED BY LUCY.

The place in which Claude found himself now, was by no means one of the most inviting in the world. In fact, a hut more destitute of common comforts than that was, could not have been imagined.

With the meanest and poorest habitation the world ever saw, there is always a something to be done, if there is one to do it, that will give it an air of home comfort; but then again, it requires some one who loves a home to do that, and not so brooding and strange a spirit as that of the young girl whom Claude had come to see. What cared she if the cottage looked squallid or not? Her own cruel passions were all that occupied her thoughts; and having an undisguised contempt for the man who was the sharer of the wretched abode with her, it was not likely that she would even make an effort of the slightest description to bestow an air of home comfort upon the place; on the contrary, she took a gloomy and misanthropical satisfaction in it being what it was.

The walls were marked with unwholesome damps; a glimmering fire was upon the hearth, and the sole furniture consisted of a broken-down deal table, and some apologies for chairs. In one corner was some course pieces of board nailed up so as to make something resembling shelves, upon which some cracked and chipped pieces of crockery were placed; and another corner had partially hiding it a kind of curtain hung to a cord, but it was so blackened by age, that its material could not be defined. The floor was sanded, and as that had been freshly done, the material being in abundance upon the heath, that portion of the wretched dwelling looked better than any other.

"This is a sorry place, Claude Duval, to introduce you to," said the man.

"It certainly is not a palace, my friend. You don't seem to find the road very profitable?"

"I don't know. I dare say it's as good to me as most, always excepting such as yourself. But she won't let me be comfortable. Oh, she's a hard bargain."

"Why don't you leave her, then?"

"Well, somehow or another, I have got used to the girl, and when I do come here, I like even to have her to talk to, in preference to nobody. But she might make the crib a little tidier."

"Truly, she might, my friend. What is that?"

A faint low whistle had sounded from without, and Claude rose from the rather insecure chair upon which he had seated himself at the request of the man.

'It's some of the gipsies, I'll be bound. They are, as I mentioned to you, Claude Duval, in the neighbourhood, and it's odd but that they are up to some game or another. I will just pop out for a few moments, and see what they ar e about, if you like."

"Do so; and if you can see Lucy, tell her that I am here, and would fain speak with her."

"I will."

Any one less confident in his own resources, and more suspicious of foul play than Claude Duval, would have hesitated about permitting the man to leave the hut so immediately upon an apparent signal being made from the outside; but Claude took no notice of such little matters, unless he had very good reason indeed to feel this importance, nor was he wrong in the confidence he put in his new friend, as will quickly enough appear.

"For the sake of Cicely, whose safety is so very dear to me," said Claude to himself, as he glanced round the wretched hut, "I must say all I can say to the poor girl who calls this her home. I would that I could see her. Ah! that whistle again. What can it mean?"

The door of the hut was opened a little way, and the head and face of a man looked in. It did not require more than the most hasty glance to let Claude see that he was one of the gipsies.

"Izra," said the stranger. "Where are you now, girl?" and then observing Claude by the miserable light that was upon the table, he shaded his eyes for a moment with his hands and cried—"Who are you? You ain't the usual fox that is in the old lair?"

"Do you wish particularly to know who I am?" said Claude; "for if you do not I prefer keeping that news to myself."

With a short impatient growl the stranger withdrew his head, and banged the front door shut again.

Claude, as a measure of ordinary precaution, looked at his pistols, for well he knew the extreme jealously with which the gipsies looked upon any one whom they could have the slightest reason to suppose was a spy upon them; and that they held human life under such circumstance cheap enough, he was likewise well aware. The man upon whose good faith he placed reliance, had been gone rather an unreasonable time, and Claude was upon the point of thinking he might as well sally out into the night air to make his own observations, when the door of the hut was hastily opened, and the man appeared.

"Have you seen her?" said Claude.

"I have—she comes. At the mention of your name she was furious, and I thought she would have struck me to the earth. She vows that she will have vengeance against you."

"Pho! pho!"

"You do not fear her?"

"I fear her? My friend, you know less of me then I thought you did, if you fancy that I fear her. I have come here to subdue her—to frighten her; and I will do it."

"If you do frighten her," said the man, "you will be a match for any one, be they ever so mad. But hark! I hear her footseps on the heath. She comes!"

"Tell me," said Claude quickly. "Has she seen the gipsies since you told her I was here?"

"One man she has seen and held some discourse with, but I know not the subject of it."

"Well, it matters not. Leave us together for a short time, my friend, when she comes here, but be within call, and you may be within hearing too. Indeed, I would rather you were."

"She don't know I am here. I will hide behind yon curtain if you like."

"Do so. Juick! I hear her coming."

The footpad, for such was his real vocation, had only just time to conceal himself behind the curtain in the corner of the hut, when the door was flung violently open, and Lucy sprang into the little room. Claude never moved from his seat which he had occupied again, but he let her come right up to him, and waited patiently for what she might choose to say. Her anger and impatience soon found words, and in a voice of fury she shouted rather than said—

"So, Claude Duval, you have come here to make me a present of your life, have you? Fool! Where is your boasted cleverness now? Idiot, you are at my mercy now! Ha! ha! Yes, the famous Claude Duval is at my mercy!"

Claude slowly pointed to the open door of the hut, and in a cold, calm voice, he said—

"Shut that door!"

"What!" she cried. "You dare to address me in such a tone! You dare to do it!"

"Shut that door!"

"Ha! ha! You order me!"

"Shut that door, woman!"

She shrunk back evidently cowed, and with a forced laugh she said, as she closed the door—

"Well, perhaps one don't want all the world to hear what one says—that's all. There, the door is shut. What do you want with me, Claude Duval?"

"Much."

"Say it, then. Oh, I ain't to be cowed and beaten down by you. No. Those times are past long since, I should think. I will have my revenge. Come, speak to me. What do you want, now that you have taken all the trouble to find me out?"

"Trouble I have not taken," said Claude. "I was told where you were, and I came, so that it has not cost me any trouble. Sit down, Lucy."

"No, I will stand."

"But I say you shall sit down. Do you dare to stand when I tell you to sit down?"

She dropped into one of the miserable seats, and with a growl she added—

"There, then, I am sitting down. What do you want now?"

"Is it true, or is it false, that you have uttered threats against my wife?"

"Your wife—wife! Ha, ha! That is good, indeed. So you come here to try to persuade me that you are married, do you?"

"It is true; and if you contradict me again, I will send your head through that wall. Answer me that which I ask of you. I want none of your comments. Is it true that you have uttered threats against my wife?"

"Yes: and what then?"

"Why, then, you shall retract them, and upon your knees you shall take a solemn oath (I know that you are superstitious) that you will never raise hand to do her harm. That is my errand here, and I will fulfil it."

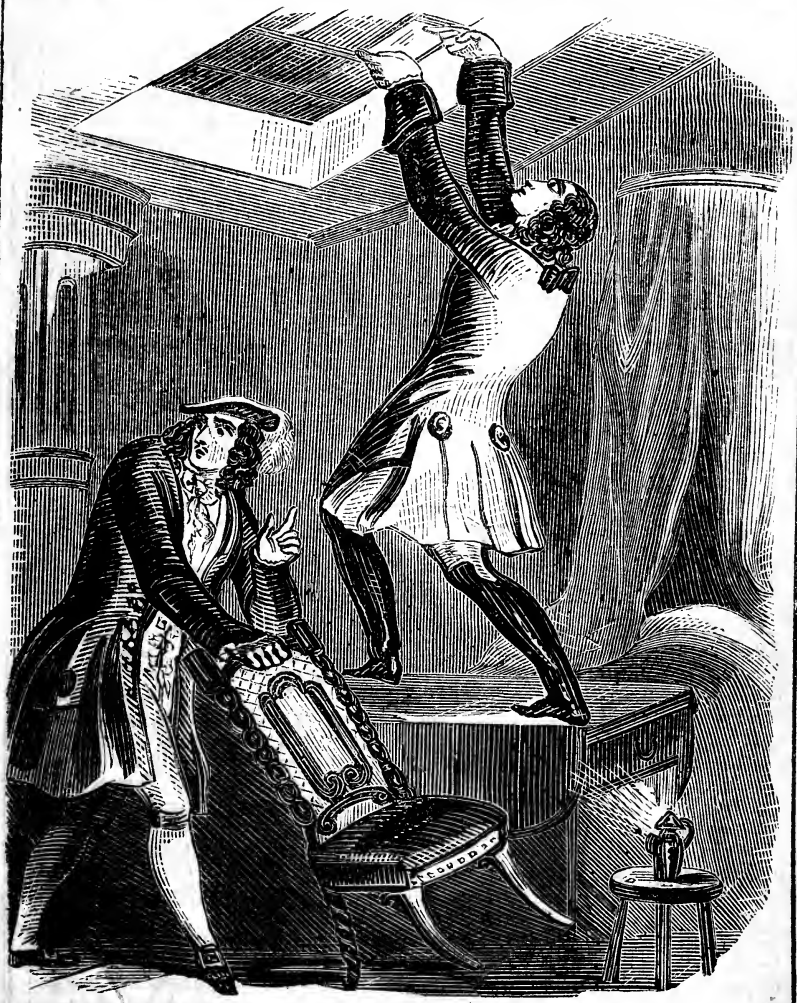
"Indeed!"

"Yes, Lucy. I thought you knew enough of me to be aware that I was a man likely to keep my word, even in so small an affair as this."

The girl looked at him for a few moments in silence, and then, in a deep, solemn tone, she said—

"Will you swear to me, by all your hopes here and hereafter, that you are really married?"

"I will. But I think my word ought to have amply sufficed. Yet I most solemnly swear it."



She shook as if moved by some strong convulsions, and then in a high croaked tone she spoke—

"Claude Duval, there was a time when you affected to love me—when you told me that no eyes were so bright as mine—when you cajoled me to be yours by the promise that our union, although it was not ratified by the ceremony of the church, should be eternal. There was a time when I was to you everything—when at my request you would come and go, and be as kind as a summer's day was long."

"Well?"

"Can you hear me talk in such a strain, Claude Duval, and say nothing but 'Well' in reply to me? Can you sit and look upon my ruined face, and look the while so calm, when you know you made me what I am?"

"Lucy, you know that that is false; I did not make you what you are. Do not attribute it to me. You know well that I lifted you from much misery and degradation to make you my companion. That you did not continue to be such, was owing wholly to your own stormy passions. But this is a profitless discussion, and one that it is folly for us to engage in. I came for another purpose."

"Then I tell you, Duval, that you will not accomplish that other purpose."

"So you say?"

"Ay, and so it will be. I have sworn that I would be revenged upon her who has taken you from me, and I will be so revenged. But for her the time would have come when I might again have been with you; but your marriage places all that aside, and I know that it may not be. Therefore it is, that as I am wretched, you shall be wretched."

"Miserable woman, can you possibly find any sort of gratification in such insensate raving?"

"It is not raving. It is the truth."

"You know that it is not. You know well that I am not one to be trifled with, and that if I for one moment really thought there was any danger to her whom I love to be apprehended from you, I would take such measures as would thoroughly prevent you from being such an enemy to yourself, as to carry out your foolish threats. Well you know all that, and now I say to you, Lucy, make me the solemn promise that you will bear no such malicious thoughts about with you."

"I will not."

"Reflect again, foolish girl. Reflect that by my coming to ask you so much I show you that I have still some esteem left for you. Reflect, I say, before it be too late, upon my words."

"I have reflected until my brain has been on fire. I have thought until thought, too, became madness; and I tell you, Claude Duval, that if I live I must have my revenge. You can kill me if you like to do so. I do not deny your power to kill a weak girl; but my death shall sit far heavier upon your soul than my present threats."

"I give you another moment for thought."

"It is useless; had I an age for thought, the result would be the same; I could not—I would not alter my determination. It is made, and it is fixed as though it held to my heart with iron grappling-hooks. I will have revenge!"

CHAPTER CLXXXIV.

CLAUDE FINDS HOUNSLOW-HEATH TO BE WELL PEOPLED.

Up to this point, it would almost seem that Claude had had some faint hopes of being able to turn the infuriated girl from her purpose; but now he looked upon that hope as gone; and he could not but see that she was madly wedded to it. The idea of taking her life, or of doing her the least bodily mischief, never came into his imagination for a moment, but he had concocted a plan of operations as regarded her, if he found her in the temper that he did, which, however, reluctant under ordinary circumstances he would be to carry out, he yet felt was his only resource. He knew that there was not far from the high-road of Hammersmith a private mad-house, the keeper of which was unscrupulous enough to detain every one who was well paid for, without being particular either as to the amount of madness, or the nature of the authority under which he held them; and it was to that establishment that Claude thought himself authorised to take Lucy; provided he found her in such a state of mind as would be decidedly inimical to the safety of Cicely.

It would seem, however, as if the poor creature had seen by the expression of his eye, that he intended something that would be prejudicial to her life or liberty, for suddenly starting up before he could move from his seat, she darted from the cottage, saying, as she went, something in the gipsy tongue, which to Claude was perfectly incomprehensible.

The man came out from his place of retreat behind the curtain, and said at once—

"Go, Claude, from her. Make speed and insure your safety. There is upon the Heath a large party of gipsies, and if she gets them to side with her, they are capable of committing any act of desperation or of blood!"

"I will not leave her thus."

"Nay, what more can you say or do now, than you have said and done already? Leave her to me, Claude Duval, and I may find perhaps some opportunity of speaking to her, when she is calmer. Besides, you should always reflect that an angry woman says much more than she means."

"I have reflected upon that. But this girl is mad, I can see she is, or why at such a time as this, when all sort of connection with me has long since been forgotten, should she become so furious?"

As Claude spoke there came upon the night air a strange low moaning sound, and he looked at the man for an explanation of it.

"It is the gathering of the gipsies," he said. "I know their habits and feelings well, for I have lived with several of the largest tribes. Heaven only knows what that maddened girl may say to them, to stir their hatred against you. I tell you, Duval, you are anything but safe here."

"And yet I shall remain."

"It is madness."

"No, not so. I have friends within call whom I can summon to my side. When I begin an adventure I like to go through with it, and this one is anything but satisfactorily settled as yet. I am not without hope of getting Lucy to a better disposition."

"You do not know her then so well as I do. As well might you attempt to make the stoutest oak of the forest bow before your breath, as get that girl to listen to reason, when her passion tells her to be unreasonable."

"She is changed, but yet she is human."

"Hark! The moaning sound continues. It is the peculiar sound made by the gipsies, when they are meeting under the impulse of some strong excitement. Again I urge you to seek safety in flight. Come this way. I can take you out by another way from the hut, and you can seek your friends."

"Urge me no more. I cannot think there is much danger. Surely the lawless people who live such a life of wandering and defiance of the rest of the community cannot feel much more than sympathy with one of my profession, and they have sense enough, I should fancy, not to pay much attention to the ravings of a jealous girl. I should scarcely forgive myself, my friend, if I were to fly from such a danger as this. Compose yourself and trust to me, that so far as regards my personal safety, all will be well; at the same time, let me thank you for your kind solicitude and assure you that I feel it deeply."

"It is so much my doing your being here at all, that I should feel myself almost like your murderer should anything disastrous happen to you. But since you will stay, remember that I will stand or fall by you, and that you may depend upon me, let the emergency be what it may."

"I know it, and will do so. They come."

A strange half-suppressed kind of shout now arose in the night air from the outside of the hut, and through the chinks, which were sufficiently numerous, in the walls, there came the red glare of torches. Claude took care to keep as near the centre of the place as possible, so that he might not be taken by surprise by any one, for the walls were quite frail enough to enable anybody who might wish to get into the wretched building in that way to push right through at any part. It did not at the moment occur to Claude that the roof might be in worse condition still, and he was at the moment rather startled to hear a sudden crash accompanied by a rushing noise, and to find a man alight close to him from the old thatch.

The gipsy's features, the long black dishevelled air, and the sparkling eyes, at once told Claude that it was one of the lawless race that stood before him with a knife in his hand.

"Die!" cried the gipsy. "Die, enemy of the child of our race."

Claude sprang upon him in a moment.

"My friend," he said, "you mistook the roof for the door, and I never allow any one to come in where I am, without knocking first. Pray tell your friends outside as much, if you please."

As he spoke, Claude made one of those tremendous efforts of strength, which at times only, and under extraordinary circumstances, he thought proper to exert. He lifted the gipsy to the height of some six feet from the floor, and then dashed him like a shot head-foremost through the little casement of the hut, and the force with which he went was so great that it had all the appearance as though he had been projected by some powerful mechanical means.

The gipsy raised a loud shriek as he went thus unceremoniously out of the hut, that he thought he had so very cleverly got into.

"You have killed him!" said the man.

"Possibly, but those fellows take a deal of killing. I very much doubt if he is other than a little hurt by the broken glass of the window, and you may depend that he alighted on his feet. Gipsies and cats always do—begging the pardon of cats for the association."

"You are a strange man, Claude; but look to your arms."

"All's right, I have a couple of pairs of pistols that I know I can depend upon. How are you provided in that particular?"

"Very well indeed. But you spoke of your friends; are they far off, or can you summon them at a moment or two's notice?"

"They are close at hand. At the first pistol shot that is fired by either party they will make their appearance; I shall not fire it unless urged by some uncommon necessity so to do, and I beg that you will be as feeling as you can."

"I will—I will!"

The low shout of the gipsies again came upon their ears, and in the course of a few moments some one tapped at the door of the hut. The man was about to answer it, but Claude said, "Permit me," and then in a clear unembarrassed voice he cried—

"Who is there?"

"One who demands admission," said a voice.

"Take it then. The door is on the latch. What hinders you, except fear? The fear that always besets men upon a bad errand. Why do you not come in?"

The door was opened, and a tall dusky-looking man in a tattered cloak appeared upon the threshold.

"Claude Duval," he said, "we know you."

"Then you have the advantage of me," said Claude, "and I do not at all envy you it, for I am not by any means solicitous for your acquaintance."

"Peace," said the tall gipsy. "This trifling as ill becomes me as it does you. I come with a demand."

"Make it then."

"You must repudiate her whom you call your wife, and you must take again to your home and to your affections, by such ceremonies as we may think proper, her whom you have discarded, and who is one of our people. That is the sentence of our tribe; and if you refuse, the bitter consequences must fall upon your own head."

"And pray what may those consequences be?" said Claude.

"Death!"

"Then my dingy-looking friend, I differ very much from you; and if you are the ambassador of your tribe, you can go back to it, and say that I am married already, and that if I were not, I should at once and most unhesitatingly decline any of their ceremonies or any of their people. If, as I suspect, you are all allowing yourselves to be stirred up to this folly by a girl who calls herself Lucy, I can only say, that you don't any of you know her half so well as she is known upon the pave of London; and the very best and most creditable thing you can all do concerning her, is to disown the connection, for it will bring upon you all nothing but disgrace and trouble."

"False wretch!" cried a female voice, and an old woman with long matted hair and a tattered red cloak about her, rushed into the hut. "False villain! she whom you speak of is my child, and she is as virtuous as she is beautiful. It is you only, who have led her into the paths of vice; and repugnant as we are to an union with a stranger, you shall, according to our forms, wed her."

"Madam," said Claude, "the less we say of the virtue of your daughter, the better. The subject is a very ticklish one, and I sincerely advise you to drop it."

"You shall wed her! She has decided that she will be satisfied if you repudiate your wife, as you call her, and wed her. You will then be pardoned your many iniquities towards her, and from time to time we will receive you as one of us. So, rejoice—rejoice—rejoice!"

Claude could hardly help laughing at the inflated manner of the old woman; and when she told him, with the air of some ancient priestess, striking a grand attitude at the same time, to rejoice, she certainly got the better of his gravity altogether, and he laughed outright.

The old gipsy woman gave a perfect yell of rage at this, but Claude raised his hand, and cried in a clear voice—

"Silence, woman! Your ridiculous denunciations and absurd inflation of language, may go down very well in some hovel, but permit me to say that I am rather a matter-of-fact personage, and that consequently, your raving has by no means the effect upon me that no doubt you wish it to have. If the foolish young woman, Lucy, is your daughter, the best advice you can possibly, as a mother, give her, is, to be quiet, and to do her best now to quell the tumult that she has been the absurd cause of raising."

"He dies! he dies!" cried the old woman. "His death shall be upon his own head! He dies! he dies!"

"Yes," said Claude, "when my time comes I shall certainly die; but not yet, I think I have a well-grounded expectation of living some time, yet. And now, in all seriousness, I warn you, and your tribe of ragamuffins, that I am a man fond of a joke in its way, but I do not like it to be carried too far, and when I begin to be serious, it is rather apt to be a serious thing for other people. This man who is with me can tell you as much of me; so I warn you, and it will be well for you and all your tribe, Lucy included, if the warning be taken in good time."

CHAPTER CLXXXV.

CLAUDE CAPTURES LUCY, AND TAKES HER TO THE ASYLUM.

The manner of Claude Duval during this most perilous adventure, probably had more effect upon the gipsies than anything he said or did. They were perfectly astounded to find, for the first time in their lives, a man who, alone, laughed at their practitional appetite for revenge; and in replying to their high-flown threats, only treated them to a little common-sense, such as they well knew the truth of, but most certainly were not in the habit of hearing.

And all that he said, too, was said in such a calm, quiet, confident air, as if their power against him was really nothing, while his against them, one would have thought was infinite.

The woman, in particular, who had thought to bear him down by hard words, and an assumption of the stage-priestess style, was evidently cowed, and if she had but had the candour to say so, she would have admitted that for once, if it were only for once, she had met her match, in meeting with one who knew how to treat with cool contempt those empty threats which only borrowed a little force from the lofty language in which they were couched.

Claude Duval knew much more of the gipsies, and of their strange habits and traditions, than they were aware of; and among other things that he knew of them, he well knew that they dreaded nothing so much as a collision with the law. It was quite a principle with them to put up with a general injury done to them, rather than provoke the regard of public opinion, and of public persons; for leading the strange vagabond life that they did, they lived in constant dread in so highly civilized and carefully cultivated a country as England, of being put down, if we may be allowed the expression.

The old gipsy women, however, although it was quite clear that she trembled before Claude, made yet another effort to obtain the mastery over him, and so accomplish her object, which was now to get rid of him as quickly as possible.

Throwing herself into an attitude as though she were quite an inspired personage, she cried—

"Ah! the spirits of another world speak to me. The dim future, like the course of some mighty river, seen from the mountain top, unfurls itself before me. My children, we will spare this man."

A yell of disappointment from the dark throng of gipsies at the door of the hut was the response to this announcement.

"Yes," added the old woman. "It must be so. Go in peace, stranger, from our people. Go in peace, I say, and never let us look upon your shadow again. Never—never!"

"No, no," cried the gipsies. "Down with him! kill him, kill him! Down with him. He has done a deed to bring shame upon our tribe. Down with him! kill him, kill him!"

"No," cried the old woman, "I say no!"

"You need not contend about me," said Claude, calmly. "I have come here for an especial purpose, and I will perform my mission."

"Fool!" cried Lucy, suddenly springing towards him, from the open door of the hut, and clutching him by the arm. "How many lives have you that you can afford to play with them thus? Let me ask you that, idiot that you are."

"Upon my word, Lucy," said Claude, "you are very complimentary; but permit me to say, that I look upon you as the fool, for you are the author of a disturbance here, that in the end these worthy people will not thank you for stirring up."

"They are my people," said Lucy, making a very faint effort indeed to imitate the manner of the old woman.

"They may," added Claude, "or they may not be your people. You may have gipsy blood in you veins, for all I know; and this anything but respectable-looking, old lady may be your mother, upon the principle that as unquestionably you had a mother, she may as well fill that situation regarding you as any other person. But I have yet to learn what all that has to do with my object here?"

"Your object is defeated," said Lucy. "This is my mother, and those whom you see and hear are my tribe. Your object, I say, is defeated. It was to threaten me—it was to frighten me from my revenge; but I will not be frightened from it. I will have revenge upon her whom you have taken to you heart, after once placing me there!"

Claude smiled.

"You laugh? A knife—a knife! I will kill him myself! He laughs at my seared and broken heart. A knife, I say! I will myself kill the man who has made me what I am, and who now scorns the gipsy's child; will no one give me the means of present vengeance? Is there no brother of my tribe who will give it to me?"

A long glittering knife was thrown on to the floor of the hut, within a few paces of where Lucy stood. With one stride Claude put his foot upon it, as he said in a loud clear voice—

"If the man who threw this knife will come here, I will throttle him for his pains."

No one come, and the dark throng of persons at the door of the miserable little place rather drew back than otherwise.

"Give me the knife," said Lucy.

"Pho! girl," cried Claude, "you are a fool; you overact your part."

He seized her by one wrist, and, although he by no means held her with any painful pressure, yet she found it as impossible to escape from that grasp as if it had been one of iron.

"He holds me!" she cried. "He wants to kill me!"

"Not at all, Lucy," said Claude, "for if such a foolish idea had ever entered my brain, I could and would have done it long ago. But I will, now that I have got you, hold you fast."

"Help! help!"

"Oh, you may shout for help as much as you please. I will take care that you shall come to no more harm, at all events, than your own obstinacy may bring upon you; but if any of your dark-skinned relations interfere with me, let them look to it, for I shall not be very particular how I retaliate."

"Mother! mother!" cried Lucy.

"Let her go," said the gipsy-woman. "We will bury the past in deep oblivion. You shall be adopted into our tribe, and Lucy, according to the mystic rites and ceremonies of our ancient race, shall be you wife."

"I decline the honour," said Claude.

"You decline?"

"Yes; I am already married, according to what probably you would call the mystic rites and ceremonies of my own people; and if I were at all inclined for a plurality of wives, I should not come here for the second one; so, with a great appreciation of the honour, I despise it."

"He contemns us!" cried the old woman.

"Vengeance! vengeance!" cried those without the hut.

"Hark, you," said Claude; "if this girl will, even now, in the presence of yourself and of her people, which she calls the savages outside, retract her mad threats against one, whom it is my inclination as much as it is my duty to protect, and will make a solemn oath that, by word or deed, she will not seek to injure her, I will depart in peace."

"No—no!" cried Lucy.

The old woman spoke, in the patois of the gipsies, to some of those who were upon the threshold of the door, and turning to Claude, she said—

"It is done—it is done. Now go."

"What is done?"

"You may go in peace, with an assurance that nothing will be attempted against the person of whom you speak."

"Is this so, Lucy?" said Claude.

"No!" cried the girl, with vehemence. "If my lips were to utter as much my heart would not. I call upon my people to avenge me upon you, and I will avenge myself upon her who stands between you and me."

"That is quite enough," said Claude.

"She knows not what she says," cried the old woman. "Passion is in her heart and brain. In a calmer hour she will think differently; I will in the meantime be answerable for her, you can take my word."

"I wish I thought I could," said Claude, "but I have always found that I could take any one's word for mischief much sooner than I could take it for good. If Lucy herself had acceded to my conditions, I would have left her, for I should have felt that I had no right to ask more; but as she has not, I hold her as my prisoner."

"Your prisoner?"

"Yes; my prisoner. Do I not speak plainly? I say, I hold her as my prisoner, and I will not let her be at liberty to carry out her threats, in the smallest particular. My determination is to take her now away with me, dead or alive!"

"Save me! save me!" cried Lucy.

"There will be murder done," whispered the footpad to Claude; "for [illegible] sake, let her go now."

"No—not while I have life to hold her.—I give every one fair warning. If any of you interfere with me I will blow your brains out. I am well armed, and I will do it. My mind is wound up to my object, and I will carry it out, so help me Heaven!"

The tone of voice in which Duval uttered these words for a few moments struck absolute terror into the hearts of all who heard him. Even Lucy, nerved as she was by strong passions, shook again. The old woman stamped with rage, and advanced two steps, crying—

"You would drag my child to a prison?"

"No," said Claude. "But I will take care of her. If she is so very fond of me as she pretends, why all this fuss about going with me?"

"You do not take her in affection."

"Certainly not."

"Then she shall not go. My children—brave spirits of our ancient tribes! I let loose your wrath against this man. I withdraw all interdiction. I no longer say to you, spare him. But I tell you to kill—kill—kill!"

A loud howl of delight came from those on the outside, and one dark figure darted into the hut and made an attempt to cast himself at Claude's feet, and seize him by the ancles, which, if he had succeeded in doing, would have embarrassed Claude very much, and indeed, in all probability would have defeated him; but Duval was well aware that that mode of fighting was practised by the gipsies, and he was prepared to resist it in the only manner in which it can and ought to be resisted.

With one of the heavy riding boots that he had on, he gave the gipsy who tried the cunning manœuvre, such a frightful kick in the face, that with a yell of pain, he rolled right out of the hut, among his companions.

"Come on," cried Claude, "I am quite prepared for that species of attack Come on, cowards—come on!"

It was all very well for Claude to say "come on," but after the reception that their comrade had met with, the gipsies did not exactly see the amusement of coming on. The old woman suddenly said a something in a loud voice, and then rushing from the hut, she slammed the door of it shut.

"What are they going to be about now?" said Claude to the footpad.

"I cannot imagine. I don't know what the old gipsy said. Their language is only very slightly known to me. What do you mean to do, Claude, with the girl?"

"Take her with me, of course. She has fainted. Excess of passion has got the better of her at last, and before she recovers I shall, I hope, have her in a place of safety. We must manage to leave the hut, my friend, as quickly as possible."

"They are barricading the door."

"Indeed! What can that be for?"

"Hush! hush! Ah, now I guess."

"You guess what?"

"That they are going to burn us out. Hark, the old woman is raving away at a great rate. I think they are about to do something that she disapproves of. The fact is, they care nothing for this girl, for they do not at all acknowledge her as one of them; but the old woman has a certain amount of authority among them, which they allowed her to exercise until their own passions got the upper-hand of them."

"Now, then, you think it is merely an affair of private vengeance against me, do you?"

"Yes, the manner in which you have treated two of them has made them almost mad, and they will think nothing of sacrificing Lucy, if, with her, they can sacrifice you."

"Do you really think so?"

"I am sure of it. They keep repeating the word 'fire' in their own tongue, and I believe that they will set light to the thatch of the hut."

"Ah, there is very little doubt but what that will be their game. Now you mention it, I can easily imagine that it is just the sort of thing that would suggest itself to them; and the old woman opposes it on account of Lucy, no doubt."

"She does."

"Put out the light, my friend. Without it we shall be better able to judge of what they are about. The turf upon the hearth will give us sufficient light to prevent us being taken by surprise through the roof, or by any other extemporaneous modes of entrance."

The footpad put out the light, and then, as Claude had said, there was a dim twilight throughout the little hut from the glowing turfs on the hearth. A very strange and unnatural stillness was without, and as Claude felt no doubt of the genuineness of the faint of Lucy, he placed her upon two chairs and waited the result of the gipsies' proceedings, with a most admirable coolness and self-possession, that was much envied by the footpad.

"Are you sure," he said, "that the girl is not playing you a trick?"

"Quite. You mean, do I think she has really fainted?"

"Yes; that is it. She has played me so many games and tricks, that I am suspicious of her."

"I know her well, my friend. But you don't seem very much cut up at the idea of parting from her?"

"I cut up?—oh, no. Quite the reverse. Her temper was tolerably violent before, but now, I expect, after all this, if she were to stay with me, I should never have one moment's peace; so I beg that you will take her, and let me get rid of her in any way. I should go in fear of my very life."

"I should not wonder. But go to the window, my friend, and both look and listen. You know something of the dialect of the gipsies, and I do not. If you can come to any correct information as to what they are about, I shall be glad to hear it."

"I will, Claude. You keep an eye on the girl, and likewise keep both ears and eyes open to be on the alert in case of those rascals trying any of their tricks. They are quite as artful as so many savages."

"I know it. I will be careful."

The footpad listened at the window, and in a few moments he came to Claude, and said, in a low tone—

"I am certain some one of them is on the roof."

"I was thinking the same thing," said Claude.

"You have heard him then?"

"I have; but you look to the general safety while I adopt a mode of meeting the fellow. Where is my hat?—oh, I have it. That will do. Have you a stick?"

"Yes. Here is one."

"Very good. Do not say a word now."

All was profoundly still, and Daval took one of the glowing red hot turfs and placed it upon the crown of his hat, taking the precaution previously to place a cold turf under it, so that it should not in a moment, as it otherwise would have done, burn through the crown. He then placed the stick in the hat, and held it behind his back, and waited under the large hole that was in the roof for the gipsy.

CHAPTER CLXXXVI.

CLAUDE HEARS OF DICK TURPIN'S ARREST, AND DETERMINES TO SAVE HIM.

As he stood in the hut under the hole in the little miserable thatched roof, through which it will be recollected that one of the gipsies had made an attempt to come down upon Claude, and been so summarily ejected again, he could just see some portion of the night sky and one star.

That star would rapidly, no doubt, have passed over his plane of vision, but he kept his eyes fixed upon it, and in the course of about half a minute it was suddenly obscured by something black being thrust before it.

Claude did not doubt for one moment but that that something was the face of a gipsy on the roof, and it was for such a contingency that he had the little piece of apparatus ready that we have noticed at the conclusion of our last chapter.

The turf was glowing hot, and in one instant, by the aid of the stick in the hat, Claude thrust it up with sharp and sudden vehemence into the face of the gipsy. A yell of pain and rage, and a shower of red hot sparks from the turf on to the floor of the hut, testified amply to the success of the plan. Then there was a rolling sound over the roof, and the unmistakable indication of a heavy fall outside.

"I rather think," said Claude, "that I have singed that gentleman's whiskers, if he had any to singe."

"You must, indeed," said the footpad, "have punished him severely."

"Serves him right. He had no business there."

"None in the least. But I should not have thought of such a plan, if I had puzzled my brain for twelve months upon the subject. Of a truth, Claude Duval, you have a most fertile imagination."

"One needs it, my friend, when one has to deal with such a set of demi-savages as these gipsies."

"They are quite savages when they are enraged; for then they forget that they are in a civilised country, and encompassed by the restraints of the law."

"Ah, they begin now."

"By Heaven! they do. They have fired the thatch, and the old hut will soon be about our ears. What on earth is to be done now, Claude Duval?"

"Don't be alarmed," said Claude; "all will be well yet."

"Think you so?"

"I feel assured it will. The walls of this hut are not very strong, my friend. Perhaps you know the weakest part. Break through it, and then we will leave the place. No doubt, it is the door that is most looked to by the gipsies."

"Yes; but they are all round the hut."

"Never mind that. All will be well. They are people who deal in threats, but nothing else."

"I will soon open a way to the heath," said the footpad. "Nothing is much easier to do than that, Claude, in such a place as this."

"Quick, then,"

The footpad set about opening a hole in the wall at the back of the hut, and by the rattling of the falling rubbish of which the wall was composed, Claude could hear that he was being speedily successful.

And now the hut presented both from without and from within, a very strange appearance indeed. The thatch was all on fire, and blazed up rather freely, while the inside was tolerably cool and comfortable, for the artificial current produced by the flames brought in at every crevice, as well as by the broken window, a strong draught of cold air; and no doubt, from without, the appearance was that the whole place was in one blaze.

Claude picked up Lucy, and flung her over his right shoulder, as he said, in a low tone—

"Are you ready?"

"Quite," said the footpad.

"Very good. Follow me, if you wish to get away; or, possibly, you would rather remain, since it is not against you that the rage of the gipsies is invoked?"

"No. It is not against me specially, but yet I feel that this is no place for me now. When you are gone, they will want some one to be revenged upon, and they may just as well light upon me as not. I will go with you, Claude, if you will permit me."

"Certainly. Come on."

The opening that the footpad had made in the wall was just wide enough to admit of one person only to pass out of the hut by it; and Claude took the lead. In his breast he had placed a pair of pistols in such readiness that he could avail himself of their services at a moment's notice, and in his right hand he held the powerful stick—which was more like a hedge stake than anything else—which he had used to thrust the hat, upon which was the lighted turf, into the gipsy's face.

Claude did not run, or make any undue haste, but he coolly and boldly sallied out into the night air.

The footpad was right enough in saying that the gipsies encompassed the hut, for the moment Claude made his appearance he was seen by the light of the blazing thatch, and a dozen voices cried—

"Down with him! Down with him!"

"My child! my child! Where is my child?" shouted the old woman. "He will kill her!"

"I have him!" said a man, darting forward; but in a moment he lay prostrate upon the heath with one blow of the stick that Claude carried.

"Take that," said a voice; and the sharp report of a pistol immediately sounded. The ball went through Claude's hat about a couple of inches only clear of his forehead. He saw by the flash the gipsy who fired it, and in an instant he returned the shot; and after a spring into the air, and a shriek, down went the gipsy dead upon the heath!

The wild yell that upon this arose from every throat was really something awful to hear, and might have appalled many a stout heart; but Claude kept the gipsies yet at bay, although, now that matters had got so serious, he did not attempt to advance. He well knew that the pistol shots would have the effect of bringing his friends to the spot, and he was, therefore, content to wait until they should arrive before he attempted anything else.

The footpad was close behind him, and he whispered—

"Blood has been shed now, and they will murder us!"

"Oh, no—no. Not at all."

"They will—indeed they will. Why do you not try to rush through them? Throw down the girl, and make one bold push for your own safety, Claude—I implore you to do so."

"All is well. Do you hear that?"

The footpad listened, and the sound of horses' hoofs came plainly upon his ears, patting the heath with a rapidity of sound that showed they were rapidly approaching the spot of the contest.

"Ah," he said, "I had forgot that you told me you had friends at hand. Why did you not summon them sooner?"

"Blood! blood!" cried the gipsies; and by the light of the now nearly expiring thatch, Duval could see that almost every one of them was armed with a knife. They were evidently collecting in a strong body, with the intention of making a rush at Claude and the footpad.

On came the horsemen, and they were close at hand before the gipsies, in the state of excitement in which they were, heard anything of their approach; and when they did, a momentary feeling of consternation induced them to pause. That moment was everything to Claude, for during it Jack and Brereton and the young farmer rode up.

"Where are you?" cried Jack. "Is all right?"

"Yes, all right," said Claude; "only these gentlemen think of murdering me, that's all."

"We will be in at the death," cried Jack, "at any rate, I rather think, Claude."

In an instant the three horsemen dashed through the throng of gipsies, and reached the side of Claude, having upset some half dozen of the more violent of the gang in their way.

"My horse?" cried Claude. "Is he with you?"

"Yes. Here," said Jack; "I have him by the bridle."

"That's right, Jack. Will you take care of this young lady? she is an old acquaintance of yours."

"Who is it—Lucy?"

"Yes."

"Give her to me," said Jack; "I'll hold her tight enough. I have a lively recollection that she used to have some little peculiarities of disposition that she called a temper."

"And she has them still, Jack. But she has fainted, so will give you no trouble. All's right now. Ah, pop away!"

As Claude mounted, another pistol was fired at the party; but although the bullet must have come right among them, it did not seem to have done any damage to them.

"Now," said Claude, "one charge with vigour will carry us through this mob of desperadoes, and you must not be at all particular where your horses tread, or whose toes come under their hoofs, for they will use their knives against the animals if they can."

"And what's to become of me?" said a doleful voice.

"Really, my friend," said Claude, "I hope you will forgive me for forgetting you for a moment. Get up behind me. My horse will carry double fare as far as we want to go, at any rate."

The footpad was thankful enough to scramble up behind Claude Duval, and then the whole party was ready; and what had been said and done during the time that they were getting ready had not occupied one quarter of the time that we have been compelled to take in the telling of it.

"Charge!" cried Claude.

Every one put his horse to a gallop, and as they each had rather heavy riding-whips, and Claude still retained possession of the hedge stake, they did not make much of the foe that only made a straggling attempt to oppose them. In the course of half-a-dozen seconds they were quite through the throng of gipsies, leaving some half-dozen of them sprawling upon the heath.

"On—on," cried Claude. "Follow me."

He took the lead, and rather to the surprise of the friends who were with him, he did not take his way to the farm-house, whither they had naturally enough concluded he would go first; but he galloped across the common in quite an opposite direction, keeping on at such a pace that none of them could ask him a question as to were he was going to.

He did not continue this speed for long though, and then Jack called out to him—

"Claude, where are you going? This is not the route to the farm."

"No," said Claude, "but that is the last place to which I should think of taking this girl to, Jack. Our friends there have quite enough trouble upon our account as it is."

"Do not think of that as a reason," cried the young farmer. "We never think anything a trouble, Claude, that we do for you; so that is of no sort of consequence. If you think proper to bring her to the farm, do so."

"No," said Claude; "it is certainly impossible that you could be always on the watch to prevent her from escaping from you, or perpetrating some mischief that would be worse still. I propose placing her in a private Lunatic Asylum, of which I know something, and where they will take her if they are well paid, and ask no questions."

"But she may talk?"

"Oh, yes, and they may listen, but what she says will have about as much effect upon those who will listen to her, as though she talked to the trees, or to the grass in the meadows. Has she moved, Jack?"

"No."

"Indeed! I begin to feel a little uneasy about this long swoon that she has fallen into. Can any of you get a light?"

"Yes, I can," said the young farmer; "and I have a small lantern hanging by my saddle, if it has not been knocked away in that squabble with the gipsies. No, here it is."

"Let us pause a moment by these trees," said Claude, "and see, if we can, what is the matter with her. I have half a suspicion now that she is only shamming a faint, for these sort of insensibilities seldom last so long as this."

They were tolerably clear of the heath, and upon the verge of a rather dense cluster of tall trees, among which they now quietly walked their horses, and Duval and the young farmer alighted. The latter, after some trouble, succeeded in lighting his lantern, which was a small hand one, with a powerful magnifying-glass, and a good reflector.

"Now," said Claude, "we will see what is the matter with this rather violent piece of goods."

As he spoke he lifted Lucy off Jack's horse, and kneeling upon one knee, he supported her upon the other.

"Bring the lantern close," he said.

"Here it is," said the young farmer. "Won't she open her eyes?"

"Good God!" said Claude.

"What is it—what is it?" they all cried.

"Poor girl, she will never open her eyes again. A pistol-bullet has gone through the very centre of her forehead, and she is stone-dead!"

CHAPTER CLXXXVII.

LUCY IS BURIED AMONG THE TREES, AND CLAUDE HEARS NEWS OF TURPIN.

NOTWITHSTANDING all that had happened to deprive the little party among the trees of much sympathy with such a personage as Lucy, they could not help feeling something of a shock upon finding that she was really dead.

For some few moments not one word was uttered by any one, and as they all, by the light of the little lantern that the young farmer had with him, gazed upon the lifeless face, no doubt each was busy with his own peculiar reflections upon the scene.

"Thank God," said Claude, breaking the silence, "that no one here present is answerable for this death."

"No one," said Jack.

The footpad stepped forward, and with his hands clasped, he looked down at the corpse. One tear fell from his eyes, and with a deep sigh, he said—

"So this is the end. Poor girl, I don't know now if all thy passion about Duval was real or affected; but whichever it was, you have paid the penalty of it. You are gone now."

"Yes," said Claude, "and let all her faults go with her. Let us, if we say anything of her now, poor girl, say that she was wrong-headed but not wrong-hearted. It matters not now if she were only playing a part, or if she really felt all that she said and did. She is gone."

"Yes gone," added the footpad. "Peace go with her. I never thought until this moment——"

"What?" said Claude.

"That I cared for her a jot!"

As he said these words, so few, and yet so expressive of his feeling for the dead, he turned sadly away. Claude walked after him, and touching him lightly on the shoulder, he said—"Stop."

The footpad turned round hastily.

"There is something yet to be done, my friend," said Claude.

"What? Can you restore her to life again?"

"No, but we can pay proper respect to the dead. Here, in the open country, far away from the feted soil of the crowded churchyard, let us lay her to rest. We will burry her, my friend."

The footpad grasped Claude's hand, but he said nothing. That pressure was sufficient, and they then walked back slowly together to the spot where Lucy lay, with Jack and the young farmer looking at her.

"We must bury her," said Claude. "At least, at our hands her remains want so much attention. Here amid the trees, where the free air of Heaven will blow over her grave, we will bury her."

"Yes," said Jack. "That is a job I will help at, with all my heart, Claude. Poor girl, she has my pity, and yet she has come to a quieter end than probably ny of us will. Only look at her face, Claude; she just seems sleeping calmly nd pleasantly."

"It is so, Jack."

"How is it possible," said the young farmer, "that we can bury her? We cannot dig a grave with our nails."

"That is indeed an obstacle," said Jack.

"And yet," said the footpad "buried she must be, poor thing. If it take me a whole day to scoop a grave for her with a hedge-stake, I will do it. It is my duty not to desert even her corpse, whatever you may all think proper to do."

He spoke in a tone of voice that was harsh with hardly suppressed g·. Claude laid his hand upon his arm, and spoke gently,

"Hush, my friend, hush. If we speak of difficulties, it is only that we may devise means to overcome them. Do not fancy that we are going to abandon our object. It will be done, let the difficulties be what they may."

"Forgive me for a brief impatience."

"It needs no excuse, Jack; can you think of any mode of operation in this emergency?"

"Yes," said Jack. "I think I can go to our friend's farm here, in less than half an hour, and bring back a couple of spades."

"Ah!" said the young farmer, "I did not think of that; I will go, and as I know exactly where to lay my hands upon what I want, I shall be able to do it quicker, and likewise to give no alarm to the family. Shall I go at once on this errand, Claude?"

"You will please me much, my friend, by doing so."

The young farmer did not wait another moment, but availing himself of the loan of Jack's horse, which was accustomed to a sharp run now and then, he set off across the fields at a pace that promised very soon to bring him to his destination.

Nothing of any moment passed during the absence of the young farmer, and he returned in much less time than any one could have supposed it possible for him to do. He brought with him two staved spades, and as he dismounted, he said—

"I got the spades from an outhouse we have in the garden, and so had no occasion to go near the house."

"Then no one knows you have been there?" suggested Claude.

"No one."

Claude nodded as though he would have said—

"I am glad of that," and then in a clear voice, he said—

"At this juncture, my friends, let me ask if any of you feel any repugnance to promising to keep this affair a profound secret?"

"None," said the footpad. "I feel, Duval, that this is a question that is solely addressed to me, and I promise that not one word of to-night's proceedings will ever pass my lips."

"I thank you," said Claude, "and I tell you frankly my reason for being pleased at such a promise. It would much vex Cicely, my wife, to hear of it."

"No doubt. It shall be kept secret."

The young farmer took one of the spades, and the footpad took the other; but Claude, throwing off his coat, took it from him, saying—

"No, my friend, let me do this last service for the poor girl. You can be a spectator and a mourner, and should not be asked to work at this sad task."

The footpad surrendered the spade. Indeed his hands shook so, that if he had attempted to persevere in the use of it, it was quite clear that he would have made but very small progress indeed with it, while Claude, with his strength and perseverance, was able, effectually, to aid the young farmer, who had already systematically begun the work.

They chose a spot beneath a large sycamore tree, whose spreading branches stretched far and wide on all sides, and particularly to the south, and then they marked out the grave of the wayward spirit that had brought death upon itself.

As they worked, the gray light of the dawn began slowly to make its appearance, and they extinguished the little lantern, by the aid of which they had first begun their labours. The moment they put that out, the coming daylight was much more perceptible to them all, and they paused a moment to look at it.

"We must get our work over soon," said Claude, "or the daylight will surprise us."

"Yes," said Jack, "it is coming fast. There—there is a sudden gleam of light from the east. Do you see it among the trees?"

"Yes, and the grave is finished," said Claude.

They had dug about five feet into the earth, and now the young farmer and Claude having got out of the grave, they all carefully and slowly lifted the body and placed it in its last resting place.

"My large cloak, Jack," said Claude.

"Yes, it is here," said Jack.

Claude took it and laid it four times doubled over the corpse, and then they replaced the mould, and as the young farmer had carefully laid aside the turf from the surface, he relaid it again, so that but very slight traces of any interference with the ground was left. The spare mould they scattered far and wide among the trees; but before the work was quite finished the farmer approached the footpad, and taking a little volume from his pocket, he said—

"I brought you this. Would you like to use it?"

It was a book of Common Prayer, and, of course, contained the service for the dead.

"Yes—yes," he said, eagerly; "yes. I thank you for this. Indeed, I thank you for this."

He advanced to the side of the grave, and holding the book so that the best rays of the gray light that was irradiating the east fell upon it, he read the service of the dead in a solemn and affecting voice. All present stood uncovered, and listening to it with quiet composure; and when the last words were spoken, and the book was closed, it dropped from the hands of the footpad.

"I shall leave England now," he said.

"Do you think you will be happier elsewhere?" said Claude.

"Yes, I am sure I shall. Besides, I—"

What the footpad was going to add, was suddenly drowned in the echoes of a loud yell, that came from some unseen persons in the immediate vicinity among the trees.

So entirely unexpected, and so startling was this sudden outcry, that even Claude, with all his presence of mind, and few could equal him in that grand particular, was startled. He recovered, however, in a moment, and cried out—

"The horses, Jack! See to the safety of the horses!"

"The gipsies are upon us!" said the footpad.

The words had scarcely escaped his lips, when the old hag, who claimed, probably upon rather dubious grounds, to be the mother of Lucy, rushed forward from among the trees, with a knife in her hand. She made directly towards Claude, exclaiming—

"Thus am I avenged!"

Had she made a similar demonstration against any other one of the party, it is likely enough she might have succeeded in doing what she wished; but Claude stood as firm as a rock, and when she darted towards him, he caught the wrist of the arm she had raised against him, and with the other hand flung her some distance off, and she rolled right over the newly covered up grave of Lucy.

"Let her be," cried Claude. "She is mad, I do think."

It would appear that the gipsies had relied upon the old hag being successful in taking the life of Claude; for they had not followed up this sudden yell, or war cry, by any attack. No doubt, that was merely for the purpose of petrifying the little party with sudden fright, so that the old woman might, before the sudden surprise had ceased, plunge the knife into Claude's heart.

If this had succeeded, it is very probable that the rest of the party would have found it difficult to resist an impetuous attack from the gipsies; but the failure of the hag made all the difference.

There was quite sufficient daylight now for the gipsies to see perfectly well what had happened, and how completely the hay had failed in her murderous intent. They just hesitated long enough to enable those whom they came to attack, to get thoroughly upon their guard.

"Do not run," cried Claude. "Stay and face them. They are arrant cowards at the best of times. I know them well."

CLAUDE AND JACK WATCHING THE LANDLORD OF THE INN IN HIS SLEEP.

The most available weapon he could use in a close encounter with the gipsies, so as to ward off their knives, which were really dangerous, was the spade with which he had assisted the young farmer to dig Lucy's grave; and that in the hands of such a man as Claude Duval was, in truth, a most formidable implement of offence as well as of defence.

The young farmer had the other spade. Jack held a very heavily loaded riding whip in both hands, one blow from which he well knew was enough to knock down any man. Mark Brereton had a sword by his side, which he now drew and put himself upon the defensive; so that our party, although small, was well prepared.

They had not, however, very long to wait, before, with a wild scream of rage, about thirty of the most desperate-looking fellows of the gipsy race that could well be conceived, made their appearance from among the trees, and tried, by one sudden rush, to overcome all opposition, and crush their foes.

This was not so easily done, however. Our friends stood shoulder to shoulder in a small half circle, and well they sustained the sudden shock of the gipsies' assault. Claude, with his spade, knocked no less than four of them prostrate in the course of as many moments. Two others fell before the young farmer, and the heavy riding whip wielded by Jack, did great execution.

One athletic fellow, who made a dash at Mr. Brereton, was run right through the body in a moment, and Brereton had to put up his foot to throw him off his sword.

This reception certainly staggered the gipsy crew; and seeing more than a third of their number put hors de combat in about a minute and a half, they wavered. One voice then cried out—

"Forward! kill them—they are exhausted now—kill them all! They have murdered the girl! Blood for blood!"

The sound of that voice seemed to animate the gipsies; and collecting all their strength and all their ferocity, they made another dash at the little party; but as our friends had not received any injury whatever worth the mentioning, and none at all that they felt at the moment, they stood firm, and the result of this second attack of the gipsy crew was something very similar to the first. Some half-dozen more fell to the ground, either dead or totally insensible from serious hurts.

CHAPTER CLXXXVIII.

CLAUDE TAKES A HASTY RIDE TO OXFORD.

After this second check, the gipsies were by far too much reduced in number to hazard a third attack. With a yell of rage and disappointment, they set off in full retreat among the trees; and in the space of a moment or two not one was to be seen, except such as lay upon the ground at the feet of their victors.

"This is pleasant!" cried Claude.

"Very," said Jack.

"Is anybody hurt of us?"

"All right," cried the young farmer and Mark Brereton.

In a moment, then, the footpad answered—

"A slight scratch," he said, as he appeared stanching the blood that flowed from a knife-wound in his arm. "A slight scratch, that is all."

"How did you get it?" said Claude.

"Why, I saw that you all had enough to do in front, so, knowing well what the gipsies are, I kept an eye on one man, and was rewarded by seeing a fellow stealing along, with a knife in his hand, to attack you all behind. I closed with him, and he gave me this bit of a scratch, that's all."

"And where is he?"

"Lying over there. It strikes me his head had two or three hard knocks against that bit of root of the chesnut there, that sticks out of the ground so singularly, and is as hard as iron."

"It strikes me so too," said Jack, who stepped for a moment over to where the man was lying. "Nobody can deny that the fellow had some brains."

"How do you mean, Jack?" said Claude.

"Why, they are lying principally on the ground by his side."

"Well, I shouldn't wonder," said the footpad. "He would be rather troublesome, so I was forced, in a manner of speaking, to do the best I could with him."

"Where is the old woman?" said Claude.

"Dead, I think," said Brereton, as he wiped his sword in the grass. "She is lying on the grave here, quite gone; I think."

"Nobody hurt her," said Claude. "I was careful only to throw her; and a fall upon the green sod here could not kill her. If she be dead, passion has more to do with it than violence."

As he spoke, he approached the grave upon which the old hag lay, in exactly the attitude she had fallen in when Claude cast her from him. He stooped slightly over her, saying—

"Foolish woman, we have no animosity against you. If you live, go and join your people in peace, so far as we are concerned."

The old woman moved slightly.

"Oh, she is all right," cried Claude.

"You will let me go?" she said, faintly.

"Certainly. Get up and be off with you. I can assure you we are none of us solicitous of your very agreeable company."

"Be careful of her, Claude," cried the footpad, who, with the assistance of Jack, was binding a handkerchief round his wounded arm. "Be careful of her. She has as many tricks as an old fox."

"Thank you," said Claude.

He only slightly turned his head towards the footpad to say these two words, and on the moment, seeing her opportunity, the hag was on her knees in a moment and made a stab at his breast with the knife which she had, despite her tumble, retained, and cunningly hidden.

"Now I am avenged!" she cried.

The knife broke off short by the hilt against Claude's breast, as though it had been made of iron. In another moment Mark Brereton had seized the old woman round the waist, and held her tight.

"How is this, Claude?" he said. "Do you wear armour?"

"Armour?"

"Yes. The knife broke off your breast as it would off a good cuirass. It has saved you."

"But I have no cuirass. I never thought of such a thing."

He hastily tore open his vest as he spoke, and then, in a moment, it was seen what had saved him. The point of the knife had happened to come precisely against a rather massive gold watch that Claude had in his pocket, and so he had been effectually saved. There was a clear indentation in the outside case of the watch; and as he held it up, he said—

"This is a lucky escape, indeed, my friends. This watch has saved my life, and I will never part with it."

"You ought not," said Brereton; "but, in the meantime, pray tell me what I am to do with this mad old woman."

"I'll soon relieve you of her!" cried Jack.

Taking from his pocket a stout cord, Jack now, after some little difficulty, tied the old woman's wrists together.

"Now," he said, "I shall have the pleasure, madam, of effectually preventing you from being mischievous for some time to come, by making you fast to one of these trees."

"My bitterest malediction light upon you all!" cried the hag, while her eyes flashed with passion.

"Rave away," said Jack, "we like to hear it. Besides, it will keep you out of more mischief. Only remember, that your cursing us has just about as much effect as if, by your maledictions, you strove to uproot one of these old trees."

"Revenge!—I will have my revenge!"

"Doubtless you will, when you can."

Despite all her struggles—and, at times, they were rather furious—Jack tied her fast to a tree, and there he left her to rave or swear at her leisure.

"What is to be done?" said Brereton to Claude.

"Nothing, that I know of," he said; "but as a matter of choice, now, to leave this place. All that has happened here, disagreeable as it is, has only been a matter of force with us. We did not choose it, and so we cannot help it. Let us all go to the farm, and from there we can separate as our different routes and inclinations may lead us. Jack and I are for the road again."

"And so am I," said the footpad, "until, by some lucky chance, I can get hold of enough to take me from England."

Jack shook his head.

"You won't go, my friend," he said. "We tried it once. There is a destiny in these things."

"Think you so?"

"I am sure of it. But help me with the horses here. It is something more than a lucky thing that the gipsies did not find out where we had stowed them, or we should have had to walk, for a certainty, from this place."

"Yes," said the footpad. "I know them well. They would have gloried in slaughtering them."

Fortunately, as Jack said, the cattle had been, while the grave was being dug, placed in a secure position among the trees; and now they were brought out quite fresh and ready for a good start.

"I shall never forget this place as long as I live," said Claude. "This affair will make a pretty noise when it comes to be known."

"I don't think," said the footpad, "it will ever be known. Of course, the dead bodies will be found; but as they are all gipsies, it will be considered that they have had some fracas among themselves, and so a number of them have come by death, and everybody with a poultry yard will rejoice accordingly."

"Then," said Claude, as they all rode off, "you think they will not themselves—I mean these who escaped—say anything about it?"

"Not one word."

"It is better that they should not."

"But you, Claude, and all of us, will be marked men by the gipsy tribe; and if ever they have an opportunity of being revenged upon us, you may depend that they will."

"Naturally enough," said Claude.

"Do you hear," said Jack, "what a racket that old woman makes, swearing and cursing us at such a rate?"

"Yes," said Claude, "I hear her. She ought to be less dangerous upon that account some other time."

"Not a whit," said the footpad. "If she don't follow you up, Claude Duval, and yet try to place a knife-blade in your heart, it will be simply because her failures will take a superstitious hold of her, and she will fancy that you are supernaturally protected—that is the only feeling that will keep her quiet."

"And do you think it a likely one to come over her?"

"I do."

"Well, I must say, I sincerely hope it may. A man I really don't mind how many tussles I have with, but with such an antagonist as a viperous old woman, it is one of the most difficult things in the world to know what to do."

More than once they at intervals paused to glance behind them, to see if they could notice any appearance of the gipsies; but all was quiet, and they soon reached the outskirts of the farm.

Claude rode up to the young farmer, and said—

"You are pretty certain that no one knew of your visit to the farm for the two spades?"

"My brother only saw me, and him I cautioned to say nothing. While I was getting the spades, he fetched me the prayer-book, which, it appeared, your friend was well pleased to have."

"Just so. I would not have the mind and the peace of Cicely disturbed by this adventure on any account."

"There is no occasion."

"Not the least; and I am extremely obliged to you, for the discretion you have showed in the matter.

"Do not mention that. If I or any of my family can, by any possible means, do you a service, you know what great pleasure it gives us."

"Yes, I do know it, and I feel grateful accordingly; but here we are at home. I always call this house home, for such is the character of the feeling that comes over me when I reach its threshold."

"And there is Cicely!"

"Cicely! So early up?"

"Ah! yes, Duval. She, doubtless, has been a little alarmed at your protracted absence. I warrant she left her chamber as soon as daylight enabled her to see her way."

"I should not wonder. Cicely—Cicely!"

Cicely ran across the farm-yard to the little gate at which they had all halted.

"Ah, you are safe?" she said.

"Safe!" said Claude, quietly. "Yes, to be sure, Cicely. How could we be otherwise? We have not been in more than common danger."

"What do you call common danger, Claude?"

"Why, have you not heard that?"

"'Tis dangerous to eat, to drink, to sleep,
To walk?"

"Yes, Claude; but your dangers, I am assured, are generally of a much more stringent character."

"And who assures you, Cicely, of that?"

"My own heart, Claude."

This little dialogue took place between Claude and Cicely as they walked up the avenue together of the garden towards the house, for they had left the farm-yard, and had taken a slight round to the homestead.

"You will now remain for a time?" said Cicely.

"Yes, for a time."

"How long, Claude? I like not the tone in which you say 'for a time.' You will stay all day?"

"Nay, dear Cicely, that I cannot. I can but breakfast, and then be off; but if it be at all possible for me to return by about midnight, I will do so. Do not, however, construe this hope of mine into a positive promise."

"I must."

"Nay, do not; for I cannot tell what may detain me. You do not know what adventures befal me at times; and were I to tell you all——"

"Why do you pause?"

"Because I was going to say, were I to tell you all, you would not be able to sleep so soundly a-nights, as, in truth, I hope you do, and wish you to do. Besides, if I were to make positive promises about being here at certain hours, without leaving myself the smallest latitude of action, if anything occurred that I came not, you would picture to yourself the worst that could happen, when, perhaps, it was very far, indeed, from the truth."

"You are right in that, Claude."

"I feel that I am. Let me then go without a promise, and come when I can."

Cicely's reason told her, that this was by far the best arrangement that could be made; and after a few moments, she acquiesced in it completely. They all sat down to an ample breakfast at the farm-house, and at its conclusion, Claude and Jack again sought their steeds, and mounting, took to the road.

They struck off to the high road to Guilford at a gentle trot across the meadows.

CHAPTER CLXXXIX.

THE LAWYER'S CLERK FROM OXFORD, DETAILS TURPIN'S PERIL.

"JACK," said Claude. "How do you feel after all this affair of Lucy's?"

"Will you let me answer your question by another, Claude?"

"It is an Irish way of answering a question Jack; but say on. Let us have it."

"Then, what is your reason for asking me?"

"Why, Jack, you are turning a complete Jesuit. What reason could I possibly have, my friend, for asking you, but to obtain information?"

"Then, Claude, I am quite satisfied; I know that her death hangs heavily at your heart; but I do not think it ought to do so. You had literally nothing to do with it; and although she had threatened abundance of harm to Cicely, you never for one moment dreamt of any to her."

"That is strictly true, Jack."

"Well, she, in the frenzy of her evil passions, called up the gipsies to her aid, and she herself fell a victim to the evil spirit she had summoned to do her service, as you will generally find most people do."

"Yes," said Claude, mournfully, "the pistol-shot which killed her, certainly came from one of the gipsies."

"And it was aimed at you, Claude."

"That there can be no doubt of. Well, Jack, we cannot recall the past, and I will endeavour to forget the fate of that poor creature. Ill-directed passion brought her to her end, and I cannot help thinking that she had some evil adviser who urged her on to her destruction."

"I have thought so myself," said Jack, "for at times, when she seemed to be most violent, her passion did not seem to me to be so natural as it might have been."

"The same idea crossed me, Jack, more than once during the fray. But hush! I hear the rapid sound of a horse's hoofs. Some one approaches in a hurry."

"They do indeed; and yet it is, by the sound, a straggling bad sort of gallop."

"Where are we?" said Claude, glancing around him.

"What, Claude, don't you recognise the road? It is the old Oxford-road, and we are about eight miles from London. Don't you know it now?"

"Oh, yes, most assuredly I do. But I should like to stop this fellow who is coming along at such a rate, and know what puts him to speed. Wait where you are a moment, Jack, and I will take the middle of the road. I don't like people to go by me in a great hurry, and I know nothing about it."

Jack laughed, and Claude rode out into the centre of the thoroughfare, which was, just at that spot, not very wide, so that when the horseman came up, he found it would have been rather a difficult thing to pass on.

"Out of my way, sir," he cried; "I am at speed."

"Hold!" shouted Claude. "As an officer of police, I insist upon knowing who you are and where you are going? They say that the celebrated Gentleman Jack the highwayman is upon this road, and how do I know but you may be he?"

Upon this the horseman pulled up at once,

"Bless your heart," he said, "me a highwayman? Only look at me, and then ask yourself if I have any resemblance to one."

"I don't know that. What do you make yourself out to be, my friend, and where are you going?"

"My name, sir, is Brown. I am clerk to a respectable solicitor in Oxford, and I am going to Bow-street."

"Humph! what about?"

"Why, you must know that the notorious Dick Turpin has been apprehended at the Pig and Tinder-Box in Oxford, while he was in bed, and we think of hanging him for a highway-robbery, outside that city, committed only three days ago. The Oxford Assizes are on, only it was thought as he was such a notorious criminal, the Attorney-general might come down by order of the Treasury to conduct the prosecution."

"Oh, indeed."

"Yes, sir. And now you know all about it. Of course, I very sincerely hope he will be hung, as no doubt you do; so I beg that you will not impede me any longer, sir."

"Certainly not—go on. Good day."

"Good day, sir. You are a very active officer, indeed, and about the stupidest fellow I ever met with," added the lawyer's clerk to himself as he rode on, for he had quite mistaken Claude's look of concern, when he heard of Dick Turpin's peril, to stupidity and a difficulty of comprehension.

The moment the clerk was out of sight, Claude rode to where Jack was waiting, and told him what had passed.

"Why didn't you stop him?" said Jack.

"Because it would have done no good. We should not have liked killing him, and if we had dismounted him, and started off his horse, he could have walked to London in a couple of hours. I did think of stopping him, but upon consideration I did not see that it would do the smallest good to Dick Turpin; so I abandoned the idea of it."

"You are right, Claude."

"But I am not going to abandon Dick, for all that. What say you to a trot to Oxford, Jack?"

"With all my heart, if you think you can do any good; and if you dont't think so, we may as well go, as something may turn up when we get there."

"Jack, I thank you for those words; they show a proper spirit. So let us be off at once. Our horses are fully equal to the job; and we shall be there in six hours from hence, I think, or thereabouts."

"Easy," said Jack.

They did not pause another moment, but turning their horses' heads in the required direction, off they went at a good pace, although not a distressing one, for knowing the distance that lay before them, they were too judicious to tax their steeds for the first twenty miles, to the peril of seeing them perform the rest of the journey with difficulty.

"How are you off for money, Claude?" said Jack, when they were in a lonely part of the road, after having riden about twelve miles or so.

"Pretty well. I think I have somewhere about eighty pounds by me."

"And I have more."

"More Jack?'

"Yes; you forget that you frequently lend me sums of money, saying, 'Take this, Jack,' or 'Mind this for a rainy day, Jack,' or something of that sort; but I take care of it all; so if cash will do Dick any good, I think we shall have plenty. I speak because we should not allow ourselves to lose any time by crying 'stand and deliver!' to anyone upon the road."

"No, Jack, we will let the world go free for once in a way. Oxford is our destination, and we will not turn out of our route or stay upon it longer than will be necessary to give our horses bait a little, on any account."

"Very good, Claude, I think that is the right course."

"After completing the first twenty miles, they halted for a whole hour, during which they refreshed themselves and their horses, letting the latter have a careful grooming, and a light feed, after which they were nearly as fresh as when they had first started in the morning.

"I want to do all the rest of the distance now," said Claude, "without a halt of more than ten minutes or so, once or twice."

"That we can do, easily. I should advise that after the next five miles we give the horses a pot of old ale each, and then I don't think they will flag if we were to ride right through Oxford."

"It shall be done, Jack."

They halted at a pretty little road-side inn, to give the horses the ale, and just as they had finished drinking it, a corpulent man came to the door of the inn with an immense bell-shaped barrelled blunderbuss in his hands, and pointing it full upon Claude, he called out—

"Stop, both of you—I know you. You stopped me once when I was in my gig, and took away one hundred and twenty pounds from me. You know you did. You are Duval, and the other rogue I don't know."

"Well," said Claude, "I'll tell you. They call him Blaze-away, and that's what I'm waiting for you to do, you stupid old pump. What's the use of that blunderbuss to you?"

"I'll soon let you know what use it is of, if you don't stop. Quick, Jem! Bob! Get a couple of ropes to tie up these two highwaymen with. I will take them both to London."

"Well," said Claude, "I'm sorry that I have not a blunderbuss to meet you with. If I had, we could make a regular duel with them both; but here is a little pop-gun in the shape of a pistol which will do."

The moment Claude produced a pistol, the corpulent man cried—

"All right, only I like to have first fire; so here goes."

As he spoke, he pulled the trigger of the blunderbuss, when, instead of discharging itself in the proper manner, it burst with a stunning report; and the last Claude and Jack saw of the corpulent man, were his heels in the air, as he lay upon his back in the passage of the inn.

"Come on, Jack," said Claude, "I expected some such an end to this adventure. Those old blunderbusses are really never to be depended upon."

"Really, Claude, you take things remarkably easy. What if it had gone off all right and riddled you with bullets?"

"I don't think, Jack, that it's my fate to be popped off in such a way. I have stood fire so often and never come to much hurt, that I seem now to have a blind confidence in my good fortune. It may fail me some day, though, for all that, and when it does, I shall not complain. Push on, Jack."

They went on at a good pace, and the effect of the ale they had given to their horses was tolerably manifest, for they did not draw rein again until they reached an inn not above three quarters of a mile from Oxford.

"We will put up here, Jack," said Claude, "and no doubt we shall get all the news if we ask our landlord to join us in a bottle of wine."

"It's more than likely," said Jack.

The horses were put up and well attended to—Claude asked for a private room, and then desired that a couple of bottles of wine should be brought him, and the two best beds kept for them. An order, too, for supper was given, of quite an ad libitum character, so that the landlord thought two such guests were well worth waiting on himself.

We should have premised that Jack had doffed his groom's costume and wore rather a dashing suit of brown cloth. Claude still retained about his costume a rather clerical look, and it became him very well indeed.

After the wine was on the table, the landlord came into the room with many bows and smirks.

"I hope, gentlemen," he said, "the wine is to your liking?"

"Very good," said Claude. "Pray sit down and take a glass of it with us, landlord."

"Oh sir, you really do me too much honour."

The landlord, notwithstanding it was too much honour, drew a chair and sat down with his very kind and urbane guests, and after a few glasses of wine had been partaken of, Claude said in an easy off-handed manner—

"Is there any news stirring in Oxford?"

"Why, sir," said the landlord, "at assize time we have lots of news of some sort or other; but everything is now taken up with the capture of Dick Turpin the highwayman."

"What, the celebrated Turpin?"

"The very same, sir."

"Why you amaze me! I always thought that he was so very bold and determined a fellow, that he would hardly have been taken alive."

"So did I," said Jack.

"Very likely, gentlemen, very likely," said the landlord. "Perhaps he would not, if they had not caught him in bed."

THE JEW CONCOCTING PLANS FOR THE RESCUE OF DICK TURPIN.

"Oh, that was it, was it?"

"Yes, they caught him in bed, gentlemen. But I hope you like this wine?"

"Very well, indeed. I think among us we may manage another bottle of it when these two are done; and in the meantime you will oblige us very much, landlord, by telling us how Turpin was captured, and by whom."

CHAPTER CXC.

TURPIN IS CAST FOR DEATH, BUT DOES NOT DESPAIR.

THE landlord smiled his best smile, for it was not every day that such good customers came to his house.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I can tell you the whole particulars."

"And we should like to know, too," added Jack, "what specific offence they are going to try him for."

"That I can tell you likewise, gentlemen, as well as any man. It is for robbing the Provost of Magdalen College on this very road, and not two hundred yards from this house."

"Indeed?" said Jack.

"What assurance," said Claude.

"Worse than assurance," added the landlord, "for of course gentlemen, you are aware, that the Provost is a Doctor of Divinity."

"Exactly."

"Well, then, gentlemen, the Provost has a quiet little nag that he likes a ride upon every afternoon, and about four days ago he passed this door on his nag, but he did not come home on it."

"How so?"

"Why it appears that after he had got some distance past this house, he met Turpin on his horse, although, of course, the Provost did not know him from Adam. Up rides Turpin to him and says—

"'Sir, can you tell me the exact time?'

"Well, the Provost did not much like his looks, but he took out his watch and told him.

"'Does that watch keep good time?' said Turpin.

"'Sir,' said the Provost, who was rather proud of his watch, which was worth a hundred guineas, 'sir, it keeps better time than the clock of Magdalen College.'

"'Oh, then,' said Turpin, 'I will trouble you for it, as I often want to know the exact time. You see, sir, I am a highwayman, and have, in consequence, what people call a bad character. Now in this country, if you give a dog a bad name you had better hang him, and as I am often accused of crimes at places I never saw, your correct watch will be a very handy thing when I want to prove an alibi.'"

"How cool," said Jack.

"Very," said Claude.

"You may well say that, gentlemen. Well, upon this, he took the watch from the Provost, and besides that, he made him give up his purse containing twenty pounds, and then he forced him to dismount from his nag and started it off down the London Road, and because he did not dismount quick enough, Turpin threw the reverend doctar's hat and wig into a ditch."

"Upon my word," said Claude, "that was too bad."

"Very much too bad," said Jack.

"You may well say that, gentleman. The poor Provost had to come here to this house on foot, and send for a chaise to Oxford, to take him home; and when he got to the college, he offered a hundred pounds reward to any one who would apprehend the highwayman who had robbed him, and he gave a good description of him, so that the police of Oxford all said it could be no other than Dick Turpin. But still he would have got clear off if he had only chosen to ride away, but instead of that he came into Oxford and put up at the Three Kings inn, and the landlord of it gave notice to the officers, and they caught him in bed and had him handcuffed before he was very well awake to what was going on."

"Ah," said Claude, "I understand how it was then. You may depend that if he had not been caught napping in such a way, Dick Turpin would have given them some trouble."

"Not a doubt of it, sir."

"And is he to be tried?"

"Why, yes, sir. The assizes were on, so he was committed at once, and as there is always a second gaol delivery during the assizes, he will no doubt be comfortably hung, for they say that the big-wigs, meaning the judges, sir, are quite resolved to get rid of him."

"But they will give him a fair trial?"

"Oh, yes, gentlemen. Everything will be regular enough; but you see it's a very clear case, indeed; and there aint the shadow of a chance for him. He will be hung, and between you and me, gentlemen, he will be a good riddance, for those sort of gentry make the roads unsafe, and do the Inns a deal of harm. Now there's another something like him; I mean Claude Duval. They tell me that on the London side of Uxbridge, he does just what he likes."

"Is that possible?"

"It is, indeed, sir. I am credibly informed of it, I assure you, on the most competent authority."

"Well," said Jack, "if Duval ever stops me, he shall find out that he has made a mistake."

"Oh, but, sir, he has another ruffian with him."

"Has he?" said Claude. "Then if that other ruffian ever stops me, he shall find out that it shall not be for nothing."

"Well, gentlemen, I only wish you two could meet them both."

"I fear that is not likely," said Claude. "But where is Dick Turpin confined now, landlord?"

"In the gaol, and he is tolerably safe. They had him in the spinning house for a time, but they did not think that safe enough. He won't get away, you may depend upon it."

"That's a comfort," said Claude, "at all events. We are very much obliged to you, landlord, for these particulars. We will leave our horses here and take a walk into the city, and then come back to rest, for we are rather tired."

"Very good—very good gentlemen. The best beds shall be at your service, and better I am sure are not to be found in the whole county, to say nothing of the city."

"Thank you," said Jack. "We shall no doubt be very well satisfied."

They then rose, having made a highly favourable impression upon the Innkeeper, and on foot they walked into Oxford. They soon found upon reaching that place that the sole topic of conversation was of the apprehension of Dick Turpin; and after a consultation between themselves, Claude said—

"There is one thing, Jack, that we must make up our minds to, let the risks be what they may; that is, to save Dick. I am quite resolved to encounter any difficulty rather than let him perish."

"And I likewise," said Jack.

"Very good. From all we can hear of the old jail, it is a crazy enough structure, and if Dick were not heavily ironed, I have not the least doubt but that he would make his escape from it."

"To be sure he would, Claude. But cannot we, who are not ironed at all, contrive to get at him in some sort of way?"

"You have anticipated my idea, Jack. There are two things, however, necessary to do before we could, with any chance of success, attempt Dick's rescue from the jail. One of them is to procure a plan of the prison, and the other is to ascertain in what part of it he is placed."

"Both rather difficult," said Jack.

"Probably so, but not impossible. There is an old work on the antiquities of Oxford, in which I know there is a plan of this jail, and what can be a more likely place to find such a work in, than in Oxford itself."

"Let's come then," said Jack, "to the best bookseller's in this place, and see if we can get it.'

We need not particularise the interview of Claude and Jack with a smiling

Oxford bookseller; suffice it to say, that without any difficulty they got the book they wanted, for which they had to pay two guineas, and then they both repaired to a private room in an hotel, and studied well the plan of the jail. They found that the cells of any strength were only six in number, and that they were numbered in regular order, and in a part of the prison called 'The Inner Keep.'

"That will do," said Jack.

"Yes, so far, Jack; and now we must find out some house of entertainment to which the officials of the prison are in the habit of going. There is always some such place near to every jail."

This latter object was much easier accomplished than even the former, and Jack and Claude were soon seated in the parlour of a public-house near the prison, with a glass of brandy-and-water before each of them. They trusted to their own natural acuteness in finding out the sort of person they wanted.

In the course of ten minutes a burly looking man came into the parlour and sat down next to Claude. He got Claude over any little difficulty in opening the conversation with him, by saying, as he rubbed his hands together—

"A nice day, sir, out of doors."

Those three words "out of doors" were quite sufficient to convince Claude that the man was one of the prison officials, and he said in a cool assured tone, "Oh, yes, my friend. You are off duty, now, I suppose?"

"You mean at the jug? Oh, yes, I get half an hour three times a day, when I ain't on the outer lock."

Claude pushed his glass of brandy-and-water towards him, as he added—

"I hope you will keep Dick Turpin safe now you have got him."

The man took a long draught at the hot steaming liquid, before he answered, and then, with what he thought was a very knowing wink, he said—

"I believe you; catch weasels asleep? We have got him safe enough."

"But he is a desperate fellow."

"Let him be."

"And he will break out of prison if you don't mind."

"But we will mind. We have got him in number six, and if he gets out of that, I will give him leave."

"Number six?"

"Yes. In course, you don't know, but number six is in the inner-keep, and there he is as safe as ninepence; and besides, he's got half-a-hundred weight of irons on him, so you needn't be afeerd of his getting away. Ha! ha!"

"Well, that's satisfactory," said Claude, giving Jack a sly kick under the table.

"Very," said Jack.

"It's to be hoped they will hang him," added Claude, as he again pushed the glass to the man, and then as before, the turnkey took his drink before he replied; placing the empty glass upon the table, he said, as he drew a long breath—

"Hang him? of course. That's settled."

"But he ain't tried."

"No matter, it's settled. Thank you, for me, sir; I must be off now, my time is just upon up. If you stay in Oxford a few days longer, for I take it you are only visitors, you will see Dick Turpin tucked up."

"We shall certainly stay. Good evening to you."

"Good evening, and your servant, gentlemen."

The official personage who had made the revelation regarding Dick being in number six in the inner-keep, then took himself off, much to the relief of Jack and Claude, who now waited to consult with each other, as to what was to be done immediately regarding the preparation for attempting the rescue of Dick from the old prison.

CHAPTER CXCI.

A PERILOUS NIGHT ADVENTURE IN OXFORD.

From the experience that our readers have had of Claude and his friend and companion Jack, it may be well supposed that in their cogitations concerning what was to be done for the rescue of Dick, they did not throw aside any possible plan that might suggest itself, on account of any dangers that might surround it.

On the contrary, it is highly probable that to those most adventurous spirits, danger was a kind of excitement, that was now in a manner essential to their existence, and there was one thing they felt convinced of, namely, that the most dangerous path was generally the most direct to any object.

"Well, Jack," said Claude. "What is your conclusion?"

"In good faith," said Jack, "I cannot come to one; but if I mistake not very much, Claude, you have."

"You are right."

"Then let me hear it, Claude, not that I may in any shape or way criticise it, but that I may be prepared to carry it out as far as my powers will let me. You are far more more fertile in expedients than I am."

"I don't know that, Jack. But you must have observed that next door to the jail in which Dick is confined there is a glover's shop."

"Yes, Claude."

"Well, then, Jack, it strikes me that we must get admittance to the prison in some way through that house, after its inhabitants have all retired to rest. It is rather something new to break into a prison, especially when such as you and I, Jack, are concerned in the affair; but I really think, for once in a way, we can manage it."

"No doubt of it, Claude."

"Then you do not think that there is anything extravagant in my proposal, Jack?"

"Very far from it. When one of our profession breaks out of a prison, he of course labours under every possible disadvantage, and such tools and implements as he requires for the purpose he has to get in with much risk and difficulty; but we being upon the outside, and perfectly free to possess ourselves of what means and appliances we like, may surely break in."

"I am glad, indeed, Jack, that you view it in that spirit. We will, from the plan of the prison we have got, make a careful sketch of our route to Dick's cell, and at midnight we will come into Oxford, and commence our enterprise."

"Good," said Jack. "I am willing. What shall we need in the way of tools and implements?"

"A couple of the best ropes we can get, each forty feet in length, some strong grappling hooks, and your picklocks, which you know how to use as well, Jack, as any man breathing, and I will take with me a small crow-bar of iron. Our pistols we will, of course, keep prepared, so that, I think, we may defy any accidents."

"I hope so, Claude."

"Then come along, and let us make our purchases, and after that we will go to our inn, and get our supper, and, then, if possible, we will get back to the town without our host knowing that we have left the inn at all."

"That, too, may be managed, Claude."

They both now left the public-house, where they had been so signally successful in getting the information they sought, and sallied into the principal street of Oxford to purchase the various articles they wanted.

In such a place as Onford they did not find much difficulty in suiting themselves with the ropes and the hooks. At a cutler's, too, Claude purchased two capitally-made small crow-bars, so that they repaired to the inn capitally provided, although, even under Jack's great coat, the rope was rather a bulky article.

They found that the landlord had got the supper for them that they had so liberally ordered, and having, to their great satisfaction, discussed it, they, under the plea of fatigue, retired very early to rest, or rather to their bed-rooms, where they were supposed to be going to rest, but where rest they did not.

"It's all right," said Jack. "My window looks into the garden of the inn, and there is only a slight paling to cross to get into a lane that runs parallel with the High-street."

"That will do, Jack."

It was nearly eleven o'clock, and all sounds had for the last half hour ceased in the inn, when Claude and Jack prepared themselves for their enterprise. They dressed themselves as compactly as they could, so as to leave as little straggling portions of apparel about them as possible, that might impede them in flight, or in climbing; and each winding round him one of the pieces of rope, to which they had firmly attached the grapples they had bought, they cautiously opened the window of Jack's bed-room.

"You have not forgotten your pick-locks, Jack?" whispered Claude.

"Oh, no—no. You have the crow-bars?"

"All right: and I think you looked to the priming of your pistols, and you have the file with you?"

"A couple of as sharp-biting files, Claude, as ever made war against fetters, I have about me. If I can only lay one of these across Dick's chains, they won't hold him long."

"Good. This little balcony is not above eight feet from the ground, so we can easily drop it. I think the moon is getting up, Jack."

"I hope not, Claude."

"So do I, for no doubt we shall do better without it; but it can't be helped. What a cold air is blowing."

Jack took off his hat, and held his face up to the night clouds for a few moments, and then he said—

"We shall have rain."

"Think you so?"

"I am sure of it. I have been so much in the open air at all times, and in all seasons, that I cannot doubt it for a moment; the signs and tokens of the coming weather are all familiar now to me. Look how the dark clouds hang over that light part of the sky, where the moon would be if she could only find an opening through which to show her fair face."

"You are right Jack. Come on."

They both sprang from the window into the garden, and then they paused for a few moments to listen, and make sure that they had given no alarm to any one. All was as still as the very grave, and in cautious whispers, Jack said—

"This way, Claude. This is the way to the little fence. There, do you not feel the rain upon your face now?"

"I do."

The night grew very black indeed, as Claude followed Jack across the garden of the inn. They both vaulted over the little fence Jack had spoken of, and found themselves in a straggling lane. It took them two or three minutes observation there, to be certain of the route, and then off they went at a good pace for Oxford.

When they got some distance from the inn, they conversed a little more freely together, for the road was perfectly quiet, and there did not seem to be a soul stirring in it but themselves.

"Well Jack," said Claude. "We will take our success so far, as a good omen of completing our enterprise."

"I hope we may, Claude."

"To determine to succeed is one half-the battle. I only hope that no one, by any foolish opposition to us, will force us to use our pistols."

"It would be a pity, Claude; but we have what we believe to be our duty to do as well as they have theirs; and so no more than they will, must we hesitate."

"You are right, Jack; and it gives me no small pleasure to find you are in such a spirit."

Jack's prediction about the rain was now most abundantly verified, for it began to come down in a thick small shower, and with a steadiness, too, that pretty well showed it had set in for the night. Such a state of the weather was considered by both Jack and Claude as highly favourable to their enterprise, for they knew that upon such a night all persons would be indisposed to active watching, and that the interior yards of the prison would, in all probability, be deserted.

In all the distance from the inn to Oxford, they only met two persons; and the rain was falling so thickly and so steadily when they got into the streets, that they traversed several and only met one watchman, and he was snugly ensconced in his box, and merely mumbled a "Good-night," as they passed him.

Jack answered him.

They then passed a house in which some Collegians, who were staying out in defiance of all college rules, were carousing, and singing tipsy choruses.

"That," said Claude. "is how our great legislators and statesmen get their wisdom."

"Humph!" said Jack, "I rather think that they got it from the rent rolls of their estates"

Claude laughed, but as they were now near the prison, they no longer spoke upon any indifferent subject, and their whole thoughts and inquiries become concentrated upon the object they had in view.

The glover's shop was closely shut up, and from top to bottom of the house there was not a vestige of a light visible.

"All's right," whispered Jack.

"Yes, I think so. Look well about you, Jack, and see that no one is lurking in the neighbourhood."

They both walked about the street for a few moments, but no one was near, and then they dived into the doorway of the glover's house, which happened to be a very deep and old-fashioned one, with quaintly carved door-posts.

Jack tried the lock with his skeleton keys.

"How goes it?" whispered Claude.

"All's right. There's only one bolt, and that's below. Give me one of the jemmies, and I will soon loosen it."

There was a creaking noise for a moment or two, and then a rather sharp crack.

"Done?" said Claude.

"Yes. I have cracked this crib, at all events. Come in, Claude. All's right. Nobody is stirring. I wish we knew what family there was in the house."

"So do I. Perhaps we shall find out, Jack, before we get out of it again?"

"We may."

They closed the shop-door now again, and in case any officious watchman, in his rounds, should take it into his head to try it, Jack shot the top bolt into its socket, advising Claude that he had done so, in case they should have to make a hasty escape, and he (Claude) should chance to reach the door first and find it fast, contrary to his expectation.

"Hush, Jack!"

"Did you hear anything, Claude?"

"At the moment I thought I did. It sounded like the sudden closing of a door or a window somewhere in the upper part of the house."

"The deuce it did."

They were both now profoundly silent for the space of about five minutes, during which they listened intently, but not the smallest sound met their ears, so that they came to the conclusion that either Claude had been mistaken altogethe in the noise he had supposed he heard, or that it was some accidental sound in the house, which was no indication of any one really being up and stirring.

"It's all right enough, I think, Claude," whispered Jack.

"Yes, I think so, too. Come on."

"We must see our way, first."

Jack ignited a very small piece of wax-taper, and shielding it with his hands, they both looked about them for some mode of getting from the shop into the house. A small door, with a little muslin-blind, presented itself to their observation, and they immediately opened it. It led into a parlour, in which lay the remains of a supper. From this parlour a door opened to a staircase and a passage.

"We are right enough now," said Jack. "If we can only find some unoccupied room at the top of the house, we will soon be upon the roof, for if it has not a trap-door to it, I don't think it will take us very long to make one."

A cat got up from the hearth, upon which she had been sleeping, and looked at them.

"Poor pussey," said Claude.

"Fuff!" said the cat.

"Oh, very well," added Claude, "don't be friends then, if you don't feel inclined. I'm sure I don't want to force my acquaintance upon you. You had better lie down again and fancy it's all right."

"Come on," said Jack. "There is not a sound in the house; I have been listening on the staircase. Kill that cat."

"No, Jack. Not if the success of all our enterprise was at stake."

CHAPTER CXCII.

DICK TURPIN SURPRISED BY A RATHER LATE VISIT.

Jack looked at Claude for a moment, and then he said—

"I forgot that these creatures were great favourites of yours, Claude."

"All creatures are, Jack."

"I know it. I spoke inconsiderately, and I should have been the last to like to carry out my own suggestion, Claude. Come on, all is profoundly still. It will not be prudent to carry even this faint light up the staircase, as it may flash under the door of some one's chamber, and betray us."

"The socks, Jack."

"Ah, true, I had forgotten."

From his pocket, then, Jack produced two pairs of stout worsted-socks, and he and Claude drew them on over their boots, so that their tread was completely muffled, and unless the stairs should happen to creak under their actual weight, they could now ascend them without the slightest noise.

"Keep close to the wall, Claude," whispered Jack. "Very few stairs make any sound, if you tread there."

"Yes—yes. I will."

Out went the little wax taper, and then they commenced their passage up the stairs, holding by the wall as they went, and treading as carefully as it was possible to tread. Luckily for them, the house was old and substantial, the timbers being of solid oak, so that the staircase made none of the complaints that modern ones are in the habit of doing upon any one ascending them. The whole building was only one story above the shop, but from the outside they had seen, that if they could only gain the roof they would be very nearly on a level with the outer wall of the prison.

Twenty five steps took them to the top of the staircase.

Jack touched Claude upon the arm, and whispered—

"I feel a room door. What do you think will be best to do?"

"Open it carefully."

"Very well. I can tell in a moment if any one is there by the feel of the air. That was an old trick that was taught me by a friend who is now no more. There is a warmth and a closeness in the air of a bed-room that you may know in a moment."

CLAUDE PRESENTING THE LETTER TO THE SHERIFF.

"Not a doubt. Proceed, Jack."

Jack found the handle of the door, and began very gently to turn it, but he found it had a slight propensity to squeak, and with such handles he knew that the safest plan was rapidity of action. In an instant he turned it, and it made no noise. The door yielded, and Jack put his head into the room. All was dark, but in a moment a female voice said—

"John! John! John!"

"What the deuce now," growled some one half asleep.

"I'm very uneasy, John."

"You always are!"

"Yes, but I'm certain I heard something down stairs, and it's really too bad of Maria not to have come home. John, do you hear?"

"Oh dear yes. Go to sleep."

"But, what, suppose there's thieves, John?"

"Oh, bother!"

"Do you want to have your throat cut? Would you like that, John? Tell me that."

"I tell you that I ain't afraid. I don't believe thieves now-a-days come anywhere at a mere venture; and if they have any information they know deuced well that there is nothing to be got here."

Jack and Claude stepped away from the door of the room very carefully. They did not dare to shut it while the glover and his wife were wide awake, but in their hearts they thought the glover a very sensible man, and wished his wife anywhere but where she was.

"Another door-handle," whispered Jack.

"Open it then," said Claude.

"Hush. You really speak incautiously loud."

The glover's wife kept on talking, which was so fortunate that it covered any slight noise that Jack might make in opening the door of the other room which he had found. Fearing the lock might have the same peculiarity as the other one, he turned it sharply as he had done the first, and then he opened the door. The cold air of that room in a moment convinced him that it was empty.

"All's right," he whispered to Claude.

"How do you mean?"

"That no one is here. Come in—come in. Pass me, and I will shut the door. Hush! what a odd noise."

"It is the rain upon the glass," whispered Claude, after a moment or two's silence.

"Ah, so it is, and as I live there is a skylight in this room, which may do us good service. We must have a light now, Claude. Close the door as softly as you can before I set a match in a flame."

Claude closed the door carefully so as not to produce the smallest sound, and in a moment afterwards, Jack had lit a phosphorus match, and a faint blue light shot over the apartment. He then set light to the little bit of taper, and they both stood profoundly still for a few moments, while Jack held it above his head and glanced around the apartment.

It was rather a mean looking bed-chamber; one of those smothering machines called tent-bedsteads stood against a wall; and the appointments altogether were such as showed that nobody of any importance slept in that room.

The rain, too, was in a monotonous manner, at intervals of about half a minute, dropping from the sky-light on to the floor of the room.

"Not a very splendid chamber," said Claude.

"No; but just the thing for us. I only hope whoever is the tenant of it that they will not trouble it to-night. Now, Claude, can you give me a hoist up to the skylight?"

"Certainly."

By the assistance of Claude, Jack got up to the skylight, which was slanting, and about the size of a smallish door. He found that it would open outwards, and then he got down.

"We can manage nicely," he said. "That table, and a chair upon it, will make it an easy enough job to get out and in; and the only thing now we have to dread is, some one coming to this room. But it is no use now stopping for trifles."

"Not a bit, Jack; so here's the table, and here's the chair."

By judiciously placing the table and chair, they found that they could obtain a perfect command over the glass trap-door. Claude opened it, and then the rain come in in a thick mist, dashing against his face, and at once extinguishing the little light.

"Can you get out, Claude?"

"Oh, yes, easily. We must feel our way when we do get out through it, for no light will live on such a night as this."

"Be careful, Claude."

"Depend upon that, Jack. Follow me as closely as you can."

They both got out on to the roof of the glover's house, and so intensely dark was the night that, when they were there, they were for several minutes afraid to move. This was not the fear of cowardice though, for there was neither glory nor profit to be got by being dashed to pieces by a fall from a house-top.

"It would not have been amiss after all," whispered Jack, "if the night had been a little finer."

"Never mind," replied Claude. "Only wait a little, and we shall get accustomed to the very dim light that comes from the night sky. Already, objects are beginning to show me their outlines more distinctly. Do you not see something very black just before us?"

"Yes; it is a stack of chimneys."

"Then, upon the other side is the wall of the prison."

"You are right, Claude; and, as you say, objects are now getting each moment more and more distinct. We shall be able after all, I think, to see our way tolerably well.'

"Hark!"

A clock, belonging to one of the Universities, struck two.

"I had no idea it was so late," said Claude. "We really must lose no time, Jack. Let us creep round the chimney shaft, and have a look at the wall of the jail."

Cautiously, Claude crept over, and Jack followed him. A tile got loose and rolled along the roof, and then fell into the street, with a sudden crash. They both paused for a few moments, but as no notice was taken of the noise, they concluded it had given no alarm, and they proceeded as before.

It was not a difficult matter to get round the chimney; and when they were upon the other side of it, they found that, rising to the slope of the roof, the wall of the prison was not far short of ten feet above them. Still, that height was not so great but that assisting each other, they could climb it. The great difficulty now consisted in the fact that there was some jagged iron work on the top of the wall.

"We must be careful," said Claude, "of those spikes."

"I think it would be better to remove them with the crow-bar," said Jack. "They have most probably been up since the jail was built; and so, in all likelihood, are as rotten as possible, being exposed for so long a time to all weathers. If you will give me a hoist up, Claude, I think I can bring them down."

Claude was quite strong enough to support Jack kneeling upon his shoulders; and so Jack could easily reach the iron work, which he found to be even more thin and rotten than he had supposed, for a large space of it came away with very little force, indeed; and Jack handed it down to Claude to place gently against the chimney shaft. By this process, about four feet of the prison wall was left perfectly clear for them to get upon; and the next thing they had to think of was the mode of fastening the ropes, so as to descend in safety on the other side, and so as likewise to leave them in such a state that they could make a rapid escape.

Their eighty feet of rope gave them plenty to spare; so after a very brief consultation, they resolved to fasten one end right round the chimney shaft, and then carrying the other over the wall and down into the prison-yard beneath, where it would easily reach.

This was no sooner decided upon, than it was done; and in such experienced hands, it was done well too. In the course of three or four minutes, Jack had slid down the rope into the prison-yard, and Claude followed him.

The darkness in that yard was very great, surrounded as it was by high walls and buildings, and the rain had reduced it to a most wofully sloppy state, unequally paved as it was; but those little disagreeables were of small consequence. The great thing was to meet with no prison official, which most probably would have been the case, had the night been not the boisterous and inclement one that it was.

As it happened, not a soul was to be seen. They stood close to the wall for a few moments, crouching down and listening intently, and watching the various windows of the jail. In only one was there the faint vestige of a light.

"All's right," said Jack. "Have you the plan of the prison well in your mind, Claude?"

"Yes; so well, that I can lead you direct to Dick's cell; but we shall have a couple of doors to open."

"I don't think they will be very serious obstacles."

"I hope not. Come on."

Claude crossed the paved yard; and after feeling along the wall of the building, he stopped at a small door, near which was a pump that they could just dimly see standing up before them.

"This," he said, "is the door we seek. See about the opening it, Jack."

While Claude kept watch, Jack carefully examined the fastenings of the door, and found that they were all outside; as from the paved yard, it was never expected any attempt upon it would be made. There were two bolts and a large lock. The latter took some time to pick, for it happened to be unusually good; but, at length, Jack succeeded, and as he had already drawn back the bolts, the door yielded.

"Come in," he whispered. "We are safer out of the yard."

"Wonderfully safer," said Claude: "and not a little more comfortable, for the rain is coming down faster than ever, Jack."

They both passed through the door-way, and Jack closed the massive door again. The darkness in which they found themselves now was truly of the most profound character. Claude could not see the smallest vestige of his hand before his face; and as they felt pretty certain none of the officials of the prison were there, Jack began to procure a light.

In a few moments he had ignited the little taper, and they began then to look about them.

CHAPTER CXCIII.

THE ALARM, AND THE RE-CAPTURE OF DICK TURPIN.

The place in which our adventurers now found themselves was anything but an inviting one. It was one of the long, damp, dismal passages of the prison, narrow and inconvenient; and even in the day time, when the sun was brightly shining, it was a place of gloom; but in the eyes of Claude and Jack, it had a special recommendation; for it was the route they sought, and which they knew, by their plan of the prison, would lead them to Turpin's cell.

"This will do," said Claude.

"Hush! Do not speak so loud. We don't know who may occupy one of the neighbouring cells, and some prisoner might think it no bad way of carrying favour with the magistracy, to give an alarm, that something unusual was going on.'

"You are right, Jack,"

"This is the way," added Jack, in the same cautious whisper in which he spoke. "This is the way, right on, and then an abrupt turn to the left."

"Yes, I recollect," replied Claude. "So says our plan, and, no doubt, that can be relied upon."

"Oh, most implicitly, I should say."

Jack's little taper light was of immense assistance to them; and while its flame was so small, that it was not at all likely to send a wandering ray through every key-hole, or under any door, yet it sufficiently enlightened them how to act, and how to proceed.

They found that the passage in which they were was no less than forty paces in length before they came to the abrupt turn to the left, which the plan indicated to them. But when they reached that turning they knew that they were in the very passage from which the cell of their friend Turpin's opened.

"Here are the little doors," said Jack. "There ought to be eight of them; and it is quite a mercy that that officer at the public-house was so loquacious as to let us know in which Dick is."

"Yes, and here is the number."

They both paused now opposite to the cell door, and Claude placed his ear against it to listen if he could hear any one stirring within it; but all was as still as the very grave itself.

"Do you hear anything?" said Jack.

"Not a sound."

"What if they have removed him to some other part of the prison?"

"Then our trouble is all for nothing, and we can only get back as quickly as we can the way we came. I don't feel disposed to give it up quite so easily, though."

With this, Duval placed his mouth to the key-hole of the door, and in a prolonged whisper, he said—

"Dick Turpin—Dick, Dick—It is I—Claude Duval."

They heard a stir in the cell as if some one had fallen to the floor of it, and then a voice said—

"Confound it, what have I been dreaming about to fall off this shelf that they call a bed, in this den? I wonder what the time is?"

"Rather late," said Claude through the key-hole.

"Ah—what? Who is that?"

"Hush!—not so loud. Don't you know my voice?"

A sudden rush was made against the inside of the cell door that made it shake again, and Turpin said, in a much louder voice than caution would have dictated—

"Who is there? Speak again—speak again, I say, if it be not after all a mere dream."

"Hush, Dick."

"Ah, again I hear you. Who are you?"

"Hush, Dick; if you speak so loud you will ruin all. It is I, Claude, and Jack. We will get you out of this fix it we can. Be quiet until we get the door open, and then we will tell you all."

Not a sound came from the interior of the cell, and while Claude held the light, Jack began upon its fastenings. They consisted of a strong, long, and an iron bar, that went right across the door, and fitted into a kind of looped socket, to which was appended a massive padlock.

"Can you manage it?" said Claude.

"Oh, yes, I think so. All this fuss, after all, only takes up two locks, and I hope to be able to pick them both."

"Do so, then, as quickly as you can."

The actual lock of the cell door did not present any very serious obstacle to Jack; he soon forced back its bolt into the lock again, but the padlock was of some very primitive construction, and none of his false keys would touch it.

"We must appeal to the saws, Claude," he said.

"Will not the crowbar do?"

"I think not; I will try one of them. Ah, there it goes snap in too. I thought as much; it's not the fault of the jemmy, but the real fact is, we asked it to do too much, and getting beyond its strength, it broke. Now for the saw."

Jack produced a small saw, that did not look as if it could cope with an iron bar, but it did so, and it was truly astonishing with what celerity it cut into the metal, passing through it in the course of about five minutes, and without making any more than a slight grating noise.

"All's right," said Jack, "now the door ought to open. Why don't it, Claude, I wonder."

"It seems as tight as ever, Jack."

"It only sticks, I am convinced. Tell Turpin to push it on the inside; you you see, we cannot get any good hold of it, or we should soon enough have it open."

"Push the door, Dick," whispered Claude, through the key-hole.

The push that Dick Turpin gave the door upon this intimation, was enough to drive it down from its hinges; as it was, it flew open with such a force, that Turpin rolled out into the passage nearly upsetting both Claude and Jack.

"Hilloa!" said Jack, "not quite so fast."

"Where are you going, Dick?" said Claude.

Turpin was upon his feet again in a moment, notwithstanding he was grievously encumbered by his fetters, and holding out both his manacled hands, he said—

"Good gracious, Claude and Jack, how in the name of all that's wonderful came you both here? I can't yet persuade myself that I am in my senses. This must surely be some too vivid dream merely. Speak to me."

"It is real, Dick."

"Quite real," said Jack, "and we hope to get you out of this stone jug by the same route that we came into it. You don't suppose that we can have any other errand here?"

"And is it possible that you two have broken into the jail to rescue me? Can I believe as much?"

"It is tolerably possible, Dick," said Claude. "The impossibility would have been in our at all deserting you under such circumstances, while anything remained to be done with a chance to your rescue. But every minute is of value to us. Jack, relieve him of his fetters, and then we will be off directly."

"Oh, my friends," said Turpin, clasping his hands. "What can I, what ought I to say?"

"Nothing at all, just now, Dick" added Claude. "We shall, I hope, have plenty of time to talk, when we are outside of the walls of this not very inviting abode."

Jack at once busied himself with the fetters. They were revitted on to Dick so that it was only by the help of the exquisite steel saws that he had with him that he, Jack, could succeed in freeing Dick from the heavy shackles in which he was confined.

"I shall feel something like myself," said Dick, "when all this infernal ironmongery is off my limbs. Nothing depresses a man so much as putting him in fetters. They have such an effect upon me, that they almost stop me from thinking, and I almost doubt if I should have had the courage to make an attempt at escape from this place while I wore them."

"There they go," said Jack, as he sawed through the last of the rings and freed Dick from them.

"I feel myself already free," said Dick.

"Don't let us cry out," said Claude, "before we are out of the wood. I hope and expect that nothing very material will come in our way, but still unexpected events do happen, and all I have to say to you, Dick, is, to do nothing rashly."

"I will be guided by you."

"Very well, then, let us come on. Ten minutes ought to place us in safety now, if we meet with no obstruction."

"Hush!" said Jack.

"What's the matter?"

"Don't you hear the bell ringing violently?—Come this way."

They all went to the corner which they had to turn to get into the long passage, and when there, they distinctly heard the violent ringing of a bell, but from the manner in which it was rung and from the time of night at which it sounded, it was tolerably clear that it portended something being rather amiss within the prison.

"Come on," said Claude. "Boldness may save us now. But I feel assured that we have no time to lose. That bell may concern us, and indeed I don't know how we can translate it otherwise, just now; I will lead the way. Put out the light, Jack, the moment we get to the end of the long passage."

"I will," said Jack.

Off went Claude at a race down the passage, and he was closely followed by Dick Turpin and Jack. The little light would not stand any such violent progress through the cold air, and the consequence was, that out it went before Jack had taken half-a-dozen steps. They all went on, however, through the intense darkness as well as they could, and as the passage was tolerably straight and very narrow they could not go far wrong, although they did, by making accidental deviations to the right or to the left, bump themselves occasionally against the walls.

By holding out his hands before him, Claude prevented himself from coming with any great concussion against the door at the end of the passage, and opening it quickly he passed out into the court-yard.

The rain was falling quickly.

"On, on," he cried.

They followed him quickly, and then a gun went off somewhere in the prison with a loud report. It was not fired in that court-yard at all, so the only way they could account for it was, that it was a signal that something was amiss and that the turnkeys and warders were all to be on duty and on the alert.

The distance from the doorway through which our adventurers issued to the court and then to the place where the ropes hung from the wall top, was by no means very great, and through the dashing rain Claude went at great speed. He felt now that rapidity of action was a safer thing to look to than quietness, so he did not hesitate to cross that court-yard at a scamper.

By a little feeling on the wall, he soon touched the rope, and turning to Dick, he said—

"You can climb?"

"Like a cat, they say."

"Very good. Go up this rope, and when you cross the wall you will find a good enough footing on a house-top, and there wait for us. I hope we shall be soon with you."

"No," said Dick. "If a thousand deaths were behind me I would not go first. The danger is great to the last one, and I will be that last. That is my determination."

"Up, Dick—up."

"No, Claude! I cannot. Remember what time is lost by trying in vain to change my fixed resolve."

"By Heaven! that is true!" said Claude. "Follow me, Jack, as quick as you can."

Claude seized the rope, and by an exertion of great strength in the arms, he began to ascend it with rapidity. When he had got about six feet up, Jack followed, and the moment that he did so, the trampling of feet was heard in the court-yard, and through the murky sloppy night air come the flash of a lantern. A loud voice called out,—

"This way! this way! They must be close by here."

Neither Claude, Jack, nor Dick now spoke, but the former, by making gigantic efforts, reached the top of the wall; and there he paused, hanging over it and peering down into the court-yard to see what was going on. Jack was very near the top of the rope, but Dick was not many feet from the ground, when with a loud shout, the armed party in the court-yard rushed to the spot, and holding up their lanterns, at once exhibited the whole scene that was enacting.

CHAPTER CXCIV.

TURPIN IS TRIED AND CONDEMNED TO DEATH.

The situation of Turpin was now most critical, as was indeed that of Jack likewise. It was an agony to Claude to see the peril of his friends, to feel that from where he was he could render them no assistance, and that he was compelled to be a mere spectator of what was going on.

There might be unknown perils behind him. The glover's house, for all he knew to the contrary, might be full by that time of foes; but he had ears for nothing and eyes for nothing, but the proceedings in that dismal court-yard into which the rain was pelting with such fury.

He called aloud for Turpin.

"Dick! Dick! Be quick! I pray you. Make an effort, and you are safe! Get six feet higher! I will shoot the first man who dares to molest you!"

"Oh, will you really?" said a voice from among the officers. "There, my lads, you see that man on the wall! Can none of you take a good enough aim to pick him off?"

In a moment, thus licensed to do so, for it was the governor of the jail who spoke, a couple of pistols were fired at Claude, and the bullets of both hit the wall some three or four feet below where he was.

A rush was made to the end of the rope, and it was quite impossible, shaken violently as it was, for Turpin to do more than cling to it; Jack got hold of Claude's hand and was drawn up, despite another shot that was fired at him.

"Where's Dick?" was Jack's first question, for he had only heard a tumult behind him, as by incredible exertions he ascended the rope and reached the parapet.

"Look below," said Claude.

The whole scene was now quite clearly to be seen in the court-yard. The rope was still shaken so violently by a couple of turnkeys that Dick could only hold on; he might, to be sure, have slid down, and doubtless that was what they wanted him to do; but he would not, and in a few moments the same voice that urged the turnkeys to use their pistols upon Claude, called out:—

"Turpin, if you don't come down this moment and surrender yourself, you will be shot. I will myself put an end to this suspense by taking your life."

"Fire away," cried Dick.

"He is lost," said Jack.

"I fear so," said Claude, who had a pistol in his hand pointed to the throng of persons in the court-yard, and quite ready to use if any urgent occasion should arise for it.

The lantern showed a tolerably bright light upon what was going on, and now Claude and Jack saw a man run from the group of prison officials and in a few seconds return with a ladder of about twenty feet long. He was a strong tall man; and unwieldly as that ladder was, he managed to move it with tolerable care and facility. To the indignation of both Claude and Jack, the man with the ladder struck Dick Turpin with it so severely that he fell from the rope heavily to the pavement of the court-yard, where he lay apparently insensible from the sudden blow and the fall combined.

"Did you see that?" said Jack.

"I did," said Claude, and at the same instant he fired his pistol, and the man with the ladder fell with a loud cry, and rolled over twice, ladder and all, on the pavement. "Did you see that, Jack?"

"Yes, Claude, and I never saw a shot that pleased me better. But we do no good by remaining here; Dick is among the Philistines, and we cannot help him now. We may be able to do so by taking care of ourselves."

"You are right, Jack. Come on."

Claude took the lead, and Jack followed him closely, over the slippery and uncertain tiles of the glover's house. They reached with some difficulty the skylight, by which they had got out of the attic; and it was a great satisfaction, even in the midst of all this disappointment, to find that it was in the same state as when they had left it; the table and the chairs still remained in their places, so that the descent into the room was easily enough managed.

"Come on, Jack," said Claude, "it's all clear; it's a good thing that whoever sleeps in this bed has not come home yet,"

"Yes; but we will yet think of something to aid Dick, Claude."

"We will aid him, Jack."

"You will be a little nearer to him than you think presently," cried a voice; a man precipitated himself upon Claude at the same time that another seized Jack by the legs before he could get off the table that was under the skylight.

Duval, under these trying circumstances, preserved his admirable presence of mind, and made no immediate resistance beyond keeping his arms free from the other's gripe.

"Help," cried Jack.

"All's right," said Claude. "Pray, my friend, who are you when you are at home, that has got hold of my throat?"

"An officer, and one who is determined to take you to jail, my fine fellow, be you who you may."

Claude in a moment slipped his body down to the waist of the man, and by an effort he flung him right over upon his head with a tremendous bounce on the floor of the room. The door at that moment opened, and a man with a light appeared, saying:—

"Have you caught the rogues, Mr. Tomkins?"

"Oh, yes, old boy," cried Claude, and then, observing Jack's rather awkward position, he with one blow of his fist knocked him down over his already prostrate companion. Another officer was in the room, but he only stood up against the wall with a little gilt staff in his hand, crying—

"Come, come, this won't do, you know; come, come, come."

"What's the matter with you?" said Claude.

"Come, come, come."

Claude snatched the staff out of his hand, and flinging it at the man with the candle, who was standing open-mouthed at the door of the room, and who was no other than the glover himself, who had risen and found his skylight open, and so had gone next door to the prison, and given the information that had produced the failure of the whole enterprise.

Believing that now he was all but a murdered man, he dropped the candle, and going backwards he forgot that the staircase was behind him, and away he went from the top to the bottom of it.

The candle did not go out by its fall, and Claude picked it up, saying—

"Come along, Jack, I don't think we have any more work to do here, and we may as well be lighted down stairs, as go tumbling along in the dark."

"Are you hurt at all, Claude?"

"Not a bit. Come on, all's right, now, I think, with us, if it be not so with poor Dick."

They hastily descended the stairs, and upon the first landing they came to, they found a young girl of about eighteen or twenty years of age, with only her night-clothes on, and a small bed-room taper in her hand, looking the picture of fright. She certainly mistook Claude and Jack for the officers, seeing them coming down very composedly with a light.

"Oh, gentlemen," she said, "have you caught the horrid wretches?"

"Yes, my dear, and all we want in return, is a kiss from those rosy lips."

"A what, sir?"

"A kiss," added Claude, as without further ceremony he took one, and Jack then followed his example, after which they descended the remainder of the stairs, and finding the street-door open, they both at once sallied out into the street.

"Well," said the girl, as she ascended the stairs to the upper rooms, "I had no idea the officers were such nice men. I wonder where uncle is, to be sure. Uncle! uncle!"

The rain was still falling in perfect torrents, when Jack and Claude, after all their dangers and really hair-breadth escapes, rushed out of the glover's house into the streets of Oxford. They kept well together, and hurried down the first turning they come to, so as to get as far from the jail as possible, and for the space of about five minutes neither of them spoke. The speed they went at, however, attracted the attention of a watchman, who in his mortal stupidity thought that two powerful men would of course allow themselves to be taken into custody by him. Stepping out of his box on to the pavement, he cried—

"Hilloa! stop!"

"Well?" said Claude,.

"Come, come, I can't allow anybody to go on at this rate. You look suspicious people, and that is quite enough for me."

"Well?" said Claude again, for he knew if he only hurried on, that the watchman would alarm the whole city with his rattle that hung by his girdle.

"But I say it isn't well," cried the watchman.

"Oh, he says he ain't well. Jack," said Claude. "What a pity it is, that a guardian of the night should not be well. We are learned doctors, I assure you, my friend, and I have no doubt we shall be able to do you a world of good."

"Do me good? Come, come, I shall take you both into custody, and march you off to the round-house. You are just the sort of characters we take up in Oxford."

"And you," said Claude, "are just the sort of character that we always knock down anywhere."

As he spoke, Claude made a dash at the watchman and caught him by the throat.

"Throw away his rattle, Jack," he said.

"It's gone," said Jack, as he broke it from the hold of the officious guardian of the night, and cast it down a neighbouring area. "It's gone, Claude."

"That will do."

Claude held the watchman so tightly by the throat that so far from his being able to cry out, it was only with the greatest difficulty imaginable he could draw breath enough to support life, and then with one thrust he flung him into the watch-box, and shutting it all up upon him, he cried—

"Give it a hoist, Jack. Once, twice—that will do."

Down went the watch-box upon its face with a crash upon the pavement, and the unfortunate guardian of the night found himself fairly imprisoned and as firmly fixed, as though he had been entombed alive.

The first person that passed that way fell sprawling over the watch-box, but by that time Claude and Jack had got quite out of the city, and were hastening, despite the rain that still fell in torrents, towards the Inn where their horses were waiting for them.

Before they reached that place Claude paused, and spoke to Jack, saying—

"By the morning this affair will have got wind on Oxford, with such additions and embellishments as such a story is pretty sure to carry with it, and as you and I will be tolerably well described, it will not at all do for us to linger here."

"Of course not," said Jack. "I think the best way will be to go to the stable-yard and get out our cattle ourselves, and be off."

"Where to, Jack?"

"Heaven only knows. If I thought there was the smallest chance of doing any good to Dick, I should say, let us remain in Oxford; but I am afraid that is now all gone and past."

"I don't feel quite sure of that, Jack."

"Indeed, Claude?"

"No, and I don't like to leave Oxford while there is life in our friend."

"Do not then. I am as willing to stay as possible. From our vallises we can easily get the means of making such alteration in our appearance as would puzzle a conjuror, and as the trial will be to-morrow, or rather we may say to-day, now, we shall not have long to wait."

"That is my thought, Jack. Something may arise yet, to enable us to be of use to Dick."

"I don't deny the possibility, Claude."

"But you think the probability small?"

"I own I do, and you must think so too; but in our time we have seen such improbable things come to pass, that I am willing to hope and expect something even against all my convictions."

"And I, too; so let us get our horses and then we can go right through the city and put up at some house at the end of it, where I dare say for a few days we shall be all safe and right enough."

By this time they had reached the fence at the back of the Inn garden, which they had crossed before so well.

CHAPTER CXCV.

AN UNEXPECTED SCENE AT AN EXECUTION NEAR OXFORD.

CLAUDE felt that this was the only course to pursue, and he and Jack in a very few moments were in the large stable-yard of the Inn, and creeping along in search of the door of the stable in which Jack had seen their steeds put up for the night.

"Are you sure you know it, Jack?" whispered Claude.

"Quite. What a pool of rain this yard is to be sure. Come on. This way, Claude—this way. Ah, here is the door, and it is not locked—all's right."

"I will keep watch, Jack, while you go in and saddle the horses as quickly as you can. Be careful about the girths, for who knows but we may have a gallop yet to-night."

"I will, Claude."

Jack disappeared into the stable, and Claude stood quite close to the door, in order that if any one should be accidentally looking from the Inn, they should not detect his figure against the night sky. Jack was compelled no procure a light in order to saddle the two horses, and the faint gleam of it came through a large chink in the ill-fitting door of the stable.

Suddenly, then, as Claude looked up at the Inn windows, he saw a light cross one of them, evidently from the inside, and then suddenly disappeared. He felt certain by that that some one was stirring in the Inn, and he whispered to Jack,—

"Quick! everybody don't sleep sound to-night."

"Ah! is it so?"

"Yes. But we may have time yet."

"Plenty. Here's your horse, Claude. Mount him at once, and I will get mine ready. We must and will be off if all the world should say no to it. In another hour hence, we don't know what may happen in this disagreeable town."

"As quick as you can with your horse, Jack."

"You be off, Claude."

"No, no! You know better than that while you say it. When did I be off, and leave you in any danger?"

"Never," said Jack, from the stable, while he was busy putting on the saddle on his own horse; but let a person be as quick as he may, such an operation as saddling two horses will occupy some few minutes; and although few, if any, could surpass Jack in the speed of such an operation, yet the person who was up in the old Inn had time to come down into the yard. Claude was not a little surprised to see a man in his night-dress, carrying a lighted candle, suddenly appear at a door that opened into the stable yard.

The moment that he did so, out went his light, which the wind and the rain were not at all likely to permit to exist many moments; but this circumstance did not seem to have the least effect upon the man, who, still holding the candle and candlestick exactly as if the former were in a state of ignition and doing him a deal of good in showing him his way, walked slowly and calmly into the stable yard

"What on earth can be the meaning of all this?" thought Claude. "Whoever that is he takes it remarkably easy. Jack, are you quite ready now? Here's some one coming, or else a ghost."

"A ghost?" said Jack, as he appeared at the stable door with his horse, already for the road. "A ghost! did you say, Claude?"

"Yes, I did. Only look where that figure in white glides along by the wall there. Do you not see it?"

"I do, indeed. Who is it?"

"Perhaps if you were to say, 'what is it?' you would be nearer the mark for surely it cannot be a living man."

"Let us mount, and be off," said Jack, as he sprang into his saddle. "I don't half like these kind of sights. Mount, Claude, mount at once, and let us get into the meadows."

Claude mounted, but yet he lingered.

"Stay a bit, Jack," he said. "This is too curious not to make one wish to stay and see the end of it. I pray you to stop a bit."

"If you wish it, Claude."

"I do, indeed, Jack. Only look where the mysterious figure comes. You can see how he holds the candlestick, and he believes that it lights him on his way. Only see how he steps over the puddles. By all that's good, ghost or no ghost, you will have a wet skin on such a night as this."

"I don't half like it, Claude. It looks ominous."

"Pho! pho! You hold the bridle of my horse. If we go away without finding out what all this means, we shall be puzzling ourselves about it at other times when we may be better employed. Hold the horse, Jack."

"What would you do Claude?"

"Go and meet the figure. If it be mortal, I should like to let him see that we are not afraid of him; and if anything else come to warn us of anything, I am determined it shall not have any excuse for leaving the warning in obscurity, for I will speak to it."

"Claude! Claude! you are fool-hardy, indeed you are. I beg that you will not go; it is much better to let these kind of sights be. Do not seek to make it more frightful than it is."

"Upon my word, Jack," said Claude as he dismounted, "I did not think you were so superstitious. I never yet saw anything worse than myself, and I don't think, do you know, that I ever shall; so whatever you do, don't let the horse stray. I will be back to you in a few moments."

Jack saw Claude stride across the yard in the direction of the figure with evident misgivings; but yet he took the bridle of the horse, and strung it round his arm so that it should not be startled into flight by whatever might happen. Claude did not for a moment pause in his progress towards the curious figure all in white, nor did that figure in any manner shrink from or avoid him, so that it was quite a curious thing to see them by the dim morning light and in the rain, gradually approaching each other.

It chilled Jack to look on at such a scene, for it was beyond his imagination to guess how it could possibly end; and now he saw Claude pause and step aside, and the white figure passed him without the remotest notice, and come on as though there had been no such person in its immediate vicinity.

"By Heaven!" said Jack, "it's to me it is coming! It won't speak to Claude. It's some visitor to me only, that is quite clear, and if it get's me to wait for it, I'm a Dutchman; flesh and blood is one thing, but ghosts in white are another, and I don't care how little I have to do with them."

With this, Jack did not wait another moment for Claude, but turning the horses' heads towards the slight fence that divided the Inn yard from the meadows, he made them both clear it at a bound. He had no intention of doing more than place the fence between him and the spectre, and when he had done so, he faced about again to look for Claude. He soon saw him running across the yard.

"Come!" said Jack; "come, Claude! quick! I cannot stay here. He is coming to me."

"And what then?" said Claude, as he placed his hands on the top of the little fence to vault over. At the moment that Claude made his spring, bang went some fire-arms from one of the windows of the Inn, and Jack thought he was hit, for Claude rolled on to the green sward on the meadow side of the fence, instead of alighting on his feet.

Jack saw the window from which the flash of the gun came, and drawing a pistol from his saddle, he at once fired at it, and from the crash of broken glass he was quite satisfied that he had hit his mark.

"All's right," said Claude, as he bounded to his feet and sprang to his saddle.

"You are not hurt, Claude?"

"Not a bit. The sudden noise startled me, and I slipped in taking my leap, that was all."

"Thank the fates for that. But look at the figure. It has turned again."

"It's only the landlord walking in his sleep, Jack."

"Walking in his sleep?"

"Yes. Did you never hear of that sort of thing before?"

"Oh, yes, often, and seen it too. I only wonder that it did not at once strike me as a solution of the mystery. But that gun or pistol shot was not fired by any one in their sleep, Claude."

"Not a bit of it. We have enemies now on the foot, Jack. My impression is that we are traced in some sort of way from Oxford. Ah, here they come. Now we shall see what they mean by it, and what force they are in."

The private back door of the Inn was suddenly now opened, and several persons with lanterns issued forth. A group of men immediately behind them appeared, and running across the yard, one cried,—

"Get us out some cattle as quick as you can, ostler. Take anybody's. It's on public service, and it will be all right. Stop! you villains! Surrender this instant, or it will be worse for you. You have shot Mr. Wolf."

"You don't say so?" said Claude. "And pray who is Mr. Wolf when he is at home?"

"The chief constable of Oxford, you villains! Oh, you will swing for this as sure as eggs are eggs. You had better give in at once, for there are eight of us, and we are determined fellows.

"Come on, Jack," said Claude. "That will do. We will leave these eight determined fellows to mount at their leisure."

Jack and Claude turned their horses' heads, but the moment they did so, bang, bang, bang, went no less than three pistols at them. In a moment Claude turned, and drawing one of his own pistols, he fired, crying,—"It was cowardly to keep your fire till our backs were to you. Now blaze away!"

With a shriek, one of the officers fell into the arms of his comrade, and everybody there was by far too busy to think of firing again at Claude and Jack, who once more tried to retreat; but they had not got many paces before a rattling volley of pistol-shots was sent after them, and one bullet struck Claude on the heel of his boot.

"A little higher," said Claude, "and it might have spoilt my dancing. Come on, Jack. I have no idea of being made an animated target of by a parcel of blundering police-officers, who might knock one over by chance."

"Not at all pleasant," said Jack.

They gave their horses their heads, and off they went over the meadows at a quick pace. The rain still came down, but not so heavily as it had, and the ground was disagreeably heavy; but still it was amazing the speed they made by going lightly over it, and finally coming to a privet hedge, they leaped it, and found themselves in a road that was tolerably hard and good.

"I don't want a race with those officers," said Claude. "We have other fish to fry."

"Certainly," replied Jack. "Let us trot along this road. We may come to some shelter for ought we know to the contrary."

"Very good. I shall not be very particular as to what it is if we can only give them the double in any way."

With this view, they trotted on, Claude taking slightly the lead; and as the dawn had now made considerable progress, they could see about them very well. In the course of a few moments they came to the lodge gates of some estate, and Claude at once drew up, saying, "Jack, this is the very place;" and then, without waiting for the smallest reply from Jack, he rung a smart peal at a bell, the handle of which hung close at hand.

"Who is there?" said a voice from one of the lodge windows.

"I," said Claude, in a voice of authority. "How dare you ask who is there? Open the gates directly."

"Yes, sir;—beg pardon, sir;—coming, sir," said the voice.

"So much for the power of impudence," said Claude to Jack. "Now, that fool thinks I am some one of great authority, although he cannot know me from Adam. You will see how obsequious he will be when he opens the gate."

"But he will find out his mistake, Claude."

"Not a bit of it. Do you think after the sample that he has of my temper, he will venture to ask me a question? Not he. Take my word for it, Jack, impudence in this world, which may be anybody's capital, if they know how to use it, goes a very long way indeed."

CHAPTER CXCVI.

TURPIN'S FATE APPEARS TO BE FIXED, BUT IS NOT SO.

Jack had hardly so much faith as Claude in the power of assurance; but he had to have his infidelity in that particular corrected, for in a few moments, the lodge-keeper, half dressed, rushed out of his little residence, and flung the gates wide open, saying as he did,—

"I am sorry, sir, I was not up. Hope you will excuse it, sir."

"Hold your noise!" said Claude.

The gate-keeper only bowed. "Of course," he thought to himself, "this must be some very great man, indeed, or he never could speak in such a tone to any one." Claude, followed by Jack, rode into the open space in front of the lodge, and then glancing about, he, seeing a little enclosed paddock of about a quarter of an acre close at hand, he said, sharply, "There are none of them up at the house yet, I suppose?"

"No, sir, if you please," said the gate-keeper.

"Ah! so I thought; I won't disturb them though. Quite time enough to put them all out of their way, and give them no end of trouble, and then the fidgets, for fear everything should not be just as I like, when they do get up. Here, turn the two horses into that paddock. Don't touch their gear—I and my friend will sit down in your little room here for a time."

"Yes, sir, of course, sir. I will set light to the fire. The family are early risers, sir, at the hall, and in an hour now, I daresay, the old gentleman will be stirring."

"Oh, will he! How is he looking now?"

"Pretty well, sir; but his lame leg will never let him be what he was."

"What! Ain't that any better?"

"No, sir, they say not."

Claude and Jack walked into the lodge, and they had hardly been there two minutes when, like a whirlwind, by swept some half dozen mounted men, no doubt from the Inn. Claude went to the little latticed window of the lodge, which commanded a tolerable view of the road, and he had the satisfaction to see the officers disappear, they, no doubt, having the full impression that they were in full cry after the two highwaymen. Claude thought it advisable to wait a few moments longer; and then, looking at his superb watch—the diamonds round the rim of which dazzled the eyes of the gate-keeper—he turned to Jack, and said—

"General, what say you to a canter, and then for us to come back here? By that time they will be up and stirring."

Jack, of course, understood Claude's aim, so he replied in a tone of well-assumed deference—

"As your Grace pleases."

When the gate-keeper heard that one of his guests was a general and the other a "Grace," they might both have wiped their boots on his back, if they had been so inclined, for the poor creature had been so accustomed all his life to look upon the possessors of titles as some superior creation that he had never the remotest idea that they were but poor frail mortals like himself.

"The horses to the gate," said Claude, with a sharpness that made the man jump as though a pistol had gone off close to his ear.

"Oh, yes—yes my lord—that your grace. Yes, directly."

"What an idiot," said Jack, when he left the little room to obey Claude's imperious orders.

"One of many, Jack."

"No doubt of it. But what a humiliating thing it is to think of, that one of God's creatures, with some brains in his head, should make himself such a crawling sycophant to another."

"It is, Jack. But you will find that it is the slave that always makes the tyrant, and not the tyrant the slave."

"I believe you are right, Claude."

This little highly philosophical conversation was put a stop to, by the gate-keeper crawling into the room to say that the horses were ready, upon which out strode Claude and Jack, and without so much as a "thank you," or one word of civility, they mounted their steeds and rode off, the gate-keeper keeping his body bent quite at a right angle until they were out of sight.

"Ah," he said, as he closed the gate. "There's real gentlemen for you. Don't come for nobody at all, and gives as much trouble as possible, and ready to snap your head off for nothing. That's how you may always know a real gentleman from the sham ones. A duke, no doubt, and some general. I'll run up to the house and see if anybody's up, and tell 'em they will have visitors to breakfast soon."

Claude and Jack took precisely the other direction to that which the officers took, and soon placed a couple of miles between them and the Inn which had so nearly been the scene of a serious misadventure to them. They then came out upon a much broader road than the one they were upon, and they saw a finger-post, upon which the words "To Oxford" let them know in which direction to go.

"You don't wish me to abandon Dick?" said Claude. "You have no disinclination, I hope, to return to Oxford, Jack, even after what has taken place?"

"None in the least, Claude."

"I am glad of that. I don't like like to do anything against your judgment, Jack, but in good truth I know that both you and I are such adepts in disguises that I feel assured if we once get an opportunity of changing our apparel, we shall do remarkably well. Who is this coming along the road?"

"A Jew," said Jack, "I think.—Yes—look at his bag."

"You are right. I wonder if he resides at Oxford. If so, I should not be at all disinclined to trust him to some extent. A confidant would be invaluable to us just now, Jack; and it is highly probable he might be bought for a hundred pounds or so, which would be no great object to us, as we could make somebody in Oxford pay it in all likelihood before we left."

"Easily," said Jack. "Shall we speak to him and sound him a little upon the matter?"

"Yes—yes, do it."

By this time the Jew, who was rather a poor looking man, and to all appearance old, and a little lame, had got close up to them, and then he paused, and shading his eyes from the light which came strongly in that direction, he said—

"Yes, it's all right. Claude Duval, my dear, how are you? and, Jack, my boy, I hope you are well?"

"Why, how is this, sir?" said Claude; "you know us?"

"Yes, surely, haven't I been looking for you and trudging about the roads for the last four hours, ever since that shindy at the stone jug? To be sure I have".

"But I am certain I never saw you before," said Claude.

CLAUDE AND JACK RESCUING TURPIN FROM THE SCAFFOLD.

"Nor I," said Jack.

"But I have seen you both in London. At the White Bear in Oxford Street I saw you twice, and I don't forget people in your line of business. Be so good as to read that."

With these words the Jew took from his pocket a common horn snuff-box, and after unscrewing the lid with a squeak that set all Claude's and Jack's teeth on edge, he handed the former a little scrap of paper, upon which was written:

"Trust Zadoc. Dick Turpin."

"Oh, then, you are a friend of Dick's?"

"I am in the business and a friend of all customers. I have a little place in the town and a little place out of it; and between the two I pick up a crust. Dick, who is in the jug, knows me, and gave me that, in case I wanted to do a little business with any friend of his. I heard all about what happened at the jail, and I at once knew that when the nabs mentioned you they were right. But they don't know Jack."

"Then how did you know me?" said Jack.

"Oh, I knew you and Claude were together, so I guessed it was you; but all the roads will be too hot to hold you in another hour. The beaks and the judges will take a little trouble, and they are going to swear in a hundred special constables on purpose for you, so that they are determined to have you if they can. The only safe thing for you is, off and away."

"And that I do not like," said Claude.

"Not like?" said the Jew, "Not like?"

"No, Zadoc! I have made up my mind, and so has Jack made up his, to stay and see the last of Dick if we cannot save him. I hope that something will yet turn up to enable us to do him a good turn; but go we will not until the breath is fairly out of his body."

The Jew considered for a few moments, and then he said:—

"Well, well! wilful men must have their way. Follow me, if you wish to be free from the grabs for the rest of to-day. Come this way, and I will take you to where you will have time to think without being feared to look about you."

"I thank you," said Claude; "but of course this is a matter of business."

"Quite."

"Then you will allow us to convince you that you will not be badly paid; take this fifty-pound-note as an earnest of our bargain together, and half-a-dozen such shall not stand in the way of Dick's release from limbo."

The Jew held the note up between his eyes and the sky for a few moments, and then with a nod of approbation he rolled it up into a little ball and put it in his pocket.

"Good," he said.

"I hope so," said Claude.

"Excuse me," said Zadoc, "I did not allude to the note; I meant that we were quite agreed that everything was to be done that could be done for Dick. I have often heard, Claude Duval, that you were more than liberal, and this proves it. It is a sound policy to pay men like me well. You will find that out in the long run."

"I have found it out long ago," said Claude, "so now lead on, Master Zadoc, to this place of safety that you talk of, where we may have the privilege of thinking without the necessity of keeping our eyes on the stretch for enemies."

"That I will do," said Zadoc. "Come on."

He went to the side of the road and opened a large white gate, which looked as if it led into some orchard, but Claude was not one who ever hesitated. He trusted, or he did not; and if he did, he trusted implicitly; so, without a moment's hesitation he followed the Jew through the white gate, and Jack followed Claude.

Zadoc closed the gate again, and locked it. Then he took a small silver whistle from his pocket and blew a wailing kind of note upon it that at the moment, if no one had seen how it was produced, might have puzzled them to say whether it was the call of some wild bird or a mere artificial sound.

In the course of two or three minutes then, during which, Zadoc conversed in a low tone with Claude, an old man and a boy came round some large laurel bushes and bowed to the party. Zadoc spoke to the old man and boy in a language unknown to Claude, and then turning to him, he said—

"If you will let him take your horses they will be well cared for, and whether I am here or not he will deliver them to you. He will not forget you, and to summon him you have only to whistle with as prolonged a note as possible, as he is not very bright in hearing, and his little grandson is not always here."

Claude and Jack at once dismounted, and gave their steeds to the old man and the boy.

"I have a whistle," said Jack, "which I always carry with me in case Claude and I should be separated by any accident, so that I shall easily be able to give him the signal."

"That is all right," said the Jew; "but I don't expect that there will be any hurry or emergency, or that you will have occasion to come here without me; but it is as well to be provided against any possible emergency."

"You are quite right," said Claude. "This is your country place then, I suppose, in which you transact business?"

"Yes, but I don't let all my customers come here. It is only such as yourselves that I let into this secret. Follow me to the house. It is but a cottage, and yet you will find yourselves more secure in it than in many a palace."

"There is not a doubt of that," said Claude. "I have no great faith in the security of palaces."

CHAPTER CXCVII.

SOMETHING ENERGETIC IS DONE FOR DICK TURPIN.

CLAUDE was specially well pleased at their meeting with the Jew; and following his established rule in such cases, he trusted him implicity. The reader will not fail to recollect how frequently Claude has insisted upon this rule of confindence as being one well worth the following.

Jack could not feel so fully and fearlessly, as Claude, a confidence in any one, and the consequence was that he followed with much more of a look of doubt the footsteps of Zadoc.

The distance to the Jew's cottage was sufficient to remove it from the high-road, so that it was completely out of ear-shot of any chance passenger.

"You will always find this, if you please to avail yourself of it," said Zadoc, "a place of refuge. All I ask of you or Jack is what I think I have a right to ask."

"And what may that be?" said Claude.

"Simply, that you will never come to it or leave it when, to your knowledge, any one can observe you, for if once the police set an eye of suspicion upon this little place, its usefulness will be gone at once, and for ever."

"That is a condition that we shall not forget," said Claude. "You hear it, Jack, and of course subscribe to it?"

"Certainly," replied Jack. "It would, indeed be a monstrous thing to avail oneself of the hospitality of any place, and then for ever afterwards invest it with such a suspicion, that it shall be of no use to any one else. I would die at the gate of this place, rather than I would enter while to my knowlede a human eye was upon me."

"I thank you both," said the Jew. "Your promises are quite sufficient for me, and here then you may find yourselves quite at home, and I daresay you have no sort of objection to such a breakfast as we can find for you."

The door of the house yielded to Zadoc's touch, and he slipped on one side to allow his visitors to enter the place. They did so fearlessly, and found themselves in a pleasant enough cottage-like residence, amply, and indeed handsomely, provided with every requisite for comfort. The Jew closed the door after them, and then in the style of an Eastern monarch summoning his slaves, he clapped his hands thrice together, upon which an old woman made her appearance, and with great demonstrations of respect, awaited the commands of Zadoc, who she evidently looked upon as some very superior being.

"Ester," said Zadoc, "may we trespass upon your larder for a breakfast this morning? These are friends of mine."

The old woman made no reply in words, but by a very low and reverential obeisance, she signified with what perfect submission she received the order, and how willing she was to execute it. She then went hastily away again through the door she had arrived by.

"You have a willing servant," said Claude.

"She is a member of my own family," replied Zadoc.

"I beg your pardon then, for naming her in connexion with anything like servitude."

"Do not fancy that it is any offence. Esther and I belong to the same race. She serves me for love, and I am but too happy to be able to make her old age comfortable. Step this way, and you will soon see, unless I am very much mistaken, and we have happened to take Esther more than unusually at unawares, that she can manage to get up an extemporaneous breakfast that need not be despised."

Jack and Claude followed the Jew into a very pretty apartment of the cottage, and as they did so, they could but exchange looks of surprise, for since crossing his own threshold the whole manner of Zadoc had altered, and there was an elevation of style and manner about him, such as they could hardly have expected.

Claude knew, however, quite enough of the singular and highly interesting people to whom Zadoc belonged, scarcely to wonder at any strange transformation of character that took place with them in their own houses in distinction to their appearance abroad among the Gentiles.

The room in which they now were was a pretty one, with long windows opening into a small, but charmingly kept conservatory, where the orange tree presented its tempting-looking fruit, and where the fig sent forth its broad leaves in abundance. Numerous flowers, too, graced that little place; and as a view from the room, it was enough to make any one believe, that he had been transported suddenly by the wand of an enchanter to some much more favoured clime, than our bleak and somewhat inhospitable one.

"Where I you," said Claude, "I should spend many an hour here."

"I do," replied Zadoc, "as many as I can. Yon greenhouse has in it many shrubs and plants from that land, which all of my people regard with veneration."

"And which you all hope to see again?"

"It is more than a hope," said the Jew, quietly. "It is a certainty. They have been promised it by one who performs all promises, and we know that the time will come, when we shall be great in the land of our fathers, and when, as a mighty nation, we shall raise again from the ashes of our ancient glory."

The Jew's eyes flashed with enthusiasm as he spoke, and Claude, as he looked at him, could not but feel how likely it was that such a conviction would maintain, as it had maintained, this scattered people through all difficulties and under all privations.

The entrance of Esther, with a tray containing some of the materials for breakfast, put a stop to a conversation that was evidently becoming by far too exciting for the Jew. In the course of a few minutes a marvellously well-laid table was laid out, and Claude and Jack partook of as hearty a breakfast as ever they had enjoyed in all their lives. When Zadoc saw that they had quite satisfied themselves, he rose, saying,—

"Now, then, to business."

"With all my heart," said Claude.

"Follow me, then, and we will consult together in the garden about what is best to be done, and leave Esther at her own good leisure to remove the remains of our repast."

Claude and Jack followed Zadoc through the conservatory into the garden beyond, which was completely protected from observation by close growing trees, and between them a complete labyrinth of interlacing evergreens. It was, in truth, a charming spot.

"It is settled, then," said Zadoc, "that you will do something for Turpin?"

"Quite."

"Well, all that remains for us to conclude is that that something shall be as likely of success as possible, and as little hazardous."

"Precisely."

"He will be tried to-day, and ordered for execution—for that he will be found guilty will not once permit of a doubt."

"This is Friday!"

"Yes, and he will be hanged on Monday morning, unless something in the meantime can be done. After the failure at the jail last night, there is no chance of anything being accomplished in that quarter. Turpin will be taken in a cart to the common, outside the town, and there executed, and his body will be hung in chains, no doubt. Now, with a knowledge of all these circumstances, what, in your calm, cool, deliberate judgment can be done?"

Claude was silent.

"Can you take him from the prison? No! Can you wrest him from the court, in the presence of the judges and all the ministers of the law? No! Can you rescue him on the way to execution? No! Can you save him on the scaffold? Yes!"

Claude and Jack both started at this sudden transition to all the Jew's negatives.

"What mean you? Are you serious?" said Claude.

"I am to the full as serious as such a subject ought to make me. If you don't mind five hundred pounds I think it may be done."

"Not a straw! Double the sum, if you like."

"Very good. We will say one thousand pounds?"

Jack plucked Claude by the sleeve, and he understood it as a friendly admonition to put some bounds to his prodigality.

"My friend," said Zadoc, "when one of my people offers you anything for five hundred pounds, never offer him one thousand pounds, for that is then his price."

"I will not draw back from my offer," said Claude. "I have said one thousand pounds, and it shall be that amount if Turpin is free."

"Five hundred pounds," said Zadoc, "for the attempt, and another five hundred if it be successful. Will that do?"

"Perfectly well; and now tell me by what wonderful means you will accomplish this undertaking. It seems to me at this present moment as though you would require more than mortal means to carry out what you propose. I am all impatience."

"Draw nearer both of you, and you shall hear."

Claude stood close to the Jew on one side, and Jack upon the other, and then he spoke in a clear voice, saying—

"We may take for granted all the facts, namely: that Turpin will be tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death on the common on Monday morning next; and we may take for granted that any attempt between this time and that to do anything will be perfectly futile, and indeed only recoil on our own heads."

Claude nodded.

"Well, on Monday morning at seven o'clock it will be found out that the hangman is very ill and cannot rise from his bed to perform his duties. But he will recommend a man of whom he knows a little to officiate, and the sheriff will be delighted to snatch at any one in the emergency."

"But—but——"

"Nay, hear me out."

"I will. Excuse the interruption. I will not say another word until you have concluded your plans."

"Well, that hangman's substitute will ride in the cart with Turpin to the place of execution, after promising him the clergyman of the jail will likewise be with them. Then that hangman's deputy will seize a sharp knife from his girdle, with which he will be well prepared, and in a moment cut the cords that bind the prisoner, and he can so manage, that only one on each side will have to be cut at all; and having as they ride along told Turpin what to do, he will jump from the cart to where a man is mounted on a fleet horse, and holding another by the bridle, he will mount the led horse and be off. The hangman's deputy will, then, if he have the opportunity, affect to pursue them, and make his way here, where he will find his own gallant and well-trained steed waiting for him."

"Waiting for him here?" cried Claude.

"His steed?" said Jack. "The duputy hangman's gallant steed?"

"Precisely."

"But how will you get that man to play his part so well?" said Claude.

"Don't you think you could do it?"

"I?"

"Yes. Who else could be depended upon in such a case? Who but you must play the executioner's substitute? and who but Jack must wait with the led horse close to the scaffold? Whose steed but yours do you think I would have here waiting?"

"By all that's good," said Claude, as he drew a long breath, "it will do; and whether it will or not, it is the only plan at all likely of success. What say you, Jack, to it? Will you undertake it?"

"If you will, Claude, yes."

"Assuredly I will; and we must have a first-rate horse for Turpin."

"I have his own brave mare Bess, as he calls her, in my stable," said the Jew, quietly.

"You have? Then if once he gets on her back he is as safe and free as the wind!"

"I think so likewise. 'Tis in good truth a noble creature. We will take care to give her some white blemishes by Monday morning to prevent her recognition by any eye that may be curious in horse-flesh, and more than usually knowing about Turpin's steed."

"Yes, that can easily be done. But how will you secure the regular hangman's co-operation in this affair?"

"He is human."

"Are you certain of him?"

"I am."

"Then, for the life of me, I do not see why the plan should not succeed. All that it requires are good disguises, and boldness and address. Don't you think well of the scheme, Jack?"

"I think better of it the more I get familiarised with it."

"That is a good sign," said the Jew. "A plan which loses no attraction, upon a closer scrutiny, is likely to wear well. But if we determine upon this, we must be up and doing. Is it agreed upon, without doubt and without reservation, by both of you?"

"By me, yes," said Claude.

"And by me," said Jack.

"Very well; then no doubt you would like to be present at the trial, which will be on in another hour, at the court house. Come into the cottage, and I shall be able to provide you with complete disguises, so that you may walk into Oxford, and no one will be a bit the wiser as to whom you may be. I will conduct the affair with the executioner entirely myself. Come in. In truth, I do think you will save him."

CHAPTER CXCVIII.

TURPIN'S RESCUE.—A SCENE OF EXCITEMENT ON THE COMMON.

In the course of half an hour more, Claude and Jack were deliberately walking into Oxford, in the disguise of a couple of graziers; and so capitally was their costume arranged and put on, that those who knew them the most intimately could never have suspected who they were.

Claude represented a man past the prime of life. He was stuffed out to look three times his real size, and the grizzly whiskers that the Jew put him, in truth, most effectually disguised him. A light-coloured wig transformed Jack into a much younger looking man than he really was; and so, with a perfect confidence in the excellence of their disguises, they fully intended to be present at Dick Turpin's trial.

The information of the Jew regarding the coming on of the trial on that morning was perfectly correct, and it will be seen that his information upon other points was equally to the purpose. At that time, hanging for highway robbery was quite a common thing, and it was very usual to execute the culprit upon or very near to the spot upon which the offence for which he specifically suffered was committed; and when the party apprehended was so well known and widely circulated a knight of the road as Dick Turpin, it was very charitably supposed that a very small amount of evidence sufficed, both with judge and jury, to convict him.

The court was very much crowded, so much so that the conscientious doorkeepers adopted the London practice, and began not to find room for any one unless they were paid; but that was no object to Claude and Jack, and they had no ambition to draw upon themselves any sort of attention by carping at anything; so they soon found themselves, by virtue of one shilling each, in the court. It was with difficulty they got standing room in rather an obscure corner.

Dick Turpin had only just been placed at the dock, and from his pale face, and the marks of several scars upon it, it was quite evident that he had suffered considerably on the previous night in the prison-yard, upon the occasion of the bold attempt to escape.

He was placed upon his trial directly, and the counsel for the prosecution very unfairly made a long exodium about the attempted escape from the prison; in which he ought to have been stopped by the court, for it had really nothing to do with the case. From this, however, both Claude and Jack learned that it was no other than the Governor of the jail that the former had shot, and that he was dead.

"Serve him right," said a voice near Claude.

Jack felt at the moment a great disposition to say something; but a slight sign from Claude warned him to be silent. Zadoc had particularly cautioned them both to make no acquaintance in the town or in the court.

Dick Turpin pleaded not guilty to the charge made against him; but he did so with the listless air of a man who feels that his fate is determined upon, and that nothing can save him.

With the proceedings of the trial the readers of this narrative need not be troubled, inasmuch as it was one of the most ordinary description, and indeed it was hurried over with a most unseemly haste, as though judge and jury had been fully agreed in the propriety of hanging Dick Turpin, but felt it to be just necessary to go through a certain formula beforehand in the matter.

"Guilty," said the foreman of the jury, almost before the question was well out of the lips of the proper officer.

"Very good," said the judge. "Richard Turpin, you have been convicted by a careful, conscientious, and intelligent jury of your fellow countrymen, of the offence laid to your charge. Have you anything to say why the sentence of the law should not be passed upon you in due form?"

"It is needless," said Dick, "to say anything. I know very well I am to be shuffled out of the world because of my reputation. Well, be it so. It was the end I looked to, and now my last words are—'Thanks to the two kind friends who, last night, did all they could for me.'"

"You ought to be thinking of other things," said the judge, "you unhappy man, than thinking of two reprobates, who will soon be in the hands of offended justice."

"There I differ with you," said Dick. "You have not caught them yet. I know by what you say, that you have not, and therefore I feel very confident you will not catch them at all. It is a wonderful comfort to me at such a time as this, to feel that they who risked so much for me have not suffered by that amount of gallant friendship. God bless them both!"

"This is indeed terrible," said the judge, "to find a criminal over the brink of eternity with so little consciousness of his situation."

"Perhaps, my lord," said Dick, "you will hardly think it right to hang a man who is in such an imperfect state of mind?"

"I can really," said the judge, who found that question a very difficult one indeed to answer—"I can really listen to no more of this. It is too sad and afflicting."

He then, with all due solemnity, passed sentence of death upon Dick Turpin, concluding with the usual kind hope that the Almighty would have mercy upon him, as none would be shown him in this world.

"Farewell to you all!" cried Dick, "and if anybody here should happen to see Claude Duval or a friend of his whom I won't name, as he might not wish it, tell them what I said of them, and how they treated me up here at Oxford, for little or nothing, but because they had heard of the old proverb, that says—'Give a dog an ill name and hang him.'"

"Remove the prisoner," said the judge, shaking his head until the powder flew out of his wig. "Remove the prisoner!"

Dick was instantly laid hold of by the officials of the jail, and hurried from the dock.

"Come," whispered Claude to Jack, and they both made their way out of the court as quickly as they could.

"Well," said Claude, "what do you think of all that, Jack?"

"Think? I could hardly contain myself in court, I was half-maddened, Claude, at the whole scene; and when poor Dick spoke of us it was with difficulty I kept myself from calling out to him to be of good cheer, for we had not deserted him yet."

"It was well you did not, Jack."

"Yes, I feel that for any such exhibition of interest in the fate of the prisoner might have been fatal to our disguise. No, Claude, I had enough self-command left not to do it, although it certainly was rather a struggle to me."

"That I can well suppose."

"But ought we not now immediately to seek our friend, Zadoc? I did not notice him among the crowd, and yet he said he would be in the court during the trial."

"Amid such a sea of faces as that court presented, I can very easily imagine we may miss sight of any one in particular; but if he said he would be there I would wager anything that there he was."

"And here he is," said Jack, as the Jew suddenly stepped up to them.

"Ah, welcome!" said Claude; "all has gone in the court as you thought and said that it would, Zadoc."

"Yes, of course it has; I knew it was all settled before-heard. I have found a lodging for you until Monday, for it will not be safe for you to be at my house, as it is known that I do not take in strangers, and your presence with me might awaken suspicion. I allude to my house in the town, for as regards the cottage it should only be gone to upon an emergency, and never to remain in it for a longer period than the emergency may last. Follow me."

"In all things as regards this affair," said Claude, "we, of course, yield implicitly to your guidance."

They now followed Zadoc past one of the college gates; and in a small but pretty street of houses, Zadoc stopped and tapped at the little parlour window of one of them. The door was immediately opened by a young woman.

'Here are your lodgers," said the Jew. "You will find them quiet enough, andi f you don't interfere with them, they won't interfere with you."

THE THREE ADVENTURERS RECEIVE AN INVITATION TO A CHRISTENING.

"Oh, surely not," replied the woman. "Walk in, gentlemen, walk in! Here's the room, and tl e bed-rooms are both above."

"That will do very well," said Claude. And when the young woman had left them alone with Zadoc, the latter said:—

"I would by no means advise you to keep yourselves prisoners here. The impression in this house is, that you have some business connected with the assizes.

Go out and about as much as you like, but take care always to be at home between nine and ten—three and four—eight and nine,—for it will be during some of those hours that I will call upon you. And as regards all the minor arrangements we were to do, you may make your minds perfectly easy. They will all go on smoothly enough, so that if the plan succeed it will fairly do so upon its own merits; if it fail, it will not be from any hitch in the machinery."

"It is pleasant to hear you say all that," replied Claude. "There is only one thing else that, if it could be by any possibility managed, would give both myself and Jack great pleasure."

"What is it?"

"In letting Dick Turpin know by some means that he is not quite destitute, and may not give hope adieu."

"I have been thinking of that and will try it; it would give me great satisfaction, and, besides, it would keep up Dick's strength, for he will need it all; and when a man fancies there is no longer any hope for him in this world, he is apt to be careless enough of his food and drink. Now, as he is condemned to death, they will let him have, in a reasonable way, all that he likes."

"To be sure; and he might get himself well up to any excitement by Monday next," said Jack.

"Yes; and the new governor of the prison is quite amiably disposed towards him," added Zadoc, "since it has been all through him and his friends that the vacancy was made, that enabled him to slip into the situation. Therefore, you may depend that I will do what I can to let Dick know that he should take care of himself until Monday morning; if I cannot, I will let you know."

With this, the Jew left them; but Claude and Jack felt so dull in their lodging that they were glad enough to avail themselves of the advice of Zadoc, to go out. They took good care, however, to be in at the time he had named, and it was on Sunday morning that he came to them again.

"Dick knows something," he said. "I ascertained that they had placed him in a cell not very far removed from the outer wall of the prison, and last night I got a man to sing a ballad in such a stentorian style of voice that he could not but hear it. They have taken the man into custody, but I feel tolerably certain that Dick knows something will be attempted for him."

"What ballad was it?" said Jack.

"It's only a piece of doggrel, got up for the occasion. It ran thus,—

'We wish him to eat and to drink;
And Bess, she is well taken care of.
C— and J—, both are in town,
And they won't let the grabs hurt a hair of
His head, tol lol de rol lol!'

And there was much more to the same purpose, which, I feel assured, Dick was sharp-witted enough to understand in a moment; but I doubt if the police could make anything of it, and, even if they did, it will puzzle them, and they won't know what to do."

"I am of your opinion," said Claude; "and I shall sleep more comfortably to-night, when I think that Dick don't look forward to the dance upon nothing on Monday morning next."

"But, about the hangman," said Jack. "Have you succeeded in arranging anything with him?"

"Yes; and to-night, at eleven o'clock, I will take you both to his house, for it is necessary that he should know you; and once again, let me assure you that you may banish all idea of anything in the shape of trickery upon his part. He is to well paid by me in more ways than one, and he is much more my servant than he is the servant of the corporation."

"We shall be ready to the minute," said Claude.

We need not go through with the trivial events of that Sunday in Oxford. Suffice it to say, that it hung frightfully heavy upon the hands of Jack and Claude, and that the incessant bell-ringing was enough to drive any reasonable persons right out of their wits. The hour, however, came at last for the very interesting interview with the executioner to take place.

Zadoc came to the lodging at about a quarter before the time appointed, and as both Claude and Jack had been ready for him some time, they immediately all sallied out together.

"Nothing new, I suppose?" said Claude.

"No; except a confirmation of my opinion, that Dick Turpin quite fully understood the song, for I hear that he demands nothing but mutton chops and port wine."

"And do they give them to him?"

"I shouldn't wonder but they do. It's an old custom to be liberal to any one condemned to death, and whom the authorities feel tolerably certain will not be reprieved; so we have nothing to fear from the idea of Dick being weak and out of condition to-morrow morning."

CHAPTER CXCIX.

THE COMMON NEAR OXFORD, AND THE TUMULT UPON IT.

The Oxford hangman's house was about half a mile on the outside of the town. It was a pretty enough place, surrounded by a little garden, so far as Claude and Jack could see of it at that hour of the night.

"What do you expect to find this man?" said Zadoc, as they rung at the gate-bell of the cottage belonging to the executioner.

"He should be," said Claude, "rather a burly ruffian."

"Yes," said Jack, "and with nothing but animal appetites, and about as small a share of intellect as may enable anybody to get through the ordinary course of everyday life."

"You really think so?"

"Such an idea of a hangman comes up to our notions of what he ought to be," said Claude; "but I have seen quite enough of life to know how our ideal notions of things, and of people, are often to be at striking variance with the fact."

"You are right there," said Zadoc; "you should always distrust what your imagination tells you. I never went to a strange place in my life but what it turned out to be as different as it possibly could from what my fancy had pictured it; and I never got into the company of a person that I had heard of, and formed an idea concerning, that I did not find him or her something widely different from all that I had previously, perhaps at great pains, pictured."

"From all which," said Jack, "we are to conclude that we are very wrong about the Oxford hangman?"

The Jew nodded.

"Well," said Claude, "so long as he does not play us false, and answers our purpose regarding poor Dick, he may be what he likes, and I shall consider him the pearl of executioners, and always shall have a friendly feeling for him. What say you, Jack?"

"I will strive to cultivate the same feeling," said Jack, very gently, "although it will be perhaps to me, Claude, a little more difficult than it can be by any means to you."

"Excuse me, Jack," whispered Claude, "if this is a subject upon which you do not like jesting. I did not think of you, and what you had gone through, at the moment."

"Don't mention it," said Jack, as he smiled faintly.

Poor Jack! He still could not forget the horrors he had passed through at his own execution, from which he had emerged into life again so very strangely, but to be only half the man he was.

While this little quiet bit of conversation was in an under tone going on between Claude and Jack, Zadoc had rung the bell at the garden gate of the hangman's house; and in a few moments, like a moving star in the darkness, a candle, in the custody of some one, came down to the gate, and a soft musical voice then said—

"Who is there?"

"I want your father, my dear," said the Jew; "you know me?"

"Oh, yes; you are our friend, Mr. Zadoc. Come in—come in. Father said that he expected you would come, and bring two gentlemen with you."

"Yes, and here they are."

The little girl—for such she was, and not above twelve years of age—held up the light, and curtseyed to Claude and Jack, as she held open the garden gate for them to enter by. The faint rays of the light fell upon her face, and Claude was astonished at her rare and exquisite beauty. As for Jack, he could hardly take his eyes off her, she was was really such a piece of miniature loveliness to look upon.

"Your father is quite alone, of course?" said the Jew.

"Oh yes, sir, quite; and he is expecting you."

The little girl led the way up a trimly kept narrow garden path, and the Jew said to her as he followed her—

"You are as fond of your garden as ever, Emma, I presume, by the way in which you keep it. I see it is as trim and carefully got up as ever; even now I can smell the perfume of the sweet flowers that you have in such rare abundance, and which do you so much credit in the rearing."

"Oh, yes," she replied. "You know, Mr. Zadoc, that next to Pa, I love the flowers and the little garden."

"Next to Pa!" whispered Jack to Claude, "she loves the——"

"Hush! hush!"

Jack did not complete his sentence, and then the little girl paused at the door of the little cottage, and holding it open she motioned them to enter. The door was so low, that both Claude and Jack had to pause and stoop at its threshold. The Jew was able to enter without that ceremony.

The little girl lighted them into the parlour of the cottage, and then herself retired to the kitchen. For a moment or two, neither Claude nor Jack saw that the parlour was tenanted, but a very small soft voice said suddenly—

"Gentlemen, you are welcome," and then from a couch there rose a short and very slimly made fair man, with a small portion of hair upon his head, and apparently cast in nature's weakest physical mould.

"Allow me," said Zadoc, "to introduce you both to him whom you seek."

"What," said Claude, "are you the——?"

"Hush," said Zadoc. "The word that was upon your lips is never, by any accident, mentioned in this house."

"It shall not then pass my lips," said Claude.

"Nor mine," said, Jack, with a shudder, for different as the Oxford hangman was from all his ideal notions of such a character, he could not but shake a little to find himself in the presence of one who filled that awful office, let him be in manner or appearance what he might.

The hangman very carefully closed the door of the room, and then he said—

"Gentlemen, Mr. Zadoc has said that a certain word is never by any accident mentioned in this house. It is true, and it is not that I myself so dread the word, but my little girl, Emma, is all the tie I have that binds me to the world. My wife is gone, and I have no children but her, and she knows not what her father is."

"You astonish me!" said Claude.

"And me," said Jack. "One would think it a thing of impossibility to keep such a secret from her."

"Doubtless," said the hangman, "the day will come, when some officious person will step between us, and kill her with the knowledge of what I am, and by what means I have fed and clothed her, and brought her up to gentleness and truth; but as yet she knows it not, and I am happy to be able to come home to one who does not shrink from me."

"One would think," said Claude, "that her very playmates would tell her, children are such bad keepers of secrets."

"She has no playmates, sir. She lives here, the secluded life of a little nun. For five years she has never once crossed the threshold of the gate which she opened to admit you to the garden. All her delights, and she has many, are concentrated in this cottage and garden. She and I talk together, but never of the world without, and she has no desire to go from the precincts of this humble home, and I need not tell you we are not troubled with many visitors."

"This is indeed most singular," said Claude. "You must live though in constant dread of the secret oozing out through some channel."

He covered his face with his hands, and rocked to and fro.

"Come, come," said Zadoc, "I have not seen you like this for years, and you promised us you would get over all this kind of feeling; I think, too, that now of all times you ought to be able to do battle with it, for I know of nothing that can prevent your almost immediate departure for the new world."

"Yes, yes," said the hangman, "what a cheering thought that is. I will take my child with me, and thousands of miles from here, there will be no one to whisper the dreadful truth in her young ears, and turn her heart from me for ever."

"Yes," added Zadoc, "with the money which these gentlemen give me for you, and which you will earn by the service you will do them on Monday next, you will be able to go to America as soon as you like."

"Oh, yes, yes. What a cheering thought that is."

"It no doubt is, and ought to be," said Claude. "I will rejoice, indeed, that this transaction will not only, as I hope, save my friend, but likewise enable you to achieve so great a good. You can take to some other course of life in America, and no one need guess for a moment who or what you were in England."

"You think they will not suspect?"

"How can they?" said Zadoc. "You do not carry the insignia of your calling stamped upon your face."

"No. I think I do not."

"Quite the contrary," said Claude. "There is not a man breathing who from hundreds would pick you out as likely to be what you now are."

"It is cheering to me to here you all say that; and yet, do you know, at times I have possessed myself with the idea, that there is a something about my looks which proclaims the dreadful truth; and when I have least expected it, my child has shrunk from me with a shudder, as though nature, in some mysterious way, had let her know that my arms were to be avoided as a terror and a pollution."

"All that is imagination," said Zadoc.

"It can be nothing else," said Claude; and yet, even as he spoke, he could not but fancy that there was a strangeness about the eyes of the hangman, which he had not noticed upon first coming into the room. Jack, however, who had said the least, had noticed the peculiarilymore quickly than Claude had done, and had noticed it with a kind of inward shudder; that made him wish himself out of the cottage again, and in the open air.

But after all, perhaps, while Claude and Jack were accusiag the hangman of being the slave of his imaglnation to too great an extent, they were in reality giving the reins of their own fancy, and seeing things in him that had no real existence whatever; sr if nature had given him a little peculiarity about the eyes, no one who did not know his calling would probably hit upon the fact of his being a hangman in consequence.

"You will get rid of all these feelings and fanies," said Zadoc, "and before you have been one month out of Oxford."

"I hope so."

"That is pretty clear, But now let us decide upon what is to be done on the Monday. All money matters will be settled with Mr. Zadoz. Now I hope that no obstacle occurs to your mind to the carrying out the plan of operation laid down."

"None whatever," said the hangman. "It has one good recommendation, and that is its boldness."

"I am glad you think that a recommendation, for it gives me a kind of assurance that you will not shrink from what you have to do, from any fears of the result."

"My good, sir, what I have to do is so little, that, let me shrink how I might, I cannot hurt your plot. As I understand it, all I have to do is to be so unwell at an early hour on Monday morning, as to feel that it is quite impossible I can attend to the execution, and then from fear that the sheriff should be left in an unpleasant dilemma, I send you as a substitute."

"That is it," said Zadoc.

"Precisely," said Claude. "After that all depends upon ourselves I am aware, and I only hope you will not be troubled about it."

"I have no apprehensions. What can they do? My story will be simple enough. You came to me, I will say, and I did not know who you were, and recommended you to the office from the well-known difficulty of getting any one to perform it, especially in an emergency, and only pro tem."

"Exactly, and you may depend upon me, let the affair terminate how it may, making my story tally with yours.

"I thank you; and if you are taken and condemned for your own offences to die, they must seek another hangman, for I am determined that my indisposition shall continue until I leave Oxford, which will be now as soon as I can do so, without attracting the attention and suspicion of the authorities. I must not be at all precipitate in the matter."

"Then it is settled," said Zadoc, "that this gentleman comes at an early hour here on Monday morning?"

"Yes, quite. Take care to be dressed accordingly. A shabby suit of rather common clothes will be best; and I should say that you were a coffin maker by trade, and that I have instructed you how to officiate as my deputy upon the occasion required."

"Very good," said Claude; "call me what you please, I will take good care to dress the character. I fancy my best plan will be to make myself up to look like a dissipated idle mechanic."

"You may safely leave all that to me," said Zadoc.

"Not a doubt of that," said Claude. "And now we will leave you, and hope you will be happy enough in the new world."

"It is a hope," said the hangman.

Jack noticed that he never offered his hand to either of them, or spoke one word about any refreshments. No doubt the wretched man felt that he was too much repudiated by society even to take that liberty with a highwayman.

The little girl with her cheerful pretty face let them all out again, and bade them good night with a soft musical voice as she closed the garden gate upon them.

CHAPTER CC.

A RIOT AT AN EXECUTION.—THE RACE FROM OXFORD.

CLAUDE and Jack had now but little rest until the eventful Monday morning, as that was to decide whether this daring plan would suffice or not for the rescue of Dick Turpin.

At the hour of six in the morning, Zadoc called for them both, and took them to his cottage. By seven he had equipped Claude in the costume which he thought most likely to deceive the authorities with regard to his real character.

Claude upon this occasion wore a rusty ragged suit of clothes that might have been those of a mechanic that he kept for his Sunday suit in prosperous times, but which he had long taken recklessly into ordinary use, and subjected to all the wear and tear of a dissolute life. A dirty apron was twisted round his waist with a ragged corner of it hanging down, and the Jew, with amazing art, painted the face of Claude so that he looked a good ten years older than he really was.

When Duval looked at himself in a glass, he cried out—

"This disguise is perfect. What do you think of it, Jack?"

"That it could not be better. Now, Mr. Zadoc, what do you advise me to wear pon this interesting occasion?"

"I have tkought of that," said the Jew. "You will not only be mounted yourself, but you will have the care of Claude's horse, and of Dick Turpin's; so I shall put you in the custume of a common livery-stable helper, in order to give the affair the appearance as if you had been sent out with the two horses either to take them somewhere, or ordered as merely to give them a little exercise. It will then look very natural that passsing by the place of execution, you should stop to see what is going on, and get as close to the seaffold as you can."

"Yes," said Jack, "nothing could be better than that. Pray, Mr. Zadoc, be so good as to equipe me as quickly as you can in my stable costume, and you may safely trust me to act the character."

"Of that I have no doubt."

There was now but little time to lose, and with great alacrity Jack was got up in the costume that Zadoc had mentioned. He wore a pair of very voluminous shorts, with a good assortment of pearl buttons at the knees, and they were then fastened, after being given that peculiar twist that is so much affected by those who occupy a stable position. Below these he wore drab gaiters. All that he had upon his upper man was a very low-flapped waistcoat, with sleeves to it; and on his head he wore a seal-skin cap. Around his neck he had a pink spotted cravat; and when he was thus completed, and stood with the end of a long straw in his mouth, as though he had just come in a highly contemplative mood from some stable-yard, he looked quite picturesque.

"Upon my word, Jack," said Claude, "I don't think I should have known you myself; the transformation is, indeed, most complete."

"I am glad to hear you say that," said the Jew; "for, somehow or another, the authorities of Oxford have got a pretty good description of both your persons now."

"Have they, indeed?"

"Yes; and I suppose it has been from the Innkeeper where you put up, when first you arrived, before the hazardous attempt upon the prison."

"Not a doubt—not a doubt. Well, if they don't find us out now, I will forgive them for finding us upon that occasion; and this much I will say, that if I and Dick get mounted, they won't need to give themselves the trouble of coming after us, for it will be all in vain if they do. We shall go three miles to their two. If that don't quickly distance them, I don't know what will."

"Nor I, either," said Zadoc. "Are you both ready?"

"Quite! quite!"

"Then you, Jack, go to the stable, and get the horses ready; and you, Claude, come along with me, to the hangman's cottage, for he will be not a little impatient about this affair, I'll warrant, since you know what a great object he has in view regarding it."

"Yes; that was what tempted him, no doubt."

"It was."

"And you knew that it would tempt him?"

"Fortunately I did, or I should hardly have risked my position in the city, by tampering with him; I believe that I am the only friend he has in the whole of Oxford, and he has always been grateful to me, because I did not despise him, but at times passed an hour or so at his cottage along with him and his little girl."

"It is a capital thing for us, that you thought even of doing so, for, without his connivance, this plan, which, the more I look at it, seems to me the more possible and likely of success, would have been but a piece of madness, resulting in the throwing away of our lives."

"Good-by, Claude," said Jack; "if anything happens amiss, let this be a farewell."

"No, Jack, we will not take leave of each other now. It looks like anticipating the future. I will not say good-by, but I will say good-day."

"Well," said Jack, "well, be it so; I will only say good-day.

They shook hands, and separated.

"Do you think," said Zadoc, "that he will be firm enough?"

"Yes, quite so; I never knew Jack to fail once in an enterprise yet, when it comes to the actual execution of it, whatever might be his feelings beforehand."

"I am glad to hear you say that; it gives one confidence."

They soon cleared the distance between the Jew's cottage and the hangman's little abode, and, as before, they were let in by the little girl, who had not the smallest recollection of Claude, and would evidently have gladly kept him outside, in consequence of his disreputable appearance, had it not been that Zadoc said to her,—

"It is all right, my dear; I know this person. He is going to do some work in the city, for your father."

Upon this, there was no further opposition on the part of the little girl, and Claude and Zadoc were in a few moments in the parlour where they had seen the executioner on the preceding evening.

By the open light of day, Claude was still more struck by his weakly and diminutive appearance than he had been overnight; but there was no time for any conversation now. The hangman merely handed Claude a letter, addressed to the sheriff, and then added,—

"I will go to bed at once the moment you leave, for it is just possible they may send an officer to know if I am really ill, and in that case I must of course be prepared to play m part; and even if they should send the jail surgeon, I think I can baffle him, for I will take some drug that will make me very sick in the course of a few minutes, if I have from my little girl notice of his coming; so now go, and success attend you. You have my best wishes; and until I hear from popular rumour that you have succeeded, I shall pass, shut up here, but a very miserable time of it, from my anxiety upon the matter."

"Come," said Zadoc. "You will see me this evening here, my friend."

"All's right upon that score. I am quite satisfied," said the hangman; "of course you will be sure to find me at home."

Claude guessed that these few words between them had reference to the money, and he paid no attention to them, for he did not think he ought to interfere with Zadoc's arrangements in that particular, so long as the hangman was satisfied.

They now set off, and when they got close to the town, Zadoc said,—"Now, my friend, I leave you to your own resources, and to play your part as best as you ma y. You will go direct to the jail with the letter, and, when they find it is addressed to the sheriff, they will let you into the lobby at once, and allow you to wait for an answer there. Of course, now, all depends upon your own address."

"I know it. You and I will meet again as agreed."

"That will do."

With a mutual nod merely, they separated, and Claude went upon certainly one of the most truly hazardous enterprises that in his life of strange adventures he had ever achieved or thought of achieving. Not only Dick's life but his own, and, in all likelihood, Jack's, hung upon the events of the next few hours; but yet he did not feel any degree of shrinking or even of nervousness. All he felt was deep anxiety for the result, and a determination that it should not fail to be a satisfactory one from any fault of his.

He walked rapidly and soon reached the jail.

Oh, if the authorities of Oxford could but for one moment have gussed who it was that appeared at the wicket-gate of the prison, with what glad rapidity they would have opened it, and welcomed him within its gloomy walls! Ay, welcomed him to the darkest cell they had, and the heaviest fetters they could place upon his limbs!

"What now?" said a rough voice, as Claude tapped at the wicket in the outer door of the prison.

THE SCUFFLE WITH THE OFFICER AND SERVANTS NEAR THE LODGE.

"A letter for the sheriff."

"Oh, is that it? Who is it from, eh?"

"The sheriff will find out that when he reads it, perhaps; and as it is not for you, it don't matter."

"Oh, indeed, that's the way you come it, is it, stupid?"

"Yes, idiot!" said Claude.

The man as he opened the wicket to admit him, looked as though he would uncommonly like to knock him down; but when he found that the stranger was about a head taller than himself, he thought it would be as well to let that part of his desire rest.

"The sheriff won't be here yet awhile," he growled.

"Oh, won't he, Jem!" said another man, who was sitting yawning upon a stone bench. "You forget that Dick Turpin is to be scragged this morning, and that he will be here early on that account."

"Do I forget it?' said the surly gate-keeper. "It would be no fault of yours if I remembered nothing else, for I do not think you have spoken of nothing else since the trial. What is to you, I wonder, about his being scragged, that you are so highly interested about it?"

"It's nothing to me personally," said the other turnkey, "only I'm sorry for the poor fellow, that's all."

"You are? And pray, why?"

"Because, to tell the honest truth, he hasn't had fair play, and that's a fact. They have hung the poor fellow, or are going to hang him, because he has a bad character, and not for what he has done, and that's what I don't like. It ain't English-like, and it won't stand the thinking of, in my opinion."

"In your opinion?" screamed the other. "Ha! ha!—In your opinion! That's a good idea; your opinion is of a vast deal of consequence, I daresay. Hilloa! here's the sheriff's carriage already. Look alive all of you. The sheriff!—The sheriff! Ring the Governor's bell at once, and tell him. It is time to look about us now, and the less you saw about your opinion, old chap, and about what you think is fair and what ain't, the better for you."

"I don't care," said the other, "who knows my opinion. What's fair is fair, and what ain't, ain't, and I sharn't say black's white to please anybody, no not if all the sheriffs in England were to be railing at me for it. They can but give a fellow the sack, and that I don't care a straw about."

A rattling knock at the door of the prison now announced that the sheriff's footman was determined his master's presence should be known with eclat, and according to custom.

The whole door was thrown open, and the sheriff, with his gold chain of office round his neck, made his appearance. He looked in a great fluster, did that sheriff, for he detested the job of being present at a hanging. It distracted his equanimity for the rest of the day.

"Come—come," he said. "Is everything ready now? Don't be behind-hand with anything. Let it be all done as soon as possible. A coldish raw kind of morning, too, it is. Come—come, be quick all of you."

"A letter for you, sir," said Claude, stepping forward and presenting the hangman's mission to the sheriff.

"Now really, my man, how can I be troubled with letters now? Here am I roused up in the cold upon a most disagreeable office, and people push letters into my hand the moment I get to the jail. Upon my word it is too bad—too bad, indeed. I really cannot attend to it."

"But, sir——"

"Poh! poh! Don't trouble me—go away. Leave the letter, or come to my office after the execution, for I cannot be troubled with such an affair just now really. Dear me, who is it from that they send to me at such a time as this, eh? Who is it from?"

"The executioner!" said Claude.

CHAPTER CCI.

THE EVENTFUL MORNING COMES TO AN END.

When Claude communicated the word, executioner, everybody looked rather aghast; and above all the others, the sheriff appeared to be rather staggered.

"What do you mean?" he cried. "What nonsense is this that you tell me that the executioner has written a note when he has to be hear directly? and, indeed, bless me, he ought to be here now."

"Yes, sir," said a turnkey, "so he ought."

"And pray, sir," said the sheriff, who was quite prepared now to quarrel with everybody upon the smallest possible notice, "and pray, sir, who requested you to make a remark?"

"I beg pardon," said the turnkey.

"You beg pardon, sir? How dare you beg pardon, I should like to know?"

This the turnkey found to be rather unanswerable, and he got out of the way as quickly as possible.

"Ah!" continued the highly indignant sheriff. "A pretty thing, indeed, that I am to come here at such a time in the morning as this, upon the most troublesome and onerous duties, and then to be spoken to in such a way. Come, you fellow, are you quite sure this is from the executioner?"

"He gave it to me himself," said Claude.

"Bless me. Tut—tut! what can it be about?"

"He is very bad."

"Bad—bad? I know he is bad. What do you mean by that? You don't mean ill, do you?"

"Yes, sir. Confined to his bed. Dying, it is thought."

"The executioner dying! The devil! Pray, sir, what right as he to die until he has done his duty here to day? I ask you or any reasonable man, if you are a reasonable man, which you don't look like, what right a low person has to die, when he is wanted to do something that nobody else likes to do as is likely to like to do?"

To this question Claude made no reply, and the sheriff bustled off with the letter in his hand, crying—

"Where is the governor—where is the governor? I must speak to the governor. Gracious Providence, where is the governor? Here's a pretty to do. I shall have to hang Dick Turpin myself, I suppose. Goodness gracious!"

Claude had the greatest possible difficulty to keep his countenance while the sheriff made such an undignified appearance, and when he had left the vestibule of the prison and some of the turnkeys laughed, Claude could not help joining with them.

"Is Dennis really bad," said one to Claude.

"Yes," said Claude. Dennis, was the executioner's name. "Yes, he is so bad that you won't see him here to day."

Claude thought that it was just as well, since they were willing, that he should be on moderately civil terms with the turnkeys.

"That's a pretty kettle of fish then," said one of them, "for Dick Turpin must be hung to day, and the question will be who is to do the job? I heard the recorder say that if nobody else would, the sheriff was bound to tuck up the fellow."

"Yes, he will have to do it," said another.

"I think not," cried a third; and then pointing to Claude, he added—"I don't think you have brought Dennis's letter here for nothing, my friend. You have no objection to act as his substitute, this morning?"

"None in the least," said Claude.

In a moment the turnkeys drew back from the immediate vicinity of Claude. It was astonishing to see the look of loathing that came on even those coarse men, at the idea of anything like contact with a hangman.

"Yes," added Claude, "if the sheriff don't like the job, as poor Dennis is ill, I am willing enough to do it, as I am out of work, unless any of you have a decided wish for the little bit of occupation."

"Oh, no—no—no!"

"Very well. I only mentioned it because of course I should feel very sorry to interfere with any of you; but if none of you like it, why I'm willing to do it for a consideration."

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY

"You may depend upon it, my fine fellow," said one, "that there will be no great competition for the job, and you will have it, as far as we are concerned. I suppose Dennis will let you have all the perquisites? The clothes, and so on?"

"Oh, yes, so he said, and as I am rather indifferently clothed, I mean to put 'em all on when I get 'em."

"You do?"

"Yes. They tell me that Dick Turpin is somewhat about my size, and that he dresses well. I only hope he will put on his best suit this morning, and then when I go out of Oxford I shall look like a highwayman."

"Well, you certainly do take the matter about as coolly as anybody that I ever heard of. But here comes somebody. Now, Jack, what is it?"

A man rushed into the vestibule in haste, and said—

"The sheriff and the governor want to see the man that brought the note from Dennis."

"I'm the person," said Claude.

"Follow me, then."

"Ha! ha! all's right. I do begin to think now that I shall really get the job. Ha! ha!"

With this, snapping his fingers as though he were in great glee at the idea of getting the job of hanging a man and his clothes to put on afterwards, Claude followed the man, who was called Jack, through some dreary windings of the prison until they reached the door of an apartment of a semi-official character, in which the governor, the sheriff, and the chaplain, were engaged in earnest converse.

Jack tapped at the door, and the voice of the sheriff, evidently in great trepidation, cried—

"Come in!"

Jack opened the door and ushered in Claude, who made a clumsy sort of half insolent bow. The governor and the chaplain regarded him alternately, but the sheriff was in too fussy a condition to take much notice of him.

"Well, my friend," said the governor, "of course you know the errand you came here upon?"

"Yes, of course I do, and I made up my mind to it, or else I should not have come; but I don't much care about it, and if you have any objection, only say so and there's no harm done."

"Oh, no—no," cried the sheriff. "No objection, quite the reverse, my good fellow; don't think of going."

"Pray," said the governor, "who, and what are you?"

"That's a wide question," said Claude, "and I answer by saying I am a bad character."

"A bad character?" said the chaplain; "oh, dear me!"

"Sir," said Claude, "do you think that any man of a good character, and who cared much about his fellow-men, and who had any character or standing to lose, would come here and be a deputy hangman? I don't want the job, if you are particular about me. Find some one with a good character to do it. Here I am, a man, who for what he can get by it, and I hope you will be liberal, consents to be a hangman. Don't bother me with any questions. Let me get through the job, and then go about my business: or else say you don't mean it, and good morning to you."

"Oh, no—no," cried the sheriff. "Stop him! stop him! It's all right; of course I will be liberal. You shall do it, my fine fellow, and be asked no questions at all; and I will give you an extra guinea out of my own pocket, and put it down to the county—a-hem! Mr. Governor, we will not ask this highly interesting young man any questions, for, as he truly says, it is not everybody who might like the little job that he comes about."

"As you please, sir," said the governor; "of course, sir, you have the decision in the matter."

"Well, well, it's all right, I dare say. A man will do for a hangman without a character, I rather think. Now, Mr. Chaplain, how is your prisoner this morning?"

"I am very sorry to say that he laughs at me," said the chaplain.

"Does he really? How very odd! Well, Mr. Deputy Hangman, you will be so good as to take care how you perform your duty. I hope you will not make any blunder at the last moment."

"Lord bless you, sir, no," said Claude, as he untwisted a rope from round his waist. "I thought perhaps I might have the situation, so I brought this with me, sir, and if you will hold your head on one side for a moment while I put the noose on, you will see how nicely——"

"Me! me! Oh, gracious no! Keep off! Keep him away! knock him down, Mr. Governor. Oh, dear—oh, dear, I'm all over of a profuse perspiration at the thought of such a thing. How dare you, you rascal, propose to put a rope over my neck? Do you know, sir, who I am, I ask you, sir?"

"I am only going to show you, sir."

"You were only going to show me, you rascal? Why could you not hang the chaplain or the governor?"

"I am quite willing," said Claude, advancing towards the chaplain, who had indulged in a quiet smile at the sheriff's trepidation, but who now started to the further end of the room and cried—

"Murder!"

"Go and wait in the vestibule," said the governor. "You will be sent for when you are wanted."

"Very good," said Claude. "It's all right, I hope, and no mistake. I shall be ready, gentlemen.

'We're all hanging—hang—hang—hanging,
And we're all hanging at our house at home.'

I shall be ready All's one to me as long as it's a good job. Come, I say, old chap, they call you Jack, don't they? Can you get such a thing as a pot of ale?"

"I tell you what it is," said the man, "you make too free by half—I don't want your company; and I don't exactly suppose there is any one here who does. I don't think you'll find any gentleman on the lock in this place, as we'll dip his nose along with yours in a pot of ale; so just keep yourself quiet."

"Oh, that's it, is it?" said Claude. "Well, when your turn comes to be tucked up and I have the job, I'll give you a twist in the wrong place by placing the knot a little on one side, you may depend."

"Oh, go to the deuce!"

"So I will, but not yet. Ha! ha! I've got the job, and you will see me go off like a jolly highwayman in Dick Turpin's clothes, that you will. Rare sport that will be; I don't know but that I may call myself Turpin's ghost and take to the road myself. They say that he made no end of money by it and lives like a prince; and now and then when I want a little change of occupation, I can come here to see if there's a little bit of a job doing in the hanging way, and who knows but there may be?"

Claude made these remarks in the vestibule in a general sort of way, but it was quite evident that the turnkeys during his observations had made up their minds to give him the cut direct, for they none of them answered him, and one of them pretended composedly to whistle as though nobody was speaking.

If anything could, in the state of intense anxiety for the success of his scheme that he was in, have amused Claude, it would have been the conduct of the turnkeys of the jail; but he could not laugh in reality, although he executed two or three mock-peals of merriment, which had the effect of greatly annoying everybody.

The prison clock struck eight.

Claude counted the strokes, and scarcely had the last one died away when a man called out:—

"Where's the executioner?"

"Here!" said Claude.

"Come this way, then; you are wanted."

It was morally and physically impossible for any human being not to feel some amount of trepidation at this moment. The only fear that Claude had was that Dick Turpin, knowing him so well as he did, might recognise him, notwithstanding his diguise; and in the surprise of the moment, utter some exclamation that might have the effect of ruining the whole scheme; and now that he felt he was about to be introduced to Dick, he shook certainly.

The man led him through several gloomy winding passages until they entered a stone vaulted room, in which there were a number of persons. The heavy strokes of a hammer came upon Claude's ears, and he knew that the prison-smith was knocking off the fetters of Dick Turpin prior to his being led out to die. Claude felt that it would not do for him to exhibit by word or look the state of his feelings, and therefore, with the most admirable self-control, he kept all outward show of feeling down. He whistled as he entered the room in which there were all the persons now who had official concern with the execution.

The chaplain walked up to him, and in a tone of great severity, said—

"How dare you whistle when a fellow-creature is so near to his last moments, you wretched man!"

"Oh, well, I won't then," said Claude.

The sound of the smith's hammer effectually drowned the tone of Claude's voice, or else Dick might have detected him by it, and Claude had a faint hope that he would. But as nothing resulted from the few words that he spoke, that hope dissipated.

"All's ready now," said the smith, as he gave the last blow, and the irons fell to the floor with a clinking sound. "Good by to you, Dick Turpin, I have done my duty."

CHAPTER CCII.

OFF AND AWAY.—BAD LUCK TO THE HINDMOST.

Good-by, my friend," said Dick, "and if ever we meet again in this world, I will thank you for doing it so gently."

The smith shook his head as he gathered up his tools, and muttered to himself—

"That ain't a very likely thing."

The chaplain now went up to Dick, and in a canting sonorous voice, into which he threw, Heaven only knew why, a powerful nasal twang, he said—

"Richard Turpin, I now expect from you a full confession that you are a hardened sinner, and a complete admission of the justice of your sentence. It is to be hoped, too, that on the scaffold you will advise everybody to work hard and go to church regularly, for fear they come to your disgraceful end."

"Then," said Dick, in a clear, cheerful voice, "you expect what you won't get."

"What?"

"I say you expect what you won't get. I do not acknowledge the justice of my sentence, for I know perfectly well that a man ought not to be hanged for stopping another on the highway without any violence; and as for the advice you expect me to give on the scaffold, I shall not give it."

"Hardened wretch, have you no regard for your immortal welfare?"

"Yes, every regard, Master Parson, but you and I differ as to the mode of showing it. If I say anything on the scaffold, it will be to advise the rich and the great, as they call themselves, to pay more attention to the poor man's comforts, and above all things, to pray the people not to be robbed by the parsons in the way they are."

"Oh, this is truly dreadful. You abominable sinner!"

"Don't begin calling me names, you humbug," said Dick.

"Come—come," said the sheriff, "this won't do at all. There's the prison-bell beginning to toll, I declare. Now, Mr. What's-your-name, come and pinion your man, and let us get this very uncomfortable affair over as soon as possible."

Claude stepped forward, but Dick did not look up to him at all. Claude got at his back to tie him with a cord that he had, and then inclining his mouth to his ear, he whispered—

"Dick! Hope—hope!"

"Hilloa!" cried Dick. "Who—what—no—no—no!"

The governor ran up to them in a moment, but before he could say a word, Dick added—

"It's easier now. There's no occasion to cut a fellow's wrists with the cord, Mr. Hangman, confound you!"

"Oh, was that all?" said the governor.

"About it," said Claude.

"It can't much matter now, Turpin, whether a rope is a little too tight or not. Half an hour will settle all that."

"Yes, by settling me, you mean," said Dick.

The governor nodded.

"Well, I'm very much obliged to you for the friendly hint, but yet I don't agree with the reasoning, and if you and I meet again in this world, I will put you in mind of it."

"Oh, pho! pho!"

"Very good. Have you done all your tying and trussing me up, Mr. Hangman? Confound you, any one would think that I was a fowl about to be roasted."

"Yes,—all's right," said Claude. "I don't want you to slip through my fingers, old fellow!—Courage, Dick."

"Yes," said Dick Turpin. "Yes. That's it. There's many a slip between the cup and the lip. Now, governor, you have not behaved badly to me upon the whole, and before I leave I beg to thank you for many kindnesses. Will you give me a cup of wine now, and will you give one to the hangman here? for I always said that before I suffered, I would take a drop with the executioner, if I could get it."

"If the sheriff has no objection, Dick Turpin," said the governor, "I will give it to you, and welcome."

"Oh, dear no," said the sheriff, "not in the least, and—and Mr. Governor, I could take a nice glass of port myself, I think; so bring a bottle and some glasses."

"I protest against this," said the chaplain. "This Richard Turpin is such a hardened sinner, that he is entitled to no indulgences whatever. He called me a humbug."

"And so you are," cried Claude,—"a hardened sinner," he then added, turning to Dick.

The chaplain shook his head, for although that was a very good turn off, yet he felt, and so did every one else, that the first part of the sentence was evidently intended to refer to him. The governor smiled slightly, and whispered to one of the prison attendants, who left the room, and in a few moments came back with a bottle of wine and half-a-dozen glasses on a tray.

"Help yourself, Turpin," said the governor. "I don't grudge you a bottle of wine at such a time as this."

Dick poured out two glasses, and handing one to Claude, he said—

"Here, my friend, it ain't your fault, you know, that you are in this rather uncomfortable situation, and come what will, I shan't forget you—not if they were to kill me by inches, and however I may be clawed."

Duval perfectly understood Dick's pun upon his name, and taking the glass of wine, he said—

"Here's better luck still," and then he tossed it off.

"Really, a-hem!" said the sheriff, who by this time had supplied himself with a glass, "I wish you, Dick Turpin, a speedy release. Upon my life, this is a capital drop of port."

"Is it?" said the chaplain. "I don't mind if I take only one glass, just to show, in fact that you see, in a manner of speaking, how humble and unaffected I am."

"Don't mention it," said Dick, giving the bottle a joggle that upset it with a smash on to the stone floor. The chaplain gave a stamp of rage, and the sheriff cried—

"All ready—it's only twenty minutes to nine now. All ready. Now, Dick Turpin, we will settle this little morning's work."

"I hope so, sir," said Dick.

"So do I," said Claude. "Come on."

A hasty procession was formed, and Claude took care to keep close to Dick, lest any one should observe how very ineffectually he had bound him. Indeed, the cord was put on in such a way, that a touch almost would be sufficient to remove it from the arm of the condemned one.

The sheriff, as in duty bound, led the way, fretting and fuming as he went, for at the bottom that little fussy sheriff was not a bad-hearted man, and he did not like to herald anybody to death. Then came the governor of the jail, who at the gate of it was formally to deliver up to the sheriff his prisoner; and then came the chaplain, reading the prayers for the dead aloud; and then came Dick Turpin, with Claude hold of his right arm, as though he was quite determined that his victim should not escape him. After them, came about half a dozen officials of the prison, who attended the sheriff upon such an occasion, as a sort of body-guard.

It was strange to note the effect produced upon a large concourse of people outside the jail, by the appearance of the different parties. The sheriff, who was not unpopular in the country, was received upon this occasion in silence. The governor heard a groan raised against him, for what, nobody knew exactly. The chaplain was received in silence; but when Dick Turpin appeared, with Claude close by him, the shouts, groans, hisses, and bravoes, rent the air.

Of course, all the complimentary effusions of mob outcry were intended for Dick, while all the discordant noises were hurled at the supposed hangman. It had got brooted about among the crowd that the regular hangman was ill, or dead, and that the person who was about to officiate was a mere volunteer; so the populace were determined that he should not remain in ignorance of the kind of estimation in which his office was held.

The cries and groans were truly frightful.

"This won't do," said the sheriff, pausing.

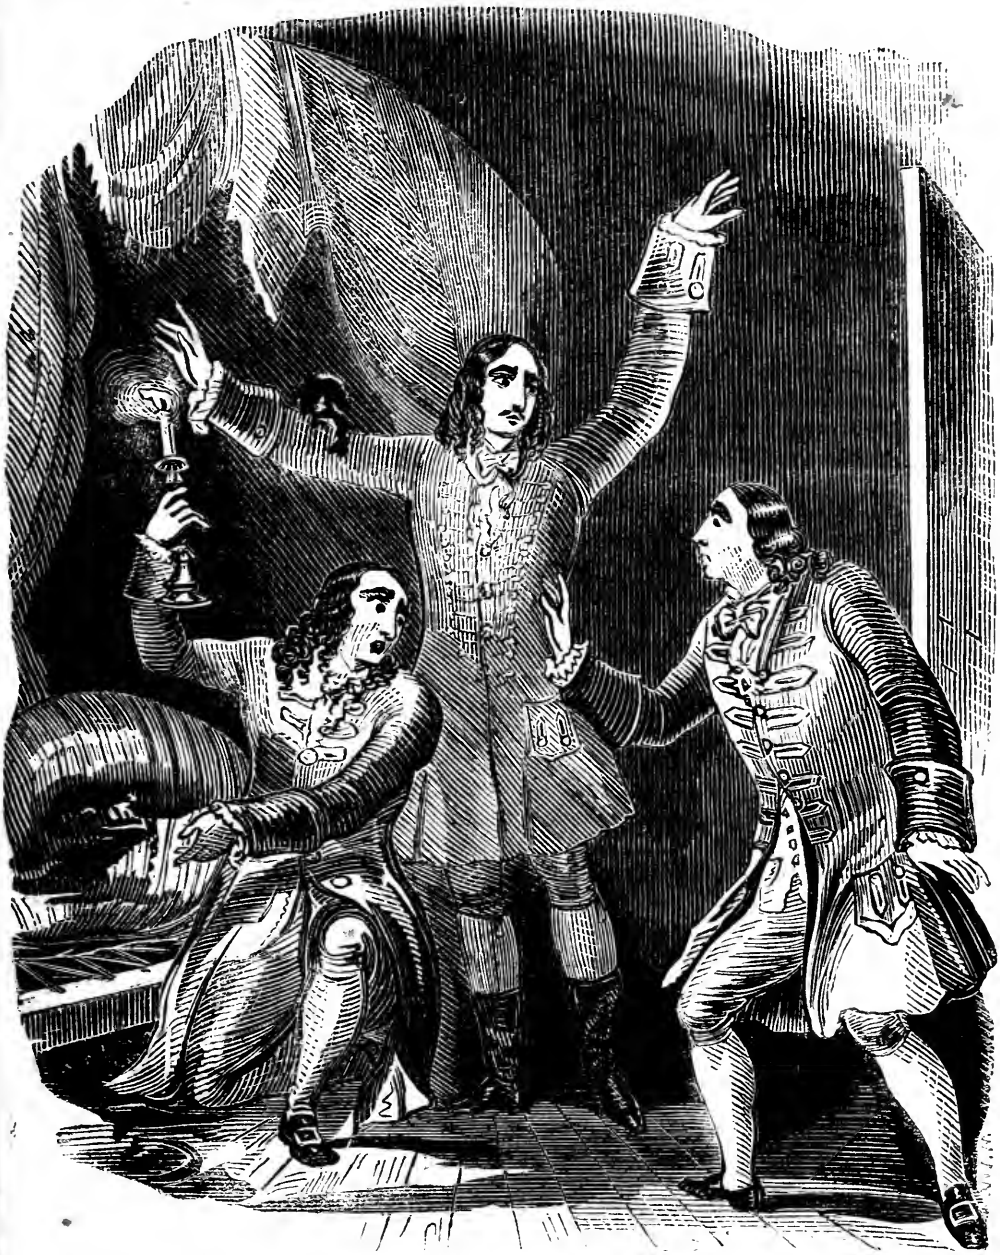
"No danger, sir," said the governor. "It's only at the new hangman. The more noise the mob make, the less danger there is in the people. It is always better, sir, to let them have their say."

"Well—well, let us go on; where's my horse? Oh, there he is. Woa!—woa! Hold him while I get on, somebody. Oh, dear, there he goes again. Thank you; that will do."

The sheriff got mounted with some difficulty; and never was the versatile nature of a mob so completely shown as at that moment; for whereas it had been all indignation and fury at the new hangman, just because the sheriff's horse moved aside twice as he tried to mount, the explosions of laughter were tremendous, and everybody seemed to be highly delighted.

It was during this amusing state of the mob that Dick Turpin, and Claude, and the chaplain of the jail, took their places in a cart that was at the prison door, and which now, surrounded by half a dozen officers on horseback, began slowly to move off through the dense mass of people that upon all sides surrounded it.

In the cart, too, was a coffin, in which it was kindly purposed to place Dick after his demise.



"That," said Dick, "is a lodging for a single man, that I would rather not take."

"Nor shall you," whispered Claude.

"Is it right, my dear friend?"

"Right."

Dick smiled, and drew a long breath. Amid the dim confusion that reigned, they might have freely enough discoursed, without any one being a bit the wiser, for the chaplain was very much discomposed by the jolting of the cart, and was holding on to one side of it, with his teeth set in a manner that gave his mouth a kind of quiver that mightily amused the people. He then, as the cart-wheel next to him went over a large stone in the road, made a grasp at the coffin, to keep himself up, and down he went into the middle of the cart, with it upon his stomach.

THE DISCOVERY IN THE ROOM OF THE "BUNCH OF GRAPES."

This event produced a roar of laughter, and altogether, so highly comic an execution as that of Dick Turpin's promised to be, had not been seen to start from the jail at Oxford.

With no little difficulty the reverend gent aroused himself, and then he found that he had lost his book. Neither Claude nor Dick thought it prudent to say anything more to each other, notwithstanding these incidents seemed to leave them so much at liberty to do so, for they could not take upon themselves to say that the eye of some wary officer might not be upon them; and, of course, now the slightest indiscretion would have upset the whole affair.

The driver of the cart found the parson's book for him, and he commenced again reading the burial service, to which Dick offered no sort of opposition, for to tell the truth he did not hear it, as his whole soul was absorbed in considering in what way Claude intended to attempt his rescue.

One of the mounted officers rode close to the side of the cart, and said to Claude in an imperious kind of tone—

"I don't think you have pinioned the prisoner at all well."

"Haven't I?" said Claude.

"No. Don't you see? Why one of his arms is almost, now, at liberty. You are a regular bungler, or else you are doing it on purpose."

"I'll soon settle that," said Claude. "If you don't like my way of doing things, come and hang him yourself, stupid."

"I shall keep an eye on you, fellow."

"Which one?" said Claude; "the one that squints, or the green one?"

The officer shook his head and moved off, a little in high dudgeon, and so the procession, which after all began to assume a melancholy aspect, went through Oxford. The people began to recollect that a man was being conveyed to death, and that it was not exactly the thing to laugh at it. Some cried out words of consolation to him, and more than one pressed up to the side of the cart, saying—

"Turpin, do you wish anything done that we can do for you when you are no more?"

"Nothing," said Dick. "But I thank you all the same, and, dead or alive, I won't forget one kind word that is spoken to me on this day, by any one, let him be whom he may."

Dick and Claude at this exchanged glances, and in the firm compressed lip and flashing eye of his friend, Dick read volumes of comfort and hope, and framed his spirit with the idea that he would yet live to see many a fair moonlight night, and to have many a dashing gallop upon his noble steed; although how his rescue from all those who were intent upon his death, some from duty and some from inclination, was to be accomplished, he could not guess.

The windows were crowded along the line of the procession, and many a pitying tear fell from bright eyes, to see a human being in health and strength carried out to die; and the crowd, each moment, increased in numbers until Claude wondered where on earth all the people could come from.

And still ever and anon, above all the sound of the feet of the people, and the tramp of the horses, and the rumbling of the cart, sounded the death-bell!

CHAPTER CCIII.

CONTAINS SOME VERY CURIOUS INCIDENTS.

Claude kept his eyes well about him. Perhaps he hoped to get a glimpse of some friendly face amidst all the throng, but if he did so, he hoped in vain; for most of the countenances he looked at, that happened to be close to the fatal cart, were actuated by curiosity more than by sympathy.

And so the cart went on.

Probably no malefactor had ever been led out to die through Oxford who had created such a sensation as did Dick Turpin; and as the procession passed a large hotel, the judge who had presided at Dick's trial, was seen at the open windows, taking a peep at the cortege. Dick's eyes happened, at the moment, to take that direction. Raising his hand, he pointed at him, crying out, with a loud voice—

"We shall meet again!"

The judge immediately retired from the window, but not before he had been seen and recognised by many in the mob, and the solemnity with which Dick uttered the words, made a deep impression upon many present. The chaplain turned to Dick, and said—

"What do you mean, you unhappy man, when you say that you and the judge will meet again?"

"Just what I say," replied Dick. "Did I not speak plainly?"

"Yes, as regards words; but where did you expect to meet the judge again, you miserable sinner?"

"On the road."

"The road to where?"

"To London, most likely."

The chaplain groaned, for he flattered himself that he was getting Dick into quite a religious discussion, and certainly he never was more mistaken in his life; for Turpin, with all the flutter of expectation in his breast that Claude and Jack would yet manage to save him even at the eleventh hour, was in a much worse mood than even if he had been listening to the chaplain's exhortations.

"It is to be hoped, that before you are turned off you will repent," he said.

"I promise you I will," said Dick.

Claude admonished Dick by a glance to be careful how he went too far in what he was saying, as in truth a very little more might have awakened serious suspicions that he had some hopes of a rescue, and in such a case the authorities might have made some move that would have effectually destroyed all Claude's plans and projects.

Turpin was silent, and pretended to hang down his head in deep thought; and soon now the procession came in view of the spot destined for the execution. It was a strange sight then to see how most of the crowd that had attended the cart through the streets from the jail, set off at a mad sort of gallop towards the scaffold, in order to get good places, so that, with the exception of the official persons, the cart was nearly deserted. Perhaps, if Claude could have foreseen such a thing, which it was quite impossible he could do, he would have thought that a better opportunity for the rescue than any other that could possibly occur, but as all the arrangements with Jack were made differently, he could not take the advantage of that favourable moment.

"Get on quicker," said an officer to the man who was driving, or rather leading the horse that was drawing the cart. "The road is even enough now, and we are behind time."

Upon this remonstrance, the man quickened his pace, and in the course of a few minutes the cart was stopped under the gallows, the mode in which Dick was to hang being the barbarous one of suspending him by the neck to the gallows as it overhung the cart, and then drawing the vehicle away from under him.

The crowd was intensely closely packed, but within six feet of the gallows' fool was Jack with the horses. He looked ghastly pale, and the moment his eyes felt upon Claude and Dick in the cart, the former saw him perceptibly tremble. It was not for any want of courage that Jack shook, but it was from his deep anxiety for the success of the plan.

"Now, Turpin," said Claude, as if speaking in his professional capacity. "Look up, will you?"

Dick started to his feet, and his eyes fell upon the horses and Jack. His own gallant and well-tried steed he knew in a moment, and a cry escaped his lips.

"What's all this about?" said one of the mounted officers.

"Ay, what's all this?" said Claude.

"It's rather a hard thing to die in such a way, in broad daylight!" said Turpin.

"Oh, stuff. Come, Mr. Hangman's deputy, do your duty. It's high time you got you job over."

"Do you wish to say anything to the people?" said Claude to Dick, and he said it in such a tone of voice, that Turpin felt that it was a kind of invitation to him to do so. For the moment he could not very well make out what Claude wanted him to make a speech for, but then it suddenly struck him that it must be for the purpose of propitiating the crowd, so that the less impediment might be offered to his escape, the mode of conducting which, since he had seen Jack with the horses, was no longer a mystery to him.

"Yes," he said, "I should like to say a few words to the people."

"Stuff!" cried the officers. "Stuff! It can't be."

"Hear him! hear him!" shouted the people. "Let the poor fellow have his last say in this world! Hear him! hear him! Down with the bloodhounds!"

The officers looked a little alarmed at this demonstration upon the part of the crowd, and the sheriff turned quite red in the face, while the chaplain turned quite pale.

"Let him speak," said the sheriff. "It's usual enough. Let him say his say. Come, Turpin, speak if you will."

"Yes," said the chaplain, "and tell the people that it was bad company, and not attending your parish church, that have brought you to this disgraceful end."

Dick advanced to the side of the cart.

"Hold him," whispered the chaplain to Claude.

"All's right, sir," said Claude. "He shan't get away from me, you may depend upon that. I wouldn't now lose sight of him for a hundred-pound-note."

"My friends and fellow-countrymen," said Dick, "God bless you all, and your wives, and your little ones, and your pretty sweethearts that I hope you will be all happy with."

"Bravo!" cried the people. "Hear him! hear him! Down with the bloodhounds! Let him go! let him go!"

"Cut it short," said the sheriff.

"I have only to say," added Dick, "that I make a full and free confession that I have taken many a guinea from a rich man with no heart of compassion in his bosom, and given it to a poor one to buy food for his wife and his little ones that were crying in their wretched home from hunger. But God bless you all, my friends; you have come to see me hanged for it—hanged like a dog!"

The yell that burst from the throats of the crowd was perfectly terrific. If Dick Turpin had spoken for an hour he could not have said more to the purpose than he did. There was surely not a person present whose feelings and sympathies were not deeply enlisted in behalf of the prisoner; and some women who were at the outskirts of the crowd got quite desperate in their rage at the idea of his being hung, and they called loudly upon the men to rescue him.

The sheriff, chaplain, and officers all got alarmed; and Claude was called upon to proceed with the execution. Jack pressed forward with the two led horses close to the scaffold.

"Keep back, you fellow with the horses," cried the officers. "Keep back. Do you want to get into the cart?"

"No," said Jack. "But the duke don't like anything said to me, old fellow: I'm his own groom."

Such is the slavish submission of rank among all official persons in England, that even the groom and the horses of a duke were held something sacred, and no more was said to Jack.

"Now Mr. Whats-your-name," cried the sheriff to Claude. "Be quick—look alive there! Don't you see the people are all in a ferment?"

"Yes, sir, I do."

"Very well, then, turn your man off, and let me get back to Oxford as quickly as I can."

"This won't do," said the officer who all along had interfered so much in the affair. "This won't do. I am convinced now of what I have suspected all along, and that is, that there is something wrong. I will shoot the first person who interferes with the due course of the law. Let them take the consequences."

As he spoke, this active officer took a pistol from his coat-pocket, and deliberately placed it at full cock.

Claude went to the edge of the cart and very mysteriously beckoned to this officer, saying—

"There is something amiss. I will tell you, but I don't want all the world to hear."

The officer inclined his head towards Claude, as he said—

"Well, what is it?—what is it?"

"This," said Claude, as he snatched the pistol from his hand, and then struck him from his horse with the heavy but-end of it. "This is what's wrong, and this is what's right."

To turn then and release Dick Turpin from his bonds was the work of an instant, and then taking him by the hand, he cried—

"Jump—jump!"

They both cleared the side of the cart and alighted outside of it among the people, while Jack made a sudden dart forward with the horses; and now a struggle ensued of a most fearful character, for the officers made an attack upon Claude and Dick with their short cutlasses, and two or three pistol shots were fired. The battle, however, did not last above a minute, for then with a roaring shout the mob made one rush, and cart, and gallows, and officers, and Dick, and Claude, and Jack, were all mixed up in one pellmell of confusion.

By great good fortune, Jack kept the horses on their feet, and Claude would have been killed if Dick had not thrown his arm round him, crying—

"He is not a hangman. He is my friend, Claude Duval!"

"And I'm their friend, Jack!" shouted Jack, "and this is Dick's mare, Bess, and this is Duval's horse. A rescue—a rescue!"

The mob raised a delirious shout of satisfaction, and in a moment or two they fairly lifted Dick Turpin and Claude Duval to the saddles of their respective steeds.

"Off and away!" cried Claude, as he raised his hat in the air, and then flung it fifty feet above his head.

"Bless you all," shouted Dick. "I don't know how to thank you, but if I live I won't forget the men of Oxford, nor the pretty girls either."

The officers made a desperate attempt to rally, but they were beaten down, and disarmed, and, half dead, they were thrown into the cart one upon another. The sheriff had, upon the very first commencement of the row, turned his horse's head towards the city, and set off at full speed, and no doubt he would have got back first if his horse had not thrown him into a ditch.

"Clear the way!" cried Jack.

A hundred voices immediately added—"Clear the way!—Clear the way!" and then, as if by magic, a lane was made for the three friends to gallop through. Dick, with his face flushed, rode on, calling out his thanks to the people. Claude came next, laughing and waving his hand, and Jack was the last, and not a little pleased did he look.

When they all three got clear of the vast throng of people, Dick turned in his saddle, and gave a wild sort of shrill "Hurrah!" which was echoed by the mob in tones of thunder, and then off they went like the wind.

The moment they were gone, the people made another mad sort of rush at the cart and the gallows, and pulled both fairly to fragments in a few moments. The chaplain had his gown torn to shreds, and was glad to get back to Oxford as fast as he could; and the officers, whose horses had all been let loose in the fray, likewise fled the best way they could.

The only one who seemed to have received rather a serious hurt, was the one who had been so officious with his pistol, and who had been knocked down by Claude at the commencement of the riot. He was unable to walk, so the people very considerately propped him up against the road-side and left him.

There was a person hovering about the outskirts of the crowd, who, when the affair was all over, and the mob went streaming back to Oxford, was heard to say—

"Dear me. Well, who would have thought of such a thing as this happening? I really was never so much surprised in all my life. The idea of Dick Turpin not being hung, after all! Do tell me how it could possibly happen, somebody?"

The person who thus spoke, was no other than Mr. Zadoc, and having got hold of one of the well-shaken officers, he treated him to something warm and comforting at the first public-house they came to, and heard the account of the whole affair, to which he listened without once changing countenance.

Of course, Zadoc's wish was to find out what the impression of the officer was concerning the rescue; but really this one that he had pitched upon was in such a state of mental and bodily confusion, that he could tell him nothing. In the meantime, our three friends were miles from the ancient city of Oxford.

CHAPTER CCIV.

A PLEASANT RIDE TO LONDON.

"HALT!" said Dick.

Claude and Jack both drew up immediately. "What's the matter?" said Claude; "anything amiss, Turpin?"

"No; but now that we are far enough from Oxford to set pursuit at defiance. I do not see why I should not shake hands with my best friends, and try, however inefficiently I may do it, to thank them."

"None of that," said Jack. "We don't want to be thanked, Dick."

"Well, but—but—"

"Come, come," said Claude, "we have just done for you what we know very well it would give you great pleasure to do for us; and it's such a grand thing to have succeeded in it, that that is quite congratulation enough for us; so don't say another word about it, Dick.'

"Well," said Turpin, "you may stop me for speaking about it, but you can't stop me from thinking; and to my dying day I shall fee how nobly and how gallantly I have been rescued from death."

"There you go again," said Jack. "He will have his say, Claude, do what we will, or say what we will."

"I am done now," said Dick.

"And a good job, too," laughed Claude; "for Jack is evidently getting into a perfect fever. And now, tell me, Dick, if you knew me when I first came into the press-room of the prison?"

"Not a bit."

"Then I was well disguised, and Zadoc did his part of the affair, after all, most admirably."

"Ah," said Dick, "Zadoc was in it? Then, I don't wonder that everything went well. But you, both of you, forget that it is all guess-work to me, and that beyond the result, I really know little or nothing of the affair."

Upon this, Claude briefly related to him the whole particulars of the proceedings after their failure in the attempt at escape from the prison; and Dick, shaking his head, said—

"Ah, I gave it all up as a bad job, when that rascal of a governor knocked me down in the prison-yard with the ladder."

"He didn't get much by that, though," said Jack.

"He got what has perfectly satisfied him," said Dick; "and so completely so, that he will not ask the justices for his next quarter's salary. You shot him dead, Claude."

"And he would have it," said Duval. "I did not use my pistol until he played the coward."

"Don't apologise, Duval. It was all right. But what do you both think of doing now?"

"Why, here is a very convenient spot," said Jack, "for opening the large vallise at my back, and getting out some of our own proper clothing, for I don't like the idea of Claude and I going much further in this sort of costume, which can be described by so many people."

"Right," said Dick; "and if out of your stock you can lend me a coat of a different colour to that which I have on, I shall not be sorry to wear it, for you may depend that the hue-and-cry will be after us sharp and fast, before many hours are over our heads."

Claude fully agreed in these remarks both of Jack's and Dick's; and as they were close to a little clump of trees, where they would be quite hidden from any casual observation, Jack opened the vailise, in which a number of articles of apparel were very closely packed, and in a very short time, they all three, by changing their coats and cravats, altered their appearance amazingly.

Dick Turpin was accommodated with a handsome scarlet coat belonging to Claude; and when they were all three mounted again, Claud cried out with a laugh—

"I think now that we might call upon all the world to stand and deliver!—Don't you, Dick?"

"It would not be a trifle that would stop us," said Dick.

"But," said Jack, "it would be anything but prudent just here; so come on, and let us get further off from Oxford; for you must recollect that any of the officers would know us in a moment, notwithstanding, by the alteration of our coats, we may not be described by people on the road."

"A carriage! A carriage!" said Dick Turpin, "by all that's good! A carriage!"

"Where?" said Claude.

Dick pointed in the direction of across-road, and there, sure enough, came cantering along one of those immense old-fashioned vehicles called a family coach—which, by-the-by, despite all the ridicule that has been cast upon them, are comfortable things. The coachman had a formidable wig on, and the footman the same, while both of them were too fat to dream of offering any resistance to anybody on the road. The horses were sleek and in capital flesh, and the whole equipage moved on at about the rate of five miles an hour.

Dick looked at Claude and laughed; but Jack interfered, saying—

"I cannot help thinking that it will be very imprudent to stop that carriage now, and so keep up a kind of ferment on the road. Of course, it will be the effect of pointing out exactly which way we have come. I would not think of it."

"Come—come, Jack," said Turpin, "withdraw your opposition, I beg of you, for I really want to see whether my imprisonment in Oxford jail has done me any harm, and I can't find out until I stop something or somebody on the highway."

"Well—well," said Jack, "if you must, you must. But let us all go, and then the affair will be sooner over. I will stay at the horses' heads while you two go to the carriage windows, and let me beg of you to be quick about it."

"All's right," said Claude. "Come on."

They then all three trotted along the cross-road so as to meet the carriage, and Jack, when they got sufficiently near, increased the speed of his horse, and cried to the coachman—

"Pull up, unless you want your brains blown out."

The coachman dropped his whip and turned purple in the face with the exertion he made to pull up the horses sharply.

"That will do," said Jack.

Claude went to one window of the carriage and Dick Turpin to the other, and letting down both the windows at once they looked into the vehicle. It was full of young ladies, with the exception of one tall grim-looking female, with a pair of blue spectacles.

"Don't be at all alarmed," said Claude. "We are only highwaymen, ladies, that's all."

"Nothing more," said Dick.

The tall grim-looking female with the blue spectacles tried to rise, but struck the top of her head in a moment against the roof of the carriage, and then in a voice like a cracked trumpet, she screamed—

"Murder!—thieves!—murder!"

All the young ladies huddled together and uttered little shrieks, so that for a few moments it was quite impossible for either Dick or Claude to get a word spoken with a chance of its being heard. They quietly waited until the commotion had died away, and then Claude said in a bland tone—

"My dear young ladies, don't be alarmed. Where are you going to?"

"Oh, sir," said one, "to school; and this is Miss Blink, our governess, and so cruel to us."

"Indeed!"

"Oh, yes! yes!" cried all the girls, in a breath.

"And has she got any money?" said Dick.

"Not a farthing, as I'm a living sinner," said Miss Blink. "Not a solitary farthing; and if any young lady says I have, I'm afraid when we get to Minerva House Academy that something disagreeable will happen to her. I have not a farthing."

"Oh, dear!" said all the young ladies.

"Well," said Claude, "we, of course, want money, and however disagreeable it may be to you all, we shall have to search every one of you, and begin with your governess. Of course, if you hand us out something handsome, we shall be off in a moment."

"Oh, you cruel Miss Blink!" said one young lady, bursting into tears. "How can you have us all searched by two highwaymen, when you know pa paid you thirty pounds before you left the lodge."

"And my pa did the same," said another.

"Here's all I have," said another, as she tremblingly handed half-a-guinea through the open windows of the carriage.

"Keep it, my dear," said Turpin. "You don't suppose that we are going to take anything from any of you, surely, with your pretty faces? Don't begin crying, now."

"There's no danger to any of you," said Claude; "and only think what lots of letters you can write to all your friends and acquaintances about this adventure; you can all say how you saw Claude Duval!"

"Duval!" said all the young ladies, in a breath. "Oh, my!"

"Yes," added Claude, "I am that person. Jack! Jack!"

"Yes," said Jack.

"Get the large shears ready! The shortest way of searching an old lady here with spectacles, who has got sixty pounds, and won't give it up, will be to cut her skirts off."

Miss Blink uttered an ear-piercing shriek, and involuntarily laid hold of the lower part of her dress. "I'll give the money, you wretches!" she said. "I'll give the money! Here it is! Here it is!"

"That will do, madam," said Dick.

"And hark you," said Claude. "I have means of information about what I wish to know, that you little dream of; and if I hear that any one of these young ladies suffer any punishment or harshness in consequence of what they have said to-day, we will come to Minerva House, in the dead and still hour of the night, and make you remember it."

"Oh, thank you!" said all the young ladies.

"How good-looking he is," whispered one of them.

"Oh, very!" said another. "Black eyes!"

Miss Blink looked absolutely frozen with rage and terror. Her nose almost emulated the colour of her blue spectacles, and although she opened her mouth several times, like some expiring fish, she could not say another word.

"Good day," said Dick; and he closed the window, at which he had stationed himself. Claude smiled an adieu, and closed his window.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE DEAD BODY IN THE "BUNCH OF GRAPES."

"All over?" said Jack.

"Yes, Jack."

"Very good. Now, Mr. Coachman, the very best thing you can do is to move on as quick as is at all convenient to you and your lazy horses, to where you were going to when we met you."

"Hurrah! hurrah!" said a voice at some little distance behind the carriage. Hurrah! there are the rogues! Down with them! There they are! The squire will pay well! Come on! Charge at 'em! Never mind about hurting them! They deserve all they get!"

"What the deuce is all this?" said Claude.

"What, indeed?" said Dick.

"We forgot the footman," said Jack, "and he has run off and got a dozen of country fellows with pitchforks and hedge-stakes. By the promise of a heavy recompense, they had made good speed; and being told there were only three highwaymen, they thought that they could easily overcome them."

"Upon my word," said Claude, "we are going to be taken by storm by the yokels."

"It looks like it," said Dick. "What is to be done?"

"Frighten them, by firing a few shots over their heads. I don't wish to kill them, but if they give my horse a touch with one of their pitchforks, I won't answer exactly for what I may do then."

"Nor I," said Dick.

"Come on—come on," shouted the footman, "there are the rogues. You will have five guineas a-piece for taking them. Come on, and take the rogues. Lay hands on 'em. They are all cowards—Knock 'em down—down with 'em!"

"Will you be so good," cried Claude, "as to shut your mouth?"

"Ah! that's the worst of the lot. Stick him!" cried the footman.

Claude levelled a pistol at him, and fired. It would have been an easy thing for Duval to have hit him, had he felt at all inclined to do so; but he had no such intention, although he did not wish to run the risk of going so close to him as he did, for the bullet carried off his hat and wig.

The footman thought that he was shot, and he fell flat upon his back, crying out—

"I am a dead man!"

"Blaze away!" said Claude. "Kill them all!"

Both Dick and Jack now fired over the heads of the country fellows, who now lingered but just long time enough to enable them to throw down their pitchforks and hedge-stakes, and then, in a wild riot, head over heels, and impeding each other in their efforts to get away, off they set.

It was a decided defeat; and our three friends amused themselves by sending three more shots after them, which made them yell again with dismay; and there was not one of the party that did not in imagination feel the bullet running riot in his inside.

"Now," said Jack to the coachman. "Drive on."

He did so immediately; and Dick dismounting, took up the prostrate footman and threw him right into the middle of a stagnant ditch, where he came with a frightful splash, and then they left him floundering about, while they again sought the high road to London.

CHAPTER CCV.

MORE ADVENTURES ON THE OXFORD ROAD.

"This is not a very bad beginning," said Jack.

"Far from it," laughed Claude. "If we go on in this way, we shall soon make up the little expenses at Oxford."

"Not a doubt of it," said Dick Turpin; "but it would please me much better, if the whole of those expenses could be by any means got out of the Oxford authorities; and if it were to be years hence that I come across any of them, I shall insist upon it that they owe me the amount, and enforce payment."

"Yes; according to law," said Jack.

"The law of the road," cried Claude, "you mean. That is the best law for us. Its jurisdiction is undeniable, let the country be where it may, and the proceedings are all of the most summary character, and nobody is incommoded by any vexatious delays."

"That is true enough," responded Dick, "and I do believe it would save many a man many a heart-ache if, instead of being placed in the court of chancery, he would just put his money in his pocket, and come out on the road and have it taken from him by us, in a quiet and gentlemanly manner."

"Not a doubt of it," said Jack. "It ought to be recommended in some of the public papers."

"Stop," cried Claude, "we are in luck's way surely to-day, as regards carriages, for here is another. Look, it will be in the high-road in a few moments."

They all looked in the direction that Claude pointed, and they saw a curricle, which was then a very fashionable description of carriage, coming rapidly on. Only one person was in it, and he was dressed up to the very height of fashion, and what was then considered to be elegance. The hat he wore was like that with which Mother Shipton is now accommodated, being the shape of a sugar-loaf, and the rest of his costume, to our present notions, was equally outrageous. The only things very natural about the whole affair were the horses, and they were as nature made them and intended they should look.

"Now, what do you think that fellow is?" said Dick.

"Can't say," replied Jack.

"Doubtful," said Claude; "but you two stay here while I go and stop him. It would perhaps terrify him to death, poor devil, if we were all three to appear at once upon him."

"Very good," said Dick. "Go on, Claude. We will consider this to be your adventure, now."

Claude did not wait to make any further remark, but trotting up to the corner of the lane, from which the curricle was about to emerge into the high-road, he cried—

"Pull up, sir, unless you want to be a dead man!"

At these words the dandified personage in the curricle at once dropped his reins, and slid off his seat on to the mat at the bottom of the curricle.

"Oh, spare my life!" he said. "Spare my life, my dear sir; do, if you please. Only spare my life! Oh, do!"

"Upon some conditions I will," said Claude.

"Oh, yes, anything, my dear sir. Anything in the worl! that you like. I suppose, my dear sir, that you are a highway-gentleman, are you not?"

"I am, and my principal pleasure is in cutting peoples' throats if they do not do as I wish them. In the first place, who are you, sir?"

"Oh dear. My name is Hannibal Popham, commonly called Hannibal Popham, Esq.; and I am going to the christening of a baby, I am, that belongs to Mr. Scatters, at the lodge about a mile on. They are new people in the neighbourhood, and have invited all the respectable people; and I am to be the godfather of the dear infant; and here's the silver mug that I have gone to the expense of four pounds ten shillings to purchase as a present for it."

"Indeed?'

"Yes, sir. Here it is."

"Very good," said Claude, as he took the mug and put it in one of the capacious pockets of his coat.

Mr. Popham groaned.

"Now, tell me, sir," added Duval, "if you are personally known to the Scatters family?"

"Oh dear, yes; that is to say, they have heard of me, my dear sir, as a highly respectable resident in the county, but they never saw me, if you mean that."

"And what is the name of their place?"

"It is called Athens Lodge, and they do tell me that the Scatters have made it quite charming."

"Very well, Mr. Popham, now listen to me. I have nothing to do in this world, but to fulfil my promises, and I here solemnly promise you, that if you do not get out of your curricle and walk to Oxford, I will hunt you up if you be twenty miles in the bowels of the earth, and make your brains into a supper for a favourite cat I have at home. If you, however, do what I tell you, to walk to Oxford, and stay there an hour and then go home, your curricle will be restored to you, and I will give you a pass which shall for ever save you from being stopped on the road by any highwayman. Now, sir, which do you decide upon doing?"

"Oh, dear, can you doubt?"

"Decide, sir."

"I will go to Oxford, certainly; but I would rather ride, do you know, for I am not a very good walker. Perhaps you will let me have the curricle?"

"Decidedly not. There is a person, just at the entrance to Oxford, who will let me know if you pass his house, and if you do not, woe be to you. It is a red-brick house, with the name of Jenkins on the door, and as you pass you must throw a stone through one of the window-panes. Do you quite clearly understand that?"

"Yes, sir, quite—oh, quite clearly! But you have not given me the sign that is to carry me free and harmless from the attacks of all gentlemen of your honourable profession, sir."

"This is it."

"You don't say so?"

The sign which Claude gave to Mr. Popham was merely to place the point of his thumb upon the tip of his nose, and to spread out the rest of the fingers in the manner vulgarly called "taking a sight."

"Well," added the simple-minded Mr. Popham, "who would have thought it! And if there are two of them, sir, I suppose you do this—

Mr. Popham perpetrated what is known popularly as a "double sight."

"Precisely," said Claude. "Nothing can be clearer, my good sir—nothing in the world can be more apt than your mode of doing it; and I can assure you that from henceforward you will have the singular and most unprecedented advantage of passing along the public roads free from the exactions of highwaymen; and for your readiness in coming to my conditions, I shall not ask you for your purse, but permit you to carry it with you, provided you set off at once to Oxford."

"I'm off, sir," said Mr. Popham, "I'm off! Thanks, Mr. Highway-gentleman, I'm very much obliged to you, sir! Good day!"

With this, Mr. Popham got out of his curricle, and summoning all his energies to assist him, he set off on his rather long walk to Oxford alone.

"Now, of all the idiots that ever I came near," said Claude, "this fellow is about one of the worst. This is too easy a triumph, and is hardly to be considered as one. There he goes! Poor devil! Now he gets to that turn of the road, and then he disappears. Ha! ha! Jack! Jack! Dick! Come here! It is as good as a play. Come here, both of you, I have something famous to tell you. Come on!"

Jack and Dick at once rode up full of curiosity to know how Claude had possessed himself of the curricle, and sent the owner of it off on foot, apparently so well contented. Claude could really hardly tell them the story for laughing; but he did, at length, manage to do so, and they were as highly amused as he was, and could not contain their laughter, which broke forth in vociferous peals.

"Upon my word it was almost too bad," said Jack, "to send the poor devil off on such an errand."

"Not at all," said Claude; "he will be wiser for ever after for it."

"But what do you mean to do," said Dick, "with the curricle? Here we are all mounted."

"Well, I tell you what I should like to do with it. We have had quite enough of gravity in Oxford, and I am inclined for a frolic, just for the purpose of knocking out of one's brains the recollection of the proceedings of the last few days. I should like very much to go to the christening."

"Oh, Claude," said Jack, shaking his head.

Dick said nothing.

"Yes," added Claude, "I own I should, and what I propose is that we put up our horses somewhere, and make what change we can in our apparel, and then all three get into the curricle, which you see is quite roomy enough, and drive to Athens Lodge, where I will personate Mr. Popham, and pass you off as two friends whom I have brought with me to do honour to the solemnity. What say you to that?"

"That it won't do," said Dick.

"Indeed! Why not?"

"Just because, although it may well happen that this Scatters family may not know Mr. Hannibal Popham by sight; if they have visited this neighbourhood to the christening, there will be many there who do, and detection would be immediate to our very great danger and discomfiture."

"Confound it, yes," said Claude; "that's true."

"Give it up," said Jack.

"No, there is no occasion to do that," added Dick. "If Claude has a fancy for the freak, and if we can find any really safe place to leave our steeds at, I think it may be done by representing that the captain is rather indisposed and cannot come, but that he has sent us, as three London friends of his in his stead, and lent us his curricle, which, most likely, he is well-known to come in."

"Yes, that will do," said Claude.

"With the difficulty of safely bestowing our cattle," said Jack. "That seems to me to be the point upon which all the affair ought to turn. If that can be done, I am as willing as possible to go into it, but it would, indeed, be a very serious thing if we were for the mere sake of a frolic to deprive ourselves of our horses."

"It would," said Claude, "but by a gallop of about three miles along the road, we shall come to an old public-house called the Yew Tree, and I will engage that there our cattle will be safe enough as long as we like to leave them."

"If that is the case," said Dick, "I have no objection; but I must own that it would cut me to the heart, now, to part with my bonny Bess, after having been deprived of her so long, and only again renewing the acquaintance for a few hours."

"Then I give up the scheme," said Claude. "If there should be any doubt lingering in your mind, Dick, about the safety of your steed, you would not enjoy the joke, so I would rather give it up."

"Not so, Claude—not so. I have no doubt when you say all is safe, you know the inn to which you refer."

"Well; and our horses will be as safe there as they are now, while we have our hands upon the bridles."

"Come on, then—I am for the frolic," said Dick.

"And I," said Jack.

"Then I will drive the curricle," said Claude, "and you be so good, Jack, as to lead my horse. The creature knows you, and will trot along by your side comfortably. Here we go."

This arrangement was speedily enough effected, and off they all went, Duval taking the lead in the curricle. The three miles he had spoken of was rapidly enough passed over, and there snugly ensconced among some trees in a very pretty situation, the old Yew Tree Inn was discerned.

"There is the house," said Claude, "and there is the landlord shading his eyes with his hand as he looks down the wood to see who is coming at such a dashing pace."

Claude drew up sharply at the door of the inn. The landlord lifted up his hand, and in a strong Scotch accent, said—

"Gude guide! is that you!"

"Yes," said Claude. "I have taken to travel the road on wheels, now, instead of on horseback. How do you think it will do?"

"Eh, sirs? not at all—not at all."

"Then I'll give it up, and all I want you to do now, is to let our horses stand in your stable ready saddled for the road at a minute's notice, while we go after a bit of fun in this curricle. Can you do it?"

"Can I? surely I can—surely I can, but just be taking care of your necks, my braw callants, or ye'll rue the day, but make yersels easy about the beastes. They will be all right enough. What will take a taste of?"

"Anything you like."

The landlord upon this rather general order, retired into the house and brought out a silver flagon, half full of brandy.

"Take a sup of this," he said, "it's only a strong kind of ale, if you look at it with the eye of philosophy."

"It just is a strong kind of ale," said Claude. "It's enough to make one wink again."

They all three took a drop of the brandy and then they rode the horses into the inn-yard, and left them up to the mid leg in fodder, after which they got into the curricle, and Claude waiving his whip as an adieu to the landlord, turned the horses heads on the route they had come, but before he started he called out—

"Do you know a place called Athens Lodge?"

"Do I know it? To be sure I do. You'll see it only a mile from here. It has the oddest crinkum crankums of chimneys that ever you saw in all your life."

"All's right," said Claude. "I saw the very chimneys as we came along, but did not know it was the place we sought. We shall be soon back, Sanders. Good-by for the present."

CHAPTER CCVI.

DETAILS SOME ADVENTURES AT A CHRISTENING.

"Now Dick," said Claude, "is your mind easy about your horse?"

"Quite. It was before, too, after your assurance."

"Some people, Dick, have a decided objection to my assurance."

"And well they may, in one sense."

"Not a doubt of it," said Jack; "but only look—there among the trees a good way on, you may see the very chimneys that our friend of the old 'Yew Tree' calls crinkum crankums."

"To be sure," said Claude. "There they are, and here we are in a nice shady bit of road.—How do we all look for guests at a christening?"

"Well enough," said Dick, "we can make an excuse for not being in full dress, as we can say we only came down to see our frend, Popham, and did not expect the honour of being asked to represent him upon the auspicious occasion, and all that sort of thing, you know."

"Capital," said Claude, "you shall make the speech."

"Not I," said Dick, "it is your joke, Claude, and you shall carry it out, I will have nothing of that sort to do with it, and if you try to let me in for any of the speech-making, I shall be off back to the 'Yew Tree' and there wait for you both."

"Well, well.—I'll do the speeches—I'll do all that, but mind you keep a sharp look out, both of you, in case any of the Philistines should be about, for we don't know exactly who may be invited to this affair at the lodge."

"Trust me for that," said Jack. "I know an officer by the look of his eye in a moment. They can never deceive me let them be disguised how they may. There is always a particular white wooden look about their faces that they cannot get rid of."

Both Dick and Claude laughed heartily at this odd idea of Jack's concerning officers, and then as the gates of Athens Lodge appeared in sight, they thought it prudent to put on a grave aspect, and to commence playing their parts as they intended to play them.

Several vehicles of different descriptions were already at the gates of the lodge, and there was quite a bustling aspect about the servants who were lounging about. The moment Claude, who was driving, drew up at the gate, a servant came to him and touching his hat respectfully, said—

"I will take charge of the curricle, sir, if you please."

"Very well," said Claude. "I hope all the family is well?"

"Quite well, sir. They say that Julius Cæsar is a little fractious, this morning, that is all."

"Who?"

"Julius Cæsar, sir, who is going to be christened to-day, but the nurse don't think it is anything serious at all, and master and misses, sir, believes that he will be able to go through the ceremony quite properly, sir."

The man delivered all this with such an abominable stupid solidity that it was really quite dreadful to hear him, and it was only with the greatest possible difficulty, that Claude prevented himself from bursting into a general roar of laughing, but as that would have spoiled everything, he resisted the impulse to do so, and said with great gravity—

"Julius Cæsar then, I presume, is to be the name of the child?"

"Oh dear, yes, sir, that's quite settled."

"Very good. We will go at once to the house, if you please."

"Yes, gentlemen—certainly. You will find the whole family in the lodge, gentlemen. It's only round those trees, you see them right on a-head, gentlemen."

"Thank you, that will do. That will do, we know the way. It is all right."

The servant took charge of the curricle, and Claude—with Jack on one side and Dick Turpin on the other—deliberately walked up the trim and well-kept gravelled path that led to the lodge, which they soon came in sight of, and which they could not help admiring. It was a very pretty structure, indeed, built after the Greek model, and with a row of Corinthian columns before it, that lent an air of great grace and elegance to the whole structure.

"Upon my word," said Claude, "our dear friends, the Scatters, are very well lodged here."

"They are, indeed," said Jack.

"It is not owing to their taste, though," said Dick; "you may quite depend upon it. Money has purchased this place, which probably has been the abode of one whose taste has outrun his means."

"Not a very rare circumstance," said Claude.

"By no means. But who have we here?"

A servant out of livery came to meet them, for they had been seen from the windows of the lodge, and as everybody in the drawing-room had disclaimed any acquaintance with them, it had been thought advisable to send out for the purpose of ascertaining who they really were. The servant executed a bow, and then said—

"If you please, gentlemen, I will announce you names."

"Very well," said Claude. "I am Mr. Green, this is Mr, Brown, and this Mr. Grey."

The servant bowed again.

"You can tell your master that we are all intimate friends of Mr. Popham, who was to have stood as god-father to Julius Cæsar; but as he is very much indisposed, and under medical advice, dare not leave his room, he hopes that I shall be permitted to officiate in his stead on this interesting occasion, and we have come here in his curricle."

"Pray step this way, gentlemen. I will tell master directly."

"Very good; you go on before and let him know the state of affairs, and we will follow you."

Thus authorised to carry his news as quickly as he chose, the servant darted off into the house, and Claude, with his two friends, purposely went on very slowly, in order that there should be time for the master of the house to be made acquainted with their pretensions, which would take off a great deal of the awkwardness of the meeting.

"Will it do, do you think?" said Dick.

"To be sure," said Claude. "What can they say?"

"Well," said Jack, "I don't see how they can get out of it very well; but here we are, and there are no end of eyes looking at us from the drawing-room windows. If there should be any there who know us it will be rather a treat, I think."

"We will not think such a thing possible."

"It will be quite sufficient if we do not think it probable," said Jack. "But here comes some one else."

A pompous-looking man now made his appearance in so remarkably stiff a cravat, that it was quite impossible he could look down or turn his head without turning his whole body at the same time. This was no other than Mr. Scatters himself, and as he advanced towards his guests he made a very condescending kind of bow, and said—

"Gentlemen, you are extremely welcome, indeed—I may say extremely welcome; and it is to me a source of very great regret that Mr. Popham is indisposed and cannot do us the pleasure of coming to the lodge upon this little, rather interesting, occasion."

"Sir," said Claude, "it is to us likewise a matter of great regret that our esteemed friend cannot come; but if my humble services, as his representative, will suffice, I tender them with pleasure, otherwise, sir, we will not intrude upon you any further."

"Don't mention that, gentlemen. Come in—come in, I pray you. I am very happy, indeed, to see you at my poor little place here. Ah!—hem! A nice little lodge, you see, with no pretensions. Some of these days I may, perhaps, take it into my head to build a mansion—A-hem!"

It was quite clear, that the weak point of Mr. Scatters was vanity; so Claude was quite resolved upon exhibiting a tolerably large dose of flattery, and he said—

"Sir, this place, to my humble judgment, is superb; and I can only answer, that it could have had its origin in the fine taste, and exquisite imagination of a Scatters."

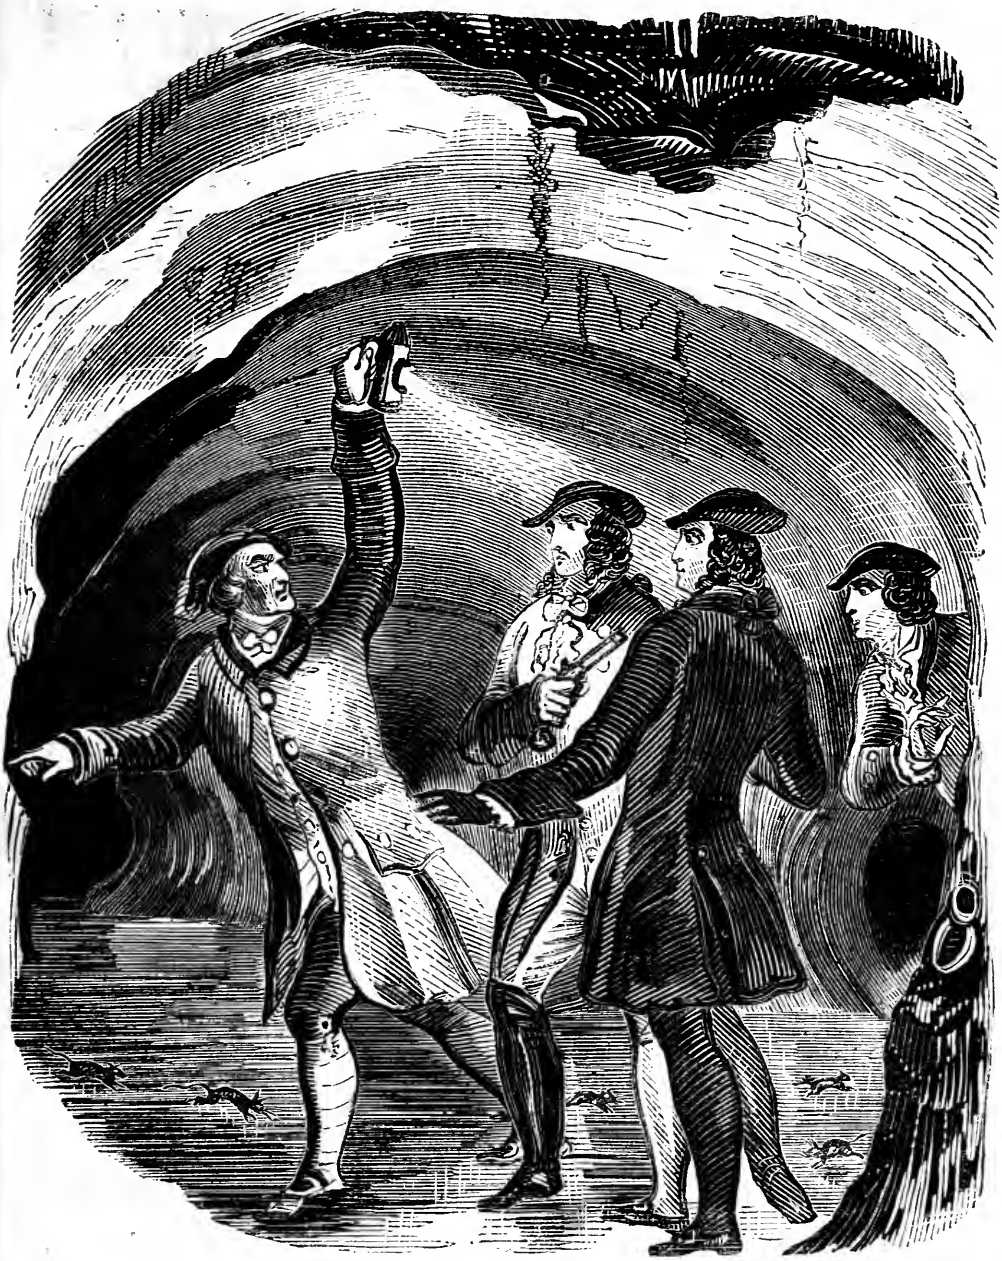
"Then," said Dick to Jack, in a whisper; "if he will swallow that, he will stop at nothing."

Mr. Scatters bowed as he replied—

"Sir, I rejoice to find that Mr. Popham's representative, upon this little occasion, is a gentleman of so discriminating a character."

Upon this, Claude bowed; and all the bowing, and the movements of the arms were exceedingly interesting, no doubt, to the people in the drawing-room, who had not the smallest idea of what it was all about. It was with no small difficulty, that Jack and Dick kept themselves in a decorous state of gravity; and as for Claude, he was ready to burst with laughter at the antics, and the vanity of Mr. Scatters.

They all ascended the flight of steps that led under the columns with their Corinthian capitals; and then passing through a hall, paved with marble, they entered the drawing-room, where there was an assemblage of some twenty or thirty people, waiting for the ceremony to commence.



"Allow me to introduce," said Mr. Scatters, "the representative of our excellent neighbour, Mr. Popham, who is too unwell to attend upon this little auspicious, and interesting occasion. I beg, ladies and gentlemen, to introduce to you all, Mr.—a—a——"

"Brown," said Claude.

"Brown," said Mr. Scatters, "and this is his friend, Mr.—Mr.——"

"Green," said Claude.

"Green," added Mr. Scatters, and then in like manner Jack was introduced as Mr. Grey; and then all the guests smiled, and bowed, and awarded, in a pleasant sort of smiling way, their satisfaction; and just as Claude was about to say something, a tremendous squall came upon the ears of the company, and Mr. Scatters exclaimed—

THE THREE ADVENTURERS FOLLOWING BOB THROUGH THE VAULTS.

"It is Julius Cæsar! Oh, it is Julius Cæsar! What are they doing to that adorable infant?"

"Here he is!—here he is!" cried everybody. "Here he is! Oh, the love! Come along! Oh, the duck!"

A succession of little howls and squalls now proceeded from the further end of the drawing-room, and, in a few moments, an amazingly fat nurse made her appearance, carrying the baby, and the mother, no less a personage than the female Scatters, following closely, dressed up to the eys in a profusion of satins, and laces, and flounces, and jewellery.

"He comes – he comes!" cried Mr. Scatters. "Oh, he comes!"

And then all the ladies surrounded the infant Scatters; and such a fussing, and kissing, and squealing was never seen.

"This is affecting," said Mr. Scatters.

"Very," said Claude.

"The man," said Dick, "who could refuse the sympathetic tear to a scene like this, would think nothing of sending his own father to be baked for a Christmas dinner."

"Where is Mr. Popham?" said Mrs. Scatters, in a sighing tone of voice. "Oh, where is Mr. Popham, who is to assist in placing Julius Cæsar in the pale of the church?"

"My dear," said Mr. Scatters, "calm yourself. Mr. Popham can't come, but he has sent a most elegant gentleman, of the name of Brown."

"Oh, gracious!"

"My love! My life! Be calm. Allow me to introduce Mr. Brown to you, and I am sure you will be quite pleased to find so very gentlemanly and appreciating a person. Mr. Brown, allow me to present you to Mrs. Scatters. My love, this is the representative of Mr. Popham."

Mrs. Scatters took a glance at Claude, and finding, as it was easy enough to find at a very transient glance, that he was decidedly well-looking, she bestowed quite a favourable regard upon him, and murmured out that he was very welcome.

"I am much obliged, madam," said Claude; "it is a pity that child is not a girl."

"Indeed, sir. Why so?"

"Because then there might be a chance that the world would have such another face and form as her mother's to gaze upon."

"Oh, sir."

The lady bestowed, now, upon Claude a very gracious smile, indeed, and it was quite clear that she was just as fond of flattery as Mr. Scatters, and, indeed, as all the world is.

"The most reverend, the dean," announced a servant, and then all eyes were turned towards the door, at which entered a clergyman with a very white placid, stupid-looking face, who was to perform the ceremony of christening; and who being the second cousin's nephew of a member of the government, was made a Dean in the church.

"Dear me," said Mr. Scatters, "this is very delightful. Here we are all, and Julius Cæsar quite quiet."

A terrific squall at that moment from the young scion of the Scatter's stock, contradicted the rash assertion, and several of the guests placed their hands to their ears to shut out the sound.

"Oh, Gracious!" cried Mrs. Scatters, "what is the matter with Julius Cæsar?"

"Nothing, mum," said the nurse. "It was nothing, mum. It's only one of his little ways, mum, bless his heart, that's all. There, now, he is for all the world just like a lamb again."

The dean was, now, the centre of a circle of ordinary ladies, who thought that in every stupid common-place sentence that came from his lips, there must be hidden some very proficient piece of wisdom, and so they admired it upon trust, accordingly.

"Ladies and gentlemen!" said Mr. Scatters, suddenly.

Every eye was turned at once upon him.

"Ladies and gentlemen, the little interesting ceremony will be performed in this room first, and then when it is all over, there will be a Dejuner a la Fa- chette in the dining-room, and we shall all have the pleasure of drinking the health of Julius Cæsar. Are you quite ready, Mr. Dean?"

"Oh, dear yes; as I was saying, after the rain you generally have it a little fine, you see, in consequence of a change in the weather," said the sapient dean.

CHAPTER CCVII.

DUVAL MAKES AN EXTRAORDINARY SENSATION AT THE LODGE.

This announcement from Mr. Scatters appeared to give the most unqualified and general satisfaction, as such announcements seldom fail to do; for upon such occasions as that one, the good people who had come to the lodge, were rather more intent upon what they were to get in the shape of good things to eat and drink, than upon anything at all concerning the fate or prospects of Julius Cæsar.

Claude was close to the dean when that miracle of wisdom made the remark with which we concluded our last chapter, and he could not resist the very natural impulse to reply to him something after his own fashion.

"That, sir," said Claude, "is a very just observation of yours, and I have frequently remarked that when the wind is blowing in this country, it raises the dust, and that if any of it gets into the eyes, it has quite an effect, for the time, upon the vision, and in some constitutions induces a sneeze."

"Really," said the dean, "that is a remarkable fact. You are, sir, a most observing individual."

"I pride myself upon being so, sir."

"And you may with justice, sir. That last remark of yours about the dust strikes me as being both original and true. I will make a note of it when I get home."

"Oh, sir, you do me too much honour."

"Not at all. Not at all. But we are really the only persons conversing, and I see that our kind friend, the gentleman, is anxiously waiting for the christening of the baby."

"Do not let me interrupt you, my dear sir."

The dean and Claude bowed to each other very ceremoniously, indeed, and then the company assumed extremely decorous attitudes in which to witness the ceremony.

A silver mug of water was brought to the dean, by the aid of which he was to sprinkle Julius Cæsar, and then lifting up his eyes like a dying duck, he commenced the ceremony.

Several of the ladies, particularly those who happened to be the nearest to Mrs. Scatters pretended to be deeply affected at what was going on, and made considerable snuffling with their noses to indicate the extent to which their feelings were affected, and Mr. Scatters, with his eyes half shut, looked as though he fully believed that a choir of angels were invisibly assisting at the ceremony.

In a very few minutes it came to be Claude's turn to make the responses, and everything went smoothly enough, until, in a very bland kind of voice, the dean asked what name was to be given to the child.

Of course, everybody fully expected that it was as fixed as fate that Julius Cæsar was to be the name, and it was not for the moment imagined that any combination of circumstances could possibly occur to alter such a thing. The consternation of the whole assembly may therefore be imagined, but certainly not described, when Claude Duval proceeded to enact this most extraordinary part in the performance, and which no earthly consideration, connected with his own safety, could possibly have induced him to alter.

In a clear voice—alas! a world too clear for the peace of the Scatters family, Claude replied to the dean,—

"The name of this sweet infant will be Dick Turpin Jack Claude Duval!"

The dean very nearly dropped the hopes of all the Scatters on to the floor, and as he had his hand in the water, ready for the very polite sprinkle he had been going to give the child, he, on the surprise and the impulse of the moment gave it such a dash with the cold fluid in the face, that Julius Cæsar, who had for the last few moments behaved with the utmost decorum burst into a roar that was perfectly terrific, and made everybody wink again.

"Goodness Gracious!" shouted Mr. Scatters, trying to make himself heard over the cries of his infant heir; "what do I hear? This must be some terrible dream, surely?"

The dean looked aghast, and Mrs. Scatters would have fainted, only there was no one near to her but a very small gentleman, who looked as though he would be quite certain to let her drop if she ventured upon the very hazardous feat of falling into his arms.

Claude pretended to look astonished at the sensation he had created, and Jack and Dick had the greatest difficulty to keep themselves from bursting into a roar of laughter.

"My dear sir," gasped the dean; "you don't really mean to say that the child is to be christened in so many names?"

"I believe," said Claude, "that as the good father, I may name the child what I like."

"Yes; but—but—Oh, dear! Oh, dear!"

"And I further believe, sir, that you are bound to go on with the ceremony which is thus scandalously interrupted. I have given you the name, sir, and must beg you to be so good as to finish christening the child, and here's the silver mug that I intend to give it."

"No—no—no!" cried Mr. Scatters, rushing forward, "I can't have it christened Jack and Dick and all that sort of thing. It can't be done! Stop it—stop it, I won't hear it!"

"But my dear sir," said Claude, "are you aware that you are interrupting one of the most awful and serious ceremonies of the church? Really this is shocking conduct."

"Bother the church and the ceremonies, too. I am a man of ample means, sir, I can tell you, and as regards the church and its ceremonies, I am willing to uphold them, as all highly respectable people do, as long as they are convenient to me, but no longer, sir. Stop the christening—stop the christening! There is some horrid mistake! I can't have Julius Cæsar called such frightful names."

"If the dean," said Claude, "don't go on with the christening, and give the child the names I mention, I shall represent his conduct to the bishop of the dioscese."

"That, sir," said Mr. Scatters, "allow me to tell you, will not be of the slightest consequence, for the bishop's wife's cousin's aunt is the twin sister of the dean's wife."

"Oh, ah, to be sure then," said Claude, "of course the dean may do just what he likes."

"Exactly so, sir. Therefore, Mr. Dean, I beg that you will be so good as to put an immediate stop to the christening."

"Very well then," said Claude, "I shall go, and my friends will go with me, I have no doubt. You may all say what you like, and do what you like, but that child's proper name now is Dick Turpin Jack Claude Duval, and that is the name he will have to go by in spite of you all. There is the mug that I brought to him, and which I scorn to take away again; and now, ladies and gentlemen, I and my friends bid you all good day, and when there is another christening here we hope to come again."

These words were scarcely out of Claude's lips, when a servant, with much less ceremony than the Scatters' family usually looked for in their domestics, rushed into the room, crying aloud—

"Oh, sir—oh, sir—oh, missus, oh!"

"What is it?" shouted half a dozen voices.

"Why, sir, there's come a mounted officer from Oxford, sir, and missus and he says that three notorious highwaymen, named Claude Duval, Dick Turpin, and Jack Somebody, are on the road, and that everybody ought to be warned about them, and to go about with loaded pistols and all that sort of thing."

All the ladies present raised a simultaneous scream, and looked at our three adventurers.

"The game is up," whispered Dick to Claude.

"Rather," said Claude. "Jack, go to the door of the room, and don't let a soul out of it."

Jack did so, and then Claude, with one bound, sprang upon a table, and looking around him with an air of haughty defiance, he said—

"Ladies and gentlemen—It don't matter much who I am, or who my two friends are. Let it suffice you that we are willing to leave this house in peace, and that it will be highly dangerous to prevent us."

The ladies gave another scream.

"Nothing," added Claude, "can possibly be to me more afflicting than to be a source of terror to the ladies. I sincerely hope that among all the beauty and bright eyes and lovely forms that I see around me, I shall not occasion one pang of alarm; such is far, very far distant indeed from my intention."

"He is really a very nice man," whispered one lady to another, who was close to her.

"And handsome, decidedly so," said the other.

"And so discriminating," said a third, joining the conference, "such evident taste he has."

"Oh, great—great."

"But," cried Mr. Scatters, "goodness gracious, we cannot put up with this. I am a respectable man, and cannot think of it for a moment. Police—police! Murder!"

"Hark you, sir," said Claude. "The pattern upon this wall is very pretty, but I shall be compelled to alter it, if you make any more disturbance. Be warned, sir."

"Alter the pattern on the wall? What do you mean, sir? What do you mean, you low highwayman?"

"I mean that I will plaster one of the panels with the few brains you possess. Do you understand me now, sir?"

Mr. Scatters staggered back until he was supported by the wall, and then Claude said to Dick—

"Be so good as to shoot that young gentleman who is trying to get out of the room by yonder window."

"Certainly," said Turpin, as he drew a pistol from his pocket, and presented it at a lanky youth who had thought he might make an escape without being noticed, and who certainly would have done so if Claude had not been so elevated, from his position upon the table, that he could see everything that was going on remarkably well.

When the youth found that his clever device did not succeed, he rolled upon his back in an agony of terror, and sought for safety among the feet of the ladies.

"Oh, well, let him be," said Claude. "It is sufficient that he is stopped in his design; and now we will go."

With this Claude jumped from the table, but the dean came up to him, and in a mild voice, said—

"I sincerely hope that you and your friends will be so good as to give yourselves up to justice; and I beg to assure you that such a proceeding on your part, will be highly satisfactory to the authorities."

"You don't say so?" said Claude, as he lifted the silver ewer of water, that had been brought for the christening, from the table, and discharged the whole contents into the dean's face. "You don't say so? There, now I have christened you, and you may take the name of Tom Noddy, forthwith."

"Bless me," said the dean, as he went spluttering away. "How water does wet you, to be sure."

"Come," whispered Dick to Claude, "come. Every moment now is fraught with its own particular dangers."

"I know it. These people must all be locked into this room. Is there a key in the door?"

"Yes."

"Then lock it on the outside, and then we will make the best of our way to our horses and be off, for the neighbourhood of the lodge will soon be decidedly too hot to hold us."

"It is now."

"Come, then. Ladies, once more, adieu."

Claude made for the door, and in a moment they were all three on the outside of it; Dick locked it, and took the key away with him, and then they ran out of the house.

"Stop one moment," said Claude, as they halted within a side-view of the windows of the room. "Stop a moment."

"What for, Claude?"

"You will see directly. Some one will make an attempt to get out at one of the windows, and I want to put a stop to that sort of thing for the next ten minutes."

"I understand you."

The anticipations of Duval regarding what would occur, turned out to be quite correct, for in the course of half a minute the head and leg of somebody was projected from one of the windows that opened on to the terrace, that went partially round the house. Claude had a pistol in his hand, and he immediately fired, but he did not intend any mischief. All he wished was to give a salutary fright to the owner of the head and the leg, and through him a warning to the whole of the company.

The bullet flew past the window, and the head and leg disappeared into the room again in a moment, while a loud scream testified to the effect that the shot had had upon the nerves of the person to whom those members belonged.

CHAPTER CCVIII.

CLAUDE REDRESSES SOME GRIEVANCES ON THE ROAD TO LONDON.

"That will do, I think," said Claude.

"It ought," said Jack, "but the panic won't last very long, so let us be off at once. It won't do to have Mr. Scatters and all his guests yelping at our heels like a lot of curs, and Julius Cæsar, for all we know to the contrary, bringing up the rear."

Both Claude and Dick laughed at Jack's description of what might be, but they did not neglect the sound advice that his words contained, and they all made off now as quickly as they possibly could from Athens Lodge.

No doubt the servant who had brought the information into the drawing-room, of there being upon the road three such very desperate personages as Duval, Jack, and Dick Turpin, was not the only one of the domestics at the lodge entrance who had heard the tale of the mounted man from Oxford; and now when the three friends where seen advancing in haste towards the gates, it struck everybody there that they might be the very personages mentioned by the officer, who had got off his horse, and with the bridle of it hanging upon his arm, and a pot of ale in his hand, was listening with a look of sharp suspicion upon his face to the echoes of the pistol-shot that Claude had just fired.

"Look," said Jack.

"At what?" cried Claude. "Which way, Jack?"

"To the gate—there is one of the Oxford officers. He was with us all at the foot of the gallows on a recent occasion, Dick."

"Don't mention it," said Turpin. "It gives one almost a crick in the neck to hear of it, but we must not allow him to be at all mischievous. I will run on."

As he spoke, Dick run on, but the officer saw that there was danger, and not probably feeling himself to be quite a match for three stout men, he threw down the pot of ale, and made a rapid and vigorous attempt to mount his horse again.

"Stop that!" cried Dick. "Stop that!" and then he just reached the officer in time to lay hold of his leg, and prevent him from mounting the horse, and not only did Dick do that, but he pulled the officer right on to the ground, saying—"Resistance will be madness. You may preserve your life by lying still."

"When I can't help it," said the officer, "I will, but not before. You are my prisoner, and I call upon all here to aid me in the king's name."

He then laid hold of Dick by the ancles and tried to throw him down, but as Dick resisted the first shock, the officer did not succeed in doing that. The servants who were about made a slight kind of movement, as though they fully intended in some sort of way to answer the appeal of the officer; but Claude stepping up with a pistol in each hand, cried out in a loud stern voice—

"If any man here present is tired of his life, let him only move hand or foot to interfere with us, and away goes the top of his skull, as sure as he now breathes, and that there are a couple of slugs in each of these barrels that will do that business for him most effectually."

This was a threat that had the desired effect, particularly as Jack appeared close to Claude similiarly armed; and as Dick dealt the officer, who would not leave go of his ancles, a blow with his clenched fist, that sent him rolling over and over to some distance, where he lay insensible, or affecting, from prudential considerations, to be so; for by this time he must have seen that the only chance he had in the affair, was of a broken head.

Not one of the servants now ventured upon anything in the shape of interference; and our three adventurers passed out by the open gate into the roadway.

"Don't hurry," said Claude, "but the sooner we are on horseback, the better it will be for our healths, I think."

"Not a doubt of it, for if I mistake not," said Dick, "we shall have the whole parish up in arms in the course of another half-hour, and we may yet have a hard tussle to escape."

"Don't say that, Dick," added Claude, "or you will make me something worse than miserable, for I cannot forget that it was I who brought you both into this scrape."

"I forgot it then, Claude, or I should not have spoken; but let what will happen, don't you fancy that. It is true you suggested the affair, but it is equally true that we both joined in it of our own free will; so it is the special fault of no one in particular; and now I think, as we have got some distance from the lodge gates, we may as well take a run, and get to our steeds as fast as possible."

"Agreed," said Claude.

Upon this, they all three went at a good hard run towards the public-house, at which they had left their steeds; and it was rather ridiculous to see them all get there out of breath; but then they did not consider that to be of any consequence, as they knew that when mounted their fatigue would be over.

The landlord of the inn had kept a good look out, for he guessed that they might come back at speed, and the moment he saw them on the scamper, he got their cattle out, so that they really had nothing to do but to spring to their saddles; and then Claude burst into a hearty laugh, as he said—

"All's right. I feel as if every danger was all but over, when I am once fairly mounted."

"I am not good at such a sharp hunt as this we have had," said Jack, panting for breath; "but it was just as well, for a minute saved may be a life."

"Are they after you?" said the landlord.

"Oh, no," said Claude, "but they will be, without a doubt. Come on, Dick, we must try back a little way and get into some cross-road. Ah! well done! Here they are, and in some strength, too. Come, this is interesting. Keep together, and don't fire hastily, whatever you do. It may not come to anything serious after all, though they do show such a good front."

The occasion of these words from Claude's lips, was quickly and easily observable, for along the road, which they had so recently traversed at speed upon foot, came about a dozen horsemen, headed by the officer, who had thought proper, when his affairs did not look well, to be quite unconscious of what was going on, but who, the moment Claude Duval and his friends had turned their backs, and left the lodge gates, revived, and by the promise of large rewards, induced the grooms and others who were waiting for the guests at the christening, to mount and aid him in an endeavour to capture the highwaymen; and it was this party, so hastily got together, that had attracted the attention of Claude.

The officer having two pairs of pistols with him, kept one pair to himself, and divided the other between two of the grooms, so that there was the appearance of three men being well armed with pistols.

An old gun, too, had been brought out of the gate-keeper's little residence, and that made a formidable show. As for the rest of the party, they were armed with such desultory weapons, in the shape of pitchforks and shovels, as upon the spur of the moment the gardener's lodge afforded.

"This is too bad," said Dick.

"How do you mean by too bad?" asked Jack.

"Why, first, that we shall be obliged to do a mischief to some of these stupid fellows, and it's all owing to the officer, who won't let we three alone."

"We must protect ourselves," said Claude; "and if they will run their heads into mischief, it's their own look-out. See, they hang back already. The only thing to put them all into wonderful spirits would be for us to run away."

"No doubt. Keep a good look-out upon that fellow with the gun. He seems as if he were very much inclined to fire it at us. Look at him."

Claude did look at him, and then, as he held out his hand with a long highly-polished pistol in it, he called out,—"The man who fires the first shot dies, if he had as many lives as a cat."

Upon this, the valorous personage who had the gun reversed it so suddenly that he poked the muzzle of it into the eye of the person behind him, and gave a sound rap upon the back to one who was before him with the butt of it. Probably the officer did not think his party that he had so hastily collected was half so formidable as it looked, for waiving his hand, he advanced a few paces—they were very few though—and spoke—

"You are well-known, all three of you," he said, "and it is quite impossible you can get away. You know that by resistance and open violence you can only make your case much worse than it is, and bring down upon you the vengeance of the law; whereas, if you give in now at once, without causing any bloodshed, I shall be very happy to say all I can in your favour."

"You are very kind," said Claude; "but we beg to decline your good offices, my friend."

"Come—come, only consider. We must have you. I and my gallant fellows here, will have you."

"Where are the gallant fellows?" said Claude. "Since you are so fond of talking and giving advice, allow me to tell you that at the first shot that is fired by us, the gallant fellows will run away and leave you to any fate that you may provoke us to inflict upon you. For myself, I beg to say that I am very well as long as I am in tolerable humour, but I won't answer for myself if you carry this affair too far."

The officer was a little staggered, and when he replied, there was a slight shake in his voice.

"Claude Duval," he said, "I know you; and I can well judge that it will be no easy matter to get the better of you; but I am bound to try it if my death were certain."

THE THREE ADVENTURERS IN THE KEN IN THE OLD MINT.

"Well, try it then."

"I must. Will you surrender?"

"Certainly not."

The officer rode a little aside, and cried—

"Fire!"

Immediately he discharged one of his pistols at the party of three, and the two grooms, who had been by him supplied with fire-arms, likewise used theirs, but with so little judgment, that the bullets went at least six feet over the heads of Claude, Dick, and Jack. The officer took a better aim, and the bullet from his weapon went through Dick's hat.

The most extraordinary effect though was produced by the man with the gun, for when he got the order to fire, he managed to pull the trigger without caring in what direction the muzzle was, and accordingly, off it went, and nearly shot one of his own friends, at the same time that it burst, and the stock of it hit him a blow in the face that knocked him off his horse, sprawling in the road, and shouting "Murder!" at the top of his lungs.

"Now for it," cried Duval.

The words had no sooner escaped his lips, than the whole party took to flight, with the exception of the man who had had the gun, and who could not get up, and the officer, who gallantly kept his ground.

"Surrender!" he cried again, "surrender!"

"Are you mad?" said Claude.

"Perhaps so. Take that."

He fired his other pistol, or meant to fire it right in Claude's face, but it only flashed in the pan, and in an instant Claude now fired fairly at him, for he was put past all patience by the officer's pertinacity. The bullet hit him in the shoulder.

"You have killed me, Claude Duval," said the officer.

As he spoke he turned of a deathlike paleness, and hung partly over the neck of his horse. Claude rode up to him and held him by the arm to look where the wound was, and he at once saw that it was too high on the shoulder to be necessarily fatal to the man.

"Nonsense," he said, "you are not much hurt, and you and I may have a brush at some other time for all this."

"Then you don't mean to kill me outright?"

"No. I am quite content, if you are."

The officer tried to say something else, but he could not, for at this moment he fainted, and but for the aid of Claude's arm, he would have fallen from his horse to the ground; but Duval held him up, and cried—

"Jack, dismount a moment and help him off the saddle. Dick will hold your horse."

"Dead?" said Jack.

"Not a bit of it. It's only a faint—partly from pain and partly from vexation; but he is a brave fellow, and as such, I will do him no more harm than I can help."

Jack dismounted and assisted the officer from his horse, and placed him against the step of the inn. They then all set off at a hard trot towards Oxford, but they took the very first turning they came to on their right hand, in hopes of getting by a round into the London-road again.

CHAPTER CCIX.

A STRANGE ADVENTURE NEAR THE METROPOLIS.

"Shall we get to London with whole bones?" said Jack.

"Why not?" replied Claude. "I hope, for one, to be able to accomplish that feat. What do you say to it, Dick?"

"And I, for another," said Dick. "After what we have already gone through, I do think we may almost laugh at fate. For my part, I believe we shall escape all our perils, and in some comfortable ken in London, I shall live to tell how you and Jack saved me from what looked as like inevitable death as anything could."

"If you do," said Claude, "I shall take it as the very worst return you can make me."

"And I," said Jack.

"Indeed? You surprise me."

"Say not one word about it, Dick, if you have any feeling for either of us, my dear fellow. All Jack or I want you to do, is just what we know you will do."

"And what is that?"

"Serve us as we served you if you hear that we are in the same predicament."

"Yes," said Jack, "that I will. So now let us push on, for the horses are in good trim, and there is now no reason on earth why we should not make a good twenty miles without a stop of any importance. Let me beg of you, Claude, not to engage in any fresh adventure just now, unless it should be forced upon us."

"Agreed, Jack."

"Amen, say I, to that," cried Dick; "so now let us do gently and comfortably as much of this twenty miles that Jack is so anxious to get over as we can."

With this, they left off conversing, and separating as much as possible from each other upon the road, so as not to impede each other's movements, they put the horses to a long trot that did not distress them, but really got over an amazing quantity of ground in a short space of time.

This they kept up for a good hour, at the end of which time they had actually done twelve miles of Jack's twenty, and Dick called out—

"Halt—halt!"

They all three at the moment drew up, and Claude cried out—

"What is it, Dick? Anything amiss?"

"Yes; my mare has fallen lame for the last mile or two, and I cannot press her on."

"Certainly not; it would be a sin, and a shame, and a pity, and a folly, and half a dozen other things."

"So it would, Claude," said Dick, as he dismounted, "and I will lead her for a dozen miles further, rather than distress her. She has done me too good service upon many an occasion, not to command my greatest affection."

As he spoke, Dick dismounted and began to examine the foot of his steed carefully.

"It's a thorn, but it has got so far in that I am afraid it will be no easy job to get it out without proper tools. Have you anything that will do it, Claude?"

"No, but Jack has."

"Rather," said Jack, as he dismounted. "I never travel without a few useful implements, for such little accidents by the way."

Jack took from his pocket a very minute pair of tweezers, and while Dick pressed the foot of the horse to make a very little bit of the thorn project from it, Jack laid hold of it and drew it out.

"That will do," said Dick. "It is not a quarter of an inch in length, and yet how lame it made her."

"I tell you what it is, Dick," said Jack. "If you don't give this creature a few hours' rest, now, she will have a bad foot, for dust will get into the little wound of the thorn, and you don't know what may be the consequence of it."

Dick looked rather perplexed, which Claude observing, induced him to say—

"Don't put yourself out of the way, Dick; the day is disappearing, and there is no reason on earth why we should not put up somewhere for the rest of the evening. Suppose now we rest till about ten o'clock?"

"Agreed," said Jack.

"Of course I shall be very glad, for the sake of my horse," said Dick, "only I feel as if I were the cause of delaying you upon the road to, perhaps, your great peril; but that may be easily obviated by your going on without me, you know."

"Yes," said Claude, "but we don't mean to do it; so you may make your mind easy about that; Jack will bind up your mare's foot for her, as he is an adept at that sort of thing, and we will all put up quietly and respectably at the next inn we come to. You can lead her, Dick, and we, by walking our cattle, will keep by you."

"It's very kind of you both," said Dick, "and when I forget all your generous conduct to me, may I be—Well, well, it's no use talking; but the time may come some day, when I may do more in a minute than I could talk in an hour; so come on, rest we will, till ten o'clock, if that will be time enough for the mare's foot to rest."

"Lots," said Jack. "Besides, I will get a bit of an old hat wherever we put up, and when we start again, I can cut it so as to wedge it in the shoe, and she won't tread upon the injured part at all next to the ground. Her feet are worth the taking care of."

"Truly they are, for I can assure you that, more than once, her heels have saved her master's head."

After strolling along, now, for about half a mile or so, they came to one of the prettiest little road-side inns that the eyes of man ever beheld. It was quite covered with roses and honeysuckle, and ivy, and looked as if it were embedded in a wood, so many well kept thriving trees and flowering shrubs, were all around it.

"That's the place for us," cried Claude. "We shall all feel, while there, like love among the roses."

"It's to be hoped," said Jack, "that while we do stay there, nobody will disturb our felicity."

They all stopped at the door of the inn, and soon made arrangement with the landlord to have the horses put up for some hours, and to have a repast got ready for themselves. There was a very pretty, well-kept garden at the back of this little inn, with a number of bee-hives, the tenants of which were in a state of the most industrious commotion.

"Two highwaymen!—Two highwaymen!" cried Jack, suddenly.

"Where?---where?" said Dick.

"There," said Jack. "Don't you see those two wasps have got hold of a bee laden with honey, and are robbing him of it in the most unmerciful manner before he can get to the hive?"

Both Dick and Claude laughed, but in a moment or two twenty bees came and attacked the two wasps, and after a sharp scuffle of nearly a minute's duration, killed them, and pulled them to pieces, scattering their fragments to the ground.

"Humph! that's sharp justice," said Jack.

"Very," said Claude. "I think it would take rather more than twenty officers to serve us in that way. But let us to dinner, for I feel, now that we have made a regular halt, that I could make some way into a round of beef, and you must recollect both of you that we missed the luncheon at Mr. Scatters, which I did hope would have stood us in good stead; and so it would if he had only had the sense to have it before the christening instead of after it. That arrangement spoilt the whole affair, so far as our stomachs were concerned."

"It did," laughed Dick.

"But it did not spoil the joke," said Jack; "and if I mistake not, my nose will inform me that there is something very nice indeed getting ready for us in the inn kitchen."

Jack was not far wrong, for the people of the pretty inn laid before them a most enticing breakfast as the innkeeper called it, but it was certainly a time of the day for calling it a dinner. To their surprise, too, they found that some very choice wines were to be had from the cellar of the inn, and everything was very much better than could have been at all expected.

There was no guests in the house but themselves, so that they had no dread of any unpleasant interruptions, and the innkeeper told them that he seldom had any one there at odd times, but that the gentlemen members of several hunts were such good customers to him at times, that he was able to keep his house open, and have a stock of every thing of the first quality, and they did not begrudge him his price for it.

This Claude thought was a kind of hint to them, that they would be expected to pay well for what they had, and he was determined to put the landlord's mind at ease upon that score.

"My friend," he said, "we don't care a straw what you charge, as long as what you lay before us is worth it. We want the very best of everything, and there is the money for it."

They staid drinking their wine and making themselves quite comfortable until half past nine o'clock at night, and then they thought of moving off, and Claude, as he rose from the table, said—

"We have taken a good medium of wine each of us, but somehow we are none the worse for it, I think."

"Not a whit," said Jack, "not a whit. Let us ring for the horses to be got to the door. Hilloa! what's that?"

"Rain, by Jove!" cried Dick, "and a dashing storm too. Only look at it against the windows, Claude."

"It is a rattle, indeed."

The noise of the rain splashing against the windows was incessant, and they looked at each other in doubt about proceeding. Dick had rung the bell, and the landlord made his appearance.

"Ah, gentlemen," he said, "what a night it is."

"Rain, we hear," said Claude.

"Oh, yes, sir—quite a water spout. The roads will be in a frightful state in a little while, and it don't seem at all likely to clear up either. There it comes again."

Splash came the rain against the latticed window, with a force that seemed enough to storm it in.

"You will hardly like to ride throught such a storm," added the landlord, "surely, gentlemen."

"Why, no, hardly. It would not be very pleasant."

"Besides, there's a little stream crosses the road not above a mile from here, and it will be so swollen now, that it will be almost enough to carry a horse off his feet. We have the very best beds, I can assure you, gentlemen, and you will find every possible accommodation; so that I feel assured you will never regret passing a night at the Bunch of Grapes."

Dash came the rain again against the casement, and the landlord shook his head, as he added—

"Ah, this will last—this will last, I am very much afraid!"

"What do you say, Dick," whispered Claude; "shall we stay, or make our way through the rain? Jack, what is your opinion about it, eh?"

"Would it not be better to stay," said Dick, "until a very early hour in the morning? It will do none of us any good to get thoroughly drenched, as we shall get. There it comes again!"

"Well, let us stay, then," said Dick. "Can you show us a room, landlord? as we are old travellers, and always like to see where we are to sleep, before we remain anywhere for the night."

"Yes, gentlemen, with pleasure—with pleasure."

Upon this, the landlord took up one of the lights from the table, and opening a door in the wall of the room in which they were, and which had not at all been noticed previously, he said—

"This leads to two nice bed-rooms, indeed, and in one there are two beds, and in the other only one, and you will find them all amazingly comfortable, I can assure you. At least, we never had a complaint from any one who slept in them."

The rooms were rather dark and gloomy. They opened one into the other, and there was some old trees growing so close to the windows, that in daytime they must have been quite shaded. Before they went into these rooms, the landlord had rung the bell in the other one rather sharply, which they did not see any occasion to do; but they had scarcely been in the first bed-room above a few moments, when dash came the rain against its window.

"Ah, there goes the storm again," said the landlord. "Dear me, I do, indeed, pity people who are forced to be out on such a night as this. How the wind blows, too."

"I must confess I don't hear the wind," said Claude.

"Not hear it, sir! Lord bless you, sir, there was a most terrific gust just then. I hope you like the bedrooms?"

"Oh, they will do very well—very well, indeed, and we will stay; but we must be off by the first streak of daylight, whether the rain is coming down or not; so take care that some one is up to get us our horses, and all that sort of thing."

"Depend upon me, sir, I will attend to you. Any more wine, gentlemen, if you please?"

"Yes, you can let us have another couple of bottles of the same Madeira. Where are you, Jack?"

"He has gone into the next room," said Dick.

"Oh, very good. The wine will do in the course of half an hour, landlord, as we have not finished the last bottle."

"Certainly, gentlemen; you may depend upon every possible attention at the Bunch of Grapes, I assure you. Nobody ever complains of the Bunch of Grapes, I can assure you, gentlemen. Dear me, how the rain does dash away, to be sure. I wouldn't turn a dog out on such a night as this, I declare."

The landlord, with this, bowed himself out of the room, and shut the door after him. The moment he was gone there came another dash of rain against the windows, and then Jack, who, while they had been talking to the landlord in the bedroom, had gone back into the sitting-room, held up his finger, and mysteriously beckoned to Claude and Dick to come close to him.

They did so in some surpise, if not alarm.

"Did you ever know it to rain in this desperate way," whispered Jack, "while the stars shone bright and clear?"

"Not exactly," said Dick.

"Well, did you ever know all the rain to come upwards against a window, instead of down from the sky?"

"Certainly not," said Claude.

"Then the rain which has induced us to pass the night, or to say that we would pass the night at the Bunch of Grapes, is of that very strange character, that it dashes away while the stars are shining brightly in a cloudless sky, and it comes all from below in the most remarkable manner, being strongy suggestive of being thrown up with a mug from a pail below."

"A mug!" said Dick.

"A pail!" said Claude.

"Yes," said Jack. "I don't know what it means, or what can be precise object of it; but we are humbugged into staying, on pretence that it is raining hard, when, in reality, the effect is produced by water being dashed against the windows, as I tell you."

Claude and Dick looked at each other in amazement.

"What can be the meaning of it?" said Claude. "I will then open the window at once and see——"

"No—no," said Jack. "Be careful. You don't know what we have to contend with yet; go into the front bedroom, Claude, and open that window, when you will ascertain, without any sort of doubt, if the night be a wet one or not. You go likewise, Dick; I am quite satisfied upon the subject."

CHAPTER CCX.

THE NIGHT OF DANGER AT THE BUNCH OF GRAPES.

Dick and Claude knew perfectly well that Jack would not have spoken upon such a subject at all, but upon the very best grounds, and his manner was sufficient at once to convince them both that he was not at all in a joking humour. Without a word Claude went into the bedroom, and when he returned, he said—

"It's as fine a night as ever came out of the heavens."

"I told you so," said Jack.

"But, good gracious," said Dick, "what could be the object of all this? Does he know us, and is he merely keeping us here until he can send for assistance to capture us?"

"That is the most likely supposition," said Claude. "Let us go down stairs and be off at once by force."

"No—no," said Jack. "Do not be hasty, Claude, I beg of you. I do not think that that is the true solution of the mystery, for if it were so, have we not been here quite long enough for him to have carried out such an idea? and if he knew us at all, he would know us from the first, of course."

"What is it, then?"

"There's the mystery, and a mystery it is. Claude, you have very sharp ears. The landlord, and a woman, and another man, whom I saw hulking about as we came in, seem to make the room below this their common sitting apartment. There is a door, as no doubt you noticed, at the bottom of the stairs. If you will creep down to that and listen, you may hear something."

"I will do it."

"Be careful, though, Claude, and have your pistols ready. Dick and I will be just at the top of the stairs to render you immediate assistance in case you should require it."

"Help me off with my boots, Jack; I will go down on my stocking-soles, and then, I know, they cannot hear me; but my boots will creak, in spite of me."

Jack helped him off with his boots, and then Claude, after making a slight examination of one of his pistols that he chose to carry in his hand, tripped softly down the narrow flight of stairs which led to the room below, and at the foot of which was the door which had been noticed by Jack. Dick and Jack leant as far over the balustrade at the top of the stairs as they could to listen, and they could hear the hum of conversation in the room below, although they could not make out what was said.

Claude, however, had got his ear to the panel of the door, and he heard every word. The landlord was speaking.

"I tell you I saw it," he said. "He has got a bag of gold with him—the youngest of the three, I mean, be he whom he may; but I suppose they are gentlemen travelling about for pleasure."

"Well, then, do it," said a woman's voice, "only if they go to the window and look out, they will see that it is a fine night, and they will suspect something."

"Oh, stuff! They stand it pretty well, but they have taken too much wine already to be very observing or scrutinising; and they are good judges, too, I can tell you."

"And that," growled another male voice, "I suppose, frightened you out of putting in the stuff?"

"I own I shrank from doctoring the wine to them while they were quite sober, and their taste was fresh. They might have found it out, for you know it does give the wine a taste, and particularly light wines. I they had called for port it would have been another thing; but they didn't."

"It's safest, though," said the woman. "Then there's no bother about it, and down they go into the old well-hole, as nice as may be. How much money do you think there was, John?"

"A hundred pounds if there was a penny-piece! Whose to say that the other two may not have as much? I'd settle the whole three of them for half that money, to say nothing of the horses, which, you know, we can get rid of."

"True enough—true enough; and we don't have such a chance every day. Look at the last person we put out of the way. There was a disappointment! Only twelve pounds in all, and we thought by his appearance that he had plenty."

"Ah, and his watch was gilt, too."

"Yes, what a take in! Oh, I have no patience with such horrid swindling; but, as you say you have seen their money, John, why that is quite sufficient, you know."

"I have seen it; and I tell you what I'll do. I'll put some of the stuff into the two bottles the have ordered, and take the chance of it. If they go to bed upon that, they will sleep sound enough, I'll warrant; and then Ben and I will cut their throats quietly enough about the time of midnight."

"That will do," said the woman, "nicely; and now you, Ben, go and splash some more water against their window, for it all depends upon their not finding out that trick, which I'm quite in a fidget about."

"Why, how the deuce else was I to to ask them to stay?" said the landlord. "You know it has answered before, and why shouldn't it now? People think they hear the rain, and they don't think of looking when they have got a good bottle of old Madeira before them, and have once made up their minds to stay where they are."

"Oh," thought Claude, "that will do. A pretty establishment we have dropped upon here."

There was some sligh movement in the room now, and Claude, apprehensive that the landlord was going to open the door that led to the staircase, stepped up stairs again, and pulled on his boots.

"Well?" said Dick.

"What did you hear?" said Jack.

"Oh, it's all right."

"Is it, though? Well, I will never trust myself again," said Jack. "They are honest folks, are they?"

"As honest as a set of brutal cut-throats can be expected to be—that's all. Listen. and I will just tell you what a nice pleasant sort of predicament we have been very near falling into to-night. Speak low, and don't utter any exclamation of surprise at what I tell you, because, now that we know our danger, it vanishes."

Claude then narrated to Jack and Dick exactly what he had heard from the people below, after which they all three stared at each other in silence.

"Why, Jack, this affair," said Claude, "seems to have struck you all of a heap."

"It has—it has!"

"And you, too, Dick. I don't think you will ever shut your mouth again."

"Oh, yes, I shall," said Dick, closing it with a loud clap of the teeth; "but I never was more staggered in all my life, I must confess. I would——Ah! there goes our friend Ben with the bucket of water against the window."

Dash came the mock rain again, and then before any further remarks could be made, the landlord made his appearance with the other two bottles of Madeira that had been ordered by Claude, and he looked so meek and mild, and smiling, that no one could have supposed for one moment, without they really had the knowledge of the fact that our friends had, that he could be a deliberate murderer.

"I have brought the wine, gentlemen," he said, "and I hope you will find it to your liking."

"Not a doubt," said Claude. "How it rains yet."

"Oh dear, yes, it does indeed, sir. I should think that the Oxford coach would hardly get on such a night as this."

"Scarcely; but it's a good thing that we are housed. We will ring when we want anything, landlord, and we shall go to bed quite early to-night, as we intend to rise so soon. I hope you have properly attended to our horses?"

"Lord bless you, sir, if they had been my own from the first moment they set foot in the stable, I could not have been more attentive to them than I have been."

"That's right—thank you."

"Thank you, gentlemen; and I feel quite sure you will never complain of your entertainment at the Bunch of Grapes."

THE PURSUIT ON THE THAMES.

The landlord retired, and when they had fairly heard the last of his footsteps retreating down the stairs, Claude said—

"Did you ever come near such a consummate villain as that, Dick? Really it is a mercy that we have stopped here, and found him out, is it not?"

"It is, for if we don't stop his career, he ought to be allowed to stop ours; and he shall, too, for I will not leave this place with the idea that any other people less wide-awake than we are, should fall into this fellow's snares."

"Good," said Claude. "We will consider that it is a duty we owe to society to put a stop to his villany, and it will perhaps be considered as a kind of set-off to some of our own little escapades in this world. Who knows?"

"Ah!" said Jack, "who knows, indeed? I very much doubt it, however, Claude. But what do you purpose doing?"

"Well, I was thinking of that all the while I was on the staircase listening. If the landlord had opened the door and seen me, I should have shot him without a doubt; but as he did not, he escaped. Would it not be better to pretend to go to bed, and see what comes of it?"

"Unless," said Dick, "we now sally down at once, and have it out with the wretches."

"I have only one objection to that," added Claude, "and that is, that as they may not be all in the room below, some mischief may come to our horses, and that would be about as bad just now as getting us to swallow that cursed Madeira and then comfortably cutting our throats."

"And putting us down the well-hole," added Jack.

"Precisely."

"Then let us do as you think, Claude," said Dick. "I, upon consideration, think it is the best plan. It is getting fast on to eleven o'clock now, but I should like to take a good look at the two bed-rooms, while we have the lights all ready here to do it with, and while we are not likely to be disturbed."

"Come on, then," said Claude, "it is what I was thinking of doing myself. Jack, place a chair against the door, so that if the rascal comes here while we are in the other rooms, we shall hear him, and catch him before he goes again."

Jack placed the chair in such a way against the door of the room, that if any one tried to open it from without, over the chair would go, and make sufficient noise on the floor in its fall to give them an alarm. They then took one of the two lights that were upon the table, and went into the next bed-room; and now, with the knowledge of how it had in all likelihood been the scene of many a murder, they fancied that they was something peculiar even in the very atmosphere of it.

They walked as noiselessly as they could, for they did not wish to give any alarm to the landlord or his myrmidons, by letting him think that they were making a search in the bed-rooms instead of drinking the drugged wine, and they only spoke in whispers.

"Here's a lot of clothes under this bed," said Jack.

"Is there? Pull them out."

Jack pulled some of them out, and it was quite evident that they had belonged to different individuals. No doubt they were the suits that had been worn by the unfortunates who had lost their lives in that room.

"Look here," said Dick.

They both app oached Dick, who had turned one of the beds half over. The under side of it was one mass of gore!

For more than a minute they maintained the position into which they had been cast by this frightful spectacle; and then Dick let the bed drop again, and in a solemn tone, he said—

"This is indeed horrible. The people in this house must be fiends, not human beings. We are to lie down upon one side of a bed, after the horrible evidence of a recent murder stained the other. It is too terrible!"

"The villains!" said Jack.

"Hush—hush, both of you!" said Claude, holding up his hand in a warning attitude. "Let me implore you not to let your natural feelings now run away with you on this occasion. We can and will put a stop for ever to the frightful practices going on in this place."

"So help me Heaven, I will!" said Jack. "Oh, Claude, we are bad enough, and our mode of life perhaps won't stand much talking about; but we are angels compared to the people in this place."

"We are, I think."

"I can bear this no longer," said Dick, drawing a pistol from his pocket; "I will go down stairs and—and——"

"Make a mess of the whole affair," said Claude. "Be calm, Dick. The management of this piece of business is in our own hands, and it would be folly to mar it. Jack, lend me the light; I want to see what is in that cupboard over there. We don't know what horrible confirmation of what we already know well enough it may contain."

CHAPTER CCXI.

DETAILS HOW THE FRIENDS SETTLED MATTERS AT THE "BUNCH OF GRAPES."

THE cupboard door was locked.

"Quite fast," said Claude. "But that won't detain us for very long, I take it, Jack?"

"Certainly not; I will open it, Claude. You hold the light so that I may see well what I am about, for it is rather a desirable thing to make as little noise as possible, as we intend to let the vagabond of a landlord here have his swing out. Now for it."

"You listen, Dick, if all is quiet in the next room," said Claude. "It would spoil all if they were to come up stairs just now, you know."

"All's right," said Dick, as he stood in a stooping posture between the two rooms; "I should catch the smallest sound that can take place below now. You go on with your inquiries; I will warn you in time if anything is amiss"

Jack always had a few well made tools about him, by the aid of which any lock could be readily opened, and he was not above two minutes in managing that one that belonged to the cupboard door in the bed-room.

"Here it comes," he said, and it did come with a vengeance; for bouncing open, evidently from the pressure of some weight on the inside, out fell, nearly upon Jack, a dead body, presenting a frightful spectacle from being covered with blood.

Jack had a difficulty in keeping himself from uttering a loud shout of alarm, and, as it was, Claude could not help exclaiming—

"The deuce!"

"What is it?" whispered Dick. "What's the row?—Eh?"

"Nothing very particular. Only just step here, and you will see, while I watch at the door."

Dick did just step there, and the sight he saw filled him with horror and amazement.

"Gracious Heaven!" he said, "this is a confimation of our suspicions, even if they had amounted to nothing more. This is a frightful spectacle."

"It is," said Jack, "but it must be got back into the cupboard again, or else it will strike the eyes of those below the moment they come into this room, and put a stop to our plans of catching them in the moment that they think of committing new crimes."

"It's all very well," said Dick, "to talk of putting that into the cupboard again, but unless you do it yourself, Jack, I don't fancy that Claude or I will fancy much touching it."

"I? Oh, I could not touch it for worlds!"

"Hist!—hist!" said Claude.

"What is it?"

"Somebody coming. Let us all get into the other room. Come on! Quick with you both—come on. Somebody is creeping up the stairs; but let them be ever so slow over it, they must get here soon. Come this way."

Dick, upon the spur of the moment, with his foot, sent the dead body right far away out of sight under one of the beds, and then he followed Jack into the sitting-room again. They all three sat down, and looked quite calm and contented, as though nothing had happened. The landlord slunk into the room with a faint smile upon his face.

"I have brought the wine, gentlemen."

"All's right," said Claude; "I hope it is equal to the last?"

"Oh, dear yes, gentlemen. It's from another bin, but, if anything, it's better, and the gentlemen who come here praise it quite wonderfully, they do. It's a very fine wine!"

"Thank you, landlord. Will you join us in a glass of it? Don't say no from any modesty upon the subject, now."

"Ah, gentlemen, it's so kind of you to ask a fellow, it is indeed; and if it wasn't for Dr. Jones, I would, with all the pleasure in the world—feeling what an honout it was, too, at the same time, you see, gentlemen."

"And who is Dr. Jones?"

"Oh, he is my medical man, and he says that I must not take wine, but spirits instead, if I take anything; though, to tell the truth, he tries to persuade me to take nothing."

"Oh, well, of course, you must not run contrary to the advice of your medical attendant."

"No, sir. Good evening, sir."

"What sort of a night is it, now?" said Dick.

"A little better; but it's gathering up again, and we shall have, I am afraid, the worst of it yet."

"So I think; good night. We shan't want anything else; and as it is getting late, I don't think we need keep you out of your bed, landlord."

"That's very kind of you, gentlemen. We are simple conscientious folks, and go early to rest with easy souls. Ah, dear, a clear conscience is everything, ain't it, gentlemen?"

"Oh, yes," said they all in chorus.

Turning up his eyes, then, as though he were repeating some mental prayer, the landlord left the room, and for a few moments our three adventurers could only look at each other in silence, they were so thoroughly disgusted by the cant and the hypocrisy of the landlord of that den of murder.

It was Jack who first broke the silence.

"Well," he said, "what do you think of our kind host of the Bunch of Grapes, now?"

"Think?" said Dick, in a loud tone. "Think——"

"Hush! my dear friend," said Claude. "We ought not be surprised that the man who can commit a murder should be an accomplished hypocrite. It is impossible that the landlord of this house can increase my abhorrence of him, let him say what he will, or do what he will."

"But the cant of the fellow——"

"Well—well, never mind it. Let us thoroughly settle what we mean to do."

"It is all in your hands, Claude; I am ready and willing to do whatever you please in the affair."

"Very well. Upon one thing you may depend, Dick, and that is, that I won't balk you of the proper amount of retribution, which, I see, you feel you would like to visit the landlord with; I think as keenly upon that point as you do. Now, what I propose is, that we go to bed—that is to say, that we pretend to do so—you and me, I mean Dick, while Jack hides in the room likewise, in such a place as will enable him to give us notice of anything going on. I will have a pair of pistols ready for action in my hands, and you can have the same."

"What then?"

"Why, I feel strongly inclined to shoot any one who intrudes into the room."

"And I most certainly will do so. All that I ask of you is, that you will let me have first pop at the landlord; I owe him a grudge, and I shall not feel at all satisfied until I have paid him in full."

"You shall then, Dick."

"I am satisfied; and now as this wine is poisoned, of course, he took none of it; but it will look suspicious to see the full bottle, so there goes a lot of it into the ashes; and now let us to bed, for the very air of this place now to me after the discoveries we have made in the next room seems thick and full of the very aroma of murder."

"I don't care how soon I am on the road again," said Claude, as he rose.

"Nor I," said Jack; "I will hide carefully behind the door in the next room, so as they come in they will only the more effectually conceal me by opening it upon me, and then I shall be ready to pounce upon them at a moment's notice; but mind, both of you, if you begin pistol firing, and there is but a dim light in the room, don't mistake me for one of the murderers, and accommodate me with half an ounce of lead as a stomachic. Mind that."

"We will be careful, Jack."

They now all three walked about the room a little, and then they flung down one of the chairs, for this object was to render the belief that they had got tired of sitting over the wine, and were going to bed. Then they all three sallied into the bedroom, and after slamming the door of connection between the two rooms, so as it should be supposed below that one of them had gone there, they all stood in the front room, and listened attentively.

Not the smallest sound broke the stillness of the place. Claude went to the window and looked out. "The night is a lovely one," he said, "and I hope we shall soon be out in it. If the air of the sitting-room was full of uneasy feelings, what must this be? Did you put the body in the cupboard again, Jack?"

"Not I. Dick kicked it under the bed there."

Claude shuddered, but he made no further remark about it. They then hastened their preparations. Dick got just under the coverlid of one of the beds, and Claude under that of the other. They both had a pistol clutched firmly in the right hand, and they were neither of them men to miss their mark very easily when they chose to hit it. Jack got behind the door, and then Claude said—

"Is all right?"

"All is right," they both replied.

"Out you go, then," said Claude, as he flung the pillow at the candle and upset it at once.

The room was even then not very dark, in consequence of the night being so fine; and if the old trees had not grown so close to the windows as almost to make the effect of an outer blind to them, no doubt every object in that apartment, within whose walls murders had been done, no doubt, many a time, would have been distinctly visible. As it was, everything had a dim and spectral look, and a coat that hung upon a peg, with a hat upon it, looked so like a human figure, that Claude could hardly convince himself that it was not one.

It was not policy for any of them to speak now, but Dick did just whisper,—

"Jack! Jack! do you hear anything?"

"Not a thing. But don't talk."

The stillness that ensued was most intense, and it lasted for nearly half an hour. It seemed really to be half a day to those who were waiting the denouement of that strange adventure. The patience of Claude was getting quite exhausted, and he was on the point of saying something, when all at once a footstep was quite plainly heard in the outer room, where they had sat at their wine. They now all three listened most intently.

The footsteps were quite plainly to be heard, and it did not seem as if the person or persons who were walking in the outer room were at all careful about the noise they made. Suddenly, then, some one came close to the door that separated the double-bedded room from the outer one, and the voice of the landlord, to the great surprise of Claude and his friends, said—

"Gentlemen, if you are not asleep, will you rise, for we are afraid that there are some thieves in the house."

It was a wonder that neither Jack, nor Dick, nor Claude, replied to this, it really seemed so very plausible; but they did not. Ordinary men, unaccustomed to the strange and adventurous mode of life which they led, must have been deceived by the manner in which this remark was made; but they were not ordinary men, and they kept up the most profound stillness.

"As fast as a church," said the landlord, then. "How much have they taken of the wine, Wilkins, my boy?"

"Oh, about three parts of the bottle," growled another voice.

"Then that accounts very well for it. Half that quantity would make them sleep for a couple of days."

"Oh bother!"

"Why, what's the matter with you, now, Wilkins, my fine lad? What are you on the growl about, now?"

"Oh, it's enough to make a fellow growl when there's nothing but botheration in the world. I could easy have brought up the old blunderbuss and shot 'em all three an hour ago, you know I could; but you are so precious frightened of a noise, and you must have your drugged wine first, and your pails of water thrown up against the windows, and all that sort of thing. Don't you call that botheration to a fellow, eh?

"Well, but, my good lad, it is so safe."

"Oh, safe be hanged."

"Come, come, don't you be out of temper. I have let you have your pick of the three horses you know, and that ought to be something. I am quite certain that dark bay whom you have chosen, is worth a hundred guineas if it is worth a sixpence."

"Well, who said it wasn't?"

"Nobody, my good lad, only you didn't seem to be pleased; but come, we can make short work of it now, and you know there's already one dead body in the cupboard to get rid of, so we can do all that sort of job at once, and clear off to night. Come on, it's all right."

"Well, who said it wasn't?"

"My dear boy, you really seem determined to be displeased at everything."

"No I ain't. Who said I was, eh?"

"Well, well, my good friend. Be so good as to come and assist in the cutting the throats of these people, and then that nice little job will be over."

"Well, then, come; for' bless me, you are so precious slow. Mind, now, I'm to have half of all the swag, and the horse I picked out, and an extra five pounds for the job of putting the bodies into the old well."

"Yes, my dear boy, yes. Oh, yes, you are quite a model of contentment, you are, and it does one's feeling good to hear you talk. Come on, now, come on."

With a full confidence that their intended victims were in a sound sleep, this precious pair of worthies now made their way into the large bed-room in which were the two beds, without the smallest idea of the fate that awaited them within its precincts.

The landlord carried a light, and the "dear boy" came close upon his heels. As they entered the room they swung the door so wide open that they quite jammed Jack up against the wall; but they did not notice that there was any obstruction to its coming wide open.

"Which will you settle, Wilkins?" said the landlord.

"Oh, I don't care."

"Yes, but you know, my lad, there's one in the farther room, and he has to be done for; and you see we can't divide this little job if we would."

"Oh, you settle which one you like, and I'll do the job for the other two of 'em. Now be off with you, and settle it all. I don't like such shilly-shallying. Mind, I am to have the horse?"

"Oh, of course—of course."

Dick gave a loud snore.

"Ah! you may snore if you like," said the landlord, "its nearly about the last snore you will make in this world, my friend. I will just settle you, as you seem to be sleeping rather uneasily; so here goes."

CHAPTER CCXII.

THE FIRE AT THE INN.—THE ROAD AGAIN.—LONDON.

As the landlord spoke, he advanced towards the bed upon which lay Dick. He had placed the light that he carried upon the dressing-table in the room, so that he had nothing to impede him in his murderous plans.

The beautiful Mr. Wilkins stepped up to the bed on which was Claude; and our friend could perceive that he was armed with a knife. The landlord had a similar one; and such a systematic pair of murderers, surely, had never existed, as these two men, who made a trade of slaughter, and looked upon human life as nothing.

"Hold!" cried Jack, for as Dick nor Claude moved, he began to be afraid that they had fallen asleep in earnest, and would become the victims of the murderers.

"All's right, Jack," said Claude, sitting up in the bed, and pointing a pistol at the amiable youth.

"That's it," said Dick, as he likewise sat up in his bed, and levelled a pistol at the landlord.

For a moment or two, the two ruffians were evidently too much petrified with astonishment and dismay to move or speak, and then, with cries of terror, they turned to the door of the room, but there stood Jack, with a pistol in each hand.

"No—no," he said, "you don't pass here."

"Mercy!—mercy!" said the landlord, crouching down upon the floor, and huddling himself up into the smallest possible compass that he could. "Mercy!" The brutal comrade of this man shrank back against the door of the cupboard, and then he screwed himself up as he said—

"You wouldn't go for to come to shoot a poor fellow, would you now? Oh, don't!"

"What do you want here?" said Claude.

"Oh, dear, gentlemen," said the landlord, "all we wanted was to see if you were quite comfortable!"

"Indeed?"

"Yes, gentlemen, that is all, upon my honour! Wasn't it, my boy, ins—w asn't it?"

"Oh, yes, upon my honour, too!"

"Dick?"

"Yes, Claude."

"You shoot the landlord, and I will shoot Master Wilkins, so we shall rid the world of two as awful rascals as Heaven ever permitted to crawl upon its surface. I do not feel that this is a murder. It is an execution founded upon the clearest evidence, for the benefit of society at large."

Upon hearing these words, Wilkins fell to the floor, where he lay howling and writhing about in the most extraordinary manner; and the landlord wept, and prayed, and shouted for mercy. Jack kept guard at the door of the room, and all he said was—

"Put them both out of their misery at once. I don't like bloodshed; but I have not a word to say in favour of two cold-blooded murderers!"

"When I cry 'three,' fire, Dick," said Claude.

"I will."

"One—two."

The landlord and Wilkins seemed both going mad, they rolled about so upon the floor, and dashed themselves against it in so terrible a manner. Surely this was a shocking scene; but if ever two human beings merited such an amount of punishment for their crimes, those two men did. They were, as Jack said, two cold-blooded murderers.

"Three!" said Claude.

Bang—bang! went the two pistols. Wilkins, with a cry of agony, bounded to his feet, and then staggering back, he fell upon the landlord, who had been shot through the head by Dick, and who lay all but dead, shivering upon the floor. The bullet from Claude's pistol had hit Wilkins in the chest, and now he fell on the landlord, and they both drew their last breaths in that room, which no doubt had often echoed to the cries of their victims.

Jack had shut the door, and his back was against it, but now some one tried to get in from without, and a harsh female voice, cried—

"Haven't you done it yet? Where did you get the pistols from? Wilkins, my dear, haven't you done that little job yet?"

"No, ma'am," said Jack, suddenly moving aside from the door, and letting a most repulsive looking woman fall into the room upon her hands and knees. Both Dick and Claude had sprung from their respective beds by this time, and the latter caught the woman by the arm, and swung her right to the other end of the room, saying as he did so—

"Remain with your dear Wilkins, you disgrace to your sex. Come away—come away, my friends, and let us leave at once this horrid house."

With a shriek of dismay as she saw what had happened, the woman fell to the floor, and then our three adventurers hurried from the room, and descending the stairs, they caught up a couple of lights that were burning below, and proceeded to the stable, were they had the satisfaction of finding their three horses well looked to; for the landlord and Master Wilkins had paid all the attention they could to them, looking upon them as their own from the moment they first entered the stable.

The saddles were soon put on, and then the horses were led to the door.

"Stop a bit," said Claude, "I don't feel disposed to leave this place just yet."

"Oh, come away," said Jack. "What more would you do?"

"Wait for me. Hold my horse, Jack."

Jack did so, and Claude went into the house, in which he was absent about five minutes. Then he came back and mounted at once, saying—

"I have set fire to the murder den."

"Have you though, really?"

"Yes, and I think it is the very best end it can come to. There's not a living thing in it but that woman, and she will take good care of herself, no doubt."

"And if she don't," said Dick, "it won't grieve me much, for if anybody deserved a roasting in the world, it is surely such a person as that. This has been rather an ugly night's work, and a most narrow escape."

"It has, indeed. Let us get on, for the further we are from the Bunch of Grapes, the better I shall think the air."

The horses were tolerably fresh, and they now made good speed along the road, but they had not been gone above a mile, when Jack looked round, and cried—

"There burns the old crib. Don't you see the light in the sky?"

They all three paused for a moment or two, and sure enough it was sufficiently evident that the public-house was in roaring flames. It was quite a relief to Claude to find that such was the fact, and to think that he—by the aid of his two friends—had been the cause of sweeping from the face of the earth such a den of iniquity as that house had been.

They started again, and soon left the inn, and the whole district in which it was situated, far behind them. Nothing of further moment occurred to our heroes, until they reached to within a mile of Tyburn-gate, and then they saw a carriage coming along in great state, with a couple of footmen behind it.

"Hilloa!" cried Claude. "Coachman! coachman!"

The coachman thought that something was amiss with his vehicle and pulled up.

"That will do," said Claude. "Who have you got in the inside, coachman?"

"You rascal!" said the coachman; "I really thought a linch-pin had come out, or the tie off one of my precious wheels. Get out of the way, you villain!"

Claude fired a pistol apparently at the coachman's head, but he took care to miss. It was so very nigh to a hit, however, that it frightened the coachman very nearly out of his wits, and dropping his whip and his reins, he cried out—

"Oh, my lord, it's highwaymen! it's highwaymen!"

Dick had ridden up to the carriage-door, and a gentleman, in a powdered wig, looked out, crying—

"Drive over the rascals, coachman! drive over the rascals!"

"No, don't," said Dick, as he laid hold of the wig, and by its assistance gave its owner's head a sound rap against the side of the coach-door. The wig then came off in Dick's hand.

"You villain!" said its owner; "do you know who I am?"

"Not I,—perhaps you will tell us?"

"I am the prime minister."

"The deuce you are! Then you ought to have rather a long purse, for all the world agrees that you rob the people at such a rate as was never known before. Come, sir, hand out your purse, your watch, rings, or any other jewellery you may happen to have; and I beg to tell you that it won't be at all safe to trifle with us."

"Help! help!"

"Oh, certainly. Jack, the prime minister wants to be helped out of his coach; open the door, Jack."

"No—no! If I am to be robbed, I may as well submit quietly. There is my purse and there is my watch, and there is a diamond ring, which is the only one I ever wear."

"You won't wear it any longer, my lord."

"Nor you, I hope, for long. I shall offer a reward of one thousand pounds for your apprehension, in the morning."

"Make it two," said Dick, "and I'll come and give myself up and claim it, my lord. All's right. Comrades, the prime minister has done the handsome thing, so he may go—off and away: Good-night, my lord, good-night."

"Ha! ha! good-night!" laughed Claude, as he passed the carriage window.

"I should only just like to know who you are," said the minister, "that's all, my fine fellows."

"Why, the fact is," said Claude, "we are three young ladies in disguise. We have just run away from a boarding-school, at Turnham-green. My name is Lydia; that one who took your purse, and watch, and ring, is the amiable Sophia; and this one who is close to me is the gentle Emily. Good-night, my lord. Mind you advertise us all well."

The prime minister was so indignant at this fun being poked at him, that he drew up the window of his carriage with a jerk and would not say another word. One of the footmen had to get down for the purpose of picking up the reins and the whip for the bewildered coachman, and while that was being all settled, our friends rode off.

"Well," said Claude, when they got into Oxford Street, "there has been some fun in that."

"Yes," said Dick, "it was done in an off-handed way at all events; and what is better, the purse seems to be pretty heavy, too, that he handed me out."

"That's the best of it," said Jack. "Here's a good lamp in Quebec Street here. Let's look what's in it."

"With all my heart."

They all three turned their horses' heads up Quebec Street, and halted close to a lamp. The purse was a most magnificent one that the prime minister had handed to Dick, and now he opened it, and poured some of the contents into his hand.

"Halfpence, by Jove!" said Dick.

"All halfpence!" cried Claude.

"Yes, every rap. Here's a do!"

Claude was so highly amused at the long face that Dick pulled over this affair, that he nearly fell off his horse with laughing, and the tears ran down his face.

"Oh, that's good," he said; "but the best of it was your look, Dick, when you turned them out into your hand. That was truly rich. Where's the watch?—Is that copper?—Oh—oh!—I shall never leave off laughing at this."

"No, the watch is all right, and so is the ring, but I admit I never was so thoroughly done with a purse before. It's really provoking."

"Not at all," said Claude. "It's a clever thing, and I give him credit for it, that I do."

"Come—come," said a watchman, at this moment turning a corner, and officiously holding up his lantern to look at them. "Come—come, move on."

"What do you say, my friend?" asked Claude.

"Move on, I say."

"Oh, that's it, is it? Just step here; I have got something to say to you. A little nearer. It's rather a secret."

"Well?" said the watchman coming up close to him. "Well?"

Claude poised his riding-whip in his hand, the end of which was heavily loaded.

"I," he said, "am Claude Duval, with one thousand five hundred pounds reward for the taking me. That is Dick Turpin with a thousand pounds for him; and there you go, old fellow."

Down went the riding-whip, and the watchman fell sprawling in the kennel.

"Come on," said Claude. "All's right. He won't like it when he comes to his senses again. Come on."

CHAPTER CCXIII.

THE KEN IN THE OLD MINT.—A NIGHT SCENE.

"WHERE shall we go?" said Jack when they had got nearly as far as the junction of Oxford Street with Holborn.

"That is worth the considering," remarked Dick, "before we proceed any further, I think. Suppose we go to the old ken in the Mint? I have not been there for a considerable time, and I dare say you have neither of you crossed its threshold for a long day."

"It is a couple of years since I was in it," said Claude.

"And three times a couple since I was there," said Jack.

"Well, then, is it a bargain? We can put up our horses elsewhere. We have plenty of places where we can safely do that, I should say; and then, on foot, we can walk to the Mint."

"Well, come on, then," said Claude. "It will be a pleasant enough way of passing the night; and who knows but we may chance to meet some old friends there? I think it is always as well now and then to pass a few hours in such places, for the sake of being able to contrast them again with the beautiful open country, which, I confess, is much more my admiration than the town can ever be."

"And mine, too," said Jack; "so let us be jogging."

They put up their horses in the City, where they knew they would not only be perfectly safe but comeatable at a moment's notice, if needs were; and then, on foot, they proceeded to the Mint at Southwark. That locality then was considered quite sacred to the thieves of London, and it was seldom, indeed, that an officer ventured into it for the purpose of attempting a capture. If one had done so, it would have been a great chance for him to escape with his life.

The ken—as it was called—to which our three adventurers proposed to go, was one of the most celebrated in the whole locality; and if any of what might be called the aristocracy of iniquity went to the Old Mint at all, it was there that they bestowed themselves.

A gentlemanly-looking man suddenly stepped up to Claude, and said—

"Sir, can you tell me the time?"

"Oh, yes. It is past twelve."

"Thank you, sir."

The man looked keenly in the face of Claude, and then, with a bow, walked away.

"What is the meaning of that, I wonder?" said Claude.

"A spy," said Dick. "There was something in that fellow's manner that convinces me at once of his vocation. He is on the look-out for some one; but it can hardly be for us, as our presence here could not be even suspected by any one, since we only made the determination to come here at all within the last half hour or so."

"And yet I feel a presentiment," said Jack.

"Of what?"

"Of much danger. Oh, Claude, it seemed to me as if at the moment that man spoke to you, an audible voice from some invisible lips had said to me, 'Go not to the Mint.'"

"Oh, Jack, you should not give way to such fancies," said Claude. "If you continue to do so, you will at last find yourself the slave of all sorts of fancies, and you won't know what to do or to think. Every enterprise you dream of executing will be nipped in the bud by your imaginary terrors, and you will be the slave of your own feelings."

"All that is true, Claude; and yet——"

"Yet what, Jack? Speak freely."

"I would give something if we were not going to the old ken in the Mint to-night."

"Oh, stuff, Jack. Come on—come on!"

"I will go if you go, Claude; for in life or in death, in safety or in danger, I feel that my place is by your side, and it is the place of all others in which I best wish to be; but I still cannot help having my fears."

"Which will all prove groundless, Jack, and to-morrow we shall laugh at them. Come on! It's all right enough."

"There are three of us," said Dick, "and we are all well armed. It would be a bold man, and indeed, I may say, it would be a bold half-dozen of men, who would interfere with us."

"You are right," said Claude, "it would indeed; but here we are."

They had now reached the door of a large building, that looked like some old tavern that had decidedly seen very much better days, but had given up the hope of ever seeing them again. Hanging at right angles from the wall, there was an old, blackened sign; but the wind, and dust, and rain of that not very clean and favoured region, had long since obliterated all traces of what had been upon it.

The roof of the house, which, by-the-by, was only one story in height, was one of those huge sloping ones with a perfect wilderness of tiles, which are still to be seen in some of the very old streets in London. The frontage was rather extensive, for there were no less a number than eight windows in a row, and the doorway was huge, and deeply sunk in the front wall of the old house.

"Well, here we are," said Dick, "and the old ken don't to my eyes look a bit different to what it did a couple or three years ago, and I do believe it will just look like what it does now till the end of the world."

"And three days afterwards," said Claude. "I wonder now if any one is here. There used to be a jolly enough lot always about the old crib. Knock, Dick, and we shall soon see."

With the handle of his riding whip, Dick knocked in a very peculiar way at the door, and he repeated the summons thrice before any attention was paid to it by any one. Then from a little window, that looked like an eye above the door, a face looked out.

"Hilloa!" said the voice that belonged to the face. "What now—eh? Who is it?"

"Old friends," said Dick. "Open the ken. Confound you, don't you know me? You ought to do so."

"Why, it's Turpin!"

"Hold your noise, will you? What do you mean bawling out a man's name in that way for?—I have got two gentlemen with me, and it don't look well to keep them waiting."

"Gentlemen? Why, who are they?"

"The right sort, you may depend; so be quick, will you? Is there anybody in the old ken?"

"Oh, yes, a jolly lot. Ain't it quiet, though? Now they are all singing a chorus, and yet you can't so much as here that a mouse is stirring, can you now? Oh; we keep the sound in nicely now; but that's all owing to science, it is."

The head disappeared from the little window, and Claude said to Dick and Jack—

"He may talk of keeping the sound in as much as he likes, but I can hear the rumour of voices as I stand here. They are under this part of the ground on which we tread. But I don't see that it much matters, for the officers and the beaks know of this place as well as we do, only they dare not come to it to do any mischief. I take it now that there is not a ken in London that is without its spy or two to give notice of who has been there, and that's the only danger with them. It is not in the ken that you run any risk, but it is in being closely watched as you go from it, that you may have a fellow upon your heels when you least expect, who will give the affair to the grabs, and then they will have a snatch at you."

"You are quite right, Claude," said Dick. "But here's the door opened. We won't stay long, and then off we will go to the road again, if you like."

"Agreed."

"And the sooner the better," said Jack.

The door of the old place was cautiously opened, and a man with a lantern made his appearance.

"Come in," he said. "Come in. It's all right."

They, upon this, all three passed into the house; and when Dick had passed the man, the lantern was held up in the face of Claude.

"Oh, gracious, it's him!" said the man. "Why, it's Claude Duval!"

"To be sure, my friend," said Claude. "Couldn't I find time to come now and then to some of the old cribs?"

"To be sure—to be sure, and there ain't a face in the old place that will be welcomer than yours; but who are you, old fellow?"

This last question was addressed to Jack, but although the man looked well at him, he failed to recognise him, and shaking his head, he said—

"You are a puzzler.—I don't know you."

"But you will take our word," said Claude, "that he is one of the right sort, I suppose?"

"Oh, dear, yes. I'd take your word for a good deal more than that, I rather think; so come on all of you."

The man with the lantern led the way and they followed him closely. After traversing a very large passage, they came to a door, which he pushed open, and then descend a flight of stairs that evidently led quite down among the foundations of the house. Then a couple of gloomy-looking cellars, which might possibly have been dignified by the name of kitchens, were passed through, after which, at the end of another short passage, a blanket, hanging double from the ceiling, was pushed aside, and they were in the ken.

The scene that now presented itself was a most extraordinary one. The ken was an apartment roughly boarded on all sides, ceiling included, with planking, that, by the aid of time and tobacco smoke, had become as nearly black as it very well could be. At one end was a great roaring fire, but owing to there having been some difficulty in carrying the flew so that it should not point out the exact locality of the ken, the fire had the amiable peculiarity of discharging the greater quantity of its smoke into the ken.

This little circumstance imparted a cloudy look to the atmosphere of the place, and always set everybody coughing upon their first entrance into it. The room, if room it could rightly be called, was capable of holding a couple of hundred people with tolerable ease, and it was now about half full.

There was a large proportion of ladies (?) present.

It was not usual to announce guests in that place; but that quiet rule of allowing anybody to go in and out unobserved, was on the occasion of persons of such celebrity as those that were now ushered into the ken, dispensed with, and the man with the lantern called out in stentorian accents—

"My rum 'uns, here's Dick Turpin, Claude Duval, and a friend of theirs as they goes bail for!"

At this startling announcement, all eyes were directed to the door of the ken, and then a shout of gratification arose from the assemblage, which was materially assisted by the shrill voices of the ladies.

Claude advanced, and with a smile upon his face, he said—

"I have only just popped in to spend an hour with the family, and to take a bottle of wine, to the health and good keeping of old friends. After that, we must be off again, for London is rather a warm place for us to be in, just now."

"Hurrah!—hurrah!"

A rather dashing specimen of the female sex now came forward, and throwing her arms round Claude, she cried—

"You are as welcome as gin in sorrow, Claude Duval. Come, sit down and tell us what you have been about for this age. Why, some of the old family coves would have it that you were married!"

"Dear me, what could put such a thing into their heads?" laughed Claude. "How very ridiculous. You know, my dear, that a highwayman is married to the road, and that he never seeks to break the union that binds him to a lonely path and a moonlight night. What say you, Dick?"

"I can hardly say anything, Claude, for a young lady has got me so fast round the neck, that I am in peril of instant suffocation, if she don't let me go."

A roaring laugh at this rung through the place, and then the wine was brought. Claude had ordered it as they came along the gloomy passages that led to the old ken, but the bottle he spoke of had somehow swelled to two dozen, of which everybody was to partake.

"Come," said Claude, "I don't come often to the old ken, but when I do, you know, I feel that I ought to order as much as though I had been here once a week, at least; so, as I can't drink it all, I hope all kind friends will help me a little."

This was one way of insuring the most enthusiastic popularity in the ken, not but what Claude was, with his great reputation, sufficiently popular without standing treat to such an extent as that; but with it, he might be called the king of the old family ken.

One hour was thus passed, and the ladies were getting rather glorious, when a voice suddenly cried out—

"It ain't all right. Hilloa!"

At this announcement, everybody was hushed, except a young lady who was singing a song, and she heard nothing but her own dulcet strains; and was not aware that there was anything amiss, until some one threw a glass of wine into her open mouth and nearly choked her.

"What's amiss," cried Claude.

"I'll tell you," said the young fellow who had made the announcement that all was not right; "I'll tell you. The Crinkley Fox and me was a going out of the ken, and he went first, and directly he got outside he was grabbed. I hung back and got the door shut again."

"Perhaps he was wanted pertickler," said a deep gruff voice, from a corner of the room.

"Perhaps he was," said Claude, "and if so, it don't much affect us; but that's what I have always said, my friends—the ken's are safe enough while you are in them, but they are watched by the grabs like a cat watching a mouse."

At this moment the man with the lantern rushed into the ken, and in a voice of dismay, he called out, to to the astonishment of all present—

"Milintery!"

"What?" cried Claude.

"He means military," said Jack. "Hilloa, old Bob White, tell us exactly what you have got to say at once. Is there any danger to Claude Duval?"

"Who is yer, that yer calls me Bob White? Why, I havn't been knowed by the name of Bob White for the last five years or more. I calls myself now, Peter Brown."

"You are determined to be among the colours, then?"

"I tell you what it is, I don't like your looks. You know more than you ought, old fellow, and I don't know nothing about yer, nor does any of the family know nothing about yer. I've been among 'em and asked 'em, and they don't none of 'em know you; and now all on a sudden yer calls me Bob White!"

"A spy!—a sneak!—kill him!—down with him!" cried a number of voices.

"Silence!" said Duval; "you seem quite to forget that I brought him with me, and that I answer for him as a friend of mine."

"And I too," said Dick.

"Yes," said Bob White, alias Peter Brown, "but yer is both taken in, that's the fact. No doubt yer think he's all right enough, but it's a take-in."

"There you are wrong," cried Claude, "and if any one here attempts to lay a hand upon him, they must first take my life; so I warn you all."

"Hold!" cried Jack; "this must not be."

"And they must kill me likewise," said Dick. "Our word ought to be sufficient for the safety of any one."

The thieves rose in a body with menacing gestures, and the noise of voices was quite tremendous.

CHAPTER CCXIV.

THE ESCAPE BY THE RIVER.—THE FATE OF THE POLICE GALLEY.

As the enraged members of the old ken advanced thus threatingly upon Jack. many concealed weapons were produced, such as knives, and other steel means of offence and defence, such as few of the large fraternity of thieves in those days were ever without.

The complexion of affairs was indeed threatening.

"What is to be done?" whisperd Dick to Claude.

"Defy them."

"But they are half mad with drink."

"That, indeed, is the worst feature of the whole transaction. Jack, what do you think of this affair?"

Before Jack could answer, the thieves made a further advance towards him, and one pressed so near, that Claude at once stepped forward, and grappling with him, he flung him right into the fire at the farther end of the ken, from which he was only just clawed out in time to save his life by some of the ladies, who, when there appeared some signs of a disturbance, had retired to that end of the ken for safety.

"Beware!" said Claude; "I tell you all to beware of me. When I say I am answerable for the good faith of a man in a place like this, I likewise make myself answerable for his safety."

"Kill him! Down with him!"

"Who says that? Whoever he be, he can howl loud enough," said Jack. "If he will be so good as to step forward and try it, here I am, and I promise him a warm reception."

"Don't speak, Jack," said Claude.

"Oh, but I must; it is time that I should speak; and, now that I have begun, I will speak to some purpose, and they shall hear me. I find that the gentleman with the powerful throat, who was so anxious to kill me, and down with me, don't seem to be glad to come forward."

As he spoke, Jack got upon a table that was close at hand, and Claude and Dick stood close to him to protect him. Claude, with a pistol in his right hand, called out,

"I see a man aiming a bottle at my friend; let him throw it, and I will give him a pistol-bullet in exchange for it."

"Hark ye," cried Jack. "You call me a spy?"

"We do—we do!"

"And you think I am a sneak, an have got into the old ken for the purpose of knocking it up and bringing mischief on all of you? That's what you think?"

"We know it!"

"Indeed! and you think that I have been so cunning as to impose upon Claude Duval and Dick Turpin? Two pretty innocent babes to be taken in by any one truly!"

There was a loud laugh at this, particularly from the ladies, and one man called out, "It's all right, I think; let it pass, comrades, I say; it's all right."

The tide of popular feeling regarding Jack was certainly on the turn; but yet, in the flashing eyes and the menacing gestures of some present, he saw that they were still far from satisfied, so he added:—

"My good friends, for myself I am not afraid; but if there be danger to-night, it is fit that we should all be united, and well able to resist it. If there be anything like doubt or disunion amongst us, we are lost; and so for that reason, and not for any other, I will tell you who I am."

This announcement created the greatest interest, and every sound was hushed, while the utmost attention was given to what Jack might next say.

"I am quite astonished," he added, "that Bob White don't know me. To be sure, it is years since we met; but that ought not to make much difference to him, for he knew me well."

"If I did," said Bob White, "you are preciously altered, that's all."

"I am altered," said Jack, in a tone of sadness; "and yet I am not so much altered as I was a year ago. Look at me!"

He took off his hat, and stood looking at Bob White, who, shading his eyes with his hands, regarded him for some moments in silence; and then in a loud voice he cried—

"'Why, by all that's good, it's—it's——"

'Who?—who?" shouted everybody, and then a silence, as profound as that of death, reigned in the ken. Jack smiled faintly as he still looked at Bob White, who then cried—

"Yes! I'd swear to him now he has laughed. Why, old fellows, this is Sixteen-string Jack!"

The moment these words were pronounced by the old servitor of the ken, there was a roaring shout of pleasure, and Jack was dragged from the table to be half smothered by the caresses of the ladies, and the shaking of hands to which the men subjected him.

"Lor' bless us!" said Bob White, "we have all of us heard an odd story of how Jack was brought to life agin, arter his dance upon nothing at Tyburn, but we none of us believed it till now; but this is him, as sure as eggs is eggs."

"Yes," said Jack, "I am Sixteen-string Jack, and the story is true; and let it have been dressed up in ever so marvellous a manner to your ears, it cannot transcend the truth. But now that your minds are at ease about who I am, let us think of the main chance. What is the danger, Bob? Tell us all about it."

It took about ten minutes to get the meeting into the quiet orderly state which was so highly necessary under the circumstances; and then Bob spoke clearly and distinctly—

"You see, pals," he said, "I began to think it a very odd thing, that half an hour and more had slipped away without any fresh arrival to the old ken, so I got up to the little window, and looked out, and what should I see but the millintery, actually a parcel of soldiers, a keeping guard at the corner of the old house, and close to the door stands half-a-dozen of officers waiting to nab everybody as comes out of the ken."

"Yes, and the Crinkley Fox is nabbed already."

"You hold your noise. What's to be done, that's the thing! Who do they come after, that's the question? It ain't all of us."

"That," said Claude in a clear voice, "can scarcely be a question now. By some means or another, they have dogged me, and Dick, and Jack to this place, and it is us they are after."

The general silence in the ken sufficiently proclaimed that such was the universal opinion of all present.

"I don't mean to say it isn't so," said Bob White, "but we know how to settle that without troubling them, after all. There's two ways of getting in and out of the old ken."

"I know there is," said Claude. "You have a mode of getting to the bank of the river, I am well aware, from this house, and that is the only way by which we shall have a chance of escaping. The sooner we go the better, and it is not at all likely that any one else, upon leaving the ken, will be more than merely temporarily inconvenienced by a detention long enough to convince the officers that he is not one of those whom they seek. I would wish you all to stay as long as you can, so as to give them a good waiting job. And now, Bob, if you will show us the way out to the river, we shall be glad enough to be off at once."

"Listen to me a moment first," said Bob; "I don't feel, do you know, quit clear in my own mind that they don't fancy we have such a way to the river though they don't know where it is exactly, for the last time we had to use it there was a police-galley plying about the spot, as if on the look-out."

"It must be risked, though, for all that."

"In course it must; but it's as well you should know that there may be the grabs in that direction."

"It's much better that we should know, and we all feel not a little obliged by the caution, Bob; but the sooner we be off now, the better."

"Good again. Now for it. We will soon open the way from the old crib to the Thames, if that will do any good, and I am in hopes as it will."

There were many then present who perfectly understood how to open the secret passage from the ken that led to the banks of the Thames. It was done thus:

From a corner of the ken, three of the floor-boards, that were placed apparently quite permanently against the wall, were removed, and when such was the case, they disclosed an aperture behind them, about large enough for two persons to walk in abreast.

"There it is," said Bob. "All folks have to do now, is to go right on, and then they will come to the old wharf that's always to let, on the banks of the Thames."

"Always to let?" said Dick.

"Yes, it belongs to us. This secret passage from the old ken opens on to it. It ain't worth above twenty pounds a-year rent, and by asking forty pounds for it when anybody comes about it, we keep it unlet, you see; for we would'nt let it on no account at all, as if we did, the people would be sure to go poking about, as folks do when they get into a strange place, till they found out the secret passage."

"Not a doubt of it."

"Well, now, I'll go before you with a light, so that you can't help being all right. Come on."

Claude turned to the thieves in the ken, and said in a cheerful voice—

"Good-night, or rather good-morning to you all I hope we shall meet again soon, when we may be able to spend a little more time together than now."

"Hurrah!" cried the thieves. "Good-night, and good luck to you all three. some again to the old ken as soon as you can."

"We will," said Dick and Jack. "You may depend upon it that we will, my lads."

"Come on," cried Bob White. "Come on; who knows but the millintery may get outrageous, and come in all of a troop? Come on now, while you can."

Claude, Dick, and Jack, followed Bob through the opening in the wall; and as he preceded them with the lantern, it seemed as though they were diving right into the bowels of the earth, or exploring some long closed up mine, with a faint star to guide them. The air was mouldy and misty in that place, and they could feel that the ground upon which they trod was very damp, while here and there an absolute pool of water splashed under their feet.

"This is not the most delightful place in the world," said Claude. "It seems reeking with moisture."

"Well, perhaps," said old Bob, "it isn't the most delightfulest place in the world; but it's a deuced deal better than a cell in Newgate, I should say."

"Oh, there's no comparison," laughed Claude. "But what makes it so damp? It don't lie so very low, I think."

"It's always been so since the last time the Thames took a freak of rising about six feet higher than it was used to do. This old place was flooded then, and so was the ken; but what with the constant fire and the feet of the family coves, we got it out of the ken; but it never all ewapooiwated out of this here old passage."

The three friends smiled to themselves at the rather peculiar manner in which old Bob pronounced the word evaporation; but they controlled their inclination to laugh outright, for they had a respect for the old man which made them anxious to spare his feelings, independent of the fact that he was there and then doing them a very great service.

"Mind, Bob," said Dick, "that you put us down for the rent of the old wharf this year."

"Oh, that will be all right, I know. Don't say anything about that, old fellow. We know you all well enough to feel quite sure the payment is forthcoming some day or another."

"It shall be forthcoming at once," said Dick. "We have enough for that, although we are not what we consider in full feather, just now, Bob; but, you know, we have ways and means of getting more."

The old man laughed; but he did not refuse the money that Dick thus implied that he would hand to him. The passage now certainly did not improve in appearance or in comfort, for the sloppy condition of the ground of it was much worse as they neared its termination on the old wharf; and it was but natural that such should be the case; for it went on a slight incline all the way, and, of course, the lower part of it took the greatest possible amount of drainage from the upper.

Now and then, too, a suspicious scampering sort of noise, just on in advance of them, spoke eloquently of the presence of some of the reptile tribe.

"You have rats here," said Claude.

"A few," said Bob. "I don't think there's a great lot; for there ain't much to get here, you see, and they are wide enough awake for to look after their own insides, you see."

"Not a doubt of it, Bob. If you were to put a nice old Cheshire cheese now here for them, it would be doing them rather an extensive favour."

"Ah, catch me at it! But here we are."

As he spoke, the old man emerged from the long and dismal passage on to an old miserable wharf, that was upon the bank of the river. All was in intense darkness, for before leaving the passage, he had placed the lantern on the ground with its dark shade turned towards the wharf, as he did not know who might be on the look-out from the river.

"This is the place," he said, "and when your eyes get a little used to the out-of-door darkness, you will be able to see what a rummy old den it is; but there are several wherries generally moored off it, and one of them will be the thing."

CHAPTER CCXV.

A TERRIBLE NIGHT ON THE RIVER.—THE OLD BUILDING AT BUCKINGHAM-STREET.

CLAUDE and his friends looked about them as well as they were able, and they were not a little struck by the gloomy aspect of the place to which they had been led; and Jack, as he nearly fell over a piece of timber, said—

"Confound the place! why, it seems full of pit-falls, and man-traps."

"Well, it is, in a manner of speaking," said their guide, "and it's a good thing to look where you are going here. A false step might take you right into the tide in a moment, and then away you would go."

"And in the darkness, no help for you," said Dick.

"Not a bit—not a bit!"

"What's that?" said Claude, suddenly.

"Where—where?" said Dick.

There was a light upon the river for about the space of half a minute, and then it disappeared again. It was more like a flash upon the night air for an instant than anything else; but still, it was suspicious, for the long, darting ray of light was, to the apprehension of Duval, decidedly directed towards the old wharf.

"Did you not see the light?" said Claude.

"I did," replied Jack.

"And so did I," said the old man; "and I shouldn't be at all surprised if it wasn't one of those confounded police galleys, as they call 'em, that go poking about in the dark to hinder folks from getting a living."

"If so, Bob," said Claude, "it is on the look-out for us to-night, you may depend."

"And if so," said Jack, "we are hemmed in regularly both by land and water; for the soldiers hold us one way and the galley the other. All we can do now is to lead the life of decoyed rats in this place, and finish off by eating each other."

"What a lively picture you draw, Jack."

"Ah, Claude, it may be nearly a true one; and there's the light again—I saw it, and so did you all."

"I did," said Bob, "and I tell you what it is. This place, as I said before, wasn't thought very well off by the police, and you may depend upon it, as sure as eggs is eggs, that they have got their eyes upon it to-night, and are not likely to take them off again. The sooner you get away the better."

"Good advice, Bob," said Claude; "but, like most of the same quality in this world, rather difficult to follow."

"Not at all; you all creep along by the side of the wall, and keep as close as you can till you get to the edge of the wharf. Mind you don't take one step too far and tumble over, that's all. When you get there, wait till you hear something of me. I know all the ins and outs of the old den better than most folks, and if I don't bring you a wherry soon, it will be something rather particular that hinders me. Good-by."

With this, Bob crouched down himself, and crawled away, leaving his friends to follow the good advice that he gave them.

"Come on," said Claude. "Follow me. I fancy I am something like a cat, for I can see capitally now, notwithstanding the darkness of this place; so I shall not lead you astray, any of you. Come on."

"We will follow."

Claude bent forward and kept his eyes fixed upon the ground before him, lest he should, notwithstanding he thought so much of his powers of observation in the dark, go a little too far; and he felt then quite convinced that he saw well enough to know when he should come to the extreme edge of the old wharf.

Moreover, his sense of hearing began to be of some assistance to him in that particular, for he could hear the water hissing and gurgling past the old rotten and tide-worn piers of the wharf; and as that sound increased upon his sense, he crept along still slower and slower, until he reached the verge of the wharf.

"Halt!" he said.

"All's right, Claude?" said Dick. "All's right? Is Bob there?"

"No, not yet; but everything is profoundly quiet now. I don't hear any sound of our enemies on the night air."

"Hush!" said Jack; "I hear a low kind of splashing, as if some boat were being very carefully rowed along. Ah, now I hear the oars working in the rollocks. Be upon your guard, Claude."

"I will. Hush! hush!"

The most profound stillness reigned in the place, and they all three of them faintly heard the sounds that Jack had spoken of as indicative of the approach of a boat. That it was Bob they all hoped and expected; but in that they were disappointed, for in a few moments a voice said—

"Hilloa! Who's there?"

Perhaps the most obvious policy of Claude would have been to keep profoundly still, but he hit upon a bold manœuvre, and in a moment he said—

"Police! Surrender yourselves, or we will fire!"

"Hold hard," said the voice again. "We are police. This is galley No. 4. Don't fire."

"Oh, all's right," added Claude. "Pass on, and don't make a noise. We have got scent of the game."

"Good luck to you, then. We won't be far off."

"I will flash a light if we want you," said Claude.

"Do—do. Good speed and good luck."

The boat which he, Claude, could only just dimly see low down in the water below the edge of the wharf, had some half dozen men in it; and as they glided away they looked like shadowy spectres in the night air, that, mixed with the vapour arising from the river, seemed floating like something tangible around that spot. Claude and his companions preserved the most profound stillness for nearly five minutes, and then Jack ventured in a low tone to speak.

"You did them, then, Claude. It was a capital move, and if anything will save us, it will."

"I think so, too," said Dick. "Half the danger is past now that these fellows are fairly taken in."

"Don't let us be too sanguine," said Claude. "Caution will do us no harm at all. I hear another boat coming. Crouch down, both of you; and if it be an enemy, I will try the same game with it."

"But it ain't," said a voice from the water, which they at once recognised as belonging to Bob. "What the deuce are you talking about?"

"Bob is it?"

"To be sure. I don't see nor hear any of the Philistines, and I really begin to think they have given it up as a bad job, do you know."

"Do you, Bob? Just listen to me a little, and I'll tell you what will open your eyes to the contrary."

Claude then in a few words told the old man what had taken place, and at its conclusion, Bob drew a long breath and said—

"Well, that was what I call taking a lion by the nose, or a mad bull. They say if you lay hold of a mad bull by the nose, he is all civility, and says directly, 'Anything you please, sir!' but the difficulty is to screw one's courage up to do it."

"I should think it was; and likewise to get the gentleman—I mean the bull—to stand still while you do it. But will your boat hold us all, Bob? for I suppose you are not in the water."

"Yes, come on; drop over one by one, and I will take hold of your legs and bring you down safely into the boat. There's a kind of fog getting up on the river, and if we can but get a quarter of a mile from here, we are all right."

"Do you intend going with us, Bob?"

"To be sure. I shan't feel happy to-night till I happen to know that you are all safe and sound; so come on."

It was rather a nervous kind of thing to do what Bob suggested, namely, to swing oneself off the edge of the old wharf in the trust that some one would take hold of one's legs and place them in safety; but Claude and his two friends were so much in the habit of doing all kinds of nervous and adventurous things, that they did not for many moments hesitate over this one—and in the course of a few minutes they were all three safely in a small wherry, that old Bob had got from its moorings not far off, and brought to the spot, borrowing it of its owner without the ceremony of asking his cognisance or sanction to the affair.

"All's right," said Bob. "Here you are. Now sit down, all of you, and be as quiet as lambs. You can't do any good, you know, and you may do no end of harm. I have a pair of skulls here, and will creep along close to the bank, and off we go."

The boat was pushed off, and it had scarcely got two yards out into the stream, when a broad gleam of light came from the old wharf, and a loud voice cried—

"Surrender yourselves, or we have orders to take you alive or dead! Resistance is useless!"

"That's a clever fellow," said Bob; "he is just in time to be too late. Ah! they see——"

"Escaped!" cried the voice again. "Escaped! Hold your light up, Watkins, while I fire at that boat. There you have it."

Bang! went a pistol, and one of the oars gave a jerk as the bullet touched it, and knocked a splinter off it.

"Any mischief?" said Claude, as he drew a pistol from his pocket. "Is any one hurt by that shot?"

"No!" was the simultaneous reply.

"Then I won't return it."

"Fire at them!" cried the voice from the wharf again. "Fire at them! There they go, my boys! Hold up the light."

Bang! bang! went two pistols. One bullet made a splash in the water, and the other hit the hat of Claude.

"They mean it," said Dick, "and I don't feel as if one ought to be made an animated target of here, and not return the compliment. So here goes. How do you like that?"

Dick took as good an aim as he could at the lantern that a man was holding up upon the wharf, and fired. There was a crashing sound, and then all was darkness.

"A capital shot that," said Bob. "What can the fellow be yelling about, I wonder? It was the lantern you hit, not him, I take it. Do you hear him?"

"Oh! oh! oh!" cried some one from the wharf.

"There's some mischief, at all events," said Claude. "Give me one of the oars, Bob. I can pull, and we shall get on all the better. That will do. Now for it—off and away."

Another shot was sent after the boat, and then all was still for a few minutes. Claude and Bob pulled very well together, and the boat shot along; but it was quite a mercy that there was nothing in her way, for if there had been, bump she must have gone against it, as the fog was so thick now that it was quite out of the question seeing above half a boat's length a-head of them.

"This fog is capital," said Dick.

"Ah!" said Jack, "but it will leave us in the lurch."

"What do you mean, Jack?"

"I mean that this is that sort of fog that sweeps over the face of the world often just before sunrise. I have watched it come, and watched it go many a time, and watched where it came from. It will vanish in a few minutes of time, and I take it as a sign that the morning is closer at hand than we all think."

"Hark!" said Dick. "That's a clock."

"St Paul's," said Bob.

The sound came faintly only through the mist upon the river; but yet, in the absence of other disturbing causes, they could count the hour of five distinctly enough to make them feel quite sure that it was no mistake.

"It is as I said," remarked Jack. "The day is coming."

"Pull away," said Bob. "There's a wharf a little further on that we can stop at; and if we can but secure a landing there, I do think we may baffle the bloodhounds yet."

Claude found that the old man was pulling with an energy that was hardly to to be expected at his time of life, and for a few moments it was quite as much as he could do to keep up with him, so as to prevent the boat from being turned out of its course. He did manage to do so, however; and then, in a low but distinct voice, Jack said—

"They are after us."

At this intimation, both Claude and Dick looked narrowly in the wake o the b at, and then they saw what it was that had induced Jack to speak as he had done, and they could not doubt but that he was perfectly correct in the statement that he made.

Creeping on after them through the fog, there was evidently a large boat, with a light in its stern, for the rays of the light were thrown right on the boat, and revealed a crowd of dusky-looking figures within it; while, by the jerking movement of the light, it was quite evident that the boat was being urged through the water at great speed.

"Ah," said old Bob. "They are coming, sure enough."

"You think they are our foes?" said Claude.

"Not a doubt of it, I should say—not a doubt of it. They fancy they have got us into a regular line, now, and that they must run us down at last. But perhaps they may be mistaken after all. It isn't the best calculation that always turns out the thing in the end. Pull away."

"Yes," said Jack. "You may now pull away, both of you, as much as you like; but I don't think a couple of pairs of oars will do the work of six exactly, and no doubt they have that number of rowers. Ah! what are they about, now?"

Crack! went the report of a pistol, and those in the little wherry could hear the bullet go whistling over their heads.

"A little too high, I take it," said Bob. "They may blaze away at us in this fog, and not do much mischief, after all."

"But the fog is going," said Jack. "Look how much whiter it is getting each moment. I tell you, Bob, if you don't pull in on shore with us in another ten minutes at the latest, the river will be clear, and they will see us as well as if they had us in their own boat."

"There's reason enough in that," said the old man; "but just wait a bit. It won't do to pull in shore now, for there is no place to land at; and as they come on, they would soon see us; for you may depend they keep a sharp look-out now for fear we should double upon them in any way."

"What's this confounded lump of something in the bottom of the boat?" said Dick. "I have been knocking my feet against it I don't know how often. What the deuce can it be?"

"A lump of stone," said Bob. "Don't throw it over, I want it."

"You want it?"

"Yes, to be sure I do, or else I shouldn't have got hold of it, and put it in the wherry, I can tell you. Do you think it's rather a weighty affair, Master Dick?"

"In truth, I do. Why, it's enough to sink the boat."

"Ha! ha!"

With this significant kind of laugh, that none who were with him at all understood the meaning of, old Bob only pulled away still. And now the truth of Jack's prognostications of the weather began to be very apparent, for the fog got whiter and whiter each instant, and seemed to be upon the point of rolling away altogether, for it moved about in flimsy masses, and now and then, through open places in the vapour, the banks of the river might be seen quite plainly in the early morning light that was beginning to make itself apparent on the face of nature.

CHAPTER CCXVI.

AN ALARMING EXPEDIENT.—THE LANDING-PLACE AT THAMES STREET.

"It's going now," said Jack—"it's going now."

"What's going?"

"The fog—the fog."

"Yes," said Dick, "and here comes the police-galley, so I rather think, Claude, that it's no use pulling any more, and tiring yourself. If we are to have a fight for it, the sooner it begins the better, for then the sooner it will be over."

"No," said Bob, as he suddenly shipped his oar. "As you say, it is of no use pulling. They must catch us now."

"What!" said Claude, "do you mean to say that you give up so easily? I will not be taken alive, and I will not die without a struggle. If this is to be the day upon which I go into the other world, I will not go alone. So let them come on, if they will do so, and take the chances of the fight."

As he spoke, Claude stooped down in the boat, but he kept his eyes intently fixed upon the now rapidly approaching police-galley.

"It's no use," said Bob; "you can do nothing."

"I can shoot a couple of them," said Claude.

"Don't, don't. Will you keep your pistols out of sight for a moment or two, and trust to——"

"Yes, if you can do anything, Bob."

"I can try."

"Ah," said Dick, "I can guess what he means to try, and it may do. We will leave all in your hands, Bob. Now try what it will come to. Leave him alone, Jack, and let him carry out his plan, for I have some reason to think it is not a bad one."

"I know it isn't," said Bob. "Crouch down all of you, and don't say one word."

They did as the old man asked them, but although both Claude and Jack now saw by his movements what he intended to try to do, they neither of them had great hopes that it would be very successful upon that occasion. Men such as they were, and leading the wild adventurous life that they led, were much more capable of keeping quiet even under the disastrous danger that threatened them, than as if they had been ordinary members of society; and, consequently, they let the old man have everything his own way.

The fog had not quite gone, but it was reduced to rather a thin fleecy kind of mist, that confused rather than hid objects from view. The police-galley, with its flaring light, that now looked red and lurid through the vapour, came pressing on.

Bob raised his voice.

"Hilloa!—Police there!"

"Hilloa!" was the response. "Wherry a-head! It's no use trying to get away. We have you."

"We know it," said Bob, "and don't want any bloodshed, so you may come on. When a man's time comes, it's no use kicking."

"No tricks," said the voice from the police-galley. "There are twelve of us here, so you will but sacrifice your lives at once by any useless resistance. You had better give up at once."

"That's what we mean.—Come on—come on."

The boat now went very lazily on with the stream, which happened to be running down at the time, and in a very few seconds the police-galley was quite close upon them.

"The first man that makes the least resistance," said a voice, "I will shoot dead upon the spot."

"The boat-hook," whispered Bob to Jack. "It's lying along the gunwale, there."

"I have it."

"Hook 'em fast, then."

At the same moment that some one from the police-galley made a plunging abortive effort with a boat-hook to catch hold of the side of the wherry, Jack, with the boat-hook that Bob had pointed out to him, caught a firm clutch of the galley. The two craft were drawn alongside of each other, and then, with a strength and a suddenness that was quite marvellous, Bob raised the heavy block of stone, and flung it right into the centre of the galley.

"There you are," he said. "Put the darbies on that, but don't think to put such tricks upon travellers again."

There was a sharp sudden crash, and the heavy jagged block of granite went right through the centre of the police-galley. The galley lurched over and began to fill rapidly.

"Pull away!" cried Bob, as he snatched his oar and plunged it into the stream —"pull away!"

"Help!—help!" cried the voices from the galley.

A couple of pistols were fired at random, and in another moment down went the galley, head-foremost, as if diving into the river, and the twelve men were left struggling for life in the stream.

CLAUDE GETS SHOT AT BY A BOW-STREET RUNNER.

Claude seized the other oar, and without a word commenced seconding the exertions of old Bob. Not a word was spoken by either of them for nearly five minutes, during which time they had made great progress from the scene of action. Then it was the old man who broke the silence, by saying, in a calm voice—

"I do think we shall have a very fine day, by the colour of the mist that still clings about the banks of the river."

"Upon my life," said Claude, "you take things easily, Bob. How many, if any, of those fellows could swim, I wonder?"

"If that part of their education," said Bob, "has been very much neglected by their parents and guardians, you know, it ain't our fault, you know, by any sort of means."

Dick executed a long whistle, and then he said—

"I tell you what it is. If I live to be a hundred years old I shan't forget the crash with which that stone went right through the bottom of the boat."

"You see it was rather jagged, and had no end of ugly points and corners about it, so it was sure to go; and I daresay it hunt some of their toes at the same time."

"Well," said Jack, "after all, you know, Claude, they would have either taken our lives here upon the river, or dragged us to prison with the hope of taking them on the scaffold, so that in self-defence we were right enough, I take it, with what we did with them."

"Agreed," said Claude. "Don't mistake me, Bob. I am much obliged to you for the skill and promptitude with which you have saved us from what would have been certain death or capture. I still only regret, as I always shall, that no other way presented itself than that of putting twelve men into the water. But they brought it on themselves."

"To be sure," said Bob; "and, after all, an officer ain't like another human being. They know their chances, and they think to get on and drink their brandy-and-water on the strength of frightening other folks; but with us it don't do; and if they are such fools as not to have found that out, why, they must take the consequences, that's all; and whether they sink or swim don't much matter. They won't be any great loss to society at large."

"You are quite a philosopher, Bob."

"I believe you. But now I advise that we pull right across the stream, and land at some of the little quays an the other side. There's half-a-dozen there to one that there is on this side, and then you can think of what is best to be done."

"I am for the country at once," said Claude.

"And I," said Jack and Dick, simultaneously.

"Agreed, then. We will get our horses as soon as possible, and set off out of London; for after this freak, I should say it would be too hot to hold us."

"Very good," said Bob, "and I shall quietly get back to the old public in the Mint, and look as if nothing had happened at all."

"And if a good face can carry things off," said Dick, with a laugh, "you are just the man, Bob, to do it. You may depend upon it that when we find ourselves pretty well to do in the world, and the fates have sent us some tolerably full purses, we shall not forget you."

"Oh, I know that's all right. You never did forget the old man, and you are not at all likely to begin now; so I am satisfied upon that head, you see."

"You may be," said Claude.

"I think we ought to give Bob a distinct promise," said Jack.

"Very good."

"I propose, then, that we ask him what sum of money will compass any particular wants that he may happen to have."

"Good again," said Dick. "Come now, Bob, don't be modest. Just say what sum of money would make you tolerably comfortable."

"Why, you see," said Bob, "the honest truth is, I don't myself want for anything; but I have a young fellow, a son, and he is in love with a good girl, but they can't afford to marry, cos, you see, all that I have is locked up in the property of the old ken, and I seem as if I should not like to shut it up, or to let it go into other hands while I lived."

"Certainly not, Bob."

"Very well, then, if you could spare among you about a hundred and fifty pounds, you see, some day when you are quite lucky, and can easily place your hands upon it, I should be glad of it for the young folks."

"It shall be done," said Claude. "We all promise; and if we live, Bob, you may expect it soon."

"Don't hurry at all about it."

"We both promise likewise," said Jack and Dick; "so you may consider that as settled."

"I do," said Bob, "and it's quite a weight off my mind, I can assure you. I was in love myself once, and hadn't the money to keep a house over the head of her that took my fancy a kind of prisoner, and popped the darbies, in a way of speaking, on my affections, and locked me up in the stone jug of her charms; so I can feel for the young folks a little."

The three friends laughed heartily at old Bob's highly figurative description of his love-making; and now they got right across the river, and pulled the boat into a little landing place that was at one end of a little miserable turning out of Thames-street.

A water-jack pulled the boat's nose right in shore, and begged for the job of taking care of it, which our friends were nothing loth to give him.

"Mind you keep a good look-out on the sticks," said Bob; "there's so many bad characters about, you know."

"All's right, sir. I'll keep my eyes on 'em."

"Do so. We shan't be gone very long."

"Very good, sir."

Claude could hardly preserve his gravity at the calm, steady, and precise manner in which the old man acted his part, and as they walked up the narrow sloppy turning to Thames Street, he said, "Really, Bob, I had no sort of idea you had one half of the accomplishments that you have exhibited to us."

"Ah, Duval, when I was a young one it was all right enough with me. I was up to everything that you could think of. But now my race is nearly run, though to-night's proceedings have roused me up a little, and once or twice I felt as if a matter of thirty years had gone from me, and I was something like what I used to be."

"Ah," said Dick, "we are all getting old."

"None of your gammon," said Bob.

They all laughed, and then Jack said, "Now, it will be much better for you two to go into some house, and keep yourselves quite quiet, while I get the horses, and thus it will create less observation. I will just go in with you, and make as much change as I can in my looks, without our vallise, with our things in it, and then I will be off."

"That's the best plan," said Bob.

"I think it is,' said Claude; "but it is rather too bad, Jack, to give you all the bother of it, especially after your night's fatigue. Shall I go and get the cattle? I will do so cheerfully, if you are at all tired."

"No—no, Claude, I can go, so let me do it. I am less known than you are, I am quite certain, and so run much less risk."

No further opposition was now made by any of them; and after walking a considerable distance up Thames Street, they got into Cannon Street, and paused at length at a house not a long way from Blackfriars. Jack, as he said he would, made what alterations in his appearance he could, and then set off for the horses.

"Good-by," said old Bob. "I am off home now, for you recollect I left it in rather an uncomfortable state."

He shook hands heartily with them all, and then off he went, and Dick and Claude hired a private room in the tavern they stopped at, and waited the arrival of Jack with the horses with no little impatience, for they were now most anxious to get off to the country as quickly as they possibly could.

In about an hour Jack came back, mounted upon his own steed, and safely leading Dick's and Claude's. They soon settled their reckoning at the tavern, and mounting, they at a sharp trot got into Fleet Street, and so took their way down the Strand westwards.

"Oh, what a relief is this!" said Claude, when after traversing Piccadilly, they fairly got out into the open country.

"Yes," said Dick, "I feel it as such; but at times I like to visit one of the old kens. They are not only useful to a fellow when he is fairly hunted, but by their contrast with the brightness and the beauty of the country, they make him satisfied when he gets to it again."

"As for me," said Jack, "I could live and die in the open country. It has grown upon me now to be a great delight. But are you going to keep on this road, Claude, or shall we get on the regular western one?"

"What do you say, Dick?"

"Any road but the one which, if pursued a little too far, would take me to Oxford, will suit capitally for me, I should say; for even Oxford Street brings a disagreeable crick in the neck."

Claude laughed as he said—

"Well—well, we need not get further than Southal on the Oxford road; and I propose that you both come with me to the farm at Ealing, where Cicely is, and then that we dine there, and have a rest; and then, after which, we can push on to Southal, and regularly take the road as the shadows of the evening begin to creep about the old trees."

"Agreed—agreed."

"If we are not intruding upon you," added Dick.

"Now, I do think you are laughing at me," said Claude. "The idea at this time of day, after all we have gone through together, of you, Dick, talking about intruding upon me is rather too rich."

"Well, but I really——"

"You really, nonsense Don't say another word about it whatever you do, my dear fellow, but let us cut across Hyde Park her, and get along the best way we can to Ealing."

They were all sufficiently familiar with that part of the suburbs of London, to enable them to go the nearest way to any given point; so they soon reached Ealing Common, and in three minutes from that time they were at the old farm again, where Cicely ever awaited the appearace of Claude, while in his absense a thousand fears for his safety agitated her bosom.

The people of the farm made them all three as welcome as they possibly could, and it was one hour before sunset when they again mounted and took the road with the intention of having a sharp trot to Southal.

CHAPTER CCXVII.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURE WITH THE PLAYERS NEAR SOUTHAL.

THE sun sunk rapidly as the three adventurers got out into the open country beyond the then pretty and rural village of Hanwell, which has since been spoilt by the huge asylum, that, with a melancholy suggestion, meets the gaze at every turn. The trees were gently waving to and fro in the evening air, and the birds had all retired to rest, save some few late songsters, who yet circled the topmost boughs of the tall trees, and caught some faint reflection of the fading glories of the sun.

"This is a fine scene," said Claude, "and one that has rather a different effect upon the feelings to that which is produced by such a combination of circumstances as that which heralded us to the Thames only a short time ago."

"A.," said Dick, "and to me it is a finer scene than——"

"Never mind what, Dick," said Jack. "Just look ahead, and be so good as to say what you see coming on at a tolerable speed."

They all glanced forwards at this speech, and beheld a chariot emerge from a cross-road. A postilion was driving a pair of rather lean and scraggy horses; and from the white bow in his hat, it was rather evident that something in the shape of a wedding was going on in the neighbourhood.

"Now, if that were the bride and bridegroom," said Claude, "I would stop them, just to have a look at the lady."

"Why not?" said Dick. "It may be so. Who shall say to the contrary? "What do you think of the set-out, Jack?"

"Why, that at the force it is going at it will all break down together soon if it don't moderate. Ah, you see the old postilion only put his steeds to their mettle upon emerging from the lane, and now they go at a pretty jog trot."

This was the fact, for the post-chaise was drawn over the ground at a very slow pace, indeed, now that the high-road was fairly reached, by the miserable cattle that were harnessed to it; and, upon the whole, so strange a set-out was seldom to be met with so near to the metropolis.

"Well, Claude," said Dick, "I see that you are hankering to stop the coach. Do so, and Jack and I will keep back, so that you may have it all your own way in the matter."

"Very good. I will let you know if there be any fun going on. I don't think there is a soul in sight besides ourselves."

"Not one, with the exception of the carriage occupants."

"Here goes then," said Claude, and he trotted after the chaise, which he soon came up with. Duval upon this occasion did what he very seldom did in the day time even, and that was to put upon his face a small half mask, with a dependent piece of crape that came down nearly to his mouth, and which effectually prevented anything in the shape of recognition at the moment.

"Hold!" he cried to the postilion, "upon your life, hold!"

The man immediately drew up, exclaiming—

"Oh, Lord! here is a highwayman in arms, as I'm a sinner! Oh, good sir, spare us all, do, and don't blow our brains out upon the spot."

"If you keep your horses still you are as safe as if you were at home in your own bed; but if you play any tricks, I would not give a bad sixpence for your life. Be warned."

"Oh, lor, yes, sir. Certainly, sir. I am very sorry, indeed, sir—very sorry, and won't move an inch."

Claude went up to the coach door, and the moment he got there, he heard a loud voice cry,—

"What's this—what's all this, eh? Am I to be continually annoyed by all the world, eh, eh?"

The window was let down, and the face of a man, of about sixty years of age, presented itself. Old age is frequently venerable and becoming, but this face was wrinkled with dissipation, and the eyes had a bleard and blood-shot look, such as in youth is sad to see; but in age, if arising from excesses, is most particularly revolting. The countenance, too, was of that purplish sanguine hue, which bespeaks a great attention to the bottle in some shape or another.

The voice of this detestable character more resembled the bow-wow-wow of some cross-tempered dog than anything else.

"Well, sir," said Claude, "who are you?"

The old gentleman looked so amazed at this question, that his eyes quite protruded out of his head, like those of some fish after it has been rather over-boiled. Before he could form any reply, or find words in which to express his overpowering indignation, a faint voice from the inside of the carriage cried,—

"Oh, Sir Felix, give the wretch a guinea or two, and let us get on to the Grove. Do, Sir Felix, for my sake."

"Oh, bother your sake," said the old gentleman. "Hold your tongue, madam, will you? Confound you—Pof!"

The pronunciation of this word "pof," seemed to be some insane peculiarity of the old gentleman. Certainly, it was not a piece of jocularity, for to judge from his countenance, nobody could be in a greater rage than he was at that moment.

"Sir Felix," said Claude, "I will trouble you for your money, watch, and valuables, if you please, or else I shall be under the necessity of taking them, in a manner that won't be half so pleasant as if you gave them up yourself quietly."

"Police!—police!" cried Sir Felix. "Watch—watch! Police! Murder! A highwayman!"

"These cries are quite useless, sir. You will only bring danger upon yourself, but none upon me."

"Cora," said the female voice from within the carriage, "Cora, you speak to the fellow, and tell him that there is nothing here for him. He will not be such a brute as to stop a bride on her way to the home of her dear bridegroom."

"Oh, mother!" said a soft and gentle voice, that was like music itself, "how can you speak to me in such a way, when you know that tears are on my cheeks, and that my heart is desolate?"

"Fiddlesticks! You are married now to Sir Felix, and it is too late to speak about your heart, now. You should have thought of all that in the church, and stopped the ceremony."

"Oh, mother, did not I go upon my kness to you, but you forced me to this, you know you did, forced me to this by an untruth? Oh, Arthur, Arthur! where are you now?"

"Silence, minx!"

"Silence, wife!" cried the old gentleman, and then—as though that word had tickled him very much—he burst out into a chuckle, that ended in a cough that nearly carried him off. He was obliged to lean back in the coach to recover himself. A scraggy looking specimen of female humanity now appeared at the window, and said—

"Now, my good man, go away. There is half-a-guinea for you. Of course, you will be hanged, some day, and serve you right, too. Go away directly, man. We don't want to have anything more to say to you. Samuel, drive on directly, or you will get your discharge."

"Yes, marm," said Samuel; "I'll be shot if I do!"

"You wretch, what do you mean?"

"Spare your anger, madam," said Claude; "I shall, I see, be under the necessity of shooting Sir Felix. It is always much easier to rifle a dead body than a living one, provided you do it before it has had time to stiffen."

"Oh, murder!" cried Sir Felix. "Here's my purse—Here's my watch—Oh dear!—Oh dear! what a loss! Take them; but I can't die just yet, with such a load of wine in my cellar as I have. Oh dear—oh dear! I shall be a long time getting over this, that I shall."

Claude took the purse and the watch. The former was heavy, and the latter glittered with jewels. It was no bad booty, that, for a beginning to the evening.

"What are you about, Cora?" cried the rather scraggy female, as the glass window of the door on the other side of the chaise was suddenly let down.

"Nothing, mother—oh, nothing—nothing."

"Pull up that window again, directly. Do you want dear Sir Felix to get his death of cold and leave you a widow, you unfeeling monster? When a man of property marries you, you ought to study him all your days, that you ought."

Sir Felix gave a terrible grunt, and then Claude, turning to the postilion, said—

"You may go on now, and the less you say about this little affair will be the better for you all. You won't get your money back again, Sir Felix, and it is much better to leave me alone than to make a foe of me. Good-afternoon, or I may rather say evening, for it is that time now. Drive on, Samuel."

Samuel did drive on, having quite satisfied himself that the highwayman was willing for him to do so; and then Claude returned laughing to his two companions, with the purse and the watch in his hand.

"What booty?" said Dick.

"Oh, pretty good, I should say. There ought to be something handsome in this purse, by its feel; but after the manner in which we were taken in a little time ago, I am always suspicious of chancing hasty conclusions."

"Look at it, then."

Claude emptied some of the contents of the purse into his hand, and even by the fading light of evening, he was satisfied that they were real golden guineas that lay glittering before him.

"All's right. This is no take-in, Jack. I don't think you have a watch, just now, have you?"

"Not I," said Jack. "The one I had didn't go very well, and I tossed it into a tree, where it hung by the chain and seals enough to puzzle a conjurer, from a distance, to know what it was. Do you mean to make me a present of one, Claude?"

"Yes, of this one that I have just had handed to me, if you will accept of it, friend Jack."

"Certainly. All's fish that comes to the net; so I'll keep it till I get a good offer for it; or it gets some stray knock that at once disorders its inside, and prevents it going as it ought to do, and then, ten to one, but I throw it away."

"You should sell it," said Dick. "You will always find a customer for a watch among the fences in London."

"But that is throwing it away, Dick, with the additional mortification of knowing that it is picked up by a rascal. So I decline that mode of getting rid of it except in dire extremity. What's that, Claude, that lies on the ground just where the chaise stood?"

"It looks like a white handkerchief."

"And it is one, too," said Dick.

"Perhaps it means something," added Jack. "I'll pick it up."

He rapidly dismounted, and picking up the handkerchief, which was wrapped up rather carefully, a folded paper dropped from it to the ground. Jack picked up that likewise, and cried out—

"Here's a billet, I'll be bound for Claude, written by the young lady on the spur of the moment, while he was robbing her husband. Read it, Claude, and tell us what it is all about."

"Read it yourself, Jack, as you have it."

"Very good. There is just light enough, I think. No, hang it if there is, though, or else my eyes are bad. The letters run into one another in rather a confusing way."

Both Dick and Claude tried, by the dim light, to read what was on the paper, but could not, and Jack had to light a little match for the purpose of reading it; and so by holding it up and down the paper, Jack managed to read aloud the following words—

"These lines are addressed to any man of humanity who may chance to read them. I am a young girl, not quite nineteen years of age; and my mother has forced me to become the wife of Sir Felix Brown, whom I abhor. I resisted until she swore to me that she had committed a criminal offence that Sir Felix only knew of; and that if I would not marry him, she would be dragged to a prison —perhaps, to a scaffold; but when the ceremony was over, she tauntingly told me that that was all a delusion, merely got up for my own good, as Sir Felix was very rich, and would support us both in splendour at Lime Grove, his estate, near to Southal. I write this in the little bed-room of an inn, where they are baiting the horses; and I implore whoever finds this paper, to send it or take it to Cornet Tarlton, at the Barracks at Knightsbridge; and tell him that I yet hope he will come to rescue me from a fate worse than death itself! Oh, have pity upon the unhappy Cora!"

After this rather singular communitation had been read, our three friends looked at each other with some surprise, as well they might; for the extremity in the fortunes of the young girl who signed herself Cora must have been serious, indeed, when her only hope was to throw herself in such a way upon the charity and good feeling of strangers.

CHAPTER CCXVIII.

DETAILS SOME PROCEEDINGS AT LIME GROVE.—THE RESCUE.

Claude broke the silence, by saying to them both—

"What is your opinion of this affair? Is it one of those things that are likely to give us either profit or satisfaction in the following up? The billet has a genuine air about it."

"Of that there can be no possible doubt," said Dick. "It is quite genuine, and, for my part, I do not for a moment doubt anything of its statements."

"Nor I," said Jack.

"Well, then, if that is the case," responded Claude with a smile, "what do you say to a trot to Lime Grove?"

"Agreed!" they both cried.

"Yes," added Claude, "we will go; but there is no reason on earth why we should neglect business upon the road; so if we do meet with any chances, I vote against throwing them away by any means."

"And so do I," said Dick. "We can easily enough, in our pleasant professional pursuit, combine business with pleasure; and while we choose to play the knight-errant, in the way of succouring beauty and virtue in distress, I have no sort of objection to empty as many pockets as possible."

"Well spoken, Dick. Come on."

Claude had taken the billet of the enforced bride from the hands of Jack, and he took good care to place it in a secure pocket, for he did not know how useful it might chance to be to him when they should arrive at Lime Grove, which they did not anticipate the slightest difficulty in reaching.

The ride that they now took was a very pleasant—indeed, one may say a delightful one. It was through a prettily diversified country; and as the moon rose—it was but a young moon—a faint and gentle silvery radiance seemed to fill the air, as though some gauze-like vapour, spangled with stars, were floating between heaven and earth.

In the distance they began to see the twinkling lights of Southal, and Claude pointed them out to his friends, saying—

"This is Southal, and a pleasant village enough you will find it, take it for all in all."

"Not a doubt of it," said Dick. "I know it pretty well, and have passed a pleasant enough hour at the George Inn there. Why, we shall be there in the course of ten minutes, now."

"Yes, we have made quick work of it, I rather think; but hark! I hear a horse's footstep. Let us draw off to the side of the road, and reconnoitre a little. It is just possible that the kind fates are about to throw something in our way before we get to Lime Grove, where we have to do what we can for the disconsolate Cora."

They all three moved off to the side of the road, and in a few seconds they heard some one muttering to himself as he rode on. The moonlight was not sufficiently powerful to enable our adventurers to see very clearly the person; but by the general appearance, it was evidently some one who basked in the beams of sunny fortune. The horse, too, from its shape and action, could not possibly be mistaken for other than a good one, so that, taking those circumstances into account, Claude thought that it would quite, in a manner of speaking, be flying in the face of Providence if he did not take some notice of the passing passenger. He accordingly rode out from the deep shadow of the trees on the road side, leaving Dick and Jack still concealed; and crossing the path of the horseman, he said—

"Good evening, sir."

The stranger stopped instantly.

"Good evening," repeated Claude.

"I don't know you, sir," said the horseman, in not the most courteous tones.

"Perhaps you will be so good as to say who you are, sir, for I cannot recognise you by your voice."

"Oh, I am an old friend, and was coming to call upon you."

"Indeed, sir?"

"Yes, to be sure. I want to borrow a trifle of you; and as it might be very inconvenient to name a sum, perhaps it will be as well if I say at once that what you happen to have about you will do very well, without further trouble."

"Perhaps, sir," said the stranger, "I am to conclude that you are a highwayman, then?"

"If you please."

"Take that, then, and a good riddance to society you will be. I am very glad I met with you."

With these words, the stranger, in the most off-handed manner possible, fired a a pistol right into Claude's face, and the bullet actually tore the lower part of his ear. At the moment he was so astonished at this sudden assault, that he sat like a rock upon his horse, and he was only roused by Dick and Jack suddenly rushing up to the spot, and knocking the man off his horse to the ground.

They made sure that he had killed Duval, so that the blow with which they knocked him down was not the most gentle one in all the world, and he lay quite still upon the ground. Dick then cried out to Claude—

"Hilloa, Duval! Are you hurt?"

"Speak, Claude, speak!" said Jack, "I shall think you are mortally wounded, if you don't."

"Oh, it's all right enough," said Claude. "Confound the fellow, I believe he has taken away a bit of my left ear; which is rather an awkward thing, as if the officers only get hold of the fact, they will describe me by it to a certainty. I hadn't the least idea that he was going to blaze away in that style."

"Nor we—nor we; but when we saw the flash of the pistol, we saw that mischief was intended.

"Hold my horse, Jack, while I dismount and see how he is; I hope he ain't much hurt; for, after all, you know, it was quite fair, and he was right enough."

"It might be right enough for him, Claude," said Jack, as he held the horse; "but it was anything but right enough for you. Upon my word, you take these things so very easy, that one would think you have a charmed life, and know the fact well."

"I do sometimes think, Jack, that such is the case. You know I am something of a fatalist, and go so far, at times, in my belief, as to fancy that when a bullet comes out of the barrel of a pistol, it has a certain person to hit or no one to hit; so it's no use getting out of the way,"

Claude dismounted and stooped over the insensible form of the man, and then he said—

"By all that's uncomfortable, I do think he is dead!"

"Dead!" cried Jack and Dick.

"Yes. He looks so. Let us take him to some house. Ah, we shall see him better now, for the moon is peeping out again. There it comes. All's right. What's this he has got on?"

"A red waistcoat," said Dick.

"And what's this?" said Claude, as he took something from the pocket of the waistcoat and held it up.

"Why, it's an officer's staff. The fellow is a constable, after all, and that accounts for his being so uncommonly handy with his pistols."

"It does. I thought no ordinary person would be so well prepared with fire-arms, and so prompt in the use of them; but a thought strikes me, Jack, and you, Dick, which I think is a happy one."

"What is it, Dick?"

"Suppose I put on this fellow's red waistcoat, and take this little gilt staff in my pocket, and then we can all three go to the residence of this Sir Felix, of whom we are in search, and pass ourselves off for officers, giving him a sham account of how there is to be an attack made upon his house to-night by housebreakers, and so getting possession of the premises, and effectually protecting the young girl, who has been forced into a marriage so very much against her inclination. What say you?"

"Agreed," said Dick.

"And it's a good plan," said Jack. "But what shall we do with this man, or his body, if he be dead?"

"He is not dead."

"Not dead? I am glad of that."

"No, he is not dead. I have had my hand upon his heart for the last five minutes, and there is plenty of life in him yet. He is only stunned, and the longer he remains so the better it will be for us, you know. Suppose we take him to some road-side cottage, and leave him there for safety? for the poor devil will get ridden over in the road-way, here, and if we put him in the hedge, it won't do him much good. Where's his horse, Jack?"

"Oh, that started off London-way some time ago."

"Come on, then. I will place him upon mine till we come to a place of safety for him, and there we will leave him."

They took away the red waistcoat from the officer, and the staff, and then buttoning his coat closely round him, they laid him on Claude's horse, and went in search of some little inn or cottage at which they might leave him, and where he might get, at all events, the little attention that his case required. They were not many minutes in finding a cottage, and then after a little debate among themselves, they thought the best way was not to disturb the people if they could help it, but to prop him up against the door of it, and leave them to find him out.

This was an idea that they lost no time in carrying out. Claude took the officer by the head, and Jack took him by the legs, and so they, between them, very quietly placed him against the door of a cottage, within which they could hear the people talking, but to whom they gave no sort of disturbance by this proceeding.

When they had all mounted again, Jack said—

"I suppose, Claude, you have no objection to the people being let known that some one is at the door?"

"Not in the least, if you can do it, Jack, without our being delayed by getting into any talk or altercation with them about it—That is all that I wish to avoid."

"Oh," said Jack, "I have provided myself with a means of accomplishing all that, I think."

Jack had picked up from the ground a good sized, round pebble; and being a tolerable marksman with a stone, he threw it right through one of the little diamond-shaped panes of glass in the cottage window.

"Let us see if any one comes out," said Dick.

They all paused a moment or two, and then they saw the door of the cottage opened suddenly, and a woman rushed out with such precipitation, no doubt to try and catch the individual who had thrown the stone, that over she went into the road-way over the insensible officer.

"That will do," said Claude.

"Yes," said Jack, "but she will rouse the whole parish, if she goes on bellowing in that sort of way. Confound her! what on earth does she mean by it?"

"Only that she will call herself hoarse in a few moments," said Claude. "Come on, Jack. You cannot stop a woman's tongue; you ought by this time to know that well enough, and that it is of no use your trying so to do."

"Why, Claude," said Dick, with a laugh, "surely that is a singularly ungallant speech for you to make; I thought that you were the greatest possible favourite with the ladies."

"And so I am," replied Claude, "but it is not by praising them for virtues they don't possess. It is by telling them their faults, and then showing them that I love them in spite of all those faults. Then they know I am sincere."

"I am answered, Claude."

They all trotted away, and soon left the cottage and the insensible officer behind them; and the shouts of the woman who had tumbled over him upon the little door-step, likewise faded away from their hearing. Claude put on the red waistcoat of the officer. Our readers are well aware, no doubt, that in old times—indeed in not very old times—the red waistcoat was the distinguishing mark of the Bow-street officer, or runner, as he was then called.

From their peculiarity in that respect, they got the sobriquet of Robin Redbreast; and if a thief only saw the tip of a red waistcoat, he knew his danger directly. The officers of the present day are a little more scientific, and do not carry about with them such an insignia of their profession, to warn evil-doers not to leave off being evil-doers, but get out of the way of the consequences.

"Now for Lime Grove," said Claude; "and as we, none of us, know where it is, we had better trot right into Southal, and ask the first person we meet for the place."

They accordingly trotted on at a good pace, and were soon in the village. The next morning was market morning, so that amid other sounds in the village there was a plentiful assortment of noises, incidental to turkeys, geese, pigs, sheep, and other creatures of the farm. Our friends drew rein at the door of the Old George Inn; and having indulged themselves with a glass of something strong each, Claude asked the landlord which was Lime Grove.

"Oh, sir, it ain't to say exactly in Southal, but about a quarter of a mile on the London road. You will know it in a moment by a large iron gate, and an avenue of trees, and there's a sheet of water close by it."

Claude had noticed this place as they came along without at all suspecting that it was that of which they were in search; but he was better pleased that it should be out of the village than in it, and they turned their horses' heads again in the direction whence they had come.

"There it is," said Claude. "There's the iron gates, and there's the water, don't you see it?"

"Yes," said Dick, "and a goodly place it looks. After all, I think our friend, Miss Cora, might get a worse home."

"There is no worse home in all the world," said Jack, "than the home you don't love."

CHAPTER CCXIX.

SIR FELIX FINDS HIS NEW FRIENDS VERY TROUBLESOME.

Lime Grove was rather a considerable estate to all appearance, and the iron gates which stood at its entrance were rare specimens of the ancient art of casting in metals. They were supported by stone buttresses of great strength and solidity, and beyond these, sure enough, was the avenue of lime-trees.

Those limes looked extremely beautiful by the moon-beams that were just gently silvering the edges of the leaves, while the slight night-breeze that was up was just sufficient to give them a stirring motion and to break up the moonlight into silvery particles.

It was a beautiful scene.

By the right hand side of the large iron gates, there was a pretty picturesque lodge, and a light shining from one of its windows showed that some one occupied it.

"I suppose," whispered Jack to Claude, "it won't do to gallop right on if we could even open the gates? It will be best to speak to the people at the lodge first?"

"Oh, yes," said Claude. "Let us do everything quite regular—as we are officers, you know."

"Oh, oh! yes, to be sure."

"Hilloa—lodge! lodge!" cried Claude.

A man made his appearance, with a lantern, in the course of a couple of minutes.

"What is it?" he said.

"Is Sir Felix within?"

"Yes, sir, he is within; but I think he is rather busy, if you please, sir. Perhaps you don't know, sir, that he has been married to-day; and so you see, sir, perhaps you will call again?"

This speech of the lodge-porter was so far satisfactory, that it quite put at rest any doubts, however slight, that Claude and his friends might have regarding their being at the right place, and Claude made answer at once—

"If he were even so busy, our business with him is of a nature that he will not be very well pleased to have delayed. I am an officer of police, and so are these two gentlemen. We have ridden from London on purpose to see Sir Felix, on a matter of the very greatest importance to him and to all of you."

The lodge-keeper looked rather aghast at this news, for Claude spoke in a solemn and earnest tone, so as to induce in him a firm belief that it was a matter of the greatest importance upon which he came.

"Oh, Lord!" said the man, "it isn't any danger, is it?"

"Yes,—serious danger."

"You don't mean to say so, sir? I'll run up to the house and see if master will speak to you, sir."

"Open the gates. We will walk inside."

"Oh, yes, of course. It's all right to officers; and now I look at you, sir, I see your red waistcoat."

"Yes, my friend; and you may be still further convinced by this. You recognise this little emblem of authority, no doubt?"

As he spoke, Claude produced the little staff with the gilt crown at the end of it; and if the porter at the lodge of Lime Grove had had the smallest lingering doubt respecting the character of the guests, it was thus removed. He opened the gates, saying,—

"Come in—come in, gentlemen. You had better ride up with me to the house at once. Wife—wife!"

"Yes, Joseph?"

"Look to the gate."

"I would advise you, my friend," said Claude, "to lock the gate and give me the key. The fact is, that if we had not ridden down here to-night, you would all have been brutally murdered before the morning."

"Murdered?"

"Yes; but do not alarm yourself. We intend to stay here all the night, and to take care of the premises."

"Oh! do, do. Gracious Providence! Murdered! There's the key of the great gate, Mr. Officer. Wife—wife!"

"Well, Joseph?"

"Hide the spoons and the babby, directly. There's thieves and murderers a-coming. I'm only going up to the house with these three gentlemen I will be back directly."

"Where shall we put our horses?" said Claude.

"Why, gentlemen, the fact is that Sir Felix don't keep up a stable on the premises, though there's lots of stalls and room. He only keeps a couple of hacks for his carriage, and the landlord of the Blue Lion in the village contracts to keep them for him."

"Never mind; here, we'll put up our horses ourselves, if you will show us the stables, at once."

"Oh, dear yes, gentlemen, and it will be best to go there first. There's plenty of hay, for last year's stacks all stand close to the stables, you see, gentlemen, so you can pull down as much as you like."

"That will do—that will do."

It was quite clear that nothing now was so delightful to the feelings of Joseph as the idea that the three officers, as he fully believed our three friends to be, should stay all night, and the fact of their putting up their horses in the neglected stables was a strong supposition in favour of such a result, and quite delightful accordingly.

As Joseph said, there was plenty of stable accommodation, although the parsimony of Sir Felix prevented it from being used on his own estate; and the contiguity of the hay-stacks enabled Claude and his friends to get not only plenty of bedding for the horses, but plenty of sweet food.

"That will do," said Claude; "and now, Joseph, you will be so good as to take us at once to your master."

"Oh, yes, gentlemen, certainly, and very happy he ought to be to see you, and very much obliged indeed to think how you came all the way from London to save our lives. I just tell you, sir, that the wine in the cellar here is good, cos you see, Sir Felix pretends that it ain't, and he says 'that the wine is going to be changed, so that I can't offer you any of it. My wine-merchant has made a mistake, and sent the wrong stuff;' and then he will offer you some capital stout, as he says; but Lord bless you, it's only small beer, and oh! so small."

"Thank you, Joseph, for the hint."

Claude and his friends could hardly suppress their laughter at this character which Joseph gave of his penurious old master; but they thought it better to keep up a becoming gravity, and having reached the house, Joseph called to the only servant that was in it, and who was a venerable old woman, to open the door.

"And what for, Master Joseph?" she cried. "And what for is the hall door to be opened?"

"Here are some gentlemen for Sir Felix."

"Indeed! Just ask them if they have had their supper then, for they will get nothing here, I can tell them."

"Open the door directly, Emily. How can you keep these gentlemen waiting in this kind of way?"

Thus urged Emily, who was about seventy years of age, and had not a tooth in her head, and was nearly bent double with infirmities, made her appearance, with a miserable rushlight in her hand, and opened the hall door.

"Ha! ha!" said the old woman, "visitors to Lime Grove? Well, well, wonders will never cease, as King Solomon said; and the more you live the more you learn. Dear me—dear me. The idea of the old idiot bringing home a wife."

"Ah, Emily—Emily, you should not call master an old idiot, though he is, to be sure."

"You hold your tongue, Joseph. I suppose these are some fine friends of young madam, the new wife. Oh, dear, yes, old Emily wouldn't do to look after the house, but a wife must be brought. Oh, I only hope she will be choked, that's all."

"How kind," said Claude; "why, Emily, you are about as amiable as you are ugly, I do think."

This remark put the old woman into such a rage, that she was half strangled with caughing, and was forced to take herself off into the domestic regions of the house, to try and recover from the effects of this sudden ebullition of anger.

"It's a very good thing, gentlemen," said Joseph, "that you have got rid of her, for she would have worried you to death in a little while, if you hadn't, that she would. Just step into this room, and I will go and tell Sir Felix that you are here."

All this time Joseph had carried his lantern with him, and now he lit a solitary candle, that was upon the chimney-piece of the really handsome reception room, into which he ushered the mock officers, and left them to consider about what they would say to Sir Felix, when they should see him, as they doubted not doing in a very few minutes.

"You be spokesman, Claude," said Jack; "you can keep your countenance somehow much better than either Dick or I can."

"Oh," said Dick, "I am the worst in the world to do that."

"And I not the best," said Jack.

"Well, then, I'll do the speaking," said Claude, "but, of course, you will both of you take what opportunities occur of confirming what I may happen to say to the old man."

"Oh, yes—yes."

Joseph opened the door of the room, and in a loud voice announced his master, and then the old man came into the room all of a shake, partly from fear and partly from anger.

"What is this?—what is all this?" he said. "I don't want visitors—I don't see company. What's it all about? Go away—go away. It is some mistake. I am busy—quite occupied! What do you want here, I say? Why don't you speak?"

"Ah, sir, you won't let 'em," said Joseph. "Why, sir, you have all the talk to yourself, and the gentlemen can't get in one word even edgeways, sir. You hold your tongue, and then they will tell you all about it, and make your hair stand on end, sir."

"How dare you, you rascal, speak to me in that way? You villanous rascal, how dare you, I should like to know? Get out of my sight directly, Joseph. You get fat—fat, sir, upon my substance. My servants ruin me, with one extravagance and another; and oh, oh! I now and then only for a few moments forget how I have been robbed on the road! Oh, dear—oh, dear, forty guineas, at the least. Oh—oh—oh!"

Sir Felix was so overcome by the recollection of his encounter with Claude on the road, that he felt ready to faint, and was compelled to sit down to recover himself; but he soon got up again, and in a loud cracked voice, he cried—

"Go away—go away. I don't want any company. No company comes here. We are all poor. There is nothing to eat and nothing to drink. Good night! Joseph, show the gentlemen out."

"No—no, sir!"

"No? Do you say no to me, you villain?"

"Yes I do, sir. You hear the gentlemen."

"Sir Felix," said Claude, stepping forward, "I and my two friends are quite willing to go, if you wish it. We have ridden down here from London at no small inconvenience, expressly for the purpose of protecting you and your property. We are police officers. There is my staff."

"And there's his red waistcoat," said Joseph.

"The magistracy of London," continued Claude, "have become aware of a plot for the purpose of robbing your house to-night, and murdering you and all within it. We are sent down expressly to defend you and your property. There is one notorious rascal, who, on the highway, often wears a crape mask——"

"Oh, I know him—I know him!" cried Sir Felix. "He is in this neighbourhood. He robbed me, only two hours ago, on the high-road. A most notable rascal he is."

"In the neighbourhood already, is he?" said Claude, in affected amazement. "Joseph, make all the doors and windows fast. Comrades, look to your pistols. He has two companions with him who are very nearly as bad as he is."

As he spoke, Claude pulled a pistol from his pocket, and made quite a parade of shaking the powder in the pan, and of putting it otherwise ready for action.

Both Dick and Jack followed his example, and at these manifestations of sincerity, poor Sir Felix began to show the most unequivocal symptoms of alarm.

"Oh, dear," he said, "you don't mean really to say that there is any real serious danger, gentlemen?"

"A little," said Claude; "but it is just possible that when the villains find they have to fight the affair out with us, that they will retire, after the exchange of a shot or two."

"A shot or two?"

"Certainly. You may depend that anger at their disappointment, if no other feeling, will induce them to do all the mischief that they possibly can. I repeat to you, that their deliberate intention is to rob the house, and to murder all that they find within it. Of course, it is our duty to risk our lives in your defence, however harshly you may be disposed to treat us; and we cannot help thinking, Sir Felix, that when men ride twelve or fourteen miles, to save your life, they are entitled, at your hands, to some little consideration."

"Oh, dear yes, of course—of course."

"I am glad to see, sir, that you begin to appreciate our services in some manner. This is your house, and we will go from it directly if you, now that you know who and what we are, choose to wish us to do so. We are too much in the habit of respecting the law not to know and feel that a man's house is his castle, and that he may order anybody out of it that he pleases."

"Oh, dear—dear, don't go on any account! I didn't mean what I said—indeed I did not! Oh, pray stay, I beg of you! Make yourselves quite comfortable, do! I am thankful you have come!"

CHAPTER CCXX.

A PLEASANT EVENING AT LIME GROVE.—THE YOUNG OFFICER.

It was now quite clear that poor Sir Felix was most thoroughly impressed with a notion of the danger he was running, and that he would not have had those whom he called his protectors go from the house on any account.

"Very good, sir," said Claude, "of course we shall stay with very great pleasure. I don't think that you need now much alarm yourself; but, at all events, we will not leave you until we are able to assure you that the danger is over."

"Thank you—thank you! Oh, I am very much obliged, indeed. It would have been a most shocking thing; for do you know, gentleman"—here Sir Felix lowered his voice—"I was only married to-day. Yes, I was, indeed."

"Married?"

"Yes, to be sure. It's only my fourth wife; and why not, I should like to know?"

"There is no reason on earth against it, sir. I am very much surprised, though, at your talking of a fourth wife. You could hardly have had time, Sir Felix, to contract four matrimonial alliances, for really to look at you, no one would at all suspect you to be more than about nine and forty."

"You don't say so, sir?"

"Indeed I do, and I think it likewise."

Old Sir Felix quite smiled at this compliment, and for a few moments forgot the danger with which he was threatened. It was quite evident that from that moment Claude was quite a special favourite with him. Perhaps at that juncture the personal vanity of the old man was more open to flattery than at any other.

"Pray walk this way, gentlemen," he said. "This way, if you please, and I will introduce you to my—Oh!"

The poor reluctant bride's mother at this moment opened the door of the apartment so abruptly, that Sir Felix got a smart rap upon the nose from one of its panels.

"What is all this, Sir Felix?" she said. "I hope you are not being imposed upon?"

"Oh, dear—oh, dear! My nose—my nose!"

"Your nose, Sir Felix, is of the smallest possible consequence; what I want to know is, if these persons are imposing upon you in any way? Pray, sir,"—to Claude—"who may you be?"

"I don't know, madam," said Claude, "what I may be—that is a secret of destiny; but I am a Bow-street officer, and I came here on business."

"Oh, gracious!"

"And," continued Claude, "as I have explained that business to the master of the house, I presume I have done all that is sufficient."

"Indeed, sir, I will beg you then to observe, that I consider myself to be the mistress of the house."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, indeed, Mr. Impudence."

"Oh, don't—don't!" said Sir Felix. "This, gentlemen, is my young wife's mother, you see; and—and so she is going to live here just to keep things in order a little, that is all, gentlemen. She is a very good woman in her way, and remarkably quiet, I assure you, gentlemen. My dear, Mrs. White, I beg you will allow these gentlemen to stay, for if you don't, I believe we are all to have our throats cut this very night."

CLAUDE SURPRISES THE OFFICIOUS COUNTRYMAN NEAR GUILDFORD.

"Our throats—cut?"

"Yes, my dear Mrs. White, or our brains blown out, which, to us, you know my dear madam, would be much the same thing. These Bow-street office have come down from London on purpose to protect us from being murdered.

"Oh, my poor heart! Oh—oh!"

"The mother-in-law showed symptoms of fainting; but as nobody seemed inclined to pay any attention to her, or to fly to her aid, she thought better of it, and didn't faint at all.

"Can this be possible?" she said. "Oh, are you quite sure, Sir Felix, that it is not a horrid take-in?"

"If Sir Felix has any suspicions of that nature," said Claude, with well-acted indignation, "we will leave the house at once; and probably, now that you are all upon your guard against the attack that will certainly be made upon you, you will be able, without our assistance, to protect yourselves against it. I can say for myself, and I am sure I may likewise say for my two comrades, that we are quite glad to be allowed to go."

"Certainly," said Dick; "all that we shall then ask of Sir Felix is a note of dismissal, signed by him, so that whatever happens, the blame will not rest upon our heads."

"Oh, come along," said Jack. "Come away at once. We can take oath as to the mode in which our services were dispensed with."

"Oh, no—no!" cried Sir Felix. "Don't go, and by all means don't mind one word that this stupid old woman says. I am going to get rid of her as soon as possible, I assure you, gentlemen. She is only my young wife's mother, that's all, and I can't bear the sight of her. Don't think of going on her account, gentlemen, I beg of you. I will make you quite welcome to everything the house may contain."

"Oh, you old wretch!" cried the lady.

"Old? old? How dare you call me old?"

"Allow me to beg that there may be no quarrelling," said Claude. "Really no one can tell but that we may be all in another world before the morning; and as regards the word 'old,' I am sure it will be many years before either of you need trouble yourselves about it. This lady cannot be above forty."

"Oh, sir," said the mother-in-law, who had just passed her sixtieth birthday, "oh, sir, upon my word you are really a—quite—gallant. I own I am forty-five—indeed, I am. Now don't be contradicting me. I am forty-five."

"Oh, dear!" said Sir Felix, lifting up his hands. "She owns to forty-five, does she? What an admission!"

"Pray step this way, gentlemen. We will at least try to make you as comfortable as we can, while you oblige us by staying in the house. It's a great favour of you to come all the way from London to protect us—indeed it is. Of course, as a sensitive female, I feel naturally timid; and if wretches of housebreakers were to get into the house, who shall say what they might do?"

"Ah, who, indeed?" said Jack.

Peace being thus happily restored between Sir Felix and the mother-in-law, the whole party adjourned to a room, in which there was a fire, and where, with her face buried in her hands, sat the young bride, poor sacrificed Cora.

"My dear," said her mother, "here are some police-officers come to watch the house, for they say that some thieves were going to break into it to-night, and murder us all."

"Happy death!" said Cora.

"What does she say?" cried Sir Felix, sharply, "what does she say? I am sure she said something."

"It's of no consequence, my dear sir," said the mother. "It's not of the slightest consequence, I assure you, sir."

"I promised," said Claude, aside to Sir Felix—"I promised to let a magistrate, as far off as Ealing, know of our arrival here, Sir Felix. Will you allow your servant at the lodge to ride as far as there with the message from me? otherwise one of us will have to go, and the effect of that, of course, would be rather to weaken our strength here in the house."

"Oh, yes—yes," said Sir Felix, "Joseph will go. He will go at once. Joseph is the man. Don't either of you stir, gentlemen, by no means, Oh, dear, no—no. Joseph will go. Ring the bell, Mrs. White, for Joseph."

Joseph was duly summoned, and Sir Felix gave him orders to go when he should be directed; so that Claude had that sagacious-serving man quite at his disposal. He put a couple of guineas into Joseph's hands when he got outside the room door with him, and then he said—

"Joseph, get me some sealing-wax and a candle."

The couple of guineas acted like some potent charm upon the spirits of Joseph, and the sealing-wax and the candle were both quickly produced. Claude enclosed the letter from Cora, that had been picked up in the road, in an envelope, in the inside of which he wrote the following words:—

"Cornet Tarlton is advised to come at once to Lime Grove, and take Cora away with him. He will find friends there who will assist him, and Cornet Tarlton is warned to place no reliance upon any odd story the bearer of this may tell him."

"Now, Joseph," said Claude, "you will get the best horse you can in the village, and ride to the barracks at Knightsbridge, close to Hyde Park. There you will ask for Cornet Tarlton, and give him this paper, and when you come back, another couple of guineas will be waiting for you, Joseph. Do you understand?"

"Lor, yes, sir. That's as clear as clear can be."

"Very good; now be off, Joseph, as quickly as you possibly can. Don't risk your neck by any outrageous speed, but go as quickly as may be convenient to you, sir."

"I will, sir—I will."

Claude retired to the sitting-room, and the moment he seated himself, Sir Felix said—

"It would give me, do you know, gentlemen, such pleasure to offer you a glass of wine; but the fact is, my wine merchant has made a mistake, and sent in the wrong article, so that it has to go back and be changed, you understand; but I have some capital stout in the house, if you can manage a little of that, gentlemen."

"The wine is sour, I presume?" said Claude.

"Oh, quite—quite."

"Well, do you know I am glad to hear that; for although you may think it a very odd and vitiated taste, yet I prefer a glsss of sour wine to anything else."

"And so do I," said Dick.

"And so do I," said Jack.

"You really don't mean it, gentlemen?" said Sir Felix, looking dreadfully alarmed. "You don't mean that you like scur wine?"

"Yes, we do. So I beg of you to get up a bottle or two of it at once for us. We shall be quite delighted with it, I assure you. Sour wine is just the thing for us."

Poor Sir Felix, who kept always the key of his own cellar, was upon this compelled to go for the wine; but such a fear had got possession of him concerning the probable attack upon the house, that he begged Claude to go with him, upon which both Jack and Dick likewise started up, crying—

"We will all go, for it would be a thousand pities for you, Sir Felix, to be cut off in your prime."

Sir Felix carried the light, and they all went into the cellar together. The old man picked one bottle out of a rack; and then, with a sigh, he said—

"This will be enough, I dare say, gentlemen, for I do think it will give you the stomach-ache."

"Oh, yes, quite enough," said Dick and Jack; and while his back was turned, they each possessed themselves of a couple of bottles of wine, and Claude did the same.

The amazement and vexation of Sir Felix when he found that no less than seven bottles of wine was placed upon the table in the sitting room, was perfectly ludicrous. He groaned again, but he could not help himself, as it would not exactly have done to send the wine back again.

A couple of the bottles were speedily opened, and as Claude had been informed by Joseph, the quality was found to be excellent; but they all three declared that it was sour, very sour, indeed, but yet that they liked it; and poor Sir Felix kept drinking away at it in order that while it was going in such a dreadful manner he might have as much as possible of it himself.

Mrs. White, too, was by no means behind-hand in taking her full share of the rare old wine, which had been in the cellar for many a long year, and was of first rate quality.

CHAPTER CCXXI.

CLAUDE TELLS A GOOD STORY—AND THE CORNET ARRIVES.

The evening wore on in this way very pleasantly indeed, and Sir Felix was really so pleased that he almost forgot that his wine was going at a great rate down the throats of his guests. He even had the temerity to offer a toast or two, to tell an anecdote of how, when he was in the yeomanry once, many years ago, he had fallen off his horse; and how the Colonel said:—"Hilloa! there's one dead man," and how he, Sir Felix, said, as he got up again, "Not yet, Colonel."

This was not a very brilliant joke, but the old man told it as if he thought it one of the most exquisite that could be imagined, and Claude laughed at it immoderately.

The old lady, however, was certainly not at all pleased. She was on the fidget the whole time, and although Dick plied her with wine it did not seem in the least to ameliorate her condition; for if it had been really as sour as old Sir Felix had pretended it was, it could not possibly have made Mrs. White more cross than she became.

"I really don't see any danger, Sir Felix," she said, "and I do think that we are detaining these gentlemen quite unnecessarily at this time of the evening."

"Oh, don't mention that, madam," said Claude. "The pleasure of your's and Sir Felix's society is ample recompense for anything of that sort; and if Sir Felix has no objection, I will just recount to you a little anecdote that happened to me once when I was in pursuit of a celebrated character."

"Pray who was it, sir?" said Mrs. White. "I hope it was no improper character, sir, as I am present?"

"Oh, dear, no. It was only Claude Duval the highwayman."

"And do you call him a proper character, sir?"

"At last, madam, I am not aware that there is anything in the career of Claude Duval that should be particularly bad for a lady to hear; and if Sir Felix pleases, I will tell the story."

"Oh, dear, yes, by all means. Let us hear it."

"Very good, sir. It happened thus:—Claude Duval, sir, probably feeling that some events in his life were not just what a very strict moralists would approve of, determined now and then to try and do some good; and feeling quite confident that a good deal of villany was going on against the fairest and best portion of creation—of course I allude to lovely woman."

Here Claude bowed to Mrs. White, who looked rather gratified at a compliment, the like of which she had not met with for the last thirty years.

"Being, as I say, convinced that the fair sex were very much imposed upon, he resolved to do them all the good he could; so, you see, Sir Felix, as he was going along the road one day—"

"But my good sir," said Sir Felix, "this story seems to be about Claude Duval and not about you."

"Exactly, sir. That's the beauty of it. But you will soon see how I shall come in at the end of it."

"Oh, very well—very well. Pray excuse me for interrupting you. I daresay it is a capital story."

"You may depend upon that, sir," said Dick; "and I can answer for it, it won't be one word too long."

"Not one," said Claude. "And so, as I was saying, Claude Duval, you see, was very much averse to any young girl being sacrificed in consequence of the cupidity of her relations to any old rascal, whose sole recommendation might be that he had plenty of money."

"Oh!" said Sir Felix.

"Humph!" said Mrs. White.

"And so one day as he was going along the road, he found a piece of folded paper, which stated that a young lady had been cajoled into matrimony by her mother to an old man, quite old enough to be her father; but she had a lover whom she wished to be informed of her situation; and she hoped that whoever found the note would forward it to him in the hope that he would arrive in time at the house of the old husband of a few hours, and rescue her from so dreadful a fate as remaining with him."

Sir Felix's young bride had retired to the next room; but as Claude spoke, he saw her shadow in the doorway, and he felt that she was listening to his recital.

"And what did the highwayman do, sir?" said Mrs. White, with a toss of her head.

"Why, he sent the young lady's note to the young officer, whom she wished most particularly should hear it."

"Thank God!" cried the young bride.

Mrs. White rose directly.

"What was that?" she cried. "Oh, what was that? Did you hear that, Sir Felix?"

"I—I heard something."

"It was me," said the young creature, coming timidly into the room. "It was me. I nearly fell over a chair, and I am sure I should have seriously hurt myself. Perhaps it was rather a trifle to thank God about that I escaped from the fall that I spoke."

"It's rather odd," said Mrs. White, with a thoughtful look. "It's very odd."

"Allow me, madam, to go on with the story," said Claude. "The fact is that the old husband, with the assistance of the poor girl's mother, had taken her to that home which, with all its advantages, would have been to her only a gilded cage; but Claude Duval, the highwayman, had forwarded the young lady's hurried appeal to her lover."

The young creature burst into tears, and Mrs. White got up from the table in a rage.

"I don't understand this," she said. "Sir Felix, I am rather an old stager, and I begin to suspect something wrong."

"An old stager are you, madam?" said Claude.

"Yes, sir; and I begin to smell a rat."

"Then I would strongly advise you to call the cat, madam, as the best possible means of catching it. I cannot understand what it is that alarms you. You are beginning to get quite red in the face, I assure you, madam."

"That's a melancholy truth," said Dick.

"Very," said Jack.

"How dare you remark upon my appearance, you low fellows? Sir Felix, if you are a man, rouse yourself, for I am very much afraid that something is amiss. I don't believe one word that these men say. It's all a delusion, Sir Felix—quite a delusion, sir; and I desire you to turn these people out of the lodge, sir."

"Well, but the thieves, Mrs. White! The thieves, you know. We don't want all our throats cut."

"I don't believe there is any danger, Sir Felix."

"Hark!" said Claude.

He held up his hand, and at the same moment the sound of horse's feet was heard upon the winding path that led up to the house. The horse that was approaching was evidently at a hard gallop, and the stop at the hall door was very sudden.

"Murder!" cried Sir Felix. "We shall be murdered!"

"Help! help!" said Mrs. White.

"Be under no alarm, let me beg of you," said Claude. "I will do what I said I would do, namely, protect you against all violence, let it come from whom it may. I am well armed, and so are my friends, and we never make a promise of protection without meaning to keep it, and taking care that we do keep it."

Mrs. White flew behind the chair of Sir Felix and looked rather alarmed, even through her rouge, and that had been rather liberally supplied to her countenance. She crouched down behind the chair, and was hidden completely from observation.

Poor Sir Felix looked the picture of bewildered dismay, and his young bride came from the inner room again, and held by the back of a chair for support, looking very pale and full of fright.

A hasty footstep sounded through the house, and was evidently approaching the door of the room, but it paused, as though the person to whom it belonged, being a stranger, did not feel quite certain of his way.

Jack went to the door and flung it open. Claude Duval had given him a hint to do so; and the gleam of light that went out into the corridor was a sufficient guide to the stranger. In the course of a few moments a singularly handsome-looking young man, in the regimentals of an officer, but splashed from head to foot by riding hard, strode into the room.

The moment the young bride observed him, she flew forward, and with a shriek of joy flung herself into his arms.

"Saved—saved!" she cried. "I am saved!"

"Gracious Heaven! what is the meaning of all this?" he cried. "Let me know what has happened! Are you the wife of another, dear one, or are you mine still? Oh, answer me."

"I am, and—and I am not," she sobbed.

Sir Felix turned of a purplish hue, and slid off his seat on to the floor of the room.

"You are, and you are not!" cried the young soldier. "Oh, why rack my brain by such words? Will no one take pity upon me and tell me what all this means? A man in hot haste rode into the barracks, and handed me a note. I am here in consequence, but yet I feel that I do not know all. Who will explain it to me?"

"I will," cried Claude Duval, stepping forward. "I will explain to you, sir, all that at present appears to you so inexplicable, and I hope and trust, satisfactorily to you."

"And who are you, sir?"

"That I don't think matters much. Suffice it to say that I was the means of sending to you the paper which has brought you here, and that I now give you an opportunity of action, which otherwise you could not have had possibly."

"Then I do not indeed ask you who you are, but know you as a friend. And now, dear one," added the young officer, addressing the bride, "will you fly with me from this place, or do you feel that you ought to remain in it?"

"With you—with you, to the world's end, if need be."

"I am content, then."

"But goodness gracious, sir," cried Sir Felix; "are you at all aware, sir, that that is my wife that you are hugging in that very affectionate kind of way?"

"Pho! pho! sir. Think yourself well off that I don't take some personal chastisement of you, sir."

"The best way," said Dick, "it there should be any cavil about the marriage that has taken place, would be to make the young lady a widow. Perhaps Sir Felix has no objection to fight it out."

"A capital thought," cried the young officer. "I will fight you immediately, sir, in any way you think proper."

"Oh—no—no!—Oh, dear no!"

"Then, perhaps," said Claude, "rather than fight, Sir Felix will give up all right and title to the hand of the young lady?"

"I will give up all right and title to a thousand young ladies," said Sir Felix, "rather than I would run into any personal danger. It is all very well for people to fight who have got nothing to lose; but I have a good estate, and every comfort about me, and that makes a vast difference."

"And a good cellar, too," said Duval.

The old man uttered a groan at the recollection of how his wine had gone down the throats of people who, after all, had come for his confusion, instead of for his protection, to the house; but Claude, seeing writing materials on a side table, at once drew up a short renunciation of all claims to the young lady on the part of Sir Felix, which he signed at once.

"There," he said, "take her, sir; I have done with her."

"It's the wisest thing you could do, Sir Felix," said Jack; "but where is Mrs. White? She ought to be something like a witness to this transaction. Where is she?"

"Ah, where is she?" said Dick. "Not here."

"Then she means mischief," said Claude, "and the sooner we now get away the better it will be for us, I am certain. We will leave directly, my friends."

"And so will I," said the young officer, "although I cannot see what you can have to dread from Mrs. White."

"I am sorry to say though," said Claude, "that I and my friends see it very well, and perhaps when we get outside this house I will tell you?"

"I can tell you now," said Sir Felix, pointing at Claude; "I can tell you at once, if he won't be angry at it."

"I don't want to know," said the officer. "If this gentleman and his friends have any secret to keep, it would be very ungenerous upon my part to seek to know it."

"Speak freely, Sir Felix," said Claude, "I don't care what you say. Who do you think I am?"

"I don't think at all about it," said the old knight; "but after all that has passed, now, I know that you are Claude Duval the highwayman, and you won't deny it."

"Claude Duval!" said the officer. "Is that possible?"

"Sir Felix says so," said Claude, "and I would advise you to believe him, sir. Do you think it quite out of the course of nature, that Claude Duval should do a kind action?"

"Oh, no, no!"

"Then do not be surprised at my name. It's probable enough that you have heard more bad than good of me; but when you hear me spoken of again, you can say, that even the worst persons have, now and then, a kindly feeling, even towards strangers; and so I will bid you good night."

"No, no," said the young lady; "we will not—we cannot part thus with him who has done us so much kindness."

The young officer took Claude's hand, and said,—

"Were you ten times a highwayman, you are my friend, and only say in what I can serve you."

At that moment, and before Claude could reply, there was heard a great noise in the hall, and Jack, who for the last few moments had been to the door to listen if any danger were at hand, said immediately,—

"It is Mrs. White, and she brings with her an armed force. We are in danger indeed, now."

Sir Felix, full of dread of the conflict that he fancied was about to ensue, crept under the table at once, and there hid himself, while Claude and his companions drew their pistols, and were resolved to defend themselves to the very last extremity.

CHAPTER CCXXII.

THE REFUGE AMONG THE PLAYERS.—CLAUDE'S DISGUISE.

Dick glanced around him, and pointing to the inner room, in which the young bride had remained for the greater part of the evening, said,—

"Where does that room lead to?"

"To a staircase," said the young lady, "but that is all I know of it. Oh, fly from here, and we will stop your pursuers."

"We will try it, at all events," said the officer, drawing his sword; "they shall not pass me without a fight for it."

"My good sir," said Claude, "let me beg of you not to draw down upon yourself mischief—it cannot help us; you had much better seem to be our foe, and yet in reality be our friend. Come on, Dick and Jack, and we'll soon find where the staircase leads to."

Claude snatched up a light from the table, and dashed into the adjoining room, followed by his two friends; and it was well that they did so so soon as they did, for hardly were their backs turned, and the door of communication between the two apartments closed and locked, which Claude had the presence of mind to do, than Mrs. White, with eight well-armed men belonging to the constabulary, rushed into the apartment so lately occupied by the three friends.

"Where are they? she cried, "where are the three wretches? Take them into custody at once, my good men; they are arrant thieves, I assure you. Knock them down, and if they resist ever so little, I advise you to shoot them. Oh, they are gone!"

"Quite gone, you see, madam," said the officer.

"Oh, you low, poor wretch! I know you well," cried Mrs. White; "you have not one penny piece to scrub upon another, except your pay, you know that well enough. How dare you interfere with me, sir, and my family arrangements?"

"You may make what family arrangements you like, madam," said the cornet, "so long as they only include yourself in their results and consequences; but I certainly object to your making arrangements that involve your daughter's happiness."

"You puppy!"

The officers who had come into the room along with Mrs. White paid not the remotest attention to the little family squabble that was going on, but with great tact and skill, they began to search the room for the parties they came to apprehend. After a little time, they espied poor Sir Felix under the table; and the principal officer seizing him by the leg, cried in a loud voice of exultation to his companions,—

"Here's one of them! here's one of them! I'll have him out in a minute—Come, come, let's have no resistance, sir! that's a sort of thing that won't do here."

With this, poor Sir Felix was dragged out so roughly that he was for the moment deprived of the power of speech; but the moment Mrs. White saw him, she screamed out,—

"Why, that is Sir Felix! That is the master of this house. Let him go instantly, you wretches!"

"The master of the house!" said the officer, who was much disappointed that he had caught nobody. "Why, what the deuce does he mean then, by hiding under his own table?"

"That's no business of yours," said Mrs. White, who guessed very well that was the fears of Sir Felix that had taken him to so ignoble a place of refuge, and was quite willing to come to his rescue. "You find the highwaymen; and if the officer, as he calls himself, who is as poor as Job, and as proud as Lucifer, don't be off directly, I will give you a guinea to turn him out of the house. Come away, you slut," addressing her daughter. "You know that you are Sir Felix's wife, and you have no sort of business to be in the arms of another man. Come away, this moment."

"But Sir Felix has given me up, mother."

"Oh, dear, yes," said Sir Felix, "I don't want to have my throat cut, or my brains blown out, for a little chit of a girl, not I. If there's to be continual squabbling and fighting about her, let her go: I don't want to see her face again."

AN ADVENTURE WITH THE PLAYERS AT GUILDFORD.

Mrs. White gave a slight scream at this and flung herself upon a couch, as though she at least had made up her mind not to leave the house of Sir Felix if her daughter did; and the officers, finding they were disappointed of their prey, and being quite convinced that no one was concealed in the room, tried to open the door of connection with the next apartment, but in vain.

"Where does this lead to?" said one.

"Why, to where the people you want have gone, to be sure," said Sir Felix, "and I only hope you may catch them, for I shall feel no peace of mind until they are all three hanged."

The officers, upon finding the door locked, did not stop long to talk upon the matter, but proceeded with violent precipitation to break it open, in which, despite the remonstrances of Sir Felix, they in a few moments succeeded. The room was empty.

The fact was, that Claude, the moment he and his two friends got into the next room and had locked the door, spoke to them in a low tone of voice, saying—

"Let us pause a moment here, and listen; one of our great objects will be to discover who they are that are after us. If they consist merely of some of the blockheads of the neighbourhood, our danger is by no means great; but if they are professional officers, we had better know it at once."

With this view, in the propriety of which both Jack and Dick fully concurred, they all listened at the door of the room, and they soon heard enough to convince them that the men were officers, or at least the greater part of them.

"Come on, then," said Claude; "frightening will have no effect upon them. It is only killing that would do, and that is what we don't like to have recource to, except at a last extremity; so let us be off at once and see if we cannot get out of the house by some means."

"Our horses!" said Dick.

"Ay," said Jack, "I fear for them. I am half afraid to think of them, and I shall not believe that we shall ever possess them again until I feel myself mounted."

"Do not speak of the horses just yet," said Claude; "let us hope for the best, and that we shall find them all right in a little time. At present, what we have to do is to get out of the way of the Philistines."

As he spoke, Claude, with the candle still in his hand, went towards a door at the farther end of the little room, and upon opening it, he found that it at once opened upon the staircase that had been mentioned by the young bride.

"It is of very little consequence to us," he said, "where this staircase may lead to; our only chance of escape is by it, so down we go."

"Very good," said Dick. "We will follow."

Claude ran down the stairs, and found that they led to a room below, that seemed as if it had once been a library, from the shelves that were all around it, although some old moth-eaten, mouldy-looking books, lying huddled together upon the floor, were now the only evidences of its being devoted to such a purpose. Still, as it was upon the ground-floor, it offered some facilities to leaving the house, or at all events, it ought to do so.

"Come on," said Claude, after taking a brief glance round the room. "Come on. We will get out of this. Here is a door."

The door through which he passed led into a kind of passage, and at the end of that was another door that had the upper portion of it made of glass. Through that was the open air; but they found themselves in a part of the grounds of the house that they were strange to. The most unlucky thing was, that the moment that door was opened, there came a puff of wind through it that blew out the candle, so that they were in comparative darkness, although the night was rather a lighter one than ordinary.

"What in the name of all that's perplexing, are we to do now?" said Dick. "It's like being set down in the moon."

"Not quite so bad," said Claude.

"Very nearly, though; but we must go round the house till we find the stables. Oh, that we were but mounted once again! That would be the thing for us. Then we should laugh at all this."

"The time will come," said Claude. "Let us keep here under the shadow of the house. We must get to the stables soon."

"Hilloa!" said a voice.

They all paused; and Claude, as he levelled a pistol in the direction whence the voice came, said in a low but perfectly clear voice—

"Whoever you are, if you don't come forward I will fire at you."

"Don't do that," said the voice. "It's me, Sir Felix's man. Don't you know me, gentlemen? Lord bless you, don't shoot me."

"Oh, it is you, is it? You have got back from London tolerably quick."

"Yes, and I advise you to leave this place tolerably quick. I know who you are now, and what you are; but you came here on a good errand, and I'm as glad as possible you have saved that poor girl, and got the better of the old woman. Do you know that there is a party of officers in the house looking after you?"

"We do."

"Very good. They have told me to take the horses out of the stable, and send 'em loose in the paddock, so that you may not get 'em; but I saddled them all three, and got 'em nice and comfortable for you close at hand. Come after me, and I'll soon take you to them."

"How can we thank you?" said Claude.

"Oh, don't mention that, only come on, and don't lose any time about it, for there's no knowing how soon they may come down, and be about our ears."

"Dare we trust this fellow?" whispered Jack.

"Yes, implicitly," said Claude. "Come on. What money have you, Jack, about you?"

"About thirty pounds."

"Give it to me. Thank you. We can supply ourselves again, you know. Now, my good friend, go on towards the horses as quick as you can, and we will follow you."

The man went on rapidly, and came in a few moments to a fence made of oak pailings. There was a door in it, but no one who had not known of its existence could have observed it in that dim light. He, however, wrenched it open at once, and said—

"This way—this way! Here are the cattle."

It was all right, for immediately upon passing through this little gate or doorway, they found the three horses ready for the road, and fastened to a ring in a post that was there for the purpose,

"Now I tell you what it is," said the man, "I don't want to get into trouble, so you will be so good as to knock me down, you know, and pull this little oak door off its hinges, and then you can mount and be off, and all I can say is, good luck go with you."

"When I knock you down," said Claude, "I hope somebody may serve me the same way. Take this as a small testimony of our gratitude to you for the efficient aid you have give us to-night."

As he spoke, Claude placed in the man's hands the thirty pounds that Jack had given to him. Dick and Jack had already mounted, and Claude was in the act of doing so, when a blaze of light flashed into the place, which was a little enclosed straw-yard, and a voice cried—

"There they are!—there they are! Blaze away!"

A couple of pistol-shots were fired at them, but did no damage, for nothing like an aim could be taken at such a time; and Claude at once closed the little oaken door.

"Stoop in your saddles," he said, "stoop—stoop, so as to keep your heads below the pailings."

"That's impossible," said Dick, as he rapidly dismounted. "Get down, Jack, or they will pick you off. The pailing is not near high enough to stoop below it. All's right."

Bang! went another shot just as Jack got off his horse; and then Claude, whose anger was roused, said—

"I am not going to stand thus to be shot at in this place, by a parcel of ragamuffin's, as if one were a carrion. Is any one hurt?"

"No—no!" they all said.

"Very good. Then I promise those fellows that at the very next shot they favour us with, they shall have my double-barrel in return, and then they will find out how they like it."

"Pepper the rascals!" cried a voice. "I daresay you have killed some of them, my brave fellows."

Claude found that this voice came from an open window some distance off, at which, in the uncertain light, he saw a head just a little way projecting. The officers that were outside the pailing had a large stable lantern with them; and now two more shots were fired at Claude and his friends, that came crashing through the oak pailing.

"I'm hit," said the servant.

"And my horse is, I think," said Dick.

Claude was infuriated at this; and taking aim at the head that projected from the window with one barrel of his double-barrelled pistol, he fired at it. A loud shriek testified to the success of the shot, and the head disappeared. The other barrel Claude discharged through the pailing at those who had the lantern.

"Murder!" cried a voice, and then all was still.

"I wonder how they feel after that?" said Claude. The silence that ensued now had quite an ominous kind of feeling with it; and Claude endeavoured all he could to pierce into the darkness, for the purpose of observing what his foes were about. Presently a voice said—

"Claude Duval, this is a foolish resistance to make to your capture. We know you well, and you have got Dick Turpin with you, and some one else. You must be taken, and you will only make your case worse by resisting. We have already sent off for more assistance."

"So have I," said Claude.

"Come, come, don't be foolish. Do you know that you have killed Mr. Smith, the officer?"

"Really, you don't say so?"

"Let me advise you, as a friend, to give yourself up, and advise your two friends to do so likewise; for if you don't, you won't live another hour, for we have made up our minds to have you, dead or alive."

"Come and take me, then," said Claude.

After this, there was evidently a rather uneasy kind of consultation among the officers to know what to do, and Claude said in a low tone—

"Did our friend say that he was hurt? Speak—speak!"

CHAPTER CCXXIII.

THE ESCAPE TO THE ROAD, AND THE VIGOROUS PURSUIT.

These last words of Claude's were addressed to the servant who had played so kind a part towards them; but they were answered rather cheerfully.

"I am hurt, but it ain't much. It's only a touch on the arm, that won't do much mischief. Keep them in talk, Claude Duval, and I will get you out of this mess."

"Can you?"

"I can and will, if you will trust the cattle to me."

"I would trust you with my life."

"Then you three hold this place against the officers, if you can, for the next five minutes, and I warrant to take you comfortably out of it by another route. I will pull down an iron hurdle here, and then we can get into the garden—the kitchen garden, I mean."

"I will help you," said Jack.

"Do; for I don't think, with my arm rather queer, that I could get the hurdle up alone."

Jack went with this man, who now behaved in so bold and generous a manner, and between them they went to work capitally. Claude, then, to cover what was going on, thought it would be better to parley with the officers a little, so he said—

"Of course, if we were to give in, we could only expect the very worst treatment from you."

"Oh, no—no—you are quite mistaken," was the reply. "We will say as little as possible of the resistance you have made."

"But this Mr. Smith's death?"

"Oh, we will pretend that it was rather accidental than otherwise. Only give yourselves up, and you may depend upon the best of treatment from us. We are not at all vindictive; but you know as well as we do, that we must do this duty."

"Yes, I am aware of that."

"And you should think, too, what a poor chance you three have against eight of us, who are quite resolved in the matter, and must have you, dead or alive, somehow. Besides, we have sent for more help; so you had better give in while you have a whole skin, than when you have a broken one. Come, come, be wise, and give in."

"Well, I will consult my friends for a few moments. As regards myself, I am always favourable to doing the best I can."

By this time, the man-servant of Sir Felix had taken away the three horses, and now he came close to Claude, and whispered in his ear—

"Follow me quietly. They are all right."

Upon turning suddenly round, Claude saw that both Jack and Dick were gone, and at the moment a rather uncomfortable feeling of loneliness came over him.

"Are they safe?" he said.

"Oh, quite, quite; follow me."

"I will do so."

Claude followed the man. It was, perhaps, rather a risk to run, to put so much faith in one who was merely an utter stranger; but then, no one was more in the habit of trusting to others than was Claude Duval; and he had found, by long experience, that it was the very best way of procuring their best services.

The man led him through the gap that he had made in the iron-hurdle fence, and then, by the tread, Claude felt that he was upon garden ground, for his feet sunk in at every step up to the ankles, and he said—

"Have we far to go?"

"No. This way—this way."

Claude went on, and in a few moments he heard the voice of Dick saying—

"Is that you, Claude?"

"Yes—yes."

"I was afraid the Philistines had got you, and so was Jack. I have had the greatest difficulty in keeping him quiet. Here we are, all among the cabbages in the garden, mounted, and Jack has got your horse by the bridle. I do think we shall give our friends on the other side of the pailings the go-bye yet."

"I'm sure we shall," said Claude.

"Thank God I hear you speak again!" said Jack.

"Ah, Jack," said Claude, "you are always expecting the worst to come to us; but I have great faith in my good luck. Now, which way are we to go, and what are we to do?"

"Let me lead your horses clear of the garden," said the man, "and then you may all three go off at a gallop, if you like, as soon as possible; for it will be in the main road that I shall lead you to, and all the mischief will be a little knocking about of the vegetables, which won't much matter."

As he spoke, this man—without whose aid the escape of Duval and his friends from that place would have been a very dangerous and critical affair—took hold of the bridle of Claude's horse, and led the creature over some of the beds in the garden, totally heedless of the crushing and displacing effects the horse's hoofs upon the various vegetables that were growing there. This kind of progress lasted about five minutes, and then they came to another oak pailing.

"Wait a moment," said the guide. "There is a door here that I will open for you directly."

He did so, and then Claude, as he passed out of the garden, found, by the firm, hard tread of the horse, that he was on the high road. A feeling of intense satisfaction came across him upon being assured of this fact, and he said—

"All's right at last. Let me but be mounted, and upon the road, and I look upon whatever may happen as only in the regular course of events. Come on, Dick and Jack."

They both emerged from the garden, and then Claude turned to the man, and said—

"I hope, my friend, that we shall meet again. Let me have the pleasure of shaking hands with you."

"Excuse me offering you the left one, then, for the right don't feel very comfortable just now."

"Ah, it is in that you were wounded?"

"It is; but I have stopped the bleeding, I think, with my handkerchief, so it won't do me much harm."

"I sincerely hope not. Good-by."

"Good-by to you all. Don't wait. All's right, you may depend, in the house; so be off at once."

Claude gave the reins to his steed, and off he went, closely followed by Jack and Dick; but they had not gone far when they became quite conscious that some one well mounted was pursuing them, or if not pursuing, was coming sharply upon the same road.

"Do you hear that, Claude?" said Dick.

"I do. Let us listen. Just draw up half a moment."

They did so, and then Jack cried—

"There are two."

"Yes," said Claude, "I hear the tread of two horses. I don't like a race. I propose that we draw up to the road-side and listen. We will wait for the comers, be they whom they may; but don't do anything hastily, whatever you do—I mean as regards the use of your pistols, Dick. We have had fighting enough, I think, for a day, or rather night, already."

"Quite enough."

The two horses came rapidly up, and although our friends were quite in the shadow of some trees, yet, as we have said, it was rather a light night, so that those who were riding upon the road could hardly miss seeing them, if they were looking about at all.

"Hilloa! who is there?" cried a voice.

"A friend," said Claude, "if you like to think so, and pass on; but a foe if you like to make him one."

"Ah, I know that voice surely."

"And I," said some one in female tones; "it is our gallant friend, Claude Duval, I feel assured."

Upon this, Claude and his friends emerged from the shadow, and they saw that the mounted persons were none other than the young officer and his lady love.

"I am quite pleased," said the officer, "to find you safe upon the road. I was, indeed, afraid that your enemies would prove too many for you. I trust that you are not hurt at all?"

"No, we are pretty well; but, you see, we have left our foes the field all to themselves, preferring a prudent retreat. Are you for London?"

"Yes; and if you are for that road, pray ride with us. Sir Felix, after you were gone, tried to fight it out with me, and I am afraid he has done himself no good by the attempt. I have had some trouble, too, with Mrs. White, who would interfere. But here we are at last, safe and sound, and I don't think they will find it very easy now to get their loved one away from me again."

"I don't think they will. But pray ride on, sir, and take with you our good wishes. You will not find that our company upon the road will redound much to your credit."

"But I am, I hope, far above paltry feelings of that sort. You and your friends have done me a great service, and I will not fail to acknowledge it in all places, and under all circumstances, that may require. So ride on with us, I begof you, without further scruple, or we shall take it amiss if you don't."

"Oh! listen, listen," said the young girl, "I hear some people coming; do you not?—Listen now! the regular tread of horses' feet comes plainly on my ears."

"And upon mine, too," said her lover. "I am rather surprised, but it strikes me I can hear the clank of military accoutrements too; how can that be, though? There is no barracks or military station nearer than Hounslow, I think."

"That is not very far off," said Claude; "we have even reason to believe that the officers who thought fit to beleaguer us at the lodge, finding we made a stouter resistance than they anticipated, sent for some help, and it is likely enough that it has been to Hounslow Barracks."

"If so, then," said the officer, "this party that is approaching is a sergeant's guard of cavalry, that the commanding officer at Hounslow has thought proper to send in aid of the civil power."

"There's very little doubt of it," said Dick.

The young officer mused for a moment or two, and then he said,—

"Keep by me; you have done me a great service. Without her who is now with me, and from whom I will not part while life remains to me, I should have passed but a miserable existence. I will now endeavour to repay some small portion of the debt of gratitude that I owe you."

"What would you do?"

"I would, and I will save you from a contest with these soldiers, if they are bound for the lodge. Trot gently on, and be under no sort of apprehension: I can and will do it."

"We should be sorry," said Claude, "if you did yourself any personal injury by interfering in our behalf. We have a thousand chances of escape. Ride on, sir, and leave us to our own resources."

"Oh, no, no!" cried the young lady, "that must not and shall not be done. You shall be protected. I wish it with all my heart."

"And your wish is a law, my darling," said the young officer; "so I am sure our friends will not say another word about it, but permit me to act as I wish, and as you wish, in the little affair."

"It would be absurd and ungrateful of me," said Claude, "further to refuse so great a kindness."

"Hush—they come!"

Clattering on in the middle of the road, came five mounted dragoons, and a sergeant. A very few moments would have brought them close to Claude and his friends. By the side of the sergeant rode a man in plain costume. This was no doubt the officer who had been sent by his comrades to request the aid of the commanding officer at Hounslow. The young cornet rode up to the troop, and in a loud clear voice cried—

"Ha't!"

The soldiers drew up in a moment.

"Sergeant, what is this party about?" said the officer. "I think you belong to my regiment, do you not?"

The sergeant at once saluted the young officer, and riding up to him, he looked at him as well he could in the dim light, and saw quite enough of him to convince himself that he was one of his officers.

CHAPTER CCXXIV.

THE THREE FRIENDS FAIRLY ON THE ROAD AGAIN.

Upon the discovery that this was an officer in his own regiment, the sergeant at once gave up all authority in the matter, and was ready to act upon any orders he might name.

"I have no wish to interfere with the duty you are upon," said the officer. "Go on at once, sergeant."

The sergeant saluted the officer, and then gave the word to the guard to pass on. The officer looked as as though he were rather mystified at what was going on, and pointing to Claude and his companions, it was evident that he said something to the sergeant concerning them; but the latter only shook his head, and went clattering on.

"We are indebted to you, sir," said Claude, "for our escape from this danger. It was a serious one."

"How much more am I indebted to you!"

"Well, if you think that, we are even, so be it; but we must positively not embarrass you any longer by our presence. I can easily comprehend the kind and honourable feeling you have towards us, but it would be very base upon our parts to take further advantage of it, to your, perhaps, great prejudice. We will now bid you adieu."

"If you will, at this juncture, bid us good-by," said the officer, "I cannot say anything that ought to stay you; but you now know my name, and you know my regiment, so that you can have no difficulty in finding me; and let me hope that you will not scruple to do so, if I can be of any service to you."

"I will remember that. Farewell!"

Both Dick and Jack cried "Farewell!" and then, without waiting for another word from the young officer, they all three dashed down a lane that was close at hand.

The entrance to that little lane—it was so very dark—looked like the entrance to some cavern.

"Well," said Dick, "we are well out of that affair, at all events; and there is one great satisfaction connected with it, that we did not go into the adventure for any mercenary motives."

"Certainly we did not," said Jack; "but I should like very well to know where this lane leads to. Can you enlighten us at all upon that rather interesting subject, Claude?"

"Not I."

"Humph! Then, perhaps, the sooner we get out of it the better."

"Every lane, Jack, has an end of some sort, and no doubt this one is no exception to the rule. I was particularly anxious to get out of the high road, for I could not help feeling that we were a very serious encumbrance to that young officer, although his gentlemanly and grateful feelings prevented him from saying as much; so I really took the turning just because it presented itself, without having the smallest idea of where it lead to."

"What's that?" said Dick, suddenly.

"What's what?"

"Oh, it's a light a little way on in advance, I see. It is having quite a fight with the coming daylight, to make itself visible. It seems to proceed from some cottage window, don't you think, Claude? Just take a good look at it."

Claude paused, and shading his eyes with his hands, he gazed earnestly in the direction of the light, and then he said—

"It is the reflection of a fire-light, I think, darting out into the air, through a little latticed window. At all events, it shows that somebody is up and stirring from whom we can ascertain where we are."

"Push on, then," said Dick.

In about five minutes they came to a pretty-looking cottage; but whether it was the lodge entrance to some estate, or a cottage of itself, merely built in the lane, they could not decide. Claude, however, raised his voice, crying out—

"Hilloa!—hilloa! Anybody at home?"

An old woman appeared at the door of the little dwelling, and, to the surprise of Claude, she said—

THE SCUFFLE WITH THE CROWD IN THE VILLAGE OF EALING.

"A, B, C. One, two, three, and take it out of that."

The three friends looked at each other, and then they looked at the old woman, after which Claude said—

"Perhaps it's rather an ungracious question to ask you, old lady; but, are you mad, or have you had a little drop too much very early this morning?"

The old woman immediately retired into the cottage, and closed the door with a bang, without deigning to say another word to Claude and his companions.

"This is rather funny," said Dick. "What do you make of it, Claude? What does it mean?"

"I don't know—I suppose she is cracked."

"Possibly," said Jack, rather drily.

"At all events, I will have her out again," said Duval, as he leant from his saddle, and began banging at the door with the handle of his riding whip.—"Hilloa, old dame! Hilloa! your society is so delightful, that we want a little more of it—Hilloa! House—house! Come out—come out!"

Rap, rap, rap, went the heavy handle of the riding whip, and then the window was opened suddenly, and a jug of water was dashed out, which missed Claude, and fell right over Jack.

"Take that," said the old hag, "and perhaps you will get a little worse, if you don't be jogging while you may."

"Come, come, old lady," said Claude, "you have got hold of the wrong customers to try any threats upon. We have made up our minds to ask you a civil question, and we will not only ask it, but we will have an answer to it likewise, or we will have your cottage down about your ears."

"Confound the old hag," said Jack, "she has drenched me."

"What's your question, idiot?" cried the old woman.

"Ah! now you are talking to yourself, old girl. Why, I suppose, you were with Noah in the ark, you are so old and hag-like, or are you one of the original witches in Macbeth?"

"I only wish I had a gun, I'd soon let you know what I am, and what I was, too."

"Oh, you can threaten, can you? Well, as you are such a nice comfortable old girl, we will dismount and step inside the little cottage for a while. I want a rest."

"You shall not—you dare not!"

"Oh, but we will; and as for daring, we are rather used to that, as you will see. Come, comrades, let us bestow a little of our company upon this sour crab of an old woman. It will be quite a piece of christian charity to do so, I feel assured."

"You wretches, what do you want here? Do you fancy I keep open house for such vagabonds? I do believe you are highwaymen."

"You don't say so?" cried Claude, as he dismounted, and fastened his horse's bridle to the branch of a walnut tree that grew close to the hedge-row. "Why, you must be quite a witch, old lady. Now, to my mind, there is nothing in nature half so well worth the studying as a real good old-fashioned, vicious, carping, snarling, old woman."

As Claude advanced, the old hag retreated into the cottage, and with a passionate vehemence, which showed how ill-regulated the disposition of that aged female must have always been, she commenced throwing at Claude and his friends everything she could lay hands upon in the cottage, quite heedless of whether they were articles that would break or not.

"Oh," said Claude, "that's it, is it? You want to get the crockery all outside do you? All's right. Let's help her, my friends. We ought always, you know, to lend a helping hand to the aged."

Jack, who had already had a taste of the old woman's passion, in the shape of the jug of cold water that had been thrown over him, had no objection to revenge himself a little, and Dick entered into the affair for the fun of the thing. They all three set to work, and in about five minutes they had cleared the cottage, and the lawn was strewed with the fragments of crockery of all descriptions, and broken articles of furniture. The last things that Claude threw out was a large earthenware pitcher, and that he sent slap though the latticed window.

Saucepans, pots, kettles, a warming-pan, all followed, and at the last, the old woman got desperate, and feeling herself fairly conquered, she sat down on the floor, and shrieked with passion.

"Now," said Claude, very gently, "you will, perhaps, answer me the quiet civil question I wished to ask you at first?"

"Oh, you odious wretches!"

"Where does this lane lead to?"

"I'll have you all hanged, I will!"

"Where does this lane lead to?"

"I won't tell you!"

"You won't? Very good. I didn't see those few little glazed prints on the wall. Out with 'em, Jack."

"There they go."

The old woman sprang to her feet, and catching up the fender, she began to lay about her with it with savage fury. Claude got out of the way as best he could, and then, watching his opportunity when she was near to the window, he tilted her out of it, fender and all, on to a little flower border that was underneath it. Then, resting his arms on the sill, he said—

"Now, old lady, where does this lane lead to?"

She scrambled up again, and seizing a garden rake, she began to poke it in at the window, with the hope of doing them some injury, but Claude quickly disarmed her of it, and then said, quite gently, and in a soft, gentle tone of voice—

"Old lady, where does this lane lead to?"

"Why, what's all this?" cried Dick, suddenly.

"All what?" said Jack.

Claude glanced round, and he saw that Dick had opened a cupboard in the wall, from which had tumbled out to the floor of the cottage a quantity of costly dresses for females. There were shawls, mantles, slippers, flowers for the hair, bracelets, girdles, and, in fact, every description of wearing apparel; and among the lot, a quantity that seemed to have belonged to mere girls.

At the sight of this discovery, the old woman uttered a cry of dismay, and fell flat upon her face.

"What is the meaning of it all?" said Claude; "is the old devil a fence, after all?"

"No; surely not," said Dick; "she would get no business out here, and, besides, this is not the sort of property. This looks as if all the young girls in the parish had been robbed of something. It's quite past my comprehension altogether."

"And mine," said Jack.

"And, I am afraid," said Claude, "I must say mine. However, this discovery seems to have quieted her down a bit, at all events. She has fainted, I do think. Let's pick her up and bring her in; at all events, she has made a grand fight of it, and considering that she must have known that there was not a very good chance for her against three men, she carried on the war pretty well."

"It was all temper," said Jack. "But I could have forgiven her everything but the cold water business."

"Ah, Jack! that seems to have thrown cold water upon your feelings in the matter. Bring her in, Dick, for let her be what she may, in temper or in conduct, she is yet a woman, and as such, entitled to some care from us."

"Agreed," said Dick; "and all she has done is her own violence. We have been careful not to touch her, I am sure, the stupid old pump! How the deuce she became possessed of all these clothes is a mystery to me. They are far beyond anything one might expect to find here."

Dick, however, picked the old woman up and brought her into the now dilapidated cottage. They placed her as comfortably as circumstances would admit upon the little miserable truckle-bed, which was about the only article that had not been thrown out into the lane; and then Dick dashed some water upon her face, and she slowly opened her eyes.

"Hilloa," he said, "are you better?"

"Yes. Oh, God, yes!"

"Do you know where you are?" said Claude.

"Yes—yes, I do now."

"Then where does this lane lead to?"

Neither Dick nor Jack could restrain their laughter at the pertinacity with which Claude stuck to his question; and the woman, after looking at him for a moment or two in silence, said,

"To Wooksom."

"Oh, I know that," said Dick. "It is a little village of not much more than a dozen houses."

"Very good," said Claude. "Now that she has answered me, I am quite content; but if I had worried her for the next hour or two I would have made her tell me. I shall be off now, for to tell the truth, we have wasted too much time here already."

"Shall we ask her about the cupboard full of clothing?" said Dick in a whisper to Jack.

"Ah, do."

"I say, old girl, how came you by all these things that seem to belong to young ladies' wardrobes, eh? We are rather curious to know; and if it is a secret, we won't let it go any further."

"Mercy! Mercy!" said the old woman, "I suffer enough. Oh, do not drag me to a prison. Oh, have mercy upon me! If you are, as I suppose you are, the officers of justice, spare me or kill me. But I cannot tell: I am bound by such solemn oaths, that it would be perdition to break them. Oh, no—no, I can die, but I will tell nothing."

"Oh, she is mad—quite mad," said Claude. "Let us come away. If she were to tell us any long story, I should not believe it. Come along, my friends; the best thing we can do is to leave her to herself."

"Hark!" said Dick. "A horseman is coming at full speed down the lane. Do you not hear it?"

"I do," cried Claude, as he rushed into the lane just as a horseman drew up at the door of the cottage.

"Well met," he cried; and then Duval saw that it was the young officer to whom he had done such good service. He handed to Claude a small folded paper.

"Take this," he said; "it is from her whom you rescued from a fate worse than death, and I have to tell you that the whole country-side is now up in arms against you. If you follow the directions contained in the paper you now have, you will find a secure asylum for a little time. Adieu; I must be off again."

Without, then, waiting for a word of thanks, the young officer put his horse to a gallop, and went towards the high-road again.

CHAPTER CCXXV.

THE MYSTERY OF THE COTTAGE REMAINS A MYSTERY FOR THE PRESENT.

"To horse!" cried Claude. "I think that the sooner we get away from here the better. There is much danger now in this neighbourhood, and the daylight has all but fairly come."

When he was mounted, Duval looked at the folded paper, and found upon it, written with pencil in evident haste, the following words:—

"To my friend, C. D.

"I have abundant reason to know that you are environed by danger, and that more than ordinary means will be used for the purpose of capturing yourself and friends. My mother and Sir Felix will use every means for the purpose o destroying you. I, therefore, beg that you will take special warning, and do as I ask you. Go to Guildford, and when you get there, inquire at the theatre for Mr. Clare. He is my brother, and for my sake will do anything he can for you. You may be quite certain, at all events, of getting with him an asylum that will provide you against any immediate evil consequences. I need not subscribe myself anything but one who feels how much you have befriended her."

Claude read this note to his friends, and then added,—

"What do you both advise upon this? Shall we obey its counsel?"

"I would," said Jack; "she cannot for one moment mean otherwise than for our good; and the young officer would assuredly not have ridden back to bring you that message, Claude, if he had not felt well assured of the emergency of the case."

"That I believe. What do you think of it, Jack?"

"I vote for Guildford."

"Very well: I own that my own inclination likewise points that way. Be it so. This Mr. Clare may assist us for his sister's sake. At all events, if we go among the players, it will be a new phase in our existence, and promises a little change to us. The only question is how to get there, for I must confess that I don't know the way."

"Nor I," said Dick.

"But I do," said Jack; "after the name of the little village, which the old woman mentioned, I know pretty well where we are; and I think if you both follow me, I can lead you to Guildford."

"Lead on, Jack, then," said Claude, "although I do think it is a pity to leave this place without ascertaining all about the mystery of that old woman in the cottage, for that there is some great mystery connected with her I feel assured."

"Not a doubt of it;" said Dick, "but if I mistake not, it is one of those mysteries that will keep; and I shall be the first to propose a return to her cottage when this hot pursuit of ours is over, even if we should be at the trouble of throwing all her crockery into the lane again."

"Or of buying her a new lot," said Claude. "We will follow you, Jack, if you please."

The old woman had recovered from her swoon, but she did not stir off the bed upon which they had laid her, so that they had no interruption from her, but off they went at a good pace down the lane in the direction of the little village that she had mentioned in answer to Duval's inquiries, which he had persisted in under such extraordinary circumstances.

At the pace they went, they were very soon quite clear of the lane, and then, upon turning an angle, formed by a splendid group of chestnut trees, they came at once upon the little village which had been mentioned. From that point, there was a capital view over the surrounding country for a very considerable distance.

"There's our road," said Jack, pointing in the direction of a clump of trees that stood by the edge of a winding road that the morning sun was just faintly shining upon.

"All's right, then," said Claude. "We can push on. How far is it, Jack, do you think, to Guildford?"

"About eight miles," said Jack "But hold my horse, Claude, and I will get upon yonder bank and take a long look round the country. I think if there are any persons in sight, one will see them for some miles off in the clear morning air, from such a height as yonder is. It will be as well to know."

Claude accordingly held Jack's horse, while he clambered up to a bank that rose some fifteen feet above the level of the road, and then, while he steadied himself by a good grasp upon the lowest arm of a stunted oak, he took a long look around him.

"Do you see anything?" said Claude.

"I do—I do. There are two distinct parties coming down separate roads. They look each of them strong enough, too, to give us some trouble; but they are a good mile off yet."

"Only a mile? Are they mounted, Jack?"

"Yes; and well mounted, too."

"Then, we have not a great deal of time to spare. Come down, Jack, and let us be off at once, for I have no fancy to be taken nor killed upon this fine fresh morning."

Jack was in the saddle again in a moment or two, and without another word of hesitation, off he went in advance, putting his horse to a sort of half gallop, while Claude and Dick kept close after him.

At the rate at which they rode, they got over the ground well, at the same time that they did not so much distress themselves to prevent them from making a grand start for a mile or two upon any emergency that might arise to call for such an exertion. The road wound round the little village; but after that, it was straight and clear, and for the most part bordered by tall banks upon either side, down which was a luxuriant growth of shrubs.

In this way, without exchanging a word, they went about two miles, and it was no small satisfaction to Claude to see that Jack did not for a moment hesitate, for that to him was a good proof that he knew the road perfectly well.

Then, Jack drew in a moment, and looking round, he said—

"The nearest way is over a hill. It makes a difference of more than half a mile to skirt it, but then we are out of sight in the hollow, and in sight on the rise."

"Skirt the hill, then, by all means," said Claude.

"Very good. I think, myself, it is the best; but I thought I would mention it to you, that's all."

"All's right, Jack!"

Jack now abruptly turned to the left, and plunged down a narrow lane, that was so thickly studded with trees on each side, that they met overhead, and, although it was really then broad daylight, involved the place in a kind of dim and dubious twilight. The road was very damp and sloppy, too.

"This," said Claude to Dick, "is, no doubt, a pretty and romantic spot in the mid-day heats of summer."

"Delightful enough! But what's the matter with Jack? He has come to a dead stop."

They were soon by the side of Jack, and they found that the obstacle to his further progress consisted of a hurdle, drawn right across the middle of the lane. On the other side was a man in a smock-frock, with a pitch-fork in his hand, which he held in a threatening attitude.

"What's the meaning of this?" cried Claude.

"Why just that you may go over the hill," said the fellow. "This here lane, you see, goes through a part of my farm; and I and my missus have made up our minds to stop it up. The parish say as how they will go to law with I, but I don't mind; I'll go to law with the parish."

"Come—come, don't be a fool."

"Yes I will: I have put up thesen hurdles here, and out yonder I have put up thosen hurdles there, and here I stands; I means to do what I likes; and here's my muck-fork, and danged if I don't put it into anybody as comes here."

"Come—come, my friend, here's a guinea; get out of the way at once like a good fellow."

"I bean't a good fellow, and I don't want a guinea."

"Oh, then, you will be a fool?"

"Yes, I will."

"Then, my friend, I have to tell you that we intend to pass this way, whether you like it or not."

Upon this, the countryman put himself into a ludicrous posture of defence with the pitch-fork, so that Claude and his friends could hardly forbear laughing at him, although there was really no time to lose, as they wished to make what progress they could in as short a time as possible.

"Once more I ask you," said Claude, "in a civil manner, to move aside. Letting us pass will not affect your quarrel with the parish; for we are perfect strangers in this neighbourhood, and may very likely never be in it again."

"No—no, I know better; you have been put on this here job by Muster Nicholls the overseer; but here I be, and here's my muck-fork, and I'm danged I'll give thee a poke with it as thee won't like if thee comes here."

"Very good, then, as we are determined to pass, I will shoot you; I am very reluctant to do it, having already shot a man this morning who offended me; but if you will have it, it is your own fault."

With this, Claude took a pistol from his pocket, and without waiting for the astonished farmer to say a word upon the subject, he fired at him, taking care only just to miss his head.

The effect of this was so astounding, that for a moment or two the fellow stood with his pitch-fork in an attitude as though he had been transformed to stone, and then, with a roar like that of some bull-calf, down he fell flat upon his back.

"We can jump it," cried Claude, and giving his horse his head, away he went over the fence.

Jack and Dick followed quickly; and leaving the farmer speechless upon his back with his pitch-fork above him, they went at the next hurdle-fence which he had put up, and cleared that likewise.

They were now half way round the hill over which the conservator of the rights of his farm had been so anxious that they should pass, and they enjoyed a hearty laugh at the consternation of the farmer. Claude, when they got right round the hill, got half way up a tree and found that they had distanced the parties that were in search of them; but he fancied that there was a suspicious collection of people a little way in advance of where they were.

"Jack," he said, "is there no way to Guildford but by the high-road? Can we not get there in any other way than by going right on, for there are people that I think we may as well avoid, in advance of us?"

"Then we must try the meadows, Claude. I know we can get across them, although the horses may give us some little difficulty. We can but try it, though."

"We will, Jack. We can surely make our way through a hedge, if it should be absolutely necessary so to do. Come on; I am for the meadows, if you can act as a guide to us across them."

"I can do that."

"Then, do it by all means; for the more I look at those who come in advance of us, the more I dislike them. There is certainly some consultation going on, and as we are very likely to be the subjects of discourse, I should like to get as far off from the council as I possibly can."

"And I," said Dick.

Jack, without more ado, now began to unfasten the first gate they came to, that upon the side of the road upon which lay their route, and by the aid of one of his picklocks, he soon succeeded in opening the padlock with which it was secured, and swung the gate open.

"I don't think," he said, "it is above a mile-and-a-half now across the fields to Guildford, if it be so much. Come on, Claude. This will, after all, perhaps, be the very best way of reaching that town, if we can do it sharply."

"Every place has its disadvantages," said Dick, "as well as its advantages; and we cannot expect this one to be without them. We certainly avoid our foes who are in advance; but, I think, we give those who are in our rear a little chance of observing us."

"Doubtless," said Claude; "but, I think, we may, having such a start of them, outstrip them tolerably easy; so that, after all, their progress through the meadows, has, I think, its good features to a greater extent than its bad ones."

"That's likely enough. Speed will be everything."

They now got on in a very peculiar manner, indeed. When they came to a meadow that was of sufficient extent, without a fence, to enable them to do so, they went at a gallop across it, and where the fence was not a particularly bad one, they leaped it, and went right on without pausing. Upon occasions, however, where the fence was high and straggling, and beyond the power of a horse, with his rider, to go over it, they rapidly dismounted, and soon oroke away sufficient of it to enable them to get the horses through a gap.

By this means, and by not pausing for a moment to consider how they were getting on, they made good progress, and upon arriving at the top of a little hill, Jack pointed in advance, and cried —

"There's Guildford."

"Why, we have not above two or three meadows to cross," said Dick. "It will be awkward now if we come plump upon somebody's garden at the end of these fields."

"If we do," said Claude, "the somebody will have to put up with the inconvenience of our going through it, for now it would be madness for us to turn back."

"If we did," said Jack, "it would be into the arms of our foes, for behold! they, too, have taken to the fields, and are making what speed they can towards this point."

CHAPTER CCXXVI.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS FIND SAFETY AMONG THE ACTORS AT GUILDFORD.

As Jack spoke, he pointed to the portion of the fields where the officers were actually coming on as quickly as possible, and in the course of a very few minutes must have reached them.

"Ah, indeed," said Claude, "there is no time to lose."

"Not a moment," said Dick.

The next fence they came to was one which, if they had not been in so great a hurry, they would have found it the safest thing to dismount at, and make a gap through; but now Claude resolved to put his horse upon its metal, and try the leap. He did it successfully.

It is well known that nothing induces a horse to do anything half so well as seeing another do it, and the consequence was, that both Jack and Dick likewise succeeded in clearing the fence in good style, although it is probable enough that under less urgent circumstances they might not have succeeded in doing so.

"All's right?" asked Claude.

"Yes—yes."

"Then we are tolerably safe, I think; for if they can get over that they are much better mounted than I think them."

"It is not likely," said Dick. "While they are making a gap to get through, we shall be off and away."

There was but one field now between them and the outskirts of the town of Guildford. Claude had rather dreaded that their course might take them to some enclosure which they might not be able to pass through, and to skirt it might indeed be a serious waste of time; but luckily for them, such was not the fact. They merely found a straggling wooded fence thrown across the end of a half-finished street which led directly into the town.

"Is this our place of destination, then, Jack?" said Claude.

"It is; this is Guildford."

"Good. It strikes me that we have about ten minutes to spare, and it is to be hoped that will suffice to reach the theatre, which I presume there will be no great difficulty in doing."

"There ought to be none. Let us ask this boy. Hilloa! my lad—where is the theatre?"

"Lor!" said the boy, g'aring at Jack wi h all his eyes. "Be ye player folks, eh?"

"Yes, my boy. All's right."

"Why then, it is down along side o' the White Horse, and then you turn round by Green's piggery, and you comes bump agin it."

"Why, what a dear lad you are. If you will run on before, and find out for us the White Horse and Green's piggery, I dare say we shall muster a few halfpence among us."

"Oh, won't I!"

At this moment a young man stepped up, and said—

CLAUDE FINDS THE INSENSIBLE BOY NEAR THE HAUNTED MANSION.

"Pardon me, gentlemen; but I think I heard you ask for the theatre just now. Is it so?"

"It is," said Claude, interposing, "and we want a Mr. Clare that belongs to it."

"Mr. Clare, gentlemen? Why, I am that person. My name is Clare.

What can you possibly want with me? Pardon me for being so abrupt; but I really did think I was quite unknown in this part of the country."

"So you are, probably; but if you will cast your eyes on that note, you will see that we have been sent to you."

With this, Claude handed the young man the note which the officer had brought to him in the lane.

"Good Heavens!" he said, "it is from my poor sister. I heard that she was being forced into a most unwelcome match by our mother, who, I grieve to say, is not all that a mother should be. By this note I see, gentlemen, she recommends you to my care. In what possible way can I aid you?"

"By protecting us for a few hours only. We have had the good fortune to perform a signal service for your sister, the particulars of which I will inform you of at greater leisure. Let it now suffice, that on account of that service we are hotly pursued, and that, if taken, our lives are not worth much. Can you by any means hide us, or disguise us, until the men who are on their route to Guildford have left it, and given up the idea that we are here?"

The young man paused for a few moments, during which he was in deep thought, and then he said—

"Yes—yes. I can and will. I am the poor manager of a very poor company of players; and that circumstances, not my poverty, but the fact of my being the manager, will enable me to do something for you. Follow me at once. We will first of all get your horses put up, and then we will to the theatre."

"Let me assure you that every inquiry will be made for us," added Claude. "This is no common danger. If our horses go to any inn, we are lost, for our enemies know that we are mounted, and will leave no stable unsearched."

"That is awkward."

"It is; but if you have any place about the theatre in which you can possibly bestow our steeds, let it be ever so rough, it will be better than going to an inn with them, for that would be at all events to insure their loss, if not our own destruction as well."

"Yes—oh, yes. Come on. There are actual stables at, or I ought rather to say underneath, the theatre, for it has at one time been used as a circus for horsemanship. We will manage all that, no doubt. Come on. I will take you by a back way, so that you may avoid observation as much as possible."

"Do so, sir," said Claude, "and as quickly as possible, for according to our calculations, our foes must now be very close indeed to the outskirts of Guildford."

The manager of the little travelling company that had taken up a resting-place for a week or two at Guildford, at once led their friends down a narrow court, in which they led their horses, and then crossing a piece of waste ground, they made their way to the back of the theatre. There there was a door that by a gentle slope conducted to some old stables beneath the stage. The door was fast, but Jack soon got over that difficulty by picking the lock, and in the course of a few minutes the three horsemen were safely bestowed beneath the Guildford theatre.

To be sure, it was but a very gloomy place, indeed, into which they were led, but it was, in comparison with the inns in the town, a safe one, and the creatures were sufficiently docile to allow their masters, with whom they were in such constant companionship, to take them where they pleased.

"We are much beholden to you," said Claude.

"Oh, no—no. But tell me. Do you really now anticipate any very immediate danger? I mean, do you think there will be an active search made for you in the town?"

"I am afraid there will."

"Humph! Well, at ten o'clock we have a rehearsal of Hamlet. I will order that it shall be a dress one, and if you will allow me to rig you out in costume from our wardrobe, I will defy your most intimate friends to know you. You of course know nothing of the parts, so you must be content to appear in a very inferior condition. We can easily make you into supplementary lords in waiting about the Danish court; or what say you to representing yourselves to be three stage-struck gentlemen of the neighbourhood, who are willing to pay handsomely for being permitted to appear? In that case, I will put up a play for you, and you can appear at the rehearsal in full dress of distinguished characters."

"That will do well," said Claude, "and it shall be no delusion, for we are willing to pay, and will pay well."

The young manager changed colour.

"Ah!" he said, "now you suspect that I was angling for money. You are wrong, on my soul you are, gentlemen. I will not take one farthing."

"Believe me," said Claude, "I had no such suspicion; but you will permit us to put your company in good humour with us, at all events, by our paying them. Do not fancy that we have the remotest idea of accusing you of any unmercenary motives, but you will see that it is the best plan. We can easily do it, so let me beg of you to allow us the gratification of so acting."

"You shall do so, gentlemen, if it so please you; but do not overdo it. A small sum will amply suffice. And now come with me to the wardrobe, and I will do my best to equip you."

They all three followed their new friend, the manager; and since it was not to be thought likely that stage-struck gentlemen would perform any part but one of importance, Claude was equipped as Hamlet the Dane; Dick was accommodated with a royal suit in which to play the king; and Jack, of his own free will, insisted upon dressing for the friar, who has a few words to say upon the occasion of the funeral of Ophelia.

They had all, by the kind assistance of the manager, got on their dresses by the time the players reached the theatre for the rehearsal; and the manager then, leaving them in a private room, said to them just before he did so—

"You will be able from where you are to hear what I say to the company concerning you. They will be upon the stage, and you must give me credit for saying what I consider it to be politic to say, not what I think."

"Say anything you please of us, my good sir," said Claude, "so that you manage to make things agreeable to yourself and to your company. I trust that we shall not be compelled by circumstances to intrude for long upon you."

"It is no intrusion; and the moment they find that you are willing to pay them, you will be most welcome, for that is more than the good folks of Guildford seem inclined to do."

"Do they not, then, patronise the drama?"

"Patronise it, sir? they are brute-beasts—mere animals, sir. They don't know what the drama is. It was only the other night in the middle of Macbeth, that a wretch got up in the boxes, and said—'I'm sure it would be agreeable to the company to have a comic song,' and the proposition being hailed with great delight, I was forced to sing one in the character of the Scottish tyrant. What do you think of that, sir?"

"Why I certainly think that the drama must be at a low ebb, indeed, in Guildford."

"You are right, sir—you are right; but I will now go, and prepare the company for your reception."

With this, the manager went upon the stage, and in a loud voice he said, addressing the company—

"Ladies and gentlemen, we have caught three gudgeons. They are willing to pay ten pounds into the treasury, which shall be equally divided; but they want to play in Hamlet. Has any lady or gentleman any objection?"

"Objection?" cried everybody in chorus. "Objection? Oh, gracious, no! Give us the money."

"I have not got it just at present, but I pledge you my word that it will be forthcoming soon, and that, as regards the equal division of it, there shall be no cavil. The three gudgeons are in the house, and they are dressed, one as Hamlet, the other as the king, and the third as the friar, so you will be so good as to go through the rehearsal with them, gentlemen, with as much gravity as you possibly can."

"Oh, leave us alone for that," said one; "we'll do it. Only think of ten pounds dropping into the treasury, when all we have had for a fortnight has been eight-and-twenty shillings among us."

"Oh, it's quite delightful," said a young lady, who played Ophelia. "The people where I lodge are quite dunning me for three-and-eight-pence, I declare, and how could I pay it?"

"And only think of the predicament I have been in," said the principal tragedian. "I make it a rule to board and lodge wherever I go, and thus save getting into debt to a lot of people, and you only make one enemy when you go away without paying, you know."

"A good plan!" cried everybody.

"And," added the tragedian, "they threaten to cut off the supplies if I do not pay the two weeks that are owing."

"Gentlemen, gentlemen!" said the manager, "not so loud; I am afraid our three friends may overhear us. Shall I call them on, and give them a book each for to read their parts from?"

CHAPTER CCXXVII.

AN ADVENTUROUS OFFICER FALLS DOWN A TRAP AT THE THEATRE.

This little conversation among the players was very amusing, indeed, to Claude and his friends, for they overheard every word of it, situated as they were so close at hand.

"Well," said Turpin, "we shall do some good by coming among these people, at all events; for I think, from what we have discovered, that we shall be the very best patrons that the drama is likely to have in this town of Guildford."

"Not a doubt of it," said Claude. "But here comes the manager; do not let him know that we have overheard the needy confessions of his company: it might sound ungracious."

The manager made his appearance with quite a smile upon his face.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I have made every possible arrangement with the ladies and gentlemen of the company, and they will be most happy to see you all, and go through the rehearsal with you."

"That will do," said Claude; "we will attend you, sir."

"This way, gentlemen, if you please; you will not, perhaps, find our stage appointments exactly what you would wish and expect, but I assure you that from the front, and when everything is well lit up, the effect is exceedingly good."

"Not a doubt of it," said Claude.

The manager coughed loudly as a hint to the company that he was about to bring before them the three liberal amateurs, and they at once ceased the buzz of conversation that had been going on previously, and saluted the new comers with great taste and tact.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Claude, "I am very much afraid that you will find us so far behind yourselves in ability, that you will feel an inclination to laugh at us."

"No,—oh, no!" cried everybody.

"I have only to request," added Claude, "that if you do so, it will be before our faces, as then we shall consider it a useful lesson, otherwise, it might a little disconcert us."

"Laugh!" cried the low comedian, who was going to play the second gravedigger; "allow me, sir, in the name of the company, to state that we never laugh."

"Never, never!" cried everybody.

"That is very satisfactory," replied Claude; "and now I hope you will not feel in any way offended at what I am about to say, and I hope your worthy manager will be so good as to take it in good part."

"Oh, yes, yes!" said everybody; "pray proceed, sir."

"We are, as you see, three friends, and we usually travel together, and as our means permit us to do so, we take good care of ourselves in the eating and drinking way. Now, it so happens that this is the hour at which we usually lunch."

A look of expectation passed from face to face.

"Therefore," added Claude, "as we are here, and as we make it a rule always to lunch in as pleasant society as we possibly can, we hope that you will permit us here, not to invite you all to a stage banquet, but to a real one, compounded of what we usually lunch upon."

A murmur of satisfaction went through the company, and Ophelia told the queen that really he, meaning Claude, was a very nice man indeed, to which the queen, in the most feeling manner in the world, assented.

"Sir," said the principal tragedian, "It is an honour to have you amongst us. Quite an honour, sir."

"You are too good," said Claude. "Will you then permit me to order half-a-dozen bottles of champagne, and a guinea's worth of pastry, from the best sources in the town?"

"Oh, yes, yes," cried everybody, and the ladies of the company almost shed tears at the extreme niceness of Claude.

"Oh, it's too much," said the manager; "it's too much. A couple of gallon of half-and-half, now ——"

"Wretch!" cried Ophelia. "Oh, you low wretch. You nearly take my breath away."

"Well, well; I have nothing to do with it. Of course, if these gentlemen please to be so very generous, I am not the person to stand in the way of their very great kindness."

"Nor I," said the principal tragedian, advancing: "and I can only say, that knowing Guildford very well, I will take upon myself to order the little articles suggested, from the very best of places in the town. It will give me positive pleasure."

"It is very kind of you," said Claude, as he counted out seven guineas from his pocket and handed them to the tragedian, whose eyes brightened at the sight of the gold. "It is very kind of you indeed, to condescend so far; but I believe that will cover the order?"

"It will—it will! Way for seven guineas! way there—ha—ha! Champagne and pastry for the gods!"

The tragedian made a most magnificent exit with the money. Ophelia turned a little pale at the frightful idea that he might not come back again; but she did not like to mention any suspicions of so highly derogatory a character to the company. She only whispered faintly to the queen, who remarked in the same tone, that if he did play such a trick, she would—with her own hands—skin him the the very next time she had the fortune to meet him.

For the honour of the profession, however, nothing was further from the intentions of the tragedian, than to appropriate in any way the guineas to himself; and in the course of a quarter of an hour, he returned with a man behind him with the half-dozen of champagne. How delightful it looked in its well-wired bottles, and no less than two men and a boy with the pastry!

Ophelia shed tears again when she saw this.

A stage table was placed in the middle of the stage, and every description of chair and stool that the place afforded, was brought into a state of requisition. The chairs from the private boxes, covered with dreadfully-faded cotten velvet, were procured for our three friends, and Claude being placed at the head of the table, bowed to the company, and said—

"I hope that the toast I am about to propose, will be acceptable to all present. Jack, tap the wine."

"Yes," said Jack, and pop went one of the corks.

"Success to the drama!" cried Claude.

Bang went another cork, and then there was such a jingling of glasses, and hissing of champagne, as never was seen; and how Ophelia and the queen did eat the pastry, to be sure!

The toast was drunk with all the honours, and then the principal tragedian rose to propose a toast and sentiment.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "when I see myself surrounded by youth, beauty, and talent, like—like I don't know what; and when I observe upon the admirable countenances of those around this festive board a—a—a kind of you know—I feel that I ought to propose ——"

"If you please, sir," said a boy, making his appearance suddenly, and interrupting the speaker as he addressed the manager, "there's two gentlemen as say they is officers of justice, and they say as they has heerd as some gentlemen is here as they wants."

"The devil!" said Claude.

"Can it be possible," said the tragedian, "that the officers of justice are base enough to interfere with persons who can be so liberal?"

"Oh, impossible!" said all the company.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Claude, "the fact is, that this is a wager. We have bet a thousand pounds to a couple of noblemen in London that we would travel a thousand miles with a couple of police officers after us, upon a sham charge of our being highwaymen, which the officers were to be made to believe, so that they should not be lukewarm in their efforts to take us, without being apprehended. Will you help us to win the wager?"

"Oh, yes—yes!" cried everybody.

"Stop a bit!" cried the low comedian. "Stop a bit! I will open the long trap in the stage from below, and if you three stand on the other side of it, the moment the officers come to seize you, down they will go at once beneath the stage."

"Oh, yes, the wretches!" said Ophelia; "I don't wish to hurt them, but couldn't something jagged, and hard, and sharp, be put underneath, for them to fall upon? There's nobody in the world more human than I am, and I merely throw out the little suggestion!"

At this moment, a furious knocking came at the door that led to the stage of the theatre.

"Stop!" cried the manager, "it's just possible enough that disguised as these three gentlemen are, the officers may not know them, and in that case, it will be much better to let them go away again quite quietly as they came."

"We should prefer that," said Turpin.

"Yes," added Claude; "but there can be no objection to the little affair of the trap, notwithstanding; and we can take up such a position by the side of it as will protect us, if you will show us where it is on the stage."

"All's right!" said the comedian; "I will run down and unbolt it at once, and if there is any fuss afterwards, we can easily say that they had no business here, and that the trap was unbolted on purpose for Ophelia's grave."

"Exactly," said Ophelia. "Now you be off at once."

The knocking continued more violently than before, and the manager pointed out the place upon which Claude and his two friends might stand, so as to be quite clear of the trap, and yet so that no one could dart towards them without stepping upon it.

The six bottles of champagne were all drank out, and great havoc had been made with the pastry by this time, so that the tables were cleared away, and the manager, with a studied look of surprise upon his face, went and opened the door at which all the knocking had taken place.

In another moment, two officers, with pistols in their hands, rushed on to the stage.

"How came you to keep us so long at the door?" cried one, with a violent tone. "We shall complain to the magistrates of it."

"But, my good sir," said the manager, "who are you, now you are here? We were in the middle of a scene, and really could not leave off for the purpose of receiving visitors. Pray explain your business, and then be off, for we are engaged at rehearsal, and your presence here is very inconvenient indeed."

"And shameful!" said Ophelia. "You are the ugliest pair of wretches ever I saw in all my life!"

"Dear me, miss," said the other officer, who until then had not spoke; "if we are ugly, thank God our noses don't turn up like some folks, at any rate. That's a comfort!"

"Oh, you odious monster! Do you allude to my nose?"

"If you please, miss."

"Fiend! I appeal to all the world about my nose: I hold up my nose to general inspection. Does it turn up? I ask everybody of an unprejudiced mind if it turns up in the least?"

"That it certainly does not," said Claude.

"It is a vile calumny," said Dick Turpin.

"It is much more of a beautiful Roman nose," said Jack, "than a turn-up one, to my ideas."

"The villains," sobbed Ophelia, "to cast any reflection upon my nose, when all my family have been celebrated for the beauty of their noses; but he must have known that, and so thought he would hurt my feelings through my nose; but it won't at all succeed—brutal as the attack is upon an unoffending female's nose, it won't succeed. I rise superior to it, and I treat it with the scorn it deserves."

"Bravo!" cried the tragedian.

"Come—come," said the principal officer of the two, "this won't do for us. We are after three highwaymen, and some people in the town say that you have strangers here. It won't do, you know, to play any tricks with us, and you will find it rather a serious thing to tamper with the law when it is in pursuit of offenders."

"We tamper with the law?" said the manager. "I should think not. But just look about you, gentlemen, and if you think that any of us poor players are highwaymen, say so."

"Surely," said Claude, "we had better go on with the rehearsal. These gentlemen, while they are prosecuting their own business, cannot have any wish to interrupt ours."

"Who are you?" said the chief officer.

"Jonathan Grogs, sir, at your service."

"Indeed! I think I have seen you somewhere, my friend."

"Very possible."

"Perhaps you have seen me, too?" said Dick Turpin.

"And me?" said Jack.

"And all of us?" said Ophelia. "Perhaps you have seen all of us, you wretches!"

The two officers whispered together, and then one of them said—

"Our information is quite clear and complete regarding the fact of three persons having come here, and we shall be under the disagreeable necessity of taking the whole company before the justices, when there will be such an accurate examination as will either satisfy them or not that you are all what you pretend you are. Resistance is useless, as you will only bring yourselves into trouble by attempting it, and perhaps get personal injury, for we are men who will do our duty let the consequences be what they may."

"You don't say so?" said Claude.

"Yes we do; and insolence will do good."

"Well, I for one won't go," added Claude; "and it will be a bad day's work, to the first person who tries to take me."

"Will it, indeed?" said the officer. Then turning to his companion, he said,—"Watkins, let's have that one first."

"All's right."

They both made a rush at Claude, and stepping upon the treacherous trap, down they went below the stage, calling out murder as they proceeded to the dismal depths.

"Oh, dear," said the manager, "that was the trap for Ophelia's grave! I really hope you are not hurt, gentlemen?"

"Help!—help!"

"Coming—coming. You ought to have asked if all the traps were right, you ought, indeed."

"We will be off," said Claude, in a whisper to the manager. "You will do us the greatest possible favour by taking us to our horses now at once. We have no time to lose."

"This way."

Claude and his two friends darted through a little side-door after the manager, who led them by rather an intricate route to the back of the theatre again. The horses were got out in a few minutes, and Jack said—

"Good gracious, are we to go off in this costume?"

"I did not think for a moment of that," said the manager. Come on, you must change. This way. And yet, I must stay and mind the horses. It's the first door to the left."

"I know the room," said Claude.

They all three made their way to the dressing-room where their own clothes were, and with a marvelous rapidity, such as without some extraordinary impulse to urge them to it, would have been quite impossible, they got rid of their theatrical trappings, and resumed their own clothing.

The manager, accustomed as he was to stage dressing, was quite surprised to see them so soon.

"You are quick, indeed," he said; "mount and be off now, and good luck go with you."

"Take that," said Claude, as he handed him a purse; "take that, and divide it among your company according to your discretion; and believe me, I and my two friends will for ever feel grateful for the favour you have done us to-day."

"Don't mention that; you will put a meal into a number of hungry stomachs by your liberality."

Claude raised his hat, and the three friends set off at a gallop through the high street of Guildford, and were soon clear of the town, and in the pretty country beyond it.

CHAPTER CCXXVIII.

THE ROBERRY OF THE PRIVATE STAGE COACH, AND ITS RESULT.

Claude pulled up when they had got about two miles from Guildford, and burst into a loud laugh, as he said,—

"Well, what think you of our Guildford adventure, Jack and Dick? Was it not an amusing one?"

"It was," said Dick; "I only wonder if the officers' broke their necks down that trap! I never saw people disappear so cleanly in all my life."

"I hope our friends, the players, will not get into any trouble upon our account," said Jack.

"Oh, no,—that is not at all likely," said Dick; "they will not be forced to say anything further than what Claude told them. But what do you think of doing, Claude, now?"

"Why, of making our way to London, and doing the best we can upon the road."

"Agreed.—I'm quite willing. It strikes me that we get on capitally together, and of the two, I certainly prefer this sort of thing to solitude, which was never much in my line."

"Nor in mine either," said Claude; "and I can say for myself, and I am sure I can answer for Jack, that the longer you think proper to stay with us, the better pleased we shall be."

THE VISION OF THE HAUNTED GRANGE.

"Yes," said Jack, "that's about the fact."

"It's a fact, then," said Dick, "that it gives me no small pleasure to hear of, for I was really at times afraid that you might get tired of me and wish me from you; but now I do think I shall stick to you a little longer. Where are we now, Jack?"

"Well, we have got into a cross-road, I rather think."

"There's an inn a little in advance, I suppose," said Claude, "for I can see a swinging sign on a tall post in the road. Let us push on and see what it is."

They rode on, and soon came to as prettily situated an inn as could be conceived. One of the most magnificent chestnut trees they had ever seen shaded the door, and there were four horses standing there, evidently waiting for their riders, who were within.

"It's perhaps worth while to find out who these horsemen are," said Claude to Dick, in a whisper. "Just hold my horse while I step into the inn; perhaps I may see them."

Claude was upon the point of dismounting, when the riders came out of the inn. They were four young men attired in faded finery, and they assumed a swaggering gait that quite astonished Claude. One of them in particular, as he mounted, hummed a song, the burthen of which was,—

"A moonlight night, a moonlight night,
And my pistols bright and steady, O!
'Stand! stand!' I cry, and without sob or sigh,
I pocket all their rowdy, O!"

With a whoop and a shout, the four horsemen then trotted off. Dick and Jack looked at Claude, and Claude looked at them with surprise, and then Jack said,—

"Why, Claude, if we don't look out, we shall be robbed upon the highway by these fellows."

"Upon my word," said Claude, "it looks very like it. What, on earth, can be the meaning of it?"

"And who are they here?" said Dick.

"Perhaps the landlord knows them. I will go into the inn as I intended, and inquire. Oh, here he is, I suppose."

At this moment, a little corpulent man, with evident looks of alarm, made his appearance at the inn door, and shading his eyes with his hand, he looked after the four horsemen, and shook his head.

"Hilloa, landlord!" said Claude, "who are those worthies that have just left your door?"

"Worthies do you call them, sir?"

"Why, perhaps the term is misapplied; but they don't seem the most respectable members of society."

"Respectable? No, sir. Oh, dear, no. I only hope I shall never see them at the White Horse again, that's all."

"Why, who are they, then?"

"I tell you what it is, gentlemen—if you are going down the road, don't do it. Don't do it. You will be robbed—robbed, gentlemen, and, for all I know, murdered!"

"Robbed and murdered?"

"Yes, gentlemen: indeed you will."

"Oh, you don't mean that, landlord?"

"Don't I though! You take a fool's advice, now, for once, and stop at the White Horse. Don't you go any further, now, or else, I assure you, gentlemen, it will be all the worse for you."

"But why, landlord?"

The landlord looked right and left to see that no one was listening to him, and then coming close up to Claude, he said, while Jack and Dick eagerly listened—

"Did you see that one, sir, that was singing a bit of a song?"

"Yes—yes."

"And you heard him, sir, as well? You took a good look at him, I hope, gentlemen, so that you might know him again?"

"We did—we did."

"Then, gentlemen, I can tell you that that person is neither more nor less than—than——"

"Who?—who?"

"The celebrated Claude Duval, the highwayman!"

"You don't say so?' said Claude, making a very great effort to keep himself from bursting out laughing in the corpulent little landlord's face. "You really don't say so, my honest friend?"

"Yes, I do."

"Is it possible?" said both Dick and Jack, affecting to lift up their hands in positive horror at the idea of being in such close proximity to such a dreadful and atrocious character as Claude Duval the celebrated highwayman was to all intents and purposes.

"Yes," added the landlord, who was quite gratified at the impression he thought he had made. "Yes, that was him; and I can tell you it will take me some time to get over the fright. I was told he was upon this road, but I didn't believe it—leastways, I didn't put myself out of the way about it, and only laughed; but now I'm all of a shake. Yes, gentlemen, I am all of a shake."

"And no wonder," said Claude. "But how did you come to make the discovery, landlord?"

"Why, you see, gentlemen, first of all, when they came to the White Horse, I thought they were no good, so I kept a sort of watch upon them—you understand, gentlemen? They ordered a bottle of wine; and just as I took it in, I heard one of 'em say to that young fellow who was singing the song, 'Well, Duval, I hope we shall have good luck.'"

"Indeed!"

"Yes, sir. That's what I heard; and I heard something else, too, and that was, that they were going to stop Lord Whiffle."

"And who is he?"

"Why, gentlemen, he is a nobleman of very great taste, indeed, and a very nice man. He has set up a stage-coach of his own, and it's got up just like any other stage-coach; and his lordship drives it, and people actually think it is a stage-coach at times, and call after it, and that's the joke, you see, gentlemen."

"A very brilliant one certainly," said Claude. "But don't he ever take passengers?"

"Oh, yes, when he is in a funny humour he will take up anybody; and then when they stop he will say 'Pray remember the coachman,' and that's a capital joke."

"What an idiot he must be!"

"An idiot, sir?"

"Yes. Why don't his friends put him into some asylum for the weak-minded? But that is their affair, not ours. Do you really think that Claude Duval intends to attack his lordship's coach?"

"I am sure of it, sir; and I strongly advise you, gentlemen, to stop here till the affair is over, for you don't know what mischief may come of it. I have heard that that Duval is a most desperate fellow."

"So have I. But our business will not permit us to stop. So we must take our chances on the road. What has his lordship's coach upon it, landlord?"

"Nothing at all, gentlemen. You would know it in a moment if you saw it, for there is no reading on it at all. It's quite a plain coach; and sometimes, when somebody hails it, and his lordship stops, he says, 'What do you want?' and the person says, 'Where are you going to, coachman?' and he says, 'Wherever you see it written on the coach panels;' and then the person looks and, looks, and can't see anything, and that's another of his lordship's jokes. You understand?"

"Oh, it's easily understandable, and I really cannot say which of his lordship's jokes is the most admirable. Good-day, landlord: we are much obliged to you for your information."

They trotted off, and the landlord looked after them, shaking his head, and prophesying that they would come to their deaths if they met with Claude Duval.

When they had got some distance from the inn, Claude pulled up, and turning to Dick and Jack, he said—

"Can either of you give a likely explanation of this affair? What, on earth, can it all mean?"

"The only thing I can think of," cried Dick, "is that some fellows have taken to the road and have adopted your name, Claude, as a means of making the business more profitable than probably it otherwise would be."

"Yes," said Jack, "that must be it."

"Well," said Claude, "it's about the only explanation that presents itself of the affair; but I am not going to put up with it quietly, I can assure them. What I do, I will stand the consequences and the repute of; but I am not going to let another bring disgrace upon my name and my courage, by insane proceedings on the road."

"Let us after them," said Dick, "and convince them that it is rather dangerous to travel with such an alias. They cannot have got very far by this time, and we are better mounted than they, for I took a good look at their horses, and I will engage that ours could beat them all to pieces at actual work."

"Come on, then."

Duval was rather in a state of aggravation at the idea that the person whom he had seen should adopt his name. It was really a species of arrogance that he was hardly prepared for; and probably if the jocose young man who had sung the verse of the highwayman's song at the inn-door had come suddenly in his way, Claude would have made him repent most bitterly the assumption of the character that did not belong to him.

Fortunately for that individual, however, he did not happen to come in the way of Claude, and after about a mile's gallop down the road, Jack raised himself in his stirrups and said—

"A coach! A coach!"

"Which way, Jack?"

"Coming on to meet us. There, don't you see it?"

"Ah, yes, I do—and, by George, there are the very four fellows we saw at the inn. Look at them Dick. They are them."

The three friends now stopped and drew aside, so that they were very much in the shadow of some tall trees that grew close to the road-side, and from that spot they were the witnesses to about as curious and amusing a scene as they had ever witnessed.

The coach they had no sort of difficulty in deciding to be that of the facetious nobleman who, in so very small a way, thought himself so very jocular, for it was quite plain, as the landlord of the White Horse had described it to be, and no one was upon it but the apparent coachman, and a lad behind in a red coat, who played the part of a guard. Coming after this coach, which was drawn by four horses, came the personages who had been seen at the inn door, one of whom gave himself out to be Claude Duval. A most amusing race took place, until a pistol shot was fired by one the horsemen, and then his lordship immediately pulled up.

The four horsemen galloped up in a moment. One of them went to the heads of the two leading horses, and held them until the others surrounded the coach. The distance was too great to hear what was said; but the conduct of his lordship was the best joke of all.

He dropped the reins, and scrambled on to the roof of the coach, where he got upon his knees, and in the most abject manner imaginable, held up his joined hands in the attitude of prayer. The lad in the red coat rolled out of the little dickey at the back of the coach, and lay flat upon his back in the road.

"I should like wonderfully," said Claude, "to hear what they all say. Can we not get a little closer?"

"Yes, easily," said Jack. "Let us get through this gate. The meadow continues all the way to the spot of the encounter, parallel with the road, and if we lead our horses, I don't think it is possible that we can be seen."

"Come on, then, at once."

The gate to which Jack had alluded was close at hand, and they soon opened it, and passed through into the meadow. Dismounting, then, they led their horses along the silent turf, and in a few moments were exactly opposite to the scene of the encounter, and only hidden from observation by a clay bank, with a thick set hedge at the top of it.

The noble lord, who was so very facetious, was pleading for his life. The four highwaymen had crape masks on, that concealed the upper portion of their faces completely, and they had pistols in their hands, with which they made a great deal of unnecessary flourishing, to the immense terror of his Lordship of Whiffle.

"Oh, spare my life, gentlemen," he said, "spare my life. I will give you all my money if you will be so good as to spare my life. I don't mean any harm, I assure you, Mr. Highwayman."

"Are you Lord Whiffle?" cried one.

"Yes, sir, if you please. Oh, have mercy upon me."

"Did you not say in St. James's Street only yesterday, that you defied all the highwaymen in England to rob you?"

"Oh, dear, no, sir, you are quite mistaken; I only said I hoped they would be so good as not to stop me, that was all, sir; but I am quite willing to be robbed, indeed, I am, sir."

"Do you know that I am Claude Duval?"

"Oh—ch—oh! I was told you were upon the road, sir, but I did not know you, sir. I have some money, sir; and I only ask for my life!"

CHAPTER CCXXIX.

CLAUDE ROBS THE THIEVES—AND MAKES A LITTLE DISCOVERY.

The abject manner in which Lord Whiffle begged and prayed for his life excited both the amusement and the indignation of Claude and his companions.

"Is it not monstrous," said Claude, "to hear a fellow set such store by his paltry existence, that he will whine and weep in such a way as that about it?"

"It is contemptible enough," said Jack; "but then, you must bear in mind, that he is a lord, and, of course, a legislator for his country, and loves to spend the taxes that the people are fools enough to pay; therefore, his life is of more importance than that of any ordinary person."

"Precisely," said Dick. "But do listen to them. It is as good as a play. I am much amused."

"Oh, then," cried the fellow who played the part of Duval, "you have some money with you?"

"Yes, dear, sir, I have," whimpered his lordship; "and it is all at your service. I have no objection, likewise, to draw you a cheque if you will be pleased to accept of it, and if you will only spare my life—I assure you I never did much harm."

"Why, I suppose, to tell the truth, you are stupid?"

"Yes, gentlemen, if you please, I rather think I am."

"Oh, very well. In that case, then, we will only rob you; and you will, I hope, remember for the longest day you have to live, meeting with Claude Duval upon the high-road."

"Oh, yes; thank you, sir, I shall remember it, and anything else you may be so good as to require of me."

"Well, since you are so submissive, give up your purse; and write the cheque you speak of. Here is a pencil and paper; let it be for five hundred pounds."

"Five hundred pounds? Oh, dear—oh, dear!"

"Very good. You don't like it, and between you and me, I don't think your life is worth one half the money. If you will just hold your head a little on one side so that I may get the barrel of the pistol into your ear, I will blow your brains out in a moment as comfortably as possible."

"The Lord have mercy upon me! I will write the cheque at once, I will, indeed. Oh, dear, it's more even than my coach cost; it is, indeed; but anything to oblige you, sir. Excuse its being a little shaky, but it will be all right, sir."

"Are we going to put up with this?" said Dick.

"Not exactly," said Claude. "I propose that we let this little affair proceed, and when his lordship is fairly robbed and those fellows have left him, we will be after them quickly."

"Agreed."

Poor, miserable Lord Whiffle shook so that it was far from being an easy matter with him to write the cheque that was proposed to him; but he did get through it in some sort of fashion; and having surrendered his purse, his watch, and his rings to the sham Claude Duval, he with a groan said,

"I humbly suppose, sir, that now I may go?"

"Why, yes, I don't see anything particular to stop you now, my Lord Whiffle, and it is only to be hoped that you won't deny at your club in London that you have been robbed on the highway by Claude Duval, that is all."

"Oh, dear no. Anything you like, sir. I won't deny anything."

"Go back, then, on your road, for if you come in the direction we are going, we shall be under the disagreeable necessity of blowing your brains out, notwithstanding all promises to the contrary."

Lord Whiffle was as submissive as any human being could possibly be, and turning his horses' head towards Guilford again, he went off at a trot, shaking so as he did, that the horses, no doubt, wondered who was jerking at the reins in such an odd fashion. But no sooner had his lordship got to a distance that made him out of ear shot, than the four highwayman burst into an uproarious peal of laughter, and seemed so delighted with the success of the adventure, that they could hardly sit their horses.

"It's capital," said one, in a very effeminate tone of voice. "It's capital! How much money have you got out of him altogether, Tom. Let's count it over at once."

"Oh, it's a good lot. But let us get off to London now as quickly as we can possibly do so. We will all go to my lodgings, and make merry upon the occasion.

"That will do—come on."

They set off at a pleasant kind of trot, and Claude, as he looked at his two friends, said—

"Well, I think that they take things coolly, don't they?"

"They do, indeed, said Jack. "But you don't mean to let them go off in that way, Claude?"

"Not, exactly. Let us get into the road, and be off after them, directly. A stern chase, as they say at sea, is a long chase, and it won't do to let them get too far ahead."

"Certainly not, and here is a gap in the hedge, quite convenient to get the horses through. Come on. Hear we are in the high-road, and by this time they must be a mile off."

"Which it will take a good canter of three to make up," said Jack, "so it is no use playing at it."

"Off we go," said Claude, as he put his horse to speed, and in a moment the whole three of them were going at a pace along the road that promised rapidly to diminish the distance between them and the party they pursued.

Claude, by dint of raising his voice and speaking very slowly, managed to carry on a sort of conversation with his two friends, notwithstanding the difficulty of doing so at the pace they were going at.

"I have thought," he said, "of a way of managing the affair, which will afford us no small share of amusement, as well as terrifying the party we are in pursuit of."

"How will you do it?" said Dick.

"In the first place, let us rob them of all their plunder, and of all their own cash likewise, if they have any; and then we can easily find some spot where we can alter our appearance, and come upon them as officers of justice, and give them into custody for the robbery on Lord Whiffle. By that means we shall clear the road of them."

"It will, indeed."

"What say you, Jack—will that suit?"

"Excellently well; and there are our men in advance of us; don't you see them, Claude, down in the hollow, there?— and they don't seem to be at all alarmed."

"Not they, indeed. Why, I do believe tkey see us, and are waiting for us. Perhaps they think they will have some more booty. That would be a rich thing if we were to be stopped on the highway, after all."

"Rather so," said Dick. "Let us try it."

They galloped on now, and sure enough, about a quarter of a mile in advance, they found the four horsemen who robbed Lord Whiffle going on at an easy trot, and conversing together as if nothing were at all amiss. Twice or thrice some of them half turned, and looked rather steadily at Claude and his friends; but they did not stop.

"Jack," said Claude, "you stand a few feet behind us, and prevent them from escaping that way, while Dick and I ride past them, and then suddenly turn upon them."

"That will do," said Jack.

This little manœuvre was executed in a few moments. Jack, with a pistol in his hand, halted, and Claude and Dick rode past the party about twenty paces, and then suddenly turning face to face with them, Claude cried—

"Stand! For your lives, stand!"

The four horsemen immediately drew up in some confusion, bustling against each other as they did so in the surprise of the moment, and one of them uttered quite a scream of alarm, which was truly ludicrous to hear.

"Now, sirs," said Claude, "I will trouble you for your money and other valuables, if you please. It is all the same to us whether you provoke us to blow your brains out first or not; but that is a matter for your own consideration quite."

"Murder!" cried one.

"As you please, gentlemen. As you please."

Two of the party turned their horses' heads apparenty to seek safety in flight, but there was Jack with a huge horse-pistol in his hand, and they saw that their case was hopeless. Claude dashed up to the young man who had passed himself off as Claude Duval, and laying a hand upon his collar, said to him—

"Now, sir, oblige me by telling me who you are?"

"I—I? Who I am?"

"Yes. If you have any courage in you, you will try to do a little credit to the name you have assumed. Are you, or are you not Claude Duval, the highwayman?"

"Oh dear, no! I am not."

"Yes you are, for you have only recently announced yourself to be such; and as I was always under an impression that that was my name, I felt just a little confounded at hearing that there were two of us."

"Oh, have mercy upon me! It was all a joke."

"Rather a practical one though, I should think. But we are disappointed. We did think that you would have had the courage to defend yourselves, and then there might have been a little sport; but this is a very lame affair indeed."

"But we don't want to be killed," said one of the party, in a voice that made Claude and Dick laugh.

"Come," added Claude; "your money and valuables at once. We are not accustomed to delays."

The whole four horsemen gave up, not only the money they had received from

Lord Whiffle, but a considerable sum of their own, as well as a gold watch that each of them had, so that upon the whole, Claude and his friends were very well pleased with their day's work.

"Now," said Claude, let me advise you, by all means, if you try the road again, not to name yourselves by any names but your own; or if you must adopt one, don't let it be mine, for the only thing I would say nothing about, were you to personify me, would be if you were to be hanged."

"And that you may be as soon as you like," said Dick.

The four horsemen looked about as silly as they possibly could, and the rueful manner in which they regarded each other, was most particularly comic, going far to disarm Claude of the rage that he naturally enough felt against them at their assumption of his name on the road.

"Good day," he said; "perhaps you will remember us in your prayers, and you may consider yourselves well off to escape as you have done. It's only, you know, the highwayman robbing the highwayman; and as we have the most right to Claude Duval's booty, we consider that what we have taken from you, we have quite honestly come by."

The discomfited robbers of Lord Whiffle made no reply to this. It was quite evident that whatever joke Claude Duval and his friends found in the transaction, they could see none whatever; and with the most ludicrously chop-fallen looks in the world, they saw all their plunder taken away.

"Now for Oxford!" said Claude, on purpose to give the four discomfited men an idea that they would not again see them, and away the friends went at a gallop, which they did not in the least abate until they got to a turn of the road which hid them from observation.

If his life had depended upon his preserving silence, Claude could not have prevented himself from stopping to laugh; and in a shout of merriment, he showed how much he had been amused at the discomfiture of the four robbers of Lord Whiffle.

"Did you ever," he said, "in all your life, come across such absolute cowards as they were?"

"Never," said Dick, "except Lord Whiffle, who I verily believe would have conquered them all if he had had the courage to flourish his whip at them only. Such fellows as that are enough to bring discredit upon our profession, and yet they must have been tolerably successful, for they had means, and were well dressed."

"They may well be successful," said Claude, "when they meet with greater cowards than they are themselves."

"That's about it," said Jack; "but do you intend still to persevere in persecuting them, Claude?"

"Do I? Yes, Jack, I do, indeed. It will be the finest fun in the world now to take them into custody. Let us dismount in this quiet spot, and make such alterations in our costume as we can, so as to look as like officers as possible. We have seen enough of that sort of gentry, I think, to be able to imitate them pretty well."

"We ought," said Jack.

The vallise which Jack had at the back of his saddle, held quite an astonishing number of articles in a small compass; and as they were all skilfully got up for the express purpose of disguise, there was no great difficulty in accomplishing the object that Claude had in view.

When they all put on brown wigs of quite a different colour to their natural hair, and made a few alterations in their costume, among which was the placing a red handkerchief just within each of their coats in such a way as to lead immediately to the idea that they had red waistcoats, they looked as like officers as they possibly could.

"Have you that little gilt staff, Jack," said Claude, "that we borrowed of a fellow once who thought he would be clever enough to frighten us with it?"

"Yes, Claude, here it is."

Jack produced an officer's staff with its little gilt crown at the end of it, and Claude put it in his pocket, saying —

"If that don't frighten them a little, I don't know what will, for they seem just the sort to be terrified at it. And now let us go after them again just as quickly as we can. This will be better sport than before, though not so profitable perhaps."

THE THREE FRIENDS DISCOVER THE COINER IN THE OLD GRANGE.

CHAPTER CCXXX.

DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS VENTURE A LITTLE TOO FAR.

THE four horsemen, in their intense chagrin at being so effectually robbed of what they had so easily got from the fears of Lord Whiffle, did not seem to have spirit enough left in them to gallop, although they were well-mounted; and by the time Claude and his two friends had gone a couple of miles, they saw them a little in advance upon the wood.

"They will not recognise us," said Dick to Jack; "do you think that we are quite safe in that way?"

"I do; there is but one chance against us."

"What is that, Jack?" said Claude; "what chance is that that you consider to be against us?"

"Why, just think, if they had taken a good look at our horses, they would know them again; but I think they were in too much of a fright to know whether we were mounted on blue, black, or gray steeds."

"That is my opinion," said Claude. "You may depend upon it, that in the state of mind they were in, they were totally incapable of coming to any conclusion of that sort."

"There," said Dick, "they are looking at us now, and, behold! they have come to a stand-still; perhaps they think they will yet retrieve this day's work by a good booty, and they mean to stop us. Let us push on—this will be capital sport."

"Prepare your pistols," said Claude. "I will call upon them to surrender in the king's name, and we will take them on to Ealing, and have them put in the lock-up there for the robbery on Lord Whiffle. Forward! forward!"

He dashed on, and Dick and Jack followed him closely. The four horsemen had drawn up together in the centre of the road, and looked rather panic-stricken at this sudden charge. It was quite evident that there was no recognition of our three adventurers by the party. Claude rode close up to them, and producing the little gilt staff, he called,—

"Surrender, you ruffians, surrender! In the king's name, I call upon you to surrender: you are our prisoners."

The four horsemen looked at each other with dismay upon their countenances.

"Forward, my lads, and seize them!" added Claude; "they are desperate highwaymen, and one of them, is the notorious Claude Duval. There will be a capital reward for seizing him. Shoot them at once if they resist; we must have them dead or alive."

"Stop! oh, stop!" cried one of the party; "we don't at all resist. It is all a mistake."

"Oh, dear, no!" said Claude, "it is no mistake. Lord Whiffle is raising the country on account of a robbery upon him by four highwaymen, one of whom is Claude Duval, and you are the man."

"The devil he is!" cried Dick.

Dick and Jack presented their pistols at the head of the party, and Claude flourished his staff after the most approved constable-like fashion.

The quietest and oldest of the party now, in a loud voice, said—

"My friends, this affair is getting too troublesome and serious, and it is time, now that we have encountered the officers of justice, that we should really explain who and what we are."

"Oh, we know well enough," said Claude.

"No, you don't," continued the speaker. "Is it agreeable to you all, my friends, that I tell the exact truth to the officers?"

"Yes—yes," they all said, and one of them was actually crying and whimpering, much to the disgust of Claude, who said—

"Why, you cowardly rascal, you are not fit to rob a cat on the highway."

"It's of no use disguising the matter," said one. "That is a young lady!"

"A young lady?"

"Yes. The fact is, we are all gentlemen, except Miss Kitty Juniper there, who is—a—a kind of lady, you see."

"Oh," said Claude, "I understand."

"None of your nonsense, Tom," said the lady, "or I'll lay my horsewhip about your back."

"Come—come, Kitty, be quiet. You know you can lose nothing by the affair."

"My virtue," said Kitty. "Think of that."

They all three burst out into a laugh as Kitty said those words, and she got so desperate, that with a little riding-whip she had with her, she began cutting about in all directions, until Dick stopped and disarmed her, and quickly tied her hands behind her back, saying, as he did so—

"Your name may be Kitty, for all I know to the contrary; but I daresay you are Claude Duval's Kitty, and you will be hanged for the robbery along with the rest."

"Not a doubt of it," said Claude.

"But I tell you," said the oldest of the three gentlemen—"I tell you, Mr. Officer, that it is all a sham. We three gentlemen belong to the same club with Lord Whiffle; and only a few days ago he was boasting, as the discourse had turned upon highwaymen, that a dozen of them should not rob him; so we made a wager with three other men in the club that we would stop Whiffle on the road, and rob him, and frighten him out of his life almost."

"And who are you?" said Claude.

"I am the Honourable John Ratchley—that is, Lord Tom Titherleigh, and that is Mr. Lorimer, the M.P., and this is Kitty Juniper, a lady who—who—a-hem!"

"Oh, vengeance!" said Kitty. "This is the way a delicate young creature is to have her character taken away, just because, for a mere frolic, she puts on a pair of what-do-you-call-'ems, and comes out on horseback for a bit of fun."

"Never mind," said Claude. "Bring them along. Character won't matter when you come to the gallows."

"But, good gracious," cried Kitty, "don't you hear that they are gentlemen, you stupid man?"

"Yes, I hear," said Claude; "but I didn't believe one word of it. I believe that one of you is Claude Duval, and that the other two are two notorious rascals; and you, Kitty, I believe, are quite a mild, inoffensive young creature, who will be hanged, as sure as fate."

"Well," said Kitty, "I should only like to have the chance of scratching your ugly eyes out, that I should."

"But, officers," cried another of the gentlemen, "we beg to assure you, upon our words of honour, that——"

"Hold your tongue," said Claude. "We have had quite enough of your assurance. We are too old birds to be taken by such nonsense, as you being gentlemen. We know gentlemen when we see them, and we know highwaymen likewise; so it's of no use your saying anything now about it. We know what you are, and that you will all swing for the highway robbery upon my Lord Whiffle, who defended himself for a whole hour against you, as he says."

"Oh, oh!" cried they all at this. "Why, he begged for his life in the most abject manner."

"Now only listen to these rascals," cried Claude; "they have the coolness to admit the robbery."

"Of course we do; I told you that before."

"Bring them along, then—bring them along. Oh, the villains!—to try and persuade us they are gentlemen, and only did it for a joke,! The law don't understand joking, and no doubt Lord Whiffle will be able to swear to them all."

"Now, get on," said Dick.

"Come, move," cried Jack.

The four gentlemen, for such indeed they were, and had given their real names, found that there was no resource but submission, and they trotted gloomily on in charge of the sham officers; but Kitty Juniper, although her hands were tied, made such liberal use of her tongue, that it was perfectly stunning. She called Claude and his two friends all the dreadful names she could think of, and abused her own friends for bringing her into such trouble as she was then in.

"It's quite enough," said Claude, "to set the question at rest about whether you are gentlemen or not, to hear this woman. No gentlemen could possibly have such a person in their company."

"Your reproach is just enough," said one, "and when we get out of this scrape, she won't find that her conduct has done her any good. We knew she was a little violent, but we did not quite expect to find her what she is. You will find your mistake about us when we can send for our friends."

"Oh, dear, no," said Claude, putting on a look of extreme stolidity; "oh, dear, no, not at all; I suppose you are Claude Duval?"

The unfortunate jokers, finding that it was all in vain to say anything, lapsed into silence, and the whole party proceeded at a brisk trot till they came to Ealing, and Claude led the way to the lock-up in that village.

The news that four highwaymen had been taken and brought in by the officers, spread like wildfire through the place, and it was quite an astonishing thing where the crowd could come from that quickly assembled. Jack whispered to Claude,—

"Let us get out of this as soon as we can."

"I mean to do so, but we must give them into safe custody; then we can be off again. What is all this?"

As Claude spoke, about a dozen persons on horseback appeared in the high-road. Three or four of them had scarlet coats on, and the whole, by their equipments, were evidently on the route to some hunt.

There might, or there might not be danger from all this; and whether there was or not was quickly apparent, for one of Claude's prisoners cried out in a loud voice,—

"My Lord Penthurst, don't you know me?"

"Hilloa!" said one of the huntsmen, "who is that? I think that's Lord Titherleigh's voice."

"To be sure it is. Here we are in custody as highwaymen—will you be bail for us?"

At these words, those who were in the costume of huntsmen, with all their friends who were not, gathered round our friends and their prisoners. Jack turned rather pale, but Dick and Claude kept their ground and their countenances very well indeed upon the occasion.

"Why, what is the meaning of all this nonsense?" said an elderly gentleman in a scarlet coat.

"Nonsense or not, sir," said Claude, "it simply means that Lord Whiffle has been robbed on the highway, and that these four persons are the robbers."

"Oh, impossible!"

"Ask them, sir."

"Yes, we admit it; but it was only a joke you see—nothing in the world but a joke."

The elderly gentleman in the red coat looked rather grave, and Claude said, very mildly—

"It is all very well for a robber on the highway to say that his criminality is a joke, but as officers of justice, we are not in a position to admit of such an excuse."

"Oh, dear no. Certainly not—certainly not. Why, what mad, blind folly has this been."

"Hilloa!" said a stout man, bustling into the throng with a constable's staff in his hand; "what is all this? Who has any prisoners, eh?—eh?"

"I have," said Claude. "Who are you?"

"I am Smithers, the keeper of the lock-up, and if you have a prisoner, you will be so good as to give him up to me."

"With pleasure," said Claude. "Take them all. Here they are, and I and my brother officers will give an intimation of the whole affair to the London magistrates. We don't wish anything but what is right, of course. Come on."

Claude got out of the throng, followed by Dick and Jack closely. There was an odd sort of pause, during which no one seemed exactly to know what to be at; but it sufficed to let Claude and his friends get about twenty yards off. At that moment a sharp gust of wind blew off Dick's hat, and in an effort to catch it, off came his wig. A shrill voice at once screamed out—

"Why that's Dick Turpin!"

"That's a good guess," said Dick. "Off Claude—off Jack—off, and away!"

They gave their horses an impulse forward, and away they went at a tremendous speed. There was a wild shout from every throat of the crowd, in the High-street of Ealing, and the clatter of horses' hoofs upon the track of the three friends came furiously. A pistol bullet went past Jack's head. Another knocked Claude's hat off, and then he turned in his saddle and fired at the foremost of his pursuers. Horse and man both fell, and the next to him could not clear the sudden obstruction, although he made an effort to do so, and down he went, being pitched over his horse's head a considerable distance in the road.

"Hurrah!" cried Claude, for now he was fairly excited. "Hurrah! Who is for a race and an ounce of hot lead in his brains at the end of it? Ha! ha!"

Like the wind, away they sped, and the pursuit was evidently given up, for upon reaching the summit of a hill, Claude checked his horse, and pointing to the valley below, he said—

"There they are. Ha! ha!—they find it safer to talk about Gentleman Jack than to follow him. They had better follow death than me, when they don't give me fair play."

CHAPTER CCXXXI.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURE AT THE HAUNTED MANSION.

"Well," said Dick, "this, after all, is likely to turn out anything but an agreeable affair. I think we had better push on."

"Oh, no—all's right!" cried Claude. "They know a trick worth two of coming after us, now. We are fairly on the hill, do you not see, and should have them at great advantage to ourselves if they were to attempt to attack us."

"Then you think," said Jack, "that there is no occasion to hurry, Claude, and that we may take things tolerably easy?"

"I do."

"I am very glad to hear it, for my horse has become lame, and I doubt whether he would carry me another mile. I don't know what is the matter with him, but I suppose it is something in his foot that he has picked up upon the road, for you see he limps dreadfully."

"I will see what it is, Jack," said Claude.

"Nay, keep your seat, Claude. Just hold him by the bridle, while I dismount and have a look. It is possible enough that I may be able to relieve him of it, if it be a stone only."

"Do if you can," said Dick, "for, notwithstanding we are upon a hill, there is no knowing how desirable and necessary a sharp trot may be in the course of the next hour or two."

Jack dismounted, and by an examination of his horse's foot, found that the mischief was worse than he thought it was. The foot appeared to have got a wound by some means or another, but he could not see that there was anything in it, although he looked carefully.

"Claude," he said, "this is more serious than I thought, and I shall have to put up somewhere in consequence of it. You and Dick had better ride on, and let me shift for myself the best way I can. We can easily appoint some place of meeting."

"No, Jack," said Claude, "that won't do. We must all keep together somehow. How long do you think it will be before your horse is fit for service again?"

"A night's rest," said Jack, "will do it; but I must have that time for the acting of a salve that I will put to his foot."

"Then let us look out for some place of shelter at one. Here is a long shady lane to the right. Let us go down it. We don't know but it may lead us somewhere where we can put up with safety. None of our horses will be the worse for a quiet night. What say you, Dick?"

"I'm willing. Come on."

"Then I will lead my horse," said Jack, as he finished tying a handkerchief tightly round the foot of the animal.

The lane into which they now plunged was one of great beauty. The trees in many places met overhead, forming a natural canopy, through which the sunlight came darting down in long pencils of beauty, and dappled the walk beneath, giving it a most sweet and extraordinary appearance. The sides of this lane were covered with wild flowers, and the birds, with unusual boldness, sung upon every branch.

"Really this is a sweet spot," said Claude.

"It is," said Jack, as he led his horse, and looked with pleased surprise around him. "I can hardly take it to be a lane at all."

"Why, then, what is it?" said Dick.

"Some neglected avenue to some estate."

Upon Jack giving that opinion of the place in which they were, they all halted, and Claude said—

"If so, we are perhaps getting what is popularly call out of the frying-pan into the fire. Is it desirable to proceed any further?"

"Why, yes," said Jack. "Let us go on—I may be wrong; and yet I cannot help thinking that the place has something of the aspect of a once well-kept avenue."

"I agree with you," said Claude. "What is this?"

They all paused to look at what had attracted the attention of Claude by the side of the lane, and they found that it was a statue upon a pedestal, but so completely covered up with wild roses, and other plants and flowering shrubs, that it was only very dimly visible, but it had a pleasing effect.

"This," said Claude, "settles the question."

"What question?" said Dick.

"Why, that this is not a mere country lane. I feel convinced now, that we are in, as Jack says, a made avenue to some estate or house. No doubt, at one time it has been well looked to, and trimly kept, but it is quite clear that for a long time everything in it has been suffered to grow wild."

"Yes," said Jack. "It is evident enough, that folks don't put up statues in country lanes. This is private property, you may depend; but yet I think we ought to go on, and see where it leads to."

"I am willing," said Dick.

"And we can but come back again," said Claude, "if we fine it desirable so to do. It is not at all likely that the place is wholly deserted. Keep your eyes about you both of you, for I don't like this very suspicious stillness."

"What!" said Dick, "are you afraid of an ambuscade?"

"Not exactly, and yet—ah, what is that?"

A strange unearthly kind of cry came upon their ears, and they all paused with surprise, looking at each other for some explanation of the sound.

"What the deuce was that?" said Claude.

They both shook their heads, and Jack, as he looked rather pale, said—

"Do you think that that cry was meant as a warning to us, Claude?"

"A warning of what?"

"Of danger—perhaps of death, if we should proceed further on the course that we are now on. If it were so, we ought not to defy it."

"Oh, Jack," said Claude, "you are like the Athenians of old—you are too superstitious. Now, I don't feel at all inclined to be frightened away from this beautiful spot by a squall such as that we now heard; and as long as the danger is confined to that, it won't stop me. My curiosity is now strongly excited, and I must confess I don't feel at all inclined to go back."

"Nor I," said Dick.

"Very well, then," said Jack, "if you are both agreed, it is not for me to dissent, and I will go on with you; but I feel convinced there is some mystery about this place, whether, as far as we are concerned, it be for good or for evil."

"We will make it for good," said Claude, "whether it likes it or not. Come on. The avenue, for now we ought not to call it a lane, turns more beautiful at each step as we go on, and see, there is another statue half hidden among the trees, as we catch but a faint glimpse of it."

They paused a moment or two, to look at the other statue, which was that of some wood nymph, in an attitude of listening.

"Well," said Claude, "somebody has had this place at one time, as one upon which to exhibit a charming fancy. This walk must have been quite delicious when it was in all its glory."

"For my part," said Dick, "I think, I like it better now than I should have done at the time when it was trimly kept. There is something very captivating to me in this union of art and nature. You may depend that no skill of the most skilful gardener that ever lived, could have wreathed those wild roses round the statues, and the trunks of the trees, as nature has done them.'

"You are right, Dick," said Claude, "and I applaud your taste; but here is a winding turn in the avenue, and ten to one but we came to some fine view now—Hilloa! There it is again!"

The same unearthly sound that had before attracted their attention, now broke upon their ears, and, as before, they all came to a temporary stand still from surprise; but upon this occasion, they had added to the unearthly cry a scream that was evidently human, and in another moment, a boy, in the dress of a peasant, rushed towards them, crying—

"Oh, don't—oh, murder—murder! Oh, don't—oh, oh!"

"Hold!" cried Claude. "Stop, boy. What is the matter with you, that you cry out in such a strain?"

The boy, when he saw Claude and his companions, suddenly plumped down upon his knees in the lane, and holding up his hands, he cried—

"Oh, sir, don't let 'em take me! Oh, save me from them! I won't come here any more—indeed, I won't! Oh, do let me go, sir, if you are one of them!"

"One of what? What on earth do you mean?"

"Come, come," said Jack, as he took him by the arm, "get up with you—We don't want any kneeling. Just tell us at once what's the matter with you."

"Oh, sir, nothing."

"Nothing? and yet you have been making noise enough to alarm the whole parish. What do you mean by that?"

"Oh, dear, I only meant nothing, sir, as there was nothing the matter with me; but lor'! ain't I frightened a bit!"

"What it?"

"You won't let 'em lay hold of me, will you, gentlemen? Oh, don't. They drove poor Dick Stevens mad—oh, dear, yes, they did, and—and I thought I would just go and take a few peaches—they are so nice and ripe at this time—and oh—oh—oh—let me go home! Mercy!—murder! They are coming after me. I know they are. Help—oh, oh, dear—oh!"

The boy clung to Jack with such frantic violence, that if he had felt ever so much inclined to shake him off, he could not have done so, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he was at length calmed down sufficiently to speak to them with any degree of rationality.

"I tell you what it is, my lad," said Claude, "if you don't be a little quiet now, we will take you back to where you came from, and leave you there; so now you know what to expect, you young rascal."

Upon this, the boy would have got down upon his knees again, but Jack would not let him, and holding him by the collar, he said—

"Now tell us, at once, what it is that has frightened you almost out of your small amount of wits?"

"Oh, yes, I will," said the boy. "You see, gentlemen, I'm only a poor boy, and my name is Will Baker, and I live in the village there away about a mile down the road when you turn to the left, as you go past Farmer Hastings's wheat stacks, where there's a pound, you know, and——"

"Come to the point," said Claude. "Bother you and Farmer Hastings; we want to know what frightened you here, and not where you live."

"Yes, sir—oh, dear, yes. Well, as I was a saying, sir:—the boys in the village will have it that there's lots of fruit in the old garden up this ways; and about a week ago, Stevens, sir, he went to get some, and he came home again, and he's been what they calls an idiot ever since; and he only sits and laughs, now, in the chimney-corner at nothing."

"But what frightened him?"

"Nobody knows, sir; and you see, I didn't think that it could be anything much, 'cos Stevens wasn't never very bright, so I thought I would come to-day and get a hatful of peaches, or something of that sort, you see, sir; and I comed."

"Well?"

"Oh, dear, it wasn't well, sir."

"Ill, then?"

"Yes, sir, that's what it was. It was only about half-an-hour ago, that I came up the walk, and got through the hedge into the old garden, and I didn't see nothing and nobody to be frightened at, so I got quite pleased like; and there was such beauties of peaches on one of the old walls—oh, my eye, wasn't there?"

"And the gardener came out and caught you, I suppose, with a good stick, did he?"

"The gardener, sir? Oh, lor! There hasn't been a gardener there, sir, for eight years come Christmas next, they say."

"Who did catch you, then?"

"I'll tell you, sir. The peaches did look so nice, so I fastened my cap to my waist, and got a little way up the wall by the thick stem of the old trees, and held on while I picked some of them. I got down again, and turned round to cut away with the peaches, when, right in my way—oh—oh!"

"Well? What was right in your way?"

The boy shook fearfully, and then in a low half-choked voice, he said—

"Right in my way was a kind of dreadful thing, all bones, with such a dreadful look, and blood coming out of the skeleton eyes and mouth, and the long, bony fingers were put out to catch hold of me; and I dropped my cap and the peaches, and I knew then that that was what had frightened poor Stevens into being an idiot, and I come out of the garden; but they called out after me, for there were more than one of them, and I nearly fell down when they called, for the horrid sound went right through me; and I shall turn an idiot like Stevens!"

"No you won't," said Jack. "Come—come, don't shake so. It was nothing, after all, but your own fancy."

"Fancy?"

"Yes, your own imagination, you know

"Oh, lor, no sir! I ain't got none."

"How many times did they call after you?" said Dick.

"Two times, sir," said the boy.

Dick whispered to Claude—

"What do you think of this affair? There is something in it, for we heard two cries."

"We did; and with you, Dick, I feel that there is something in it, but what that something is, I cannot pretend to say. I will speak closely to the boy."

"Do so. Perhaps you may get some more facts out of him."

"Now, my boy," said Claude, "attend to me."

"I will, sir. Oh, yes, sir, I will."

"Where does this lane lead to?"

"It ain't a lane, sir. It's called the Grange Walk, sir. That's what it is, and it leads to the Grange as has been shut up ever so long, all on account of the ghosts, you see, sir, and that's one of 'em."

"Where?" cried Jack, starting round.

"Oh, it's not here, sir. I mean that was one of 'em as tried to lay hold of me, when I was getting the peaches, and as called out after me in such a horrid way."

THE THREE ADVENTURERS MAKE THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE OLD GRANGE.

"And who lives at the Grange?" added Claude.

"Lor, sir! nobody, in course, lives there but the ghosts. Who would live there to be frightened out of their wits like poor Stevens, and made an idiot to sit in a chimney-corner, and grin at nothing?"

"Not a very pleasant prospect, certainly."

"Oh, no, sir. If you want to go to the village, gentlemen, I'll soon show you the way; and there's the Barley Mow there, ever such a nice public house, as never was, sir. This way, gentlemen, this way."

"Stop a bit," said Claude: "I am very fond of a nice peach, and I feel very much inclined, notwithstanding the ghosts, to go to that garden and get one or two; I think we are in pretty good force to resist anything in the shape of ghosts that may offer themselves; and now that there is such a capital chance of seeing a few in the old Grange, I can't resist going."

"Oh, don't, sir, don't," said the boy, with earnestness; "you can't tell what they may be able to do."

"We will chance that. What say you, Dick, and you, Jack?"

"Come on," said Dick.

"As you please," said Jack; "and if you are both willing, so am I; but we need not drive this lad out of his wits by making him go with us: that would be a needless piece of cruelty and oppression towards him."

CHAPTER CCXXXII.

THE FRIENDS TAKE POSSESSION OF THE HAUNTED GRANGE.

As Jack uttered these last words, the boy looked wistfully down the lane. He was evidently in doubt as to which he should do—go home at once to the village, or accompany Jack and his friends to the Haunted Grange.

"Come," said Claude, "make up your mind. Come with us or be off. If you really have any liking for a peach, you had better come, for I tell you I have made up my mind to have some in spite of all the ghosts that can conspire to prevent me."

"Don't speak of 'em in that way, sir."

"Why not?"

"Because—because, you see, sir, they don't like it, and it is said, that when anybody speaks slightingly of them, they take all sorts of vengeance upon them. Don't, sir; it ain't, you know, gentlemen, worth while to be made idiots of, and sit in chimney corners and grin at nothing."

Jack gave a sort of nod, to the great amusement of Claude, as if he would have said, "I am precisely of that opinion." Dick looked from one to the other of them with a half-laugh upon his face, as though he did not know exactly whether to view the matter in a comic or a serious light.

"Well, I'm going to the Grange," said Claude.

"And I," said Dick.

"And I, then," said Jack, "if it comes to that."

"Well, gentlemen," said the boy, "if so be as you will promise to protect me against the ghosts, I will go too. There is peaches, and good ones I can tell, and perhaps we may get some, and then get away again before any of the ghosts think of interfering with us, you see."

"Nothing is more probable," said Claude, drily.

They all now went up the avenue, and upon making a curved turn in it, they suddenly, through the trees, came into sight of the old mansion.

It was one of the oldest of the Elizabethan structures that adorn England, and was of great extent. Ancient ivy had climbed to the top of its tallest chimneys, and where that leafy screen had not hidden their rich colour, the red bricks still shone out in the sun with all the effect as if they had been but recently put up. There was a kind of observatory at the top of the house, which had a very graceful appearance; and but for the air of desolation about it, and a number of broken windows, the Grange would have been a stately and imposing structure.

"It's a pity," said Claude, "that such a house as that might be is abandoned to ruin."

"It is," said Dick, "a thousand pities."

"Oh, but the ghosts, sir," said the boy; "who likes to hear them following you up and down stairs and wherever you go! Oh, dear no!"

The lad kept so close to Claude, whom he probably thought the bravest of the party upon the subject of ghosts, that the horse was in danger of treading upon his toes each moment, and Claude had to warn him to keep a further distance. Jack still led his horse, and in that way they presently reached the end of the avenue, and saw before them a large and handsomely laid out lawn, in the centre of which there had at one time been a fountain, surmounted by sculptured tritons and sea nymphs, but now its jet was still, and weeds and moss covered every available spot. The grass upon the lawn was intersected and mingled with every description of rank vegetation, wound about in masses. The once trimly kept gravelled walks had yielded to the influence of time, and the grass had grown up over them rankly and luxuriously.

"This is a pity," said Dick, as he glanced around him.

"It is quite extraordinary," said Claude.

"Yes," said Jack, "and—and it only shows you,"—Jack kept a wary eye around him as he spoke,—"and it only shows you what a shocking thing it is to be superstitious."

Claude turned aside to smile at this, for he knew that superstition was Jack's failing.

"Never mind," he said, "Jack; if you can rest your horse here and get what you want for his wounded foot, all will be well."

"That I can easily get," said Jack. "The best thing to put to it will be some bruised leaves of the common flowering mallow, and I see that it is here in abundance."

"Certainly," said Claude, as he glanced around him, "there is no want of that in this place. It seems to be the favourite wild growth of the spot."

"Oh, there's lots," said the boy.

"Well, my young friend," added Claude, "we do not see any of the ghosts yet."

"Don't speak of them, sir."

"Oh, stuff; I am convinced of one thing as regards ghosts, and that is, that the more you are afraid of them the more you may be; and they never, on any account, make their appearance to persons who laugh at them."

"Do you really think so, sir?"

"I do more than think it, boy: I know it. And now you will be so good as to show us the way to the garden where all the peaches are that you speak of, for I long to taste some of them."

"It's this way," said the boy, with a kind of shudder; "but I hope you won't want me to go in, sir?"

"Not if you have any great objection."

"Oh, dear haven't I a big objection? Didn't I see the horrid thing, all bones and horrid blood, that nearly made me an idiot? Oh, sir, don't make me got into the garden. I'll wait here for you, if you please, sir. Indeed I will."

"Very good; only point out to us the way, and I promise you that I will bring you a peach or two for your pains."

"That's the way, then, sir, past that old mulberrry-tree, and right on by the side of the house: you will soon come to it."

"Very good."

Claude had by this time dismounted, and so had Dick. They tied their horses to some iron hurdles that were close at hand, and then on foot made their way to the garden by the route the boy had pointed out to them. They found that they had to skirt a hedge for a considerable distance before they reached a pretty rustic gate that opened into the garden, but the sight that presented itself to their eyes when they did reach it, amply compensated them for all the time and trouble they had expended in so doing.

The garden was of considerable extent, and although time and neglect had evidently done much to injure the neatness of its appearance, it had not been sufficient to destroy it wholly. No doubt, the produce of that favoured patch of ground would have been of a much higher character had it been well attended to; but as it was, there was much to tempt the eye and the appetite.

Clustering fruits hung in luxuriance upon the branches of the trees; a perfect wilderness of flowers adorned the ground; and upon the walls the plum, the peach, and the nectarine hung in profusion.

"Upon my word," said Claude, "this is the first time that I ever thought ghosts had such taste."

"They are well off here, indeed," said Dick.

"Come—come now," said Jack, "it's a subject that is just as well not to joke about, you know, for, after all, what do we know about it? and whether there are supernatural beings or not as long as they don't interfere with us, I think the best we can do is not to interfere with them."

"Very good, Jack," laughed Claude. "If you take the ghosts under your special protection, we will say nothing against them."

"Yes; but——Good Heavens, what is that?"

The same unearthly sound that had before come upon their ears, and which they had almost forgotten, suddenly broke the stillness of the air with the most startling effect, and this time it appeared to be quite close at hand, so that they all three started as its echoes passed them, as though the means by which it was produced were close to their ears.

"This is something more than strange," said Claude.

"It is. It is horrible," said Jack.

"Not so," added Claude. "I will not have it to be horrible. It is curious, but that it is of mortal origin, I feel convinced."

"Mortal?" cried Jack.

"Yes, I will not even yield to superstitious fancies; and if all the noises that earth, sea, or air can make were to combine to appal me, I would not shrink. I will have a peach."

"Oh, don't," cried Jack. "Take my advice now, and come away at once from this dreadful place."

"Not I."

"Oh yes, do, Claude. It is much better."

"No, Jack. You would be, in after time, the first to laugh at the great absurdity of our being frightened by a mere sound. Come, let us regale ourselves off the wall-fruit. You don't want to go, Dick?"

"Not I."

"Come on, then."

As he spoke, Duval plucked two or three peaches, and handing one to Dick, they both began eating.

"Come, Jack," he said. "You see the ghost of the old Haunted Grange has not, after all, the courage to come in person to defend his peaches. You had better eat one. They are truly delicious, I can assure you. Perhaps it is, after all, only boys that the ghost has an objection to."

When Jack saw that Claude and Dick were eating away at the peaches with impunity, he got a little ashamed of his fears, and took on, saying as he did so—

"Why, Claude, I feel quite sure that even you will admit that there is much more in supernatural matters than any of us are well aware of."

"Oh, yes, I admit that."

"Very well then, you ought not to feel surprised if I think more deeply upon such subjects than you do."

"Not at all, Jack—not at all. Only you enjoy with us this delicious fruit, and I shall not say another word to you about it."

Jack ate the peach.

"Now, if you are both of my mind," said Claude, "I shall propose that we stay here long enough to give the necessary rest to Jack's horse, in defiance of all the ghosts of the Grange."

"I say yes to that," said Dick. "But tell me, Claude, have you any suspicions of that boy?"

Claude nodded.

"I have," he said. "From the first I thought that the young rascal was acting a part, and as he went on, felt quite convinced of it. Did you notice how at times he put on the tone and language of a country boy, and then forgetting that part of the performance, he would say a few sentences as well as you or I could for the lives of us?"

"I did."

"Well," said Jack, "I confess that something of that sort struck me; but I did not think it sufficiently clear to make any observation upon it, or to think that it was of much consequence. There is one thing, though, that we have done that, as the catechism says, we ought not to have done."

"And what is that, Jack?"

"Why, if that boy has been playing a part, it is for some ulterior purpose, and we have very kindly left our horses at his disposal.

"The deuce take it!" cried Claude, throwing down the peach he was very quietly eating, "so we have."

"An oversight that," said Dick. "Let us go at once and ease our minds upon that subject. Each moment now will seem to me an age until I clap my eyes upon my gallant four-footed friend again.

This suggestion of Jack's was really so very alarming, that there was something quite ludicrous in the haste with which they all three left the garden that they had been in such rapture about, and rushed in the direction of the iron hurdle railing by the lawn, to which they had fastened their horses about ten minutes before.

One glance was sufficient. The horses were gone!

"Done, by Heaven!" cried Dick.

"Confusion!" said Claude.

"Lost—lost," said Jack, "and all owing to our own want of thought. Well, for once in a way, the whole three of us are thoroughly outwitted. But what's that lying down there? Why, it's the boy."

They all made their way to the lawn, and there, lying upon his face, to all appearances dead, was the boy. Claude turned him over on his back, and then he opened his eyes and looked wildly about him.

"Oh—oh," he groaned, "I am mad now! Oh, save me—save me!"

"Speak," said Claude, shaking him. "Where are our horses? Speak, or I will shake the life out of you!"

The boy made several gasping efforts to speak before he could do so, and then he said—

"Oh, sir, oh! You hadn't been gone above a few minutes when one of them came. Oh, dear—oh, dear!"

"One of what?"

"The ghosts of the Grange. Oh, it was an awful one. All green and fat. Oh, it was dreadful! and the fat ran down its green cheeks; and its tongue was like a flame; and it just pointed to the horses, and they broke away from the iron and disappeared, I don't know where; and then three of them came, and they danced round me—they were skeletons; and then down I went, and then I think I fainted away."

"Indeed?"

"Here are the bridles," said Jack, "hanging to the iron hurdle fence. Look, here they are."

"Broken?" said Claude.

"No. They are unbuckled from the bits, and are quite perfect."

"Indeed! That was kind of the ghosts not to break our reins. Oh, very! Now, my lad, where are our cattle?"

"Lord bless you, sir, I don't know."

"Very good. Dick, will you be so good as to collect as good a bundle of long switches of blackthorn as you can from that hedge? Now, my boy, you will please to come with me just to this young sycamore tree, to which I intend to tie you up comfortably."

"Oh lor, sir, what for?"

"Where are our horses?"

"But I don't know, sir. Oh, murder!"

"Very good."

Claude, with one of the bridles, strapped the highly talented youth to the tree he spoke of, and Dick collected a capital handful of long switches of a highly stinging character.

CHAPTER CCXXXIII.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HAUNTED GRANGE IS SOLVED.

"Oh, lor, what have I done to be wolloped!" cried the boy, when he saw that such active preparations were on foot for the accomplishment of that object. "Oh, dear—oh, dear!"

"Hark you, my lad," said Claude. "It is quite impossible for me to take upon myself to say that you have hidden our horses, or been at all instrumental in their hiding; but you must know. I have the very greatest notion of your abilites."

"My what, sir?"

"Your cleverness and talent. I have that confidence in both those qualities in you, that I cannot help thinking you will be able to hit upon some shrewd conjecture upon the subject."

"Oh, but I don't know."

"Very good. Strip, if you please. Oh, you decline? Jack, will you be so good as to prepare this young gentleman for a little wholesome castigation, which if it does him no other good, will circulate his blood, and so prove very beneficial to his general health. He don't seem thoroughly to understand it himself."

Both Jack and Dick now saw what Claude intended, and as they had their own suspicions of the lad's complotment in the affair of the loss of the horses, they were nothing loth to get the truth out of him in any way that seemed the most likely to effect that object. They entered into the affair with spirit.

"Oh, murder," cried the boy, as he tried in vain to free himself from the bonds that held him to the tree. "Oh, murder! Why should a poor boy be whacked because he don't know where some 'osses is?"

"Ah, why indeed?" said Claude. "Now, Jack."

Jack did not trouble the vivacious youth with any solicitations to aid in his own disrobing, but in a few moments prepared him very nicely for the assault of the twigs that had been collected.

"Now," said Claude, as he flashed the handful of stinging, long pieces of vegetation in his right hand. "Now, where are our horses, my fine fellow?"

"Oh, I don't know."

Whack! came the twigs, and the boy raised a shout that must have been heard half a mile off.

"Where are our horses?" said Claude.

"Oh, goodness gracious, I told you that I didn't know."

Swish, came the twigs again through the air, and the boy bellowed like a young bull.

"Where are the horses?"

"Murder! I don't know."

"Very good."

Claude did not now wait to repeat his question between the strokes of the twigs, but laid on at a rate that set the boy howling and screaching so loudly that both

Jack and Dick were really alarmed; but Claude was not in the least moved to pity. On he went, and after about a dozen strokes, the boy shouted—

"Oh, stop! I will tell."

"Very good," said Claude. "Be quick about it, then."

"Oh dear, the horses are in the old barnhouse. I'll take you to them. Oh—oh—oh! Oh, lor—oh, lor!"

"Now," said Claude, "that is very satisfactorily settled; and if you had said as much half a minute or so ago, you would have saved your skin a little smarting, that I think will last you some days to come. You may now be so good as to put yourself into walking order, and show us the way to this same barnhouse; but mark me, if we see any prevaricating, or any tricks, back you come to this same tree to have the second dose of the same medicine that you now know the taste of so well."

Jack undid the bridle that fastened the lad to the tree, and then, with his face the colour of a peony, and great tears bubbling over his eyes, he led the way from the garden.

Jack and Dick had the greatest difficulty to smother their desires to roar with laughter, and Claude, too, found it no easy matter to keep a grave countenance. The only person of the party who looked as if he were not likely to laugh again was the boy, who had certainly received such a castigation as he could not have had any idea of in his life before.

Fretting, and groaning, and crying as he went, he conducted the friends through a kind of poultry-yard, and then round a corner of the house to a large door that he opened savagely, saying—

"There they are. Oh, dear, I never was so served out in all my life. Oh—oh! Oh, my!"

The three horses were in the barnhouse, standing upon a quantity of stable litter, and looking rather frightened at the intense darkness of the place in which they had been shut up.

"All's right," said Claude. "The lad has not deceived us. Now we are all right again, and you see, my lad, what virtue there is in a good handful of twigs. Whenever you think of playing a trick upon any one, you had better look out if there are any nice little twigs growing in the neighbourhood, and a strong hand to wield them."

The boy cried lustily, for the smart of his castigation had by no means abated; and then he managed to say—

"Oh, dear! I suppose I may go now? You don't want to keep a fellow here, after whacking him at such a rate?"

"Certainly not," said Claude; "you may go as soon as you like now, and I beg that for the future you will remember me."

"Oh, I can't possibly forget," whimpered the boy. "It ain't easy. Oh dear—oh, if I had only know'd this, wouldn't I have seen all these horses further first! Oh—oh!"

Still ejaculating in his misery, the boy walked away, and when he was out of hearing, Dick said—

"Would it not have been as well, Claude, to have brought that lad with us? He may now give notice of our being here to some who may be enemies."

"Why," said Claude, "it was rather difficult to know upon what pretence to detain the fellow now. Besides, I am quite convinced that he is in some sort of connection with the choice spirits who haunt the old Grange."

"What do you mean?" said Jack.

"Why, I mean, Jack, that I am of opinion the Grange is haunted; but that the ghosts are beings of flesh and blood like ourselves, and that we have not much to fear from them. But now we have our affairs in our own hands again, by the possession of our horses, and we can either go or stay. What is your opinion, Dick?"

"Why, I think that we had better stay, if it is only for the purpose of getting Jack's horse's foot to rights."

"Ah," said Jack, "that is a reason which goes far, indeed, with me, and stay we must, I fear."

"Very good," said Claude, "then it is settled in the affirmative; and I propose that we take the horses into the house at once, and place them in one of the lower rooms. In that barnhouse there was plenty of straw."

"Yes," said Dick, "and there is a good hay-stack close by the lawn, that, no doubt, is the produce of a meadow that lies beyond it; so we can give them a sort of feed."

"Be it so, then," said Jack. "I will set about preparing the dressing for my horse's foot; and if it be possible to give it a night's rest, it will be no bad thing, and in the morning we can all start fresh from the place; but my own private opinion certainly is, that we shall not be permitted to pass a very quiet night."

"It's a good thing, then," laughed Claude, "that we are used to unquiet ones, Jack. Let us come into the house and see what sort of accommodation we can find for man and beast within the walls."

There were several rooms that evidently looked out upon the lawn, and several doors that opened from that side of the building, so that there could be no great difficulty in making an entrance to the Grange. After trying a couple of doors, and finding that they were undoubtedly fastened within, Claude made his way through one of the windows, and with a pistol in his hand, with which he determined to give a warm reception to any one who should attempt to impede his progress.

The door that he determined upon opening, was not far off from the room into which he had managed to penetrate, so that he reached it in a moment or two, and drew back the two bolts that held it fast, and flung it open to his friends.

"All right?" cried Dick.

"Yes," said Claude, "the house is quiet enough. I have seen no one, mortal or immortal, as yet. Bring in the horses. We can easily put them in one of the rooms, here."

The horses were led into the house, and Claude opened the door of an apartment, that no doubt at one time had been a very handsome refreshment-room, but which was then in a sadly dismantled condition; some of the old furniture yet remained in the room that had been fitted to it, and that would have been quite useless if removed; but those who had at one time inhabited the mansion, little imagined that that room would ever be turned into a stable for the horses of three highwaymen.

Claude examined the lock, and found that it was in tolerably good condition, with the key in it.

"This will do," he said, "and all we have got now to be quick about, is to get in some hay and straw. I think it would be bad policy, after what has happened, for all three of us to leave the house at once, so two can go for the hay and straw, while one remains as guard here, and we can take turn, and turn about in the duty."

This was agreed to, and Dick and Jack went first for the hay and straw, while Claude remained with the horses, and then while he went, Dick remained, and then it came to Jack's turn; and by the time they had made the three journeys, they had got as much as the horses required, and on the floor of that really handsome room, a comfortable bed was made for the cattle.

Jack went out to the garden and got in a number of leaves of the mallow, with which he made a dressing for his horse's foot, and then they felt that they had done all that they could for the comfort of the animals, upon whose health and strength so much depended.

"And now," said Claude, "that we have done our duty—and I mean to say that it is no more than our duty—to our horses, what sort of cheer, Jack, can you give us for ourselves? I am well aware that you generally have something in the vallise good to eat and to drink."

"Yes, Claude, it is well that I look after that department a little. I happen to be provided with a bottle of wine, as good old port—if I may judge from another that came from the same place—as ever you tasted, and a few biscuits. Beyond these materials for keeping the enemies, hunger and thirst, at bay, I have nothing."

"We won't complain," said Dick. "We might do a great deal worse than have a meal off port wine and biscuits. Come, Jack, unpack, and let us fall-to, for I confess that for once I have a good appetite."

CICELY WELCOMING CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS TO THE FARM.

"And I," said Claude.

"Well," said Jack, "I could do a little, I think, with the wine myself."

With this, Jack unpacked the vallise that he always had at the back of his saddle, and produced the bottle of port and the biscuits.

"It won't be any the better," he said, "for the shaking it has had; but I can't help that, you know, as it was forced to travel on horseback; but it is one of your light wines, that fortunately has little crust, so it may be better than one expects."

"Any port in a storm," said Dick, perpetrating a very old joke indeed; "so let us have it, Jack."

They dispensed with a cork-screw by very cleverly knocking off the head of the bottle; and then as Jack had likewise in his vallise a little portable drinking cup, they were able to help themselves from the bottle very comfortably.

Claude sat upon a table in the room, and Dick threw himself into the recesses of an old arm chair that had once been covered with rich velvet, and Jack sat upon the seat of a very low chair, that had been made, no doubt, for devotional services, and was of that description commonly known on the continent by the name of a Prie Dieu. It was, truly, a strange scene that to see those three men and the three horses all in that room, with its remnants of faded past magnificence upon every portion of it.

"Well, Jack," said Claude, "give us a toast."

"I——"

Jack had only just opened his mouth to reply to this, when there arose in the house such a dreadful yell that they all instantaneously started to their feet. Claude was off the table in a moment. Dick struggled out of the depth of the arm-chair, and Jack, after rolling on the floor with the devotional chair, got to his feet, crying—

"What's that? What's that?"

"Hush!" said Claude. "Hush!"

To describe that sound which had so startled them would have been utterly impossible, because in such description we can only proceed upon comparisons, and there was nothing like unto it. In all their experiences, neither Claude, nor Dick, nor Jack, had ever heard anything that at all approached it. It was a yell that no one for a moment could believe to be human; and for some moments the echo of it seemed to pervade the whole atmosphere of the place, and to have taken entire possession of their brains. The horses started with affright, and one of them made a dash across the floor of the room, and had to be caught by Dick, who had some difficulty in soothing the creature. The other two trembled excessively.

"What in the name of all that's horrible," said Jack, "can be the meaning of this?"

"I will find it out before I leave this house," said Claude, "or I will know some very special reason why. I will not be made the fool of a mere sound in this way.""

"Nor I," cried Dick. "I am quite convinced that there is something in the shape of trickery in this matter; and I think with you, Claude, that we ought not to dream of leaving this house until we have found it out."

"Oh, be careful," said Jack, "what you do and what you say. There is certainly more in Heaven and on earth than we know of. How can we take upon ourselves to say what that sound was?'

"No how, Jack;" said Claude, "but if it really should proceed from supernatural beings, I cannot conceive what gratification it can be to them to terrify our horses, and attempt to terrify ourselves."

"Hush! Do not speak of them in such a way. Oh, Heaven! there it is again!"

A second time the wild shout came upon their ears, and the horses, now thoroughly alarmed, snorted and made an attempt to dash out of the room through one of the windows. It took all that both Claude and Dick could do to stop them, and then Claude cried—

"Oh, that I had kept that boy here! Who knows but that another application of the twigs would have procured from him a solution of this mystery as it did of the other connected with the disappearance of our horses?"

CHAPTER CCXXXIV.

CLAUDE AND DICK SEARCH THE OLD GRANGE, AND ENCOUNTER A GHOST.

"THIS sort of thing," said Claude, "will not do for me. The evening will soon be here, when anything that may be attempted against our peace may be done with ten times the facility that daylight affords. It is necessary that we should settle all this affair before night."

"And it shall be settled," said Dick. "I am not going to be made a fool of by a mere noise."

"You both speak," said Jack, "as if you felt quite assured that the noise you have heard was mortal, and was a mere human contrivance. You cannot take upon yourselves to say it is such."

"Jack—Jack," said Claude, "once more I beg of you not to give way to superstition. I do not see that we can do anything else but, with our pistols in our hands, search the house through; and the sooner such a job is set about the better. Jack, will you mind the cattle while Dick and I go through the building?"

Jack evidently hesitated.

"Well," added Claude, "shall I go alone?"

"Not so," said Dick; "that would be hazardous. Suppose we carefully fasten up this room and all its windows, and then the whole three of us can go? I think that will be the best plan. We can take such measures as to make the room pretty secure."

It was evident enough that Claude did not much relish the idea of leaving the horses; but as it was equally evident that Jack was really not in a frame of mind to be left alone in case of any attack upon them, that he might consider in his heated imagination to be supernatural, there was no other resource but for them all to go on the expedition through the house, for neither did Dick like the idea of not going, nor did Claude fancy being without so bold and efficient a companion in the adventure.

"We must chance it then," said Claude, "and all go. Help me, Dick, to secure the windows of the room as well as possible. Oh, there are good shutters, I see, and strong fastenings. There will be no difficulty, and now I leave the cattle with something like confidence."

The room was well fastened up, but Jack was rather silent, for he could not help feeling that he was rather to blame for his superstitious fears; nevertheless he could not get sufficiently the better of them to insist upon staying with the cattle, and Claude said to him, kindly—

"It's all right now, Jack. See, I have locked the door, and both lock and door are strong, so that there need be no fear for the horses. Besides, I believe that we shall give whoever is in the house quite enough to do, now, to induce them to let our cattle be."

"I hope so," said Jack.

"Cheer up, Jack," cried Dick. "You will be the first to laugh at all this to-morrow, when we have found out what is the meaning of it. I quite agree with you, Claude, that if we only had that boy here again, we should find out all about it by virtue of the twigs that in so miraculous a manner brought us to the barnhouse where our horses were hidden. That one circumstance is quite sufficient to convince me that the whole affair is of mortal origin."

"And me, likewise," said Claude; "and if Jack will but think a little, it will convince him too. Come, Jack, what say you to that?"

"I own it staggers me," he replied; "but then, what possible explanation can you give of that truly awful noise?"

"None, at present; but we shall not be for long, I hope and expect, in that state of ignorance. If I mistake not, we shall soon find out all about it; and now let us commence a systematic search of the old house."

It was a great advantage to them that they had still daylight in which to prosecute their search in the Grange, for there were none of the uncertainties and the shadows of an artificial light to perplex their perceptions. Moreover, the very presence of daylight is such a foe to superstitious fears, that even Jack could not feel what he might have felt if the sun had fairly sunk.

Immediately outside the room in which they were, was an irregularly-shaped kind of hall or passage, from which opened a variety of doors. At one end of the hall or passage, there were steps, conducting to the domestic portion of the house, which seemed to be just a little below the level of the other part. From the middle of the hall—taking a grand sweep into it, so as to have an imposing commencement—was the staircase that led to the upper floor.

When the three friends got fairly into the hall, they paused to listen if there were any sounds in the house which might guide them in their operations; but after about a minute thus spent, they heard nothing, so that they could only proceed as systematically as possible in searching the various rooms.

"Come," said Claude, "we will look through all the rooms on this floor first, and I should advise that we take some means of propping all the doors open as we proceed."

"That will not be at all difficult," said Dick. "Here are plenty of bits of wood and litter of all sorts lying about, with which I will, with the aid of my knife, fashion a few wedges that will answer that purpose well enough."

While this was being done, Claude opened the door that was the nearest to him, and walked into a room that was of beautiful proportions, and still very handsome in some of its decorations. At the farther end of it was a large glass door, that opened into a conservatory.

He glanced round the room, but there was no indication of the recent presence of any one.

"Push open the door, Dick," he said. "It's all right here."

"Stop a bit," said Jack; "before we proceed any further, I see that there is a door that leads to the offices from the hall here. I propose that we fasten that up as best we may before we go any further in our search. There is a key in the lock, and a bolt upon this side."

"Do it, Jack. It is a good thought."

Jack advanced to the door, and had just got the bolt shot into its socket, when from some upper portion of the house, as they thought, there came two of the most dreadful shrieks that any of them had ever heard. These two sounds differed very much from the strange cry that had before made the house vocal with its echoes.

"Ah!" cried Claude, "they are trying it again."

"Good gracious!" said Jack; "but those cries are horrible!"

"They may be; but I am not going to be shouted or scared out of this house. Come on. Let us continue our search."

Jack looked very pale, indeed; but he made no sort of opposition to the search being carried on through the house, although both Claude and Dick knew perfectly well, of course, that he would much rather have been out of it. Claude thought that as those cries had come from the upper part of the house, they were either made for the purpose of preventing their ascending the staircase, or to attract them up at once, so as to stop them from pursuing their search in those rooms on the ground floor, where they had thus begun it; so he resolved to disappoint both expectations by gently continuing the search where he was, and when that was concluded, but not before, ascending to the upper rooms.

Dick, with one of the little wedges that he had made, effectually propped open the door of that first room that they had examined, and then they passed through it, and took a look in the conservatory beyond; but all was quiet there, and as the conservatory only opened again into the garden, they did not think it worth their while to proceed further in that direction.

Returning, then, to the hall, they opened another of the numerous doors leading from it, and, suffice it to say, that they went into no less a number than seven rooms—all of which were, more or less, in a state of delapidation—without being rewarded for their perseverance, with any discovery.

"So far so good," said Claude, "and we have found out nothing. Now for up stairs. I think if we are to have any success at all, it will be there, surely, since we have not achieved it here."

"I do sincerely hope," said Dick, "that we shall not be obliged to leave this place without discovering what it is that has produced those diabolical sounds. I should feel very much dissatisfied, indeed, if we could not find out the author of them."

"Never fear," said Claude. "A little perseverance will do wonders."

"I don't know," said Jack. "If those sounds are produced by mortal agency, I grant you then, that there will not be much difficulty in finding out who has produced them; but that is of itself a point that you know is not settled."

"Quite settled, Jack," laughed Claude; "so now let us come up stairs at once."

They ascended the grand staircase, but they had not got above half way up it, when one of the strange cries, similar to those that they had at first heard, came upon their ears. Jack was compelled to hold by the balustrade of the staircase to save himself from falling, and both Claude and Dick, so really terrific was the sound, could not at the moment keep from feeling something like alarm.

"What on earth can it be?" said Claude. "I will not be made a fool of in this way any longer."

Raising his voice then, he cried loudly—

"Be you whom you may, and let your object be what it may, I warn you that we are not to be terrified by cries or shrieks. There is not a room in this house into which we will not penetrate; so you must adopt some other mode of scaring us than by ugly cries."

After this speech, Claude waited with the expectation of there coming some sort of answer to it; but in that he was disappointed, for all was profoundly still as before.

"Come on," cried Claude, "come on," and he sprang up the remainder of the stairs, and reached the landing-place, from which opened several doors. The moment Claude laid his hand upon the lock of one of them, he heard a voice from within say—

"Help—help! Oh, will nobody save me?"

Claude dashed the door open, and made his way into the room, where he found, to his great surp ise, a lad of about fourteen years of age, securely tied to a table that was in the centre of it. The lad was crying bitterly; and when he saw Claude, he called out—

"Oh, don't kill me—don't kill me!"

"Who are you?" said Claude.

"Oh, dear, sir, take me away—do take me away from here! I will never come any more to the garden!"

"Oh, you have been in the garden, have you?"

"Yes, sir. My farther is Mr. Dale in the village; and I came a birds-nesting, sir, and a man told me if I came into the house he would show me an owl's nest, and so I came; but when we got into this room, his face all changed into a skeleton's, and he put his dreadful mouth close to my ear, and made—oh, such a frightful cry, that I think I must have fainted away; and when I came to myself, I found that I was tied to this table. Oh! gentlemen, come with me to the village, and my father will be so thankful, and so will my poor mother, gentlemen, for they don't know where I am; and my father will come back and help to look over the house, and bring his friend Mr. Clements with him, too, so that it will be much better."

"Dear me," said Claude. "It was too bad to frighten you in such a way, my boy."

"Oh, yes, sir, it was; but come away at once, gentlemen. I will show you the way out, and then we can all come back again and search the house."

Claude whispered a few words to Dick, who immediately left the room rather to the consternation of Jack; and then Claude said to the boy—

"I suppose, after what has happened to you here, you would like very much to find out all about it—who it is that makes the strange noises, and all that sort of thing?"

"Oh, yes, sir, I should indeed like it. And by the time we come back it will be all right, no doubt, sir."

"Not a doubt of it. Oh, here you are, Dick."

"Yes," said Dick, as he re-appeared with the bundle of twigs that had been use in the castigation of the other boy. "Yes, it's all right. Here I am, Claude, and here is the persuader."

"Now," said Claude to the boy, "I will show you a much readier way of getting at all the information you require, and that we require, likewise. It is not worth while for us to go to your father, nor to his friend, Mr. Clements. Jack, will you hold his heels, and Dick, will you hold his arms? and between you, it will not be at all difficult to make him lie on this table, as I have loosened the cord that held him to the leg of it."

"Oh, dear!" said the boy, "what are you going to do? I will go home to father at once, if you please, gentlemen."

"We want to know," said Claude, "the meaning of the strange sounds in this house, and how they are produced, and by whom?"

"But, lor, sir! how should I know?"

"Up with him!" said Claude.

Jack and Dick lifted up the boy, and placed him upon the table; and Claude rendered him to a condition, as regarded apparel, in which the switches were likely to be very effective.

"Now, my lad," said Claude, "I shall not trouble myself to keep asking you. You are quite well acquainted with what we want to know, so you can stop these proceedings at once by telling us. Is all right, Dick?"

"Yes; all's right."

Claude immediately applied the twigs, with an energy that made the boy burst into such a roar, that it was perfectly ludicrous to hear him; and after about half a minute he could stand it no longer, but shouted out—

"I'll tell! I'll tell! Oh, I'll tell!"

"Very good! Go on, then," said Claude.

"It's my father who is here. He is a coiner, and I'll take you to him, and he makes that horrid noise by blowing through a large cow's-horn. Oh, dear! oh, dear! I didn't think I should come to this. It's very horrid! Oh! Oh! Oh! Let me go; do, sir, let me go! I can't stand any more of it."

CHAPTER CCXXXV.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS ARE COMPELLED TO GET RID OF THE COINER.

Jack and Dick were so very much amused at this capital plan of Claude's in the way of getting information from boys, that they roared again with laughing; and, probably, Jack now laughed, or affected to laugh, the loudest, for he felt thoroughly ashamed of his fears upon the subject of the haunted house, and was afraid, now, that Dick and Claude might refer to them.

"Oh, that is capital!" he cried. "Capital!"

"And so," said Dick, "it is by bellowing through a cow's-horn, that the noise is made?"

"Oh, dear, yes," said the boy. "The other boy you met was my brother Bill. Why didn't you whack it all out of him, instead of giving me such a teaser?"

"Why, my lad," said Claude, "we did try it with your brother Bill, and found it equally successful as with you, so far as we asked him for information."

"Oh, dear! then he ought to have told a fellow how you managed things, that he ought. I never was so served out in all my life behind, before."

"You have your own obstinacy to thank for it; and now, as you have explained all that we want to know, you will perhaps be so good as to fulfil your promise of taking us to your father, the coiner. Come, will you do so?"

"Oh, dear, yes," said the boy, who had now scrambled off the table, "anything you like, sir, so that you put those twigs away."

"Oh, you don't like the look of them?"

"It ain't the look of them, sir," said the boy, as he made a wry face. "It's the feel of 'em."

"Very good—I have no wish in the world to administer another dose, unless it should be absolutely necessary. It was a very ungenerous thing of your brother Bill, not to give you due notice of our mode of transacting business."

"Oh, yes, sir, it was; but then you see, sir, he was afraid I might laugh at him, and I dare say he wanted me to catch it, too. That was it! Oh, dear! Oh, dear!"

"Lead on, then, and we will follow you."

"This way, gentlemen, this way. I am rather in for it now, I think, for I suppose, when you are gone, father will begin upon both me and Bill, so I think the very best thing we can do is to run away."

With this sagacious remark, the boy led them from the room on to the landing-place again, and after proceeding some little distance, he came to a door, at which he tapped three times in a very peculiar manner. A voice from within immediately said—

"Is that you, Joe?"

"Yes," said the boy, mournfully. "Oh, yes, it's me. I only wish as it wasn't, that's all; and that somebody else felt what I feel now."

The door was opened after a little fuss in undoing what, no doubt, were some very secure fastenings on the inside, and a man, with a very grimy face, made his appearance. Claude and his friends had remained perfectly still, so that he had no idea that there was any one there but the boy, and the moment he caught sight of the strange faces, he called out in a loud voice—

"Ah! am I betrayed at last, and by my own flesh and blood, too?"

"No!" said Claude. "Don't be hasty—It is not so. This boy has been enforced to conduct us to you. But lay aside your fears; we will not be of any disservice to you. Our intentions are by no means against you. All that we want is to remain here, and rest ourselves in peace and quietness for the night, and your secret will be quite as safe in our keeping as in your own."

"How am I to know that?"

"No how, except by experience of the fact; but a fact it is for all that. We are not men who care one straw whether you make money one way or another."

"If I could only feel assured—"

"Pho!—pho! man, you may feel assured. Here are three of us, well armed, and if we meant you any mischief, I should rather think there would be no occasion to temporise with you, or to lie about it."

"That is true."

"Very well. With that belief, then, you had much better put your mind at ease concerning us."

"I will. And I am armed, too; but what could I do against so many?"

"Nothing, but make a fool of yourself."

At this juncture, the boy thought it necessary to say something to his father in vindication of himself, and in a whining tone, he said—

"Oh, father, I couldn't help it. I should have been all cut up into bits soon if I had not told all about it. Indeed I should, father."

The father looked at him angrily.

"What do you mean," he said, "by being forced to tell all about it? You do not mean to tell me that you had anything really to fear from these three gent emen?"

"Oh, yes, he had, though," said Claude.

"What? You do not mean to tell me that you would have taken the life of a boy for keeping his father's secret?"

"Certainly not. We have a much better plan than that. We did not attempt by threats to induce him to tell, nor would he have yielded to them very probably; but we appealed to his sensations in another way. Did you not hear a noise?"

"I heard some one roaring out as if in pain."

"Oh, lor!" said the boy, "that was me, and wasn't I in pain, neither!"

"Yes," added Claude. "We whipped the secret from him, and found it wonderfully effective."

The man bit his lips, and looked vexed; but after a moments pause, he said—

"It is ridiculous of me to say, now, that I will trust you, for I cannot help it. Pray come in, and make yourselves at home in this room, which has not been intruded into by a stranger for many a month. I am a coiner of base money, I freely confess it; and by terrifying the country people regarding this house, I have made them all ready to swear that it is haunted, and they will not come near it, so I have it all to myself."

"Exactly; but we are not the right sort to be frightened; so you see, here we are; and if you keep quiet, you may go on to-morrow just as usual."

With these words, Claude and his companions stepped into the room, where they found a fire lighted, but no indications of the employment of the coiner. He was quite alone, too, and Claude said—

"Where are your tools? If you manufacture base money, you must have the means of doing so."

"Yes; but as a matter of common caution, when any one approaches the place, I conceal everything as quickly as I possibly can. I do not intend to remain here myself, for, however I have braved it out for a length of time, now I am quite convinced that there are noises in this house which are not human."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. I am sorry to feel obliged to give way to such a belief, but circumstances force it upon me."

As he spoke, Claude, without appearing to do so, kept the most careful watch upon the actions of the man without appearing to do so, and he saw that he put his hand behind him, close to the wall, and touched a bell pull that hung to it. The moment he did so, there came from the lower part of the house one of the horrible sounds which had been explained by the boy while he was under punishment, but which the coiner did not know was so well now understood by his visitors.

"Oh, there it is!" he cried. "There it is! Tell me, my good friends—oh, tell me, if you can, what you can ascribe that dreadful noise to? It appals me!"

"What, that bellowing we heard just now?" said Claude, in the most indifferent tone he could assume.

"Yes, oh, yes."

"Oh, that's somebody blowing through a cow's-horn, I am quite convinced. I have no doubt at all upon the subject. It is your son, Bill, I shouldn't wonder."

"The devil!" said the coiner.

"Come—come," said Duval, "it is of no use your trying this sort of thing any longer with us. We don't intend to be frightened out of the house; and if there should happen anything that we don't quite understand, our friend Joe, here, will explain it to us after a little persuasion with a few twigs."

"Oh dear, don't think of it," said Joe.

The coiner shook his head.

"Humph!" he said, "so I find he has told you all. Just you wait a bit, Joe, that's all. You and I can come to an account to-morrow."

"There," said Joe, "I said so. I shall catch it from everybody now, and be flayed alive, that I shall. Oh, I can't stand this sort of thing. It's too horrid."

"Allow me," said Claude, "to intercede for Joe. In a ridiculous kind of way he has been quite sufficiently already punished, I assure you. It was not possible that he could hold out against the inducements we offered to him to tell us all."

"Not possible?"

JACK PERCEIVES THE OFFICERS MAKING FOR THE FARM-HOUSE.

"Oh, no," said Joe, "I'm quite sure of that."

"Under such circumstances, then," added Claude, "and as no real harm will come of it, I hope that you will forgive him, and take no further notice of it."

"I presume I must."

"And Bill, likewise, for he has been subjected to the same persuasion; and under great compulsion that way, he told us where our horses were hidden."

"The rascal ! he came here and said you had gone about yourselves till you heard one of them neighing, and then, of course, lit upon where they were."

"Oh dear, no. It was quite the contrary. It was Bill's neighing that gave us the information."

At this moment a footstep was heard upon the stairs, and then the father cried out—

"Is that you, Bill ?"

"Yes, father. Have they gone away ?"

"Come here and see."

Bill bounced into the room, and he was tolerably staggered to see Claude and his friends there.

"Well, Bill," said Claude, "where is the cow's-horn ?"

"Oh, lor !"

"You did that last bellow pretty well, but it did not come near up to the natural shout that you made when you were tied to the tree below, did it now ?"

Bill looked uncommonly sheepish, and Joe, with a look of some satisfaction, said—

"Well, I am glad that you had it as well as me, Bill, so you can't laugh at me now, you know, old fellow, and you told about the osses, if I told about father and the cow's-horn."

"Yes," said the coiner, "all is known now; but these gentlemen say they will keep our secret, so get a table ready, and let us see how we can manage to entertain them, my lads. We owe them some sort of reparation for the trouble that we have given them."

"A great deal too much trouble they have had," said Bill. "If I could only have thought they wouldn't be in the way, I should have liked to spare them one part of their trouble, since they have been about this old place."

"And so should I," said Joe, with a rueful look.

"Let bygones be bygones," said Claude. "I will make you some amends for the twig business before I leave the house."

"You are very good, sir," remarked the coiner, "but, indeed, they don't deserve anything. Come, boys, bustle—bustle. We will do the best we can, at all events, although our larder is not very well stocked."

A furious ringing at a bell at this moment claimed the attention of them all.

"Pray," said Claude, "what do you mean by that ?"

"I !" cried the coiner. "I know nothing about that, I assure you. It is none of our doing. Oh, I am lost—lost! I shall be taken and dragged to a jail, at once. Oh, save me—save me !"

The terror of the coiner was too genuine to be suspected, and Claude said at once—

"It is possible enough that whoever is ringing the bell in that style, is an enemy of mine, if not of yours. What had better be done in such a case ? Surely it must happen that sometimes strangers come to the house ?"

"Oh, yes, yes, and then Bill always meets them with terror in his looks, and tells some story about, coming to gather blackberries, or something of that sort, and how he has seen something that has nearly frightened him out of his wits ; and in nine cases out of ten, the people shuffle off again as quickly as they can."

"Let him try it now, then."

"Go, Bill. Go, my boy, and do your best, and remember that you give us notice with your whistle if they are too obstinate for you. Go and terrify them with some of the stories that I have taught you to tell of the old place."

"I will, I will, father. It ain't very likely that they will think of the sort of way of getting at secrets that these gentlemen did. Oh, dear, me, it's horrid to think of."

CHAPTER CCXXXVI.

THE NIGHT OF DANGER IN THE DESERTED HOUSE.

As the boy spoke, with so vivid a recollection, of what he had suffered at the hands of Claude Duval, there came another desperate ring at the large bell at the hall-door, and it became quite evident that whoever was there, was not disposed upon light grounds to leave the spot.

"Go at once, boy," said Claude, "and stop them, if you can. If you cannot, and they should turn out to be enemies of mine, I am not one that will very tamely submit to their dictates. Look to your pistols, my friends."

"Ah!" said the coiner, "you will repel force by force, then?"

"We will."

"Will you tell me, then, who you are? Surely you may trust me, now?"

"If there were any occasion to trust you," said Claude, "I for one should not hesitate a moment; but there can be no possible use in your knowing our names; and if we were to tell you, you have no means of satisfying yourself that we tell you the exact truth in the matter."

"Well, I will be content. Let us listen for Bill's signal. If he be successful in getting rid of whoever is ringing at the door, he will blow a shrill clear whistle, which we cannot but hear if we are only tolerably attentive."

Upon this they all remained profoundly still, listening for the whistle, and in about five minutes it came, breaking in upon the silence with a startling effect.

"All's right," said the coiner; "he has frightened them."

"Are you sure of that?" said Jack.

"Quite sure. We shall have him here soon. Go, Joe, and listen at the head of the stairs for your brother's footsteps.

Joe left the room, and after he had been gone some little time, the coiner, with an air of uneasiness, said—

"What can have become of the boys? I will go and seek them."

"Hold!" said Claude.

"What would you say? What do you suspect?"

"Nothing. But in order that we may continue in that blessed state, I beg that you will have the goodness to stay with us. You will recollect that we are but very slight acquaintances, indeed, and until we know each other better, I do not like to part with the whole of the family at once."

"As you please. I did not think of anything wrong, for I apprehend that I have much more to dread than you can possibly have. But I hear a footstep. It is one of the boys. Ah, they are both here, I fancy. Yes, here they are."

Bill and Joe both came into the room, now, and the former said—

"I have frightened them away, although there was a sort of constable among them."

"A constable, Bill? You don't mean that surely? How did you know h was one?"

"He said he was, and he said something else, too, that perhaps these gentlemen might not like."

"Whatever it is," said Claude, "let us have it. It is the constable's saying, not yours, so we cannot blame you for it."

"Yes," said the father, "say it at once, Bill."

"Then," said the boy, "the constable said that he was on the look out for Claude Duval, who was in this neighbourhood along with two friends of his, and he said that he would give one hundred pounds to anybody who would give him any information that might place him on their track, if he caught them."

"Claude Duval, the famous highwayman!" cried the coiner.

"Yes, and his two friends."

The coiner glanced knowingly at Claude and his companions, and the two boys, who were cunning beyond their age, likewise looked at them with eyes full of meaning.

"So," said Claude, "all this means now that you suspect I am Claude Duval, and that these are my two friends that the constable spoke of? Is it not so? Speak out."

"It is," said the coiner.

"It is," said Bill and Joe, both in a breath.

"Oh, what mistakes people do make in this world," said Claude. "The idea of mistaking three commercial travellers for three of the most desperate highwaymen! Why, I tell you that that very Claude Duval you speak of, has got the most of my money in his pocket."

"What, then, has he robbed you?"

"He has got possession of all I had, if you call that robbing; and as for my two friends here, they would not like to meet Duval on a dark night all alone, I can tell you."

"There's five hundred pounds reward for him now," said the coiner, "and there was at one time fifteen hundred pounds, but a lot of it has been withdrawn by the different parties as they cooled down in their feelings after he had robbed them. The five hundred pounds, though, is a good sum, and would be no bad day's work."

"Yes, if it could only be earned," said Claude. "But you promised that you would get us something to eat, and we shall be glad to see of what your larder consists. How dark it gets."

"Yes," said Dick, "the twilight is going fast. The long shadows are in the old garden now. We shan't see each other's faces for many minutes longer."

"Light up, Joe," said the coiner. "We don't make much of a flare when the night comes, for fear it should be seen; but we have light enough to look at each other by, at all events. And now let me tell you, that whether you be the persons mentioned by the officer, or not, you are safe here. I am not the man to betray any one, and if ten times five hundred pounds were to be got by it, I should expect every guinea of the ill-gotten money to stick in my throat. I would rather go on at my own trade of coining."

"You are right," said Jack, "for I rather think that something would stick in your throat, if it were not a guinea.

"Not a doubt of it," said Dick.

The coiner affected to laugh heartily, and Joe, by dint of clambering upon a table, lit a solitary candle that was in the remains of what had once been a very handsome lamp, hanging from the ceiling. When lit, that candle gave but a dim light, which was only just sufficient to enable those in the room to see each other, and not to run against its furniture.

"This is darkness visible," said Dick.

"It is, rather; but as Bill is going to the village to make a few purchases, he can bring us a candle or two. Now, Bill, mind you get exactly what is wanted."

"Yes, father."

"And be as smart and as quick as you can; and, of course, as you always are, you will be upon your guard."

"Yes, father."

"Be off with you, then, and get back as soon as you can. Don't forget the brandy and the candles. That will do."

Bill left the room, but he had not been gone a moment or two, when the coiner called out,—

"Bill! Bill! stop, I forgot—I quite forgot: bring in some whitening with you. Confound the boy, he don't hear me. Bill! Bill! I say!"

He ran out of the room and went down the stairs with a great clatter after Bill. Joe remained in the room, and looked rather silly as he eyed Claude out of the corners of his eyes. In the course of a few moments, the coiner came back.

"We use whitening in our work," he said, "and I send to the village so very seldom for fear of exciting any suspicion of who Bill is, that I always wish him to bring in everything at once, if possible, He is asked at times who he is, and then he names some farmer a good way off, and says he is with him, and that satisfies the people."

"You cannot do better," said Claude.

"Well, in this world, of course, we always do the best we can—ah! ah! All's right, I rather think."

The coiner said those words, 'All's right' so significantly, that Claude and his companions could not help thinking they had some hidden meaning, and if they had, it was, in all probability, one that was not over-favourable to their safety.

Duval would have been glad of an opportunity to say a few words in private to Jack and Dick, to ask, in fact, their opinion regarding the present posture of affairs, and how far they thought the coiner and his hopeful family ought to be trusted, under these circumstances; but he could not very well get such an opportunity. If it had not been for Jack's horse, he would have at once left the place; but anything in the shape of lameness in any one of the animals, upon whose speed and powers so much depended, was not a thing to be trifled with in any shape or way.

The coiner, and the boy whom he named Joe, busied themselves in spreading a cloth upon the table; and from a cupboard in the room that was capitally concealed in the panelling of the wall, they took out some bread and some cold meat. The meat was mutton, and by the manner in which it was cut, it looked wonderfully like as if some grazier had suffered for it.

It had evidently not been cut up according to the ordinary rules of butchers' craft.

"Come," said the coiner; "all you have got to do, is to eat, drink, and be merry, and quite at your ease. Bill will soon be back with the brandy, and more lights.'

"I think," said Joe, "that you ought to have told Bill, father, not to put up with the bad brandy at the Rose and Crown, but to ask for something strong."

It was quite evident that Joe in his own mind, looked upon this as something of a joke, for he grinned as he said it, in despite of certain smarting sensations that reminded him of a recent event.

The coiner gave him a kick under the table to be quiet, which made the matter only rather more suspicious.

"Jack," said Claude, "have you any objection to step down stairs, and take a look at the cattle?"

"Not the least; I was thinking of doing so."

Jack rose, and Claude did so likewise.

"We will go together, Jack," he said. "I dare say our kind host will excuse us for a few moments."

"Don't mention it," said Dick, answering for the coiner, who did not seem quite at his ease at this movement of Claude's. Dick knew well enough that Claude wanted to say something to Jack, and he was willing to give him the opportunity of so doing. In another moment they had left the room, and proceeded down stairs to the room where the horses were placed. It was in the same state in which they left it, and Claude was well enough pleased to see that the whole of their horses were laying down and comfortably resting.

"Jack," said Claude, "what do you think of our new friend, the coiner, and his two hopeful sons?"

"That he is as great a rogue as needs be, and that he is bringing them up in the same way," said Jack.

"But does it strike you, Jack, what Master Bill has gone to the village for?"

"Why, no, not exactly."

"Well it does me; and in my humble opinion, Jack, it is for the express purpose of getting together a force to try and take us prisoners."

"You don't really think that, Claude?"

"Indeed but I do."

"Then we must be off at once. My horse's foot would be eventually the better for a little longer rest; but if it can't have it, it can't, and there's an end of it."

"Do you think the creature could take a canter?"

"Oh, yes, now it could, or gallop, for the matter of that; but, as I say, rest would be a good thing for it, no doubt. If, however, you have suspicions of the sort you name, let us go."

"Recollect, Jack, that they are only suspicions."

"Yes; but the more I think of them, the more likely they look. That he suspects, to the extent of knowing, who and what we are, I can well believe, and the reward has tempted him. He, no doubt, calculates, too, upon his own offences against the law being passed over with impunity, on account of aiding in our capture."

"That may be, and, doubtless, is a part of his calculation; and so, Jack, I will tell you what I was thinking. It will be, in my opinion, advisable to change the place where the horses are now, and to place them somewhere that we only know of; so that, at the urgency of a moment, we could seek them, and mount and be off."

"Good!"

"Very well. Then I propose that we remain in this house until we have the most irresistible and positive evidence that our suspicions are quite correct."

"Let it be so then, Claude. I only hope we shall get safe out of this abominable house; I think the ghosts that we thought at first were in it were more endurable than the flesh and blood that we really find here."

"Don't say we thought the ghosts were here, Jack," said Claude with a smile. "Recollect that you had that all to yourself."

"Well—well! We will say no more about that."

Claude and Jack were both such practised hands at the management of horses, that they got all the three animals up, and saddled and bridled, in the course of a few minutes, and then they conducted them quite gently out of the house and fastened them to the lattice-work of a little summer-house in the garden that was close to the lane.

CHAPTER CCXXXVII.

CLAUDE AND HIS COMPANIONS ARE BELEAGUERED IN THE OLD HOUSE.

"HARK!" said Jack, "I hear something in the lane. I only wish Dick was with us instead of keeping company with that rascal of a coiner, we would be off at once."

"Perhaps it is Bill coming back?" said Claude.

"Listen!—Listen!"

R "You are right, Jack. There are persons in the lane, and they are coming on with such caution, too, that we may well suspect them to be enemies."

"You may depend," said Jack, "that Bill's kind errand to the village has been for the express purpose of getting a force, by the aid of which to arrest us. I half-suspected it before."

"And I, too; but I never like to give way to suspicion, for one's fancy is so very apt to mislead one in circumstances of danger; but now I think there can be but little doubt of the fact. Oh! that Dick were with us! There is no help for it, though, Jack. Let us go back to him, for we have succeeded in getting the horses into a handy position, and that is everything. Come on."

Jack followed Claude quickly into the house again, and they made their way back to the room where Dick was keeping company with the coiner. Upon their entrance, Dick spoke, saying—

"Is all right with the cattle?"

"Quite," said Claude, "and Bill is coming, I think, for we fancied we heard a footstep or two in the lane."

"Oh, I am glad of that," said the coiner, "we shall be so very nice and comfortable, when Bill comes back, I do think."

"Well, so do I," said Claude. "It will be the only thing that it is at all wanting to our felicity. But don't you run considerable risks here, my friend, at times, from the curiosity of strangers, who may come into this house?"

"Oh, no, not much. This room can be well fastened up. Don't you see that there is an iron bar inside the door, here, that I have had the precaution of putting up myself, so that no one here can get in without my leave. But here is Bill."

At this moment that precocious young gentleman found his way to the room: He was quite alone.

"Oh, gentlemen," he said, "I am afraid that your horses are frightened at something."

"Indeed!" said Claude.

"Yes, sir, they are making quite a kind of disturbance on the floor of the room below. I would have gone in and seen what it was, but I was afraid, you see, sir, that they might kick me; but it will be better for you to go at once."

"Why, the fact is, Bill," said Claude, as he stepped to the door of the room, and put up the bar that the coiner had unbarred, "the fact is, my fine fellow, that we always let our horses amuse themselves in their own way."

"Why are you putting up that bar?" said the coiner, with rather a flurried kind of look.

"Oh, just as a little measure of security, that's all, my friend. And now, Bill, we want a little bit of information from you, and we sincerely hope that you will give it to us without putting us to the trouble and you to the pain of a process of getting it, which you know by experience is very efficient, indeed."

"Oh, this is some joke," said the coiner. "Ha! ha! It is some very good joke, indeed, this is."

Bill looked very red and fidgetty.

"I—I don't know anything, gentlemen," he said; "but, of course, if I find I do, I will tell everything to you in a moment, if you will only be so good as to say what it is."

"Certainly, Bill; we won't keep you in suspense about what it is for long, you may depend. How many persons, now, have you brought with you from the village to capture us?"

"How many?"

"Yes. We want to know what force is opposed to us, that we may take our measures accordingly."

"Oh, now, that's too bad," said Bill. "Do you think that I would do such a thing? It's quite wrong, sir—indeed, it is. Why, father don't want people out of the village here, I'll be bound."

"Indeed I do not, my child," said the coiner, with a look of great candour, "and I am quite surprised that the gentlemen should think of such a thing—quite. Oh, it is too bad, after we feel inclined to do all we can to make them comfortable for the night. But come, my son—since the gentlemen think that we are not good and honest company enough for them, we will go to another room, and there pass the night; and in the morning, when they find that all their suspicions of us are groundless, they will then apologise to us for our entertaining them."

"Yes, father," said Bill, in the same canting tone. "It's a shocking thing to be suspected, when you are doing your best to be kind and obliging to people."

"It is, my dear son, but you will find that such is the way of the world, and that virtue and charity must be their own rewards, for the world will not appreciate either. Come, my boy. Let us come away and leave these gentlemen to themselves."

"Wait a bit," said Claude, "we are very much afraid that you will be rather dull without us, so we cannot think of parting with you or Bill."

"But my dear sir, allow me to say ——"

"Whatever you please, in a little while—but at present we have something to do. Jack, have you got a good strong piece of twine?"

"Oh yes," said Jack. "I always carry some nice, round, strong whipcord with me, and here it is."

"Very good; now, Mr. Coiner, I intend to take the liberty of tying your hands behind your back."

"Tying me!—Me!"

"Even so, you; and then, if you are prudent enough to be quite quiet, you will receive no injury, but if you are otherwise, I shall be under the disagreeable necessity of wasting a charge of gunpowder in blowing out your brains, if you have got any."

The coiner turned ghastly pale.

"Oh," he said, "this is too bad. What on earth can you suspect of me? Am I not a criminal, and would it be at all possible that I should bring down upon you the police, whose efforts would be as much directed against me as against you?"

"I don't know that," said Claude. "You have a suspicion that I am Claude Duval.—Have you not?"

"I know you are."

"Exactly; and I know likewise, that the government is sufficiently anxious for my apprehension to look over the pettier offences of any one who may be instrumental in giving me up. Come now, confess, Master Coiner, that you sent Bill to the village to get a sufficient force here to apprehend us. Is it not so?"

"Oh, no—no! I appeal to Bill."

"Certainly not," said Bill. "Such a thing would have been very wrong indeed. Oh, my—I could not have done it."

"Very well," said Claude. "Of course it is a matter of fact, and not of opinion. You will be so good as to sit here, Mr. Coiner."

Claude Duval had securely tied the wrists of the coiner together behind his back, and now he placed a chair exactly against the door of the room, and intimated that it was there he was to seat himself. The fellow hesitated for a few moments, and Claude said mildly—

"I have no objection to give you a reason for seating you there. The fact is, that if officers are in the house they will be pretty sure to threaten to fire through the door if we will not open it, and you, as you sit against it, will catch the shots, you see."

"Oh, murder, no!"

"Nay, my friend: if there are no officers in the house, you will be in no danger. Tie him to the chair, Jack, by his ankles to the legs of it, and then he won't be able to get up upon any emergency."

The coiner looked rather agonised, and licked his lips nervously.

"Oh, Bill," he said, "is not this dreadful treatment for a son to see a father endure?"

"It is, father," said Bill, in an oratorical kind of tone, "and the heart that can witness such things without a pang, is—a—a—that is to say—I quite agree with you, father."

"Yes, my dear; and now tell me, Bill—Did you see any suspicious persons prowling about the house, for I rather think you did?—Hem!"

"Why yes," said Bill, taking the hint, "I did, and I was going to tell these gentlemen so, when they all of a sudden took it into their heads that we were acting a base part towards them. As I got to the end of the lane, father, I did fancy I heard footsteps."

"Then," said the coiner, "let us all unite and resist the common enemy. Claude Duval, I will fight by your side, and so will Bill, I feel convinced."

"Yes," said Bill; "and if we all fall, let it be as friends. Oh, father, the idea of any one suspecting you of sending for the officers is enough to bring tears from a flintstone, it is."

At any other time, when their danger had been less imminent, Claude Duval and his friends would have been highly amused at this conversation between the father and son, for it was about as fine a piece of duplicity as could very well be imagined; but as it was, the danger that Claude and his friends were in made them exhibit an amount of impatience that they would not otherwise have yielded to, and in a voice that had quite enough passion in its tones to convince them both that he was perfectly serious, Claude spoke—

"This hypocrisy is thrown away," he said. "I and my friends are perfectly convinced that you have thought it worth your while to betray us. Come, Bill be so good as to confess it at once, and let us know the number of persons who, no doubt, are even now below."

"Oh, dear—oh, dear," said Bill. "How can I tell what isn't?"

"Very good," said Claude. "I think you have got the twigs, Dick?"

"I have. Thinking they might be useful, I brought them into this room, and here they are."

"The twigs!" said the coiner. "What is the meaning of the twigs?"

"Oh, father," said Bill, "they whack a fellow with them till he is glad to say anything to get them to leave off. Really I don't know anything, do I father? There's nothing to know."

"Certainly not, my son, and it will give me much more satisfaction to see you suffer for the truth any amount of punishment, than lose your character by telling a falsehood. Never mind, my son—your reward will be in a better world than this."

"But the whacking," said Bill, "in the meantime, is horrid."

"You should look upon it, Bill, as one of the trials in this life we have all to undergo. I recollect when I was a Methodist preacher in London, I often used to preach upon the necessity of having patience under grievous trials."

"Well, now," said Jack, "if I didn't think that you had been a Methodist parson! Come, Bill—we are sorry to be so very troublesome to you; but having found, by experience, that the only way to make you speak out is to make you smart a little first, you can't blame us."

"If you say anything but what you ought," said the coiner to Bill, "I shall take the first opportunity of thrashing you within an inch of your life."

Bill burst into a howling cry, as Jack laid hold of him by the shoulder, and dragged him over to the table, while Claude began the operation of the twigs.

"Oh, murder! murder! I can't stand it! It's worse than before. I'll tell—I'll tell! There's six officers down stairs, and they mean to have you. They are going to wait for two more, and then come up. Oh, murder! murder! dont—dont——"

"Did your father tell you to bring them?"

"Oh, no—no! Oh, lor! don't—don't!—Yes, he did—he did!"

"Oh, William," said the coiner, "I am surprised at you telling such very infamous falsehoods; I would rather have seen you flogged by those twigs than I would have heard you say what you have."

"Oh, dear, yes," sobbed Bill. "I daresay you would; but I never knew what a whacking was till to-day. It's enough to make a fellow say anything, to lay into him in such a way. Oh, oh! I might as well have told at first without all this. Oh, dear, I have caught it!"

At this moment, some heavy blows came against the door of the room, and a voice from without cried—

"Open—open! Open the door this moment! We won't stand any nonsense! Open the door!"

"Who's there?" cried Claude.

"Oh, never you mind who's there. Open the door, I tell you, and that will be the very best thing you can do. There are eight of us here, and we are all well armed, and won't be trifled with."

"Well," said Claude, "there are five of us here, and we are well armed, and won't be trifled with."

"In the king's name," said another voice, "I summon you to open this door, and surrender yourselves. In the king's name, recollect!"

"Oh, we shall not forget it," said Claude.

"Come, come, it is of no use trifling with the law in this sort of way. We give you fair warning that if the door is not opened within the next few minutes, we shall fire upon you."

"Oh, don't!" howled the coiner.

Claude stepped up to him and placed the muzzle of a pistol against his forehead, as he said, in a low tone—

"Hark you, my friend—it is to us highly desirable that we leave this place as quickly as possible. We are going to adopt an extraordinary means of doing so, and now I warn you that if you utter one half word that in my estimation is calculated to have the effect of letting those without know what we are about, I will blow your brains out without mercy!"

"But don't let me stay here against the door to be shot."

"Tell them that you are against it, and then, perhaps, as you brought them here, they will be considerate enough to let you alone."

Claude now hastily whispered a few words to Dick and Jack, and they at once commenced operations in the room, while he talked to the men without in a loud voice, so as to drown the noise that they made. The coiner, in the way of his business, had several tools about the place, such as files and chisels, and so on. It was astounding with what quickness and dexterity Jack, who was a capital workman, got off some of the skirting band of the room, and then pulled up a couple of the planks that belonged to its flooring. The joists were not very wide apart; but it is astonishing what a small aperture a tolerably bulky body will go through with a little squeezing. It was the intention of Claude and his friends to make a hole in the floor right through to the room below, and so escape. The coiner quickly saw not only what was doing, but he saw, likewise, that it was even likely to be quite successful. If he had only dared to do so, he would that moment have given the alarm; but the threat of Claude was uttered in a tone of voice that convinced him it was anything but a joke, and that it would, without the shadow of a doubt, be carried out, if he should be so indiscreet as to give occasion for it.

He was forced to content himself with conversing in a very low tone of voice, which, as it had no effect upon anybody, and gave the officers without no sort of information, Claude did not take any notice of.

After the floor boards was removed, it was not a matter of any difficulty to knock through the lath and plaster of the ceiling of the room below, and so make a clear aperture.

CHAPTER CCXXXVIII.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS ESCAPE FROM THE HAUNTED VILLA.

"All is ready," said Jack.

"That will do," said Claude. "You and Dick get through as quietly as you can—I will follow you."

"This won't do," said the officer without. "I will fire through the door if you don't open it. I tell you, Claude Duval, that we know you are there, and that there is no chance, whatever, for you to escape. We must have you this time. There is but this door to the room, I know, and you cannot escape us. You had better surrender without resisting, and so causing bloodshed—Listen to reason, Duval!"

"So I will. How many did you say there were of you?"

"Eight, and in the course of a few moments there will be twenty more people, at least, from the village. If you surrender now, we will undertake that the villagers shall not treat you and your comrades with any violence; but if you are foolish enough to resist, I cannot answer for the consequences."

"Where do you want to take us?"

"Direct to London—where you know you will get a fair trial, so I don't think that, in the long run, you will have anything to complain of. Come, come! be reasonable."

"Certainly I shall not complain of anything after I am hanged," said Duval. "I suppose, Mr. Officer, that is what you mean by stopping my complaints? But I will just say a word or two to my friends, and perhaps, after all, we may think it better to chance what may happen afterwards, than to have a row with you here, as you say you are well armed."

"We are, indeed, Claude Duval."

By this time, Dick had got through the aperture in the floor, and Jack, who was less bulky, was preparing to follow him. Claude made a sign to him to go quickly, and then suddenly taking hold of Bill by the collar, he turned to the coiner, saying—

"We are so fond of Bill that we shall take him with us. You may or you may not care for his life; but if you do, you will be careful not to give any alarm to the officers, regarding our mode of escape, until sufficient time has elapsed for us to be off. If you listen, you will be able to hear our horses' feet in the lane. When you do hear such a sound, you may say anything you please; but if before that they come upon us, we shall know that we have you to thank for it; and as it will be all in the family—we will shoot Bill."

"Oh, dear! I'm to be served out for everybody else?" said Bill.

"Exactly so," said Claude. "Below, there!"

To the great consternation of the boy, he dropped him through the aperture in the floor, and Dick caught him below. The officers were getting impatient, and their spokesman cried—

"Come, now, Duval, none of your tricks, my fine fellow; you can't help yourself, you know that well enough. The bravest thing a man can do is to give in, when he feels he can't help himself."

"I think so, too," said Claude. "Wait a minute, that's all. You will soon get your answer, and I hope it will be satisfactory to you."

With these words, Claude himself got through the hole in the floor, and alighted safely on his feet in the room below.

"All's right," said Jack. "Let us be off, now, as quickly as we possibly can. How shall we get Bill along?"

"I'll manage that," said Dick, as he took hold of one of Bill's ears. "Now, my boy, the more trouble I have in getting you along with us, the harder I pinch, that's all."

"Oh, I'll come—I'll come," said Bill. "Anything but the twigs. I never was so served out as I have been to-day. I'll come along as quick as you like—indeed I will. But—but——"

"But what, you young sinner?"

"I'm afraid—that is, I suspect——"

"Well, what are you afraid of, and what do you expect?"

"That the officers found out where your horses were in the room close to here, and put 'em away somewhere."

"No, you don't suspect any such thing, my dear boy. Bill, you know, you rascal, that you told them where they were; but for your special gratification, you will find that we are one too many for you, my boy, and we removed them ourselves; so we shall get clear off in spite of you."

Bill groaned.

During this little bit of conversation between Dick and Bill, the whole party had moved on at a rapid pace, and getting into the room where the horses had been, they left it again by one of the windows, and rapidly crossing the garden, found the three animals quietly waiting for their masters by the little gate to which they had been tied by their bridles. To mount was the work of a moment with the three friends; and then Dick got Bill up behind him, saying—

"We are going at a decent pace, Bill; so if you don't want rather an awkward tumble, you will do well to hold on like death, for we mean to give you a little ride, as a kind of recompense for all your kindness towards us."

"Off and away! Hurrah!" cried Claude.

They were in the lane. The impulse was given to the horses—Jack was a little afraid of the lame foot of his steed, but he found that it went much better than he expected; so they got off at a canter that covered a great deal more ground than it seemed to do. Bill was in the greatest fright imaginable, and clung to Dick as though he considered that was the only hold he had of life. If he could only have been sure of alighting in some soft place, and escaping the horse's heels, he would have gladly done so; but he dreaded to make the experiment; so he continued a prisoner, notwithstanding it was quite at his own option not to do so. The end of the lane was quickly gained, and Claude and his friends took the high road to London, well enough pleased at their escape.

They rode four miles without a pause, and then Jack cried out—

"Can we ease the pace a little? Pursuit is out of the question, and I am rather afraid of my horse's foot."

"Certainly," said Claude, "there is no hurry now; but what shall we do with our friend Bill?"

"Oh, let me go, now," said Bill. "Do let me go now, and I will never do so any more—indeed I won't."

"You are the most treacherous young rascal," said Claude, "that I ever remember to have come across. In the most cool and villanous manner you have tried to do all the mischief you possibly can; and when you were defeated at one scheme, you tried another; so that if we were even to take your life, it would be no more than what you fully deserve; for it was at our lives that all your plans and actions were aimed. You are an educated lad, I can see, although at times you have thought proper to put on the appearance of a country lout, and to affect the languge of one. Now, say freely what you think we ought to do with you?"

"You have got away," said Bill, "and so I think you ought to let a poor boy go now. Besides, you know, I caught it rather with those twigs, and I feel it yet."

"A good job, too, Bill. Now, we will be more generous to you than you deserve, rascal as you are. That you will come to some bad end it don't require a conjurer to prophesy. Is that a labourer's cottage a little ahead there, Jack?"

"It is, and a man is at the door of it."

"Very good. Let us speak to him."

"But you mean to let me go now?" said Bill. "It will be a long trot back, you know, and before I get there, you can be half a dozen miles off, so I can't do you any harm if I wanted."

"We shall see, Bill—we shall see."

They all rode on till they came to the cottage that was on the rode-side, and as it was not far off the dawn, they could just see it, and the little patch of garden-ground that joined it to the main-road. Indeed, in the eastern sky there was already a long streak of strange coloured light, which was at each moment widening, so that in a very little while the new day would be in the heavens.

"You are early up, my friend," said Claude, to the man who was at the cottage-door, and who seemed to be finishing his toilette there.

"Yes, sir," he replied; "my work begins as soon as I can see it, so, you see, I am obliged to be up betimes."

"Ah, to be sure. Well, have you any objection to earn a guinea in the next half-hour? It will be easily earned, and it will be doing a good action beside."

"Objection, sir? Oh, dear, no. I haven't so much as seen a guinea for I don't know when, sir. I hope it is nothing wrong that you want me to do?"

"Certainly not. Don't I tell you it's a good action?"

"Ah, then, sir, I shall be main pleased to do it."

"Very good. You see this lad? He is a very bad fellow, and if we did what was right, we ought to take him to prison. He has tried to get us impeded upon our journey by pretending that we are highwaymen. Now, do we look like it?"

"Oh dear, no, sir."

"Well, we think that a little wholsesome correction will do him more good than anything else, so if you will give him a capital flogging, and then let him go, you will deservedly earn the guinea of us."

"What!" shouted Bill. "More of it! Oh dear, no. I have had enough of that to last me all my life. Oh, let me off, do! I promise better behaviour for the future."

"You hear him? Will you earn the guinea?"

"Won't I? that's all!" said the labourer, advancing to the side of Dick's horse, and collaring Bill. "If I don't give him a good lesson, it shan't be my fault. Come, my young fellow, it will all be for your own good in the long run."

"There is the guinea, then," said Claude, who was hardly able to restrain his laughter at the rueful face that Bill put on. "I will trust entirely to your honour to perform your part of the bargain; and so good morning, for we are rather in a hurry."

With this, Claude and his friends trotted off again, leaving Bill in the hands of the labourer. When they had got to some little distance, they simultaneously stopped to laugh.

"Upon my word," said Dick, "although that young rascal fully deserves his punishment, it was enough to make a cat laugh to think how he had been half-flayed already. You may depend upon it such a retribution will not again overtake him in this world, and the chances really are, that it will make him very cautious for the future how he engages in acts of treachery."

"If," said Claude, "his punishment has that effect, we are not his worst friends, after all. Hillio! what's that?"

"Why, Bill howling, to be sure."

Claude laughed, and so did Jack, and they all three went off again at a hard trot, that quickly took them out of hearing of the guinea's worth of castigation that Bill was duly receiving at the hands of the conscientious labourer.

They had not got far before they met a man on horseback, who, the moment he got up to them, cried out—

"Are they taken yet, gentlemen—are the highwaymen taken? I have been for some help, and there's half a dozen gentlemen on horseback coming."

"It's a pity they are too late," said Claude, "for the highwaymen are not only on the road again, and perfectly free, but one of them is about to blow your brains out, if you have got any."

To the intense horror of this man, who had so unexpectedly spoken, Claude held a pistol to his head.

"Oh, spare me," he said; "spare me; I have a wife and family!"

"You ought to have thought of them," said Claude, "before you made yourself so busy in hunting to the death, if you could have done it, others who have done you no harm; but you will be spared on condition that you ride on with us, and when we meet the mounted men, you spoke of, you will be so good as to pass us as friends of yours. Upon no other terms will I spare you."

"Of course," he said, turning very white, "I accede to those terms. If I have been a fool, I must take the consequences."

"Just so," said Claude; "and now come on. Ah, there are your friends, I presume?"

"They are, and but for my folly, Claude Duval would have been taken to-day."

"It is possible; but the best thing you can do now is to provide for your own safety. Mark me, when I say a thing, I mean it, and if you attempt any tricks, I will shoot you with as little compunction as I would a mad dog."

At this moment half a dozen men rode up in haste, and the foremost of them cried out—

"Hilloa, Simpson, I thought you were in such a hurry to get back that you could not wait for us, and here you are with your horse's head the other way!"

"Why, these are friends of mine! No, hang it! They are no such thing Blaze away! One can but die once."

Duval was too much struck with the courage of this man to find it in his heart to deliberately murder him, although he had said that he would do so. He lowered his pistol as he said—

"I spare you, and leave it to your conscience to do as you please. You can go."

"Then, by Heaven, I repent that I have said a word."

"What is the meaning of all this?" cried one of the fresh arrivals. "Are you all out of your senses?"

"No!" said Claude, in a voice of thunder. "The meaning of it just is, that I am Claude Duval, and you stop the road, gentlemen. Forward, my gallant friends! Charge them!"

Without, then, giving the six, or rather, we ought to say, the seven horsemen, time to think what to do, Claude and his two companions dashed forward among them, and succeeded in making their way through them. The man who had been Claude's prisoner for so brief a space of time, shouted out—

"Off with you, Duval, and good luck to you. I won't pull a trigger or move an inch after you."

The others were by no means so scrupulous, for in the course of the next few moments three or four pistol bullets rattled about the ears of our adventurers. Claude felt that one of the bullets touched his cheek, and a slight exclamation from Dick led him to think that he was wounded.

"We cannot stand this," said Duval. "Fire upon them!"

He turned, and so did Dick and Jack. They all three fired, and then, amid the smoke of their own pistols, without waiting to see what execution they had done, they went off at a gallop.

After this taste of the quality of the highwaymen, no one seemed very much inclined to follow them. After half-an-hour's fast riding, they thereupon thought proper to decrease their speed, and examine into the amount of damage done by the pistol bullets.

"Is any one touched?" said Claude.

"No," cried both Jack and Dick, "there's no mischief worth the speaking of done, at all events. Let us push on for London at once, or the road will be too hot for us soon."

CHAPTER CCXXXIX.

CLAUDE GOES HOME FOR A FEW DAYS, AND THERE MEETS WITH A STRANGE ADVENTURE.

CLAUDE's idea was to get to Ealing now as quickly as he could, and taste the luxury of repose for a day or two at the farm, where Cicely, he knew, would be overjoyed to see him.

He felt a little backward, though, in saying as much to his two friends, so he rather hinted it than absolutely said it.

"I suppose, now," he said, "you would think me but a lazy fellow if I were to lie by for a day and a night at Ealing? Come, speak the truth. Will you relish being my guests for a little time at the old farm, or has the road too many attractions for you both?"

Jack looked at Dick and laughed. "The road is all very well," he then said, "but if you, Claude, will really take us into comfortable keeping for a day or two, I don't know anything that will be a more desirable change. What do you say, Dick?"

"I say yes to the proposition, with all my heart," responded Dick, and from his manner, it was quite clear that he spoke his real sentiments, and not from any show of complaisance to Claude Duval merely.

"Why, then," said Claude, "you both of you do me a very great kindness, and since that is all settled, let us push on as fast as we conveniently can."

"Recollect my horse's foot," said Jack.

"Certainly. No one would be less willing to forget any ailment of a horse, than I. We will entirely accommodate ourselves, Jack, to your horse's convenience and pace, and you shall go first, so that we may do so with a degree of certainty that we could not otherwise aim at."

"That will do," said Jack. "I don't mean to say that I am going to crawl, but I like the creature to have its own pace when it really has anything the matter with it. And now, Claude, just see what a nice little rent in the sleeve of my coat one of the bullets of our acquaintances on the road has made."

"It has, indeed. An inch deeper, Jack,—"

"And I should have had a broken arm; but a miss, you know, as the old saying has it, is as good as a mile."

"It is, Jack, and take things on the long run, I will say it, that we have all of us the most extraordinary luck."

"Well, now," said Dick, putting on a very philosophical look, "you may call it luck, if you like, but I rather differ from you there. I think it solely arises from the fact of our not flinching."

"Indeed, Dick?"

"Yes. You see when a bullet leaves the barrel of a pistol, it takes a particular course, in a curved line, and, of course, if you or I happen to be in the line, we catch it; but there's many chances to one that we are not in it, and as we keep steady, it passes us, when most folks, if they fancy a bullet is coming, dodge about in an extraordinary manner, with the idea of avoiding it, when, in point of fact, by so doing, they are only giving it a further chance of hitting them."

"There's something in that," said Jack.

"To be sure there is," cried Claude, laughing; "but not much, for you forget, Dick, that you may dodge out of the way of the bullet as well as into it."

"Never mind that. It is not a good plan to try to get out of the way of a shot; and I have heard folks who have been in the army, and who have heard them whistling around them, say the same thing. Those who have tried all sorts of schemes to avoid the shots, have almost always caught one, while those who took no notice have escaped."

"Well," said Claude, "I shall think it a capital theory so long as I am not hit; but the moment I am, I am afraid I shall alter my opinion upon the subject. But here are some passengers. What are we to do, my friends?"

"Let us be respectable, for once in a way, and allow them to go in peace," said Jack. "There is a coach, too; but it is a poor-looking affair, after all, and at no time would be worth the stopping."

"I am of your opinion."

The carriage which had induced these remarks was, in good truth, rather a miserable affair. It was drawn by a horse that certainly ought to have been past all service; and the set-out, take it for all in all, was of so violently shabby a character, that you would not have given a five pound note for the whole of it. Some sort of groom, or serving-man, went in front of it, mounted upon such another horse as the miserable-looking one that drew the carriage. He had on a faded livery, out at the elbows, and looked the picture of starvation.

"A luxurious turn-out, with a vengeance," said Dick to Claude.

"Yes. The carriage-windows are close shut. Shall we take a peep in before letting it go?"

"Oh, it is not worth while."

"Well, perhaps it is not. Let it pass. We are too near our place of destination to make it worth while to get into a disturbance for nothing."

Acting upon that principle, they did not offer the slightest obstruction to the passage of the carriage, and when it was fairly past they did not think themselves called upon to restrain their laughter at the odd character of the whole equipage.

"I'd lay any sum, now," said Dick, "that that affair belongs to some old maid who, perhaps, has seen better days, or who, even upon slender resources, tries to get the reputation of keeping a carriage, with the hope that the very name of it will attract some loving old bachelor."

Both Claude and Jack agreed that this might very likely be the case, and in a few minutes they dismissed all consideration of that carriage from their thoughts.

Little did they suspect that its passing them was, in reality, to be the most important event that had happened to them for some time, and that it was to Claude Duval a matter of almost life or death.

Within that miserable vehicle, in company with an old toothless hag who had taken him into a kind of keeping, was no other than Tom Brereton, and through numerous interstices in the blinds, he saw with ease the face of Claude Duval.

Well did Tom Brereton know the large rewards that were still offered by the government for Claude's apprehension, and with an ardent wish to earn them, he only waited until the carriage was out of sight of the three friends, in consequence of a turn in the road, and then, making an excuse to the old lady, who was half asleep, he hastily alighted, and slinking along by the road side, he continued to keep Claude and his friends in sight.

The important consequences of this system of espionage practised by Tom Brereton will soon develop themselves, and, in the meantime, we accompany the unsuspecting trio to the farm at Ealing Common, where Cicely was waiting day by day, with the hope of hearing the well known sound of Claude Duval's voice.

Claude always approached this home of Cicely's with the greatest possible caution. He not only did so for her sake and for his own safety, but he considered that he owed it to the people who granted to her an asylum in so generous a spirit, to be as careful as possible that they should not suffer from it.

The common mode of proceeding which Claude adopted was first of all to ride right across the common, then abruptly to turn and go about a third of the way back to the commencement of a bridle-path, that led to the back of the farm, and where, in a very few moments, he could completely hide himself from all observation among the trees.

In daylight, such precautions were much more necessary than at night; and now, little fancying that any one was specially watching him, he went with his two friends by the route we have mentioned, with the full idea that he was being eminently successful in getting to his destination unobserved by any one.

Tom Brereton, however, had, at the commencement of the common, got right into a hedge, from the recesses of which he watched the whole proceeding.

"Good," he said. "If I don't have Duval now I'm a Dutchman. There is only one house beyond all those trees, and that is where he has gone to. Now for London."

It so happened that, in a few moments, a stage-coach that came from Wycomb made its appearance on the common, and Tom Brereton, hailing it, got up on the outside, and was soon at a good pace whirled into the metropolis.

In the meantime, Claude conducted his two friends to the little gate that led to the stable-yard of the farm; and then turning to them, he said, with a pleased look—

"This place, amid all the storms and disasters of my life, is a true haven of rest for Cicely."

"Long may it continue so," said Dick.

"Amen!" said Jack; and he did not say it lightly or jocularly, but with the real feeling that the word should inspire.

"I thank you both for your good wishes," added Claude. "Only once has this house been invaded by the enemy, and to only one is the secret confided beyond you two and the inhabitants of the place; and yet, each time that I come here, I tremble for the result, and have a dread that some one may, after all, have an eye upon me."

"Banish such a fear," said Jack. "I looked back upon the common, and no one was at hand."

"And I looked forward," said Dick, "and all was clear."

"Well," said Claude, with a satisfied look, "I do believe that, for once in a way, I may be content, and consider myself quite safe."

It was strange that, upon the only occasion when his danger was very great, Claude should consider that he was unusually safe, and free from all sorts of peril.

Claude was so familiar to the place in which he was now, that he opened the gate, and rode in, accompanied by his friends. It was only the angry barking of a dog that summoned some of the family out to the yard to see what was amiss; but at the sight of Duval, he was hailed with pleasure. In the course of a few moments Cicely, looking quite fresh and blooming, was in the farm-yard, and the pleased flush upon her face at the sight of Claude lent her more beauty.

"Thrice welcome, Claude!" she said. "Thrice welcome!"

"You are quite well, dear Cicely?"

"I am, indeed. But tell me—is this a mere passing call, or can you and will you stay awhile?"

"I thought of staying a day or two."

"Ah! that, indeed, is welcome news. And your friends, too—they will stay and take a rest in the old place?"

"Yes. I have ventured upon saying that tkey would be welcome here, and I think and hope I have not been wrong in doing so, Cicely?"

"Far from wrong.—But come in all of you—the whole of the family are not at home; but those that are will make you most welcome. This way—this way. We have cut a new path, you see, Claude, right through the flower garden."

Poor Cicely was really so delighted to see Claude again, quite well, and to hear that he purposed staying a day or two at the farm, that she ran on talking and hardly knew what she said while the bright tears stood in her eyes, and she could have wept for joy.

Some of the lads took charge of the horses, and the three adventurers, little expecting what was brewing for them in London, quite gave themselves up to what they considered the serenity of the hour and the place, and did not dream of danger.

A hasty dinner was prepared in the ample kitchen of the farm-house; and to just take a peep at the party assembled there, no one could possibly have believed that three out of the lot had prices set upon their heads by the authorities.

Time soon flies when it is laughed away in agreeable society, so that the remainder of the day passed, and the evening shadows crept over tree and flower of the old farm, before Claude or his two friends thought it possible it could be so near at hand. Even Cicely seemed to share in the general confidence that all was safe; and, contrary to her habit, she did not suffer herself to entertain any of those gloomy fancies that usually beset her concerning the safety of Claude.

Alas! what a fatal serenity that was.

"I tell you what we think of doing," said Claude, as they all walked in the flower garden, to watch the last rays of the setting sun. "We will remain here until midnight to-morrow night, so that that will make two whole days and one whole night, and the greater part of the evening of the second day. Will that do, Cicely?"

"Ah, Claude, if you must then go, it shall and must do; but I lead a life of continual apprehension when you are away."

"Nay, then, that you should not. You should reflect upon the many dangers I have gone through, and you should tell yourself that it is hardly possible that I should again encounter such serious ones, so that you should consider me safer now than I have been."

"No, Claude, I cannot reason myself into any such fallacy. It is here that you have run the most serious past risks; but they, in their remembrance, only suggest what dangers may be still to come."

"But recollect that now," said Dick, "we go together, so that we are really strong enough to repel slight dangers."

"And, if I mistake not," said Jack, "we mean to keep together, too. Is it not so, Claude?"

"With all my heart."

"And with all mine," said Dick. "It is a lonely thing to be by one's self upon the road, knowing that the whole of society is in arms against you, and that in every man you see an enemy, while there is no one with whom you dare to exchange a kindly word."

"I have felt that," said Claude; "but then my heart used to fly here—(he pressed Cicely's hand as he spoke)—and then I was not lonely, but full of busy and happy thought."

Cicely looked at him gratefully for that speech. It was a tribute to her affection which she felt she deserved, but which was none the less delightful and welcome upon that account.

"You know where our horses are, Claude, in case of any alarm?" said Jack, with a sudden seriousness.

"Oh, yes; but it is fit and proper that you both should know likewise, although, as for any alarm here, I think, for a very small sum I would consent to insure your safety. What makes you, Jack, all in a moment, begin to have apprehensions?"

"That I cannot tell you, Claude. All I can say is, that the idea suddenly crossed my brain, and beyond that I know nothing; and as for apprehensions, I certainly cannot take upon myself to say that I have any."

"Well, we will have a peep at the horses for all that, Jack, and I am glad that you thought of it, for in my feeling of over-security in this place, I dare say it would not have crossed my mind to take you to the stables. But come on, we will go at once."

It was certainly strange that some obscure notion of danger should lay hold of Jack's mind at such a juncture; but it certainly did, and he could not shake it off either. The stables were duly visited, where the three horses were enjoying themselves with every luxury that could be placed before hem. Jack would not say anything else to damp their great hilarity, for, to tell the truth, he felt rather ashamed of his own fears, and he dreaded that Claude and Dick should begin to banter him about them.

By ten o'clock they all retired to rest, and a profound silence reigned throughout the farm.

CHAPTER CCXLI.

SHOWS HOW TOM BRERETON WENT TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

We will attend very briefly to the proceedings of Tom Brereton after he had fairly seen, or as good as seen, Claude Duval and his two friends housed in the farm.

For once in his life, Tom was determined to do the thing well, and as he knew that his information was very acceptable indeed in certain high quarters, he made up his mind as the Wycomb Coach rattled down Oxford Street, to go to the best market he could with his news, and make a thorough good bargain for himself.

"I won't mince the matter," said Tom. "I will go to the Under-Secretary of State at once, and tell him all about it, and get him to move in the business himself. There can be no cavilling then about the reward, or about who gave the first information, and all that sort of thing. Yes, I'll do it that way."

Full of this intent, Tom got off the coach at the corner of Bond Street, and making his way up that then much more fashionable thoroughfare than it is now, he turned into Grafton Street, where he happened to know the private house of the official personage he wished to see was situated.

"I'll see the secretary himself," muttered Tom; "and I will tell him all about it, and if I can't see him, I won't tell it at all; but when they find me obstinate, they wont hold out, I know; so it will be all right."

Now, this was a very good notion of Tom's, for if he had gone to a police office, he would just have got surrounded by officers, who would each have strove to have some hand in the affair, so that in all probability, with their eagerness and their avarice, the matter might have been completely spoiled; but, by going to the highest authority, he at once established his own position in the matter, as well as keeping it out of low hands in the carrying out.

There was only one little difficulty, and that was, the manner in which official personages are surrounded and made difficult of access—a fact that we cannot wonder at, for if they were at all easy of access, the space of time they wou have left for the transaction of real business would be small, indeed.

Just at that time, though, it so happened that the political aspect of the country was rather stormy, and there were many rumours of plots against the government, and conspiracies, for the purpose of assassinating the king; so that in th respect, Tom, as will be seen, had an advantage, and his application to see the secretary was not so likely to be slighted as under quieter circumstances.

Giving his hat, then, a more knowing look, by placing it rather on one side of his head, and opening his waistcoat a button or two, to show his well-pleated shirt-frill, Tom strutted up to the door of the secretary, and executed a rather alarming knock, after which, seeing a bell-handle with a little brass plate under it, upon which were the words, "Ring also," Tom laid hold of it, and worked away at it until the door was flung open by a couple of powdered flunkies, who thought that some very great person must be at the door, and yet they wondered they had not heard the sound of carriage wheels.

"A-hem!" said Tom, setting his arms a-kimbo. "Is his lordship within?"

The two footmen were so completely astounded at any one on foot, and with anything but an aristocratic air asking if his lordship were within, that one of them did nothing but stare at Tom Brereton in the face, while the other one walked completely round him in mute wonder.

"Come—come, flunkies!" said Tom, "no nonsense. I want to see his lordship, and I must and I will."

"And, pray, sir," said one of the footmen, with an affected drawl, "who may you be?"

"How do I know," said Tom, "who I may be? I only know who I am. I have business of the greatest importance with his lordship, and I won't tell any one else on any account."

"Ah!" said the footman, taking a pinch of snuff. "Does it concern the—the country?"

"Rather," said Tom; "the country roads in particular."

Tom Brereton took care to utter these last words rather aside, so that they did not reach the ears of the footmen.

"Ah!—ah!" said his interrogator, "in that case you will tell me, and I will tell his lordship's secretary's clerk, and he will tell his lordship's secretary, and he will tell his lordship. Ah!"

"Very well," said Tom Brereton, buttoning his coat slowly up to the chin, and then giving a decisive blow to his chest, "very well; just as you please. When the story all comes out, and there is the very devil to pay about it, it will then be fully understood that I was repulsed at his lordship's door by his lordship's footmen. Very good, indeed!"

"Stop!—stop! Ah—that is to say, stop!"

"What for? What is the use of stopping?"

The two footmen looked at each other with rather puzzled expressions, and then the one with the snuff-box, as he regailed himself with a pinch, said—

"Sir, it—ah—may, or it—ah—may not, be quite right and proper that you should see somebody, and so you shall; I must take upon myself the rather frightful and—ah—I may say, serious responsibility of introducing you to somebody."

"You had better," said Tom.

"And—ah—if it should turn out to be really—ah—nothing of any importance, I shall never forgive myself, and his lordship is very likely to say to me, 'Thomas, you are—a—a——'"

"An ass!" said Tom.

"Upon my life, sir," said Thomas, rapping the lid of his snuff-box. "Upon my life, I must say that you take very great liberties, indeed, sir—very great liberties, I may say."

"I tell you what it is," said Tom Brereton, "if you don't be quick about introducing me to your master, it will be too late, and then I won't exactly say what the consequences may chance to be."

Upon this intimation, the gentlemen in plush bestired themselves. They had of late heard so much about conspiracies and plots against the government, that they were quite in a state of agony upon that subject, and the idea that their per-tinacious visitor might have something frightful to disclose in that line, had been gradually taking possession of their faculties for the last five minutes.

"Yes. Oh—ah—certainly," said the one with the snuff-box. "Just step this way, sir, if you please."

"All's right," said Tom, as he again carefully unbuttoned his coat, and flung it open with an air of importance. "All's right now, I rather think—ahem!"

Strutting after the footman with all the importance of his little despicable nature, Tom flattered himself that at last he had done the thing rather cleverly, and that not only should he achieve his revenge against Claude Duval for the many slights he had put upon him, and the frights he had given him, but that he should gain a good round sum of money by the transaction.

"Ah," he muttered to himself, "this is the way to do business, I rather think—hem! Always go to the fountain-head, and then you are sure to be all right—hem!"

The footman conducted Tom into a waiting-room upon the ground floor, which was fitted up upon the same principle that the waiting-rooms of physicians houses are, namely, with everything of so big and bulky a character, that if the cleverest appropriators of other folks' goods that London could produce got into the place, he would not be able to take anything away with him.

"If you will be so obliging as to wait a few minutes, sir," said the footman, whose respect for Tom, in proportion as he thought he might really have something important to tell, increased, "you will be attended to."

"Oh, don't hurry—a minute or two, or perhaps three," said Tom, "may not be of much consequence; but three is the outside, young man—quite the outside, now."

"Certainly, sir—of course, sir—no doubt of it."

Tom was left alone, and full of the importance of the tidings that he came with, he threw himself into an easy chair, and strove to look as important as though he were himself a secretary of state, and the owner of the house into which he had made his way.

"This affair," he said, "will strike up a kind of acquaintance between me and the government, so that it will be obliged to provide for me as it provides for other great men out of the taxes. I don't at all like paying taxes, but I have no objection in the world to being provided for out of them. Indeed it is rather a pleasant idea than otherwise, I should say, and I shall feel it my duty to——"

"Well, sir, what is it?" said a voice.

Tom sprang up from the easy chair, with the full conviction that his lordship was before him, for there stood a quiet looking man in black, with a pen in his hand, which looked, Tom thought, very Secretary-of-State-like.

"Oh, my lord," said Tom, "I beg your lordship ten thousand pardons; but the fact is, I was rather just a little tired, you see, and so I sat down. That was all, my lord, upon my word."

"It's of no sort of consequence—you are quite welcome. I am not his lordship; but you can, with perfect safety and propriety, tell me what you come about."

"You are not his lordship?"

"Certainly not."

"Then I'll see you at the bottom of the sea before I tell you. I have news for the ear of the Secretary of State. I came here to tell it to him, and if he won't listen to it, I can go away again, that's all, so tha's flat."

"But my good sir——"

"It's of no use your speaking to me—not a bit. Not a bit. Hold your row. It's of no use, I tell you, at all. I won't tell you or anybody but the Secretary of State himself."

"Very good, sir. Is it a matter connected with the state of the country?"

"It is a matter connected with the state of the country—roads," added Tom to himself. "Of that I give you my most particular word of honour."

"Very good, sir. Will you be so good as to wait?"

The gentlemanly-looking man in black left the room, and once again Tom Brereton sunk into the recesses of the easy chair, and then wagging his head to and fro for a few moments, he said, in what he considered was an enormously sagacious tone of voice—

"Ha, ha! They won't get the better of me. Oh, no! I am not going to let any whipper-snapper of a clerk stand between me and the reward. Oh, no!"

"Well, sir!" said a voice.

Tom started to his feet again, and beheld a bald-headed elderly man, elegantly dressed in evening costume, in the centre of the room. "That's the fellow!" thought Tom, and he executed a very low bow.

"Your lordship is very good," said Tom. "I hope I have the pleasure of seeing your lordship quite well, and—and that is to say quite well?"

"Pray, sir, do not mistake," said the bald-headed man in the most bland accents. "I have not the honour of being his lordship. I am only his lordship's secretary."

"The devil!"

"Sir?"

"Oh, no offence; but I thought really that I had got the ear of the right man at last. And pray, sir, who was the gentleman with the pen in his hand who came here only a little while ago?"

"That was my clerk."

"Your clerk?"

"Precisely so, sir. I hope and trust that I may be permitted to have a clerk without that point being at all offensive to you?"

"Oh, you may have a dozen; but I tell you what it is, Mr. Secretary, I don't mean to let you know what I come about any more than your clerk. I have got a piece of information to give to the Secretary of State, and if I do not see him and tell him personally, I can carry it away again with me, and the country—roads" added Tom in a low tone, "must take the wretched and most diabolical consequences."

The secretary looked grave.

"Allow me to assure you, sir," he said, "that whatever you say to me goes directly to the Secretary of State, without anything being added or taken from it. It is my special duty to be to that distinguished personage a faithful reporter of facts, and under such circumstances I do hope that——"

"Bow! wow!—don't bother! I tell you, I won't, and there's an end of it if I had only known there had been half so much bother as this, I would not have come at all. But I can go—yes, sir, I can go as I came, with my information here, sir—here!"

Tom rather fiercely struck his forehead as he spoke, and the very polite secretary looked rather puzzled to know what to do in the matter. After a pause, he said,—

"Well, sir: pray be patient for a few minutes, and I will see what can be done. I will speak to his lordship, and very probably, as you say it is information connected with the country, he may feel inclined to see you. Pray be seated, sir."

CHAPTER CCXLII.

THE ALARM AT THE FARM.—CLAUDE'S GREAT DANGER.

Tom Brereton was again alone.

"Ah!" he said, "I shall do it at last, in spite of them all, I know—the vagabonds! Lord, I know 'em well! They would swear me out, among them, that I had never been here, after a little time, and pocket the reward among them."

One would really think that Tom Brereton must have, at one time or another, been in public life, to have acquired so capital and accurate a notion of the morality of it; and we cannot but admire the perseverance with which he insisted upon seeing the secretary, who could not very well flinch from any promises he might make concerning the reward for the apprehension of Claude Duval.

Tom was determined that this time he would keep an eye upon the door, so that when the secretary should appear, he might not be taken by surprise; and it was well that he did so, for in the course of about three minutes, the door opened, and an odd-looking, red-faced, vulgar looking man bustled into the room.

Tom stared at him in amazement.

"Now, sir, what is it?" said the man; "you would insist on seeing me, and here I am."

"What, are you his lordship?"

"I am the Secretary of State for the Home Department, sir, and I shall feel obliged if you will be brief in what you have to say to me, as my time is very much occupied."

Tom shook his head.

"How am I to know you arethe Secretary of State? You say you are, but how am I to know it?"

"Tut—tut; what folly this is, to be sure. Then, sir, do you see that portrait on the chimney piece?"

"Oh, yes, I see it."

"Well, look at it, and then look at me; it is flattered a little, but still is sufficiently like for you to see that it is intended for me, and it is not very likely that any one else's portrait but that of the master of the house hangs in such a place. Are you satisfied?"

Tom made a low bow, as he said,—

"I am, my lord."

"Very good; that's settled. Now, sir, what have you to say? what is your information?"

"Well, then, my lord, as I feel now quite convinced that you are my lord, and as there can be no possible mistake about it—"

"Quick, sir—quick."

"And as by the portrait, which is nearly as ugly—I mean nearly as handsome—as your lordshp, it is quite easy to perceive that——"

"Do you want to keep me here all the day, sir? I tell you my time is appropriated to the last moment. It is as much as I can do to eat or drink, or sleep, sir; and yet, here you are dallying with the minutes, as though they were of not the slightest consequence."

"Then, my lord, I beg to state, that if you will make me feel sure of the reward, I will take anybody you like to send to where they may lay their hands upon Claude Duval."

"Claude Duval, the highwayman?"

"The very same."

"And why, in the name of all that is abominable, sir, could you not take your information to the police-office?"

"Oh, my lord, you don't know what rogues they are at police-offices. They would have jewed me out of the reward as safe as eggs are eggs, so I thought I would come to you."

"A pretty affair, indeed, that I am to be consulted about thief-catching! At the same time, I admit, sir, that the government is anxious for the apprehension of this Claude Duval. As long as he remains at large, it is a disgrace to the police of this country."

"Just so, my lord."

"And he has committed some of the most daring and violent attacks upon persons in a high station of life that it is possible to conceive. Sir, I do not at all undervalue your information; but, yet, there was no occasion for such an amount of pertinacity in seeing me upon the subject."

"Oh, dear, yes, there was! I have no notion of not getting the reward, you see, my lord. My name is Tom Brereton, and I really want the money, I assure you; so I hope I may have your lordship's word that if I really do give Duval into the hands of the officers, I am to get what has been offered for his apprehension?"

"Most assuredly."

"That's all right, then. It's as good as settled; and I tell you what I can do

THE PURSUIT FROM THE FARM-HOUSE.

as well—I can give you two other highwaymen that are with him into the bargain, for I happen to know where the whole three of them have gone, and no mistake!"

"There is one thing, Mr. Tom Button," said his lordship, "that I hope you are right in, and that——"

"Brereton, my lord."

"Oh, it's no matter—Bacon or Button. They will do equally well. But I was going to say, that I hope you are quite sure of the identity of Duval with the persons you say you can deliver up to the officers of justice?"

"Oh, yes, my lord. I happen to know him rather too well. It isn't at all likely that I shall make any mistake of that sort, I can tell you."

"Very good, then. As you have my word for the reward, which was what you wanted to see me for, I presume you can make the particulars of your communition to the secretary, if you please; and I beg to bid you good-day, Mr. Tom Burnett."

Before Tom could interpose another word to detain his lordship, he had abruptly left the room.

"Confound it," said Tom, "what does he mean by calling me Bacon, and Button, and Burnett? Does he mean to try and swindle me out of the reward by raising a cavil about my name? Oh, what a thing it is that people are all such rogues!"

No doubt Tom Brereton had arrived at this conclusion regarding human nature by an attentive self-examination, for the reader is already aware of several little passages in Tom's history, that are by no means of an exalted character.

Very shortly afterwards the respectable looking secretary with the bald head made his appearance, and took down in writing the exact information that Tom could give about the whereabouts of Claude Duval; and when that was concluded, he said,—

"I have received his lordship's orders upon this affair, and since there is, from what you say, every reason to believe that this place you mention is one at which Claude Duval will remain the night, it is determined to make the seizure an hour before midnight. It will take nearly an hour to get to Ealing Common; so, you will be so good as to come here at ten o'clock this evening."

"What? me?"

"Yes. It is thought desirable by his lordship, in order that there should not be the shadow of a doubt concerning the reward, that you should accompany the party."

"Oh, well, if I must, why—a—a—I suppose I must; but I am not at all good at the fighting business."

"Concerning that, you need not trouble yourself. We will provide a sufficient force to take all that difficulty off your shoulders."

"Oh, then, in that case I have no objection in life to go, and you may expect me to the minute quite punctually."

Having made this arrangement with the secretary, Tom felt pretty well satisfied with the manner in which he had conducted the affair. We may at once skip over the hours that intervened between this and ten o'clock at night, and fancy Tom once again at the door of the Secretary of State, about a minute after the metropolitan church clocks had agreed that it was ten.

This time Tom Brereton did not find the same difficulty that he had before experienced in making his way to the interior of the mansion. The clerk to the secretary was waiting for him, and the moment he saw him, he said, very politely—

"I am to accompany you, Mr. Brereton."

"You?" cried Tom. "But do you think that you and I can lay hold of such a fellow as Claude Duval?"

"Certainly not, sir. I should for one be very sorry to make the attempt; but I will take you to where you will find quite a sufficient force to settle the business."

"Oh, that's quite another thing."

"Exactly—I hear the sound of carriage-wheels at the door. His lordship is kind enough to accommodate us with one of his private carriages as far as Hyde Park, and after that we will go on horseback."

"Horseback!" said Tom to himself. "Somehow, I never feel very happy on horseback." That was no time, however, to start any frivolous objections, and as Tom knew that at the least the rewards for the apprehension of Duval were a thousand pounds, he was far from wishing to throw any obstacles in the way of carrying out the affair.

In the course of a couple of minutes, he and the clerk were being wheeled off at a rapid pace to the Oxford Street corner of Hyde Park; and so swiftly did they go, that the distance appeared to be a mere nothing. The night was rather dark and blusterous—now and then a smart puff of wind, that was strongly indicative of rough weather, would come across the faces of the horses, and make them almost pause; and when Tom and the clerk alighted, the trees in the park were agitated furiously by the breeze.

"A roughish night," said Tom.

"Yes, we shall have wind and rain enough on our progress, I daresay; but that cannot be helped," said the clerk. "Be so good as to step this way, if you please. One party was to be stationed a little way down here, beyond Tyburn Gate."

Three minutes' walking took Tom Brereton and the clerk through the celebrated gate; and then, to their surprise, but greatly to the comfort of Tom, he found that, drawn up close to the roadside, was a party of twenty-five of a Light Cavalry Regiment that happened at that time to be quartered at Kensington. Along with these soldiers there were six mounted police-officers, so that the party altogether that went upon that occasion to capture Claude Duval, was really one of a very formidable description indeed.

"Hilloa!" said Tom, "this is coming it strong, rather."

"Yes, Mr. Brereton," said the clerk. "If your information be quite correct, I think there is very little doubt of the capture of Claude Duval, now, and his associates; and if once captured, he will soon be disposed of."

"Yes; this will be a settler, I rather think."

"Mr. Anderson," said the clerk, in a higher voice, "are you there, sir? Mr. Anderson!"

"Yes, sir," said one of the mounted police-officers. "All's right, sir. We have been waiting some little time. Here are the led horses, sir."

"Very good; now, Mr, Brereton will you be so good as to mount, and we will start at once upon the expedition."

A very tall horse was brought to Tom Brereton, upon the back of which he did, after no inconsiderable difficulty, succeed in scrambling; and there he sat, perched up, at an amazing and perilous height from the ground, and feeling anything but comfortable or pleased with his situation.

"It's all very fine, Mr. Clerk," said Tom, "but if there are any bullets flying about, I rather think I am in just the proper place to catch a few of them."

"Oh, no—no, not at all. It's all luck in such matters, my dear sir; I don't think, if you are to catch a shot or two, that do what you will you can avoid them."

"Really?"

"No; and, of course, in such little affairs as this, there must be some danger. But if you are hit, it will be still a great satisfaction to you to feel that it is in the service of your country, and in the protection of legitimate rights of property."

"Oh, very great! Confound the rights of property! What the deuce is property to me with a pistol bullet in my brain, I should like to know? Nothing at all. I tell you what it is, Mr. Clerk—I did not bargain for any danger in the affair; so after I have pointed out where the fellows you want are to be found, I shall make bold to be off to a distance."

"Well, I am certainly surprised at you, Mr. Brereton."

"Surprised? What at?"

"Why, that you should not have enjoyed a little fracas."

"Are you?—then you don't know me. I like peace and quietness, and plenty to eat and drink, and lots of money and nothing to do. Fighting is not in my line. Dear me, how fast we are going."

"Delays are dangerous."

"Yes, but it's much more dangerous, don't you think, to be jolted off the back of a trotting horse, as high as a first-floor window?"

Tom Brereton's remonstrances produced no sort of effect upon the party, They went on at a rattling pace, and he found, that unless he held on with all his skill and power, that he ran a risk of being left behind in the middle of the road; so he put up with it the best way he could with a good grace, although the bumping he got was really something seriously alarming. In this way, however, and at such a pace, the ground was soon got over. The village of Acton was passed through as the old church-clock chimed the half hour past ten, and several heads were thrust out of the cottage windows at the sound of the unwonted bustle made by the horses' feet in the road-way.

The cavalcade of soldiers and civilians, however, swept past before any one could hazard a conjecture upon the subject of their destination; and in a very short time Ealing Common was in sight, looking wide and black and mysterious in the night air.

The wind was rather whistling over the common with a melancholy sound that made Tom Brereton shiver again.

"Halt!" cried the officer commanding the party of cavalry, and then turning to the civilian who answered to the name of Anderson, he said,—"Now, sir, where are we to go? I was to come to Ealing Common, and there wait your directions, and here I am."

"This is the gentleman who will guide us to the house, I presume," said Anderson, singling out Tom Brereton. "What I shall then request of you, captain, will be to surround the premises in the way your own judgment may suggest, so that no one shall be able to escape—that's all. We, of course, will go in and make the capture."

"Very well. I will undertake that no one passes the cordon that I will establish without; and whoever attempts it, must just take the consequences of their indiscretion, for my men will not be very particular, I daresay."

"It isn't necessary that they should, captain. No one will try to escape from us that we don't want to nab."

"Now, Mr. Brereton," said the clerk, "lead on if you please, sir."

"Oh, dear, yes," said Tom. "How pleasant this is, to be sure! Don't you think you could find the place, now, if I were to describe it to you?—for, to tell the truth, I have just recollected that I have an appointment in London of very great importance, indeed. It's a fact."

"You must break it then, sir, if you please. Pray lead on. No possible description of the place we are to attack can come up to actually showing us. Recollect the reward."

"Oh, dear, yes; that's the only thing that I do want to recollect in the whole affair; but, I suppose, there is no help for it, and even I must go. This is the way, gentlemen. Let me beg that you will be so good as to make as little noise as you possibly can in the way, for that Claude Duval has very sharp ears."

"Caution!" said the captain.

The cavalry adopted a step that was very light, and which could not have been heard at any distance. The horses seemed quite perfectly to understand what was required of them; and certainly more noise in going across Ealing Common was made by the half-dozen police horses than by the whole twenty-five cavalry.

This alteration of pace, though, was a very welcome thing to Tom Brereton; and but for the fact that he felt he was approaching rather to a dangerous proximity with the farm-house where Duval was, he would have felt now tolerably comfortable. He took the party to the shrubbery that skirted the farm, and then, in a low voice, he said—

"Oh, gracious! Here we are."

CHAPTER CCXLIII.

TAKES A PEEP WITHIN THE FARM-HOUSE, AND GIVES AN ALARM.

It is necessary now that we should see what our friends in the farm-house are about.

The intense feeling of security of which we have before spoken, and which in some strange manner had taken possession of Claude Duval, spread its influence over every one but Jack, and he, from constitutional nervousness, did not participate in it. Yet, as he felt that upon many occasions he had raised a feeling of alarm where none should have existed, he did not like, upon the present occasion, to damp the feeling of general satisfaction that was evidently in the breasts of the whole of the people at the farm-house.

The countenance will speak, however, if the eyes do not, and Claude could not but see that Jack was ill at ease. Dick likewise observed as much; but then, knowing Jack as well as they did, they naturally enough set it down to the infirmity of his nature.

Claude tried at supper to rally him out of the feeling, and he did succeed to some extent in doing so.

"Come, Jack," he said, "you must not look so dull and downcast now. Recollect that if all the world is in arms against us, this is a haven of rest and security."

"I hope it is," said Jack.

"You only hope?"

"Well, Claude, is not that sufficient? I say I hope it is; and if you think it is, I am content to believe as much; and yet——"

"Well, Jack, and yet?"

"I think that even here we ought not to neglect all precautions, and if you won't take it amiss that I do so, I will keep watch during the night round the farm, while you and Dick rest yourselves from your late fatigues."

"Now this is really too bad, Jack," said Claude.

"Very much too bad," said Dick.

"Well," added Jack, "I really can't see how it is too bad. If nothing comes of my forebodings, why, I lose my night's rest for my pains; but if anything does come of them, I have the great satisfaction of having been, by my caution, useful to my friends."

"Now, Jack, listen to me," said Claude, with a smile. "Our fatigues are no greater than yours, for we have all three been together precisely through the same adventures, and exposed to the same adversities; therefore, if there were any real occasion for watching, we ought to take that business by turns, or rather, I should say, that I ought to do it wholly, as I must be the principal person whose name brings danger upon you two."

"Oh, I demur to that," said Dick. "If we are to mount guard during the night, let us take it turn and turn about in the regular way. I certainly will not submit to Jack being made the victim."

"Nor I," Claude cried, "so give it up at once, Jack, for we really all need a night's rest."

"Very well, I give it up," said Jack; "let us hear no more about it; and now let us enjoy ourselves as we best can, for, as you say, it is not often we can sit down with the same feelings we do now at any table."

Claude and Dick were tolerably well satisfied with the change that now took place in the manner of Jack, for there was a degree of hilarity about him which they had seldom witnessed; and whether it were acting or a reflex of his real feelings, they had no opportunity of coming to a judgment.

The evening now deepened into night, in the midst of rather sprightly conversation, and at length a general move was made to retire, and in the course of another quarter of an hour there was a profound silence in the farm-house, for everybody had gone to rest.

It was then about a quarter past ten o'clock.

The room which had been appropriated to Jack was a small apartment at one corner of the house, and which had a little window that opened upon the sloping roof of an outhouse, over which grew a very luxuriant vine. There was another window likewise to the room, that looked to the back garden. When Jack retired to this apartment, Claude went with him for a few moments, and remained talking to him while he took off his coat and boots.

"Now, Jack," he said, "take a night's rest, for I am quite sure you want one, and don't let any fears disturb you, for it is one of the most unlikely things in all the world, as you know well, that any enemy can possibly be aware that we are here."

"You are right, I think, Claude."

"I know I am. Here we have been a number of hours in this place, and no one has come to it upon any real or pretended business, so that there has been no chance of anything going amiss. I merely wish to assure you of my most perfect and entire confidence in our safety; and now good-night, Jack, and a good rest to you."

"Good-night, Claude, the same to you. All's right."

"Poor Jack!" thought Claude as he left the room, "he has never recovered that hanging business, and I suppose he never will now, poor fellow. But I think I have quieted him down, now, as regards any fears for to-night, and he will sleep calmly and soundly enough, I dare say."

Jack calmly waited until Claude's footsteps had died completely away, and he was satisfied that there was no likelihood of his return to say anything, and then calmly and deliberately he pulled on his boots again, and put on his coat.

"It is all very well, Claude," he said, "for you to feel so much confidence in your safety in this place, but I cannot conquer the feeling that has been growing over me for hours, to the effect that some disaster is at hand. If I were to go to bed I should not sleep, so that it is of no use vexing myself by trying. I don't go so far as to say that I am a believer at all times in what are called presentiments of danger, but I will say that I never felt so strongly persuaded as I do now, that something will happen.'

Jack was cool and collected enough, notwithstanding this strong feeling of danger to himself and his friends that had taken possession of his mind. The firm resolution that he had taken some hours before of keeping watch for its approach nerved him.

By the light of the candle with which he was provided, he now set about looking carefully to his pistols, and as they had been loaded now for some hours, and exposed to the jolting of a hard ride, he carefully drew the charges and reloaded them.

"It's as well to have all right," he said, "and then one feels a degree of confidence that enables one to be cool and calm."

Jack's next effort was to hammer the flints of his pistols, so that at a moment's notice they would do duty without the possibility of a failure, and then he considered that he had everything in readiness, come what might.

His fixed intention was to keep watch round the farm, but as he did not wish his friends to have any suspicion that he entertained such a project, he resolved upon waiting until it was a matter of positive certainty that they were all asleep. He had taken a good survey of the position of his chamber before, therefore he knew perfectly well how to get from it with the least noise or alarm.

It would have been an odd sight to Claude, if he could only have seen Jack sitting in his room there by the light of a candle that was getting an alarmingly long wick, fully armed, and waiting until repose had stolen over the senses of all in the place, before he should sally out as though his object were a hostile one, instead of a protecting one.

But neither Claude nor Dick had the smallest suspicion upon the subject, and went to their rest with the full idea that Jack had likewise gone to his.

As he (Jack) there sat, there came yet more strongly on him each moment the presentiment of danger. Suddenly he started to his feet.

"No," he said, "I will not, and I ought not to disregard this feeling that is far from dissipating, but, on the contrary, grows upon me each moment with the greater strength—I will not cast aside this most mysterious warning of approaching danger, for, in good truth, it does amount to that—I will meet it!"

Jack now considered that he had waited long enough for the whole of the house to be in a state of repose, so, after opening his room door, and listening for a few moments, and hearing nothing, he at once commenced his arrangements for leaving his chamber.

His first act was, to close his door, and fasten it upon the inside, and then he cautiously opened the little window that looked out upon the outhouse roof. All was still without, and the little rain that fell had the effect of completely prostrating what small amount of wind there might have been. Jack heard that rain faintly pattering upon the large vine leaves that completely covered up the roof of the outhouse.

With an extreme caution, that his habits of life had taught him well how to assume, he now crept through the window, and carefully let himself down by the roof of the outhouse, until he came to its lowest edge, when he jumped into the garden. He was quite satisfied that he had been successful in doing all that without creating the smallest amount of alarm.

"That will do," said Jack to himself. "Now I shall be able to keep a good watch, and no one will be any the wiser, although, I flatter myself, that every one will be something the safer. Claude and Dick need never know that I was on the move all this night; but I would ten times rather have been prowling round this house than tossing upon my bed in all the fever of sleeplessness from apprehensions of some unknown danger."

There was no difficulty in walking completely round the farm-house to those who were acquainted with it. A couple of little gates, which Jack knew well how to open, were the only obstructions to his progress; and when he had set them wide open, he could take his slow march completely round the premises easily.

There was something very grateful and pleasant to the senses in the cool freshness of the night air, impregnated as it was with that soft, balmy rain that pattered gently upon the leaves of the trees. Jack leant against one of the little gates, and rather enjoyed the scene. The freshness of the air effectually kept off all feeling of fatigue from him; and he was just upon the point of trying to look at his watch, amid the darkness, to note the time, when a dull sound came upon his ear from a distance.

Jack placed himself in an attitude of listening, and he felt satisfied that imagination had not deceived him—Tramp—tramp—tramp! From afar off, he felt satisfied that he heard the sound of horses' feet.

From that moment, Jack felt certain that all his prognostications of some danger had not been for nothing; and that in keeping watch that night, he was really doing good service to his friends who slumbered in fancied security.

Slowly he bent down to the ground, until he lay at full length upon it, and placed his ear flat against it. Then he could, as plainly as though they had been just on the outside of the gate of the farm, hear the tread of horses' feet, each moment becoming plainer and plainer, which was as good a proof as needs be that they were approaching that spot.

One thing, however, was just possible, and that was, that the party of horsemen approaching might not, by any means, be going to stop at the farm. There was nothing to lead directly to that conclusion. It was possible that they might be going right on; and if such were the case, he (Jack) felt that it would be, as yet, quite premature upon his part to give any alarm.

"There is time yet," he said. "There is time yet. I will wait a little while, and judge more accurately of what are their intentions."

That the mounted party was coming by the high road from London to the common, Jack's accurate knowledge of the topography of the spot enabled him to feel certain; and his object, therefore, became to get as near to the road-way across the common as possible, for the purpose of noticing their movements. He accordingly at once began to make his way. To do this he had to pass through the stable-yard; as he went, he assured himself that the stable where the three horses were kept was easily accessible. He then made a rapid passage through the plantation, which so effectually screened the farm from the common, and from the sight of all persons passing along its high road to the village, and soon emerged upon the common itself.

Jack now threw himself flat upon the grass, and listened. The footsteps of the horses sounded alarmingly close at hand, and he immediately rose.

A very few minutes, now, must, he felt, decide the question effectually, as to whether the horsemen were going straight on, or were going to swerve from the path, for the purpose of attacking the farm; and during those few minutes, poor Jack endured hours of suspense.

The path, or rather the high-road across Ealing Common, as it might now properly be termed, was a considerable distance from the plantation that shut in the farm, and upon the extreme edge of which Jack was only just within the shadow of the trees. From that high-road there diverged a path that led directly to the farm, and in the dim night air, Jack could just see the head of that path, by means of a stunted pollard that he knew grew there, and which sent up a few straggling branches into the night sky. He kept his eyes fixed upon that spot, as though upon it depended his destiny in all time to come.

CHAPTER CCXLIV.

THE ATTACK UPON THE FARM BY THE POLICE AND MILITARY.

It is rather a curious subject of inquiry, that of presentiment. We are apt to be led astray by coincidences of the purest accidental character, that it is almost impossible to come to a conclusion upon the subject.

Philosophers tell us, that if any result follows a certain action for a great number of times, we are justified in calling it a law of nature that it should do so, and certainly as regards presentiments of coming evil, the experiences of every one are sufficient to convince them that they are not unfrequent, and that the occurrence of something very unusual after them, seems to favour the supposition that they were a mute kind of warning of the coming distress.

But be all this as it may, certainly Jack had upon that night felt particularly uneasy, and a conviction had stolen over him, in a manner that he could not succeed in shaking off, to the effect that something would happen.

"I knew it," he muttered to himself, as he still kept his eyes fixed upon the the old tree; "I knew it well. I would not have slept to-night, and cheated myself into an idea of security, for worlds."

The night air swept past him with a strange and mournful kind of sound, as though unseen spirits were upon its noiseless wings, sighing for the evil that was about to ensue, which their pure natures enabled them to plainly foresee.

Jack trembled a little, but it was not for himself that he did so. It was for others that he held dearer than self.

Not very long, however, had poor Jack to reflect upon the situation in which he was, or to vex himself with anything in the shape of imaginative or unsubstantial terrors, for in a very few moments he saw the dark throng of people pause at the corner of the path across the common that led up to the farm.

Whether that pause were accidental or on the contrary, Jack only now awaited to see, and that was a question which was very speedily put to rest, by his observing the crowd of heads, that were only very faintly relieved against the night-sky, slowly advancing towards the plantation, upon [the skirts of which he was then concealed by the deep shadows of the old trees.

"They come," said Jack, "they come."

With these words, he turned at once, and p'unged through the brushwood back to the house.

JACK CLIMBS A TREE TO RECONNOITRE THEIR PURSUERS.

From that moment, Jack seemed as if but one impulse could possibly animate his mind, and tha' was to awaken Claude Duval and Dick Turpin to the frightful danger that they ran. All fear seemed to have vanished from him; but mechanically he went on until he reached the part of the garden into which he had descended from the roof of the little building immediately beneath the window of the apartment allotted to him as a bed-room.

He began to climb up by the aid of the vigorous shoots of the vine that were there in abundance to assist him in so doing.

Jack felt that now the least alarm of a noisy character would only have the effect of bringing the enemies of himself and of his friends with the greater activity to the attack; and from their numbers, if it should really come to an encounter, there could be but little doubt as to which way it would terminate. If anything was to be done to save them, it was quite evident that it could only be by silence and caution.

Jack, full of this conviction, and it was a true one in every sense of the word, made his way to his chamber-window in a much shorter space of time than probably, under other circumstances, he would have been able to reach it. He sprung into the room. A touch at the door was sufficient to convince him that it was just as he had left it.

It was at this moment that a frightful pang shot across the heart of Jack, from a thought which, however unjust it was in reality, was not at all unnatural under the circumstances. He thought that it was just possible there might be some treachery in the house, which would account for the attack upon the farm.

If anything could be calculated more than another to unnerve Jack for a few moments, it certainly would be such an idea as that, and he was compelled to lean against the wall for support while he made the attempt to reason himself out of it.

"Oh, no—no," he said. "It cannot be. It is only a frightful idea engendered by this peril. Who is there here who would stoop to such an act? No, no! I will dismiss it from my thoughts."

It was much easier to say that he would dismiss from his thoughts such a notion than actually to do so; but, at all events, Jack made the attempt, and if he succeeded but ill, he would not let that non-success interfere with what he had to do, which was to rouse Claude and Dick.

The lock of his door readily yielded to his touch and he passed out of the room into the passage beyond it, from which he knew opened the bed-chambers of his two friends. At the first door he came to, he knocked rapidly, saying in a subdued voice, and yet one loud enough to be plainly heard by any one within the room—

"Up—up, I say. There is danger on foot.—Up—up, and leave this place at once!"

Jack then heard a loud noise as though some one had fallen out of bed on to the floor; and, in fact, such was the case, for it was Dick Turpin's bed-room that Jack had got to, and as Dick happened to be reposing very near to the edge of the bed, he had, upon the first surprise of the moment at hearing Jack's voice in such alarming accents, made a sudden turn that had precipitated him to the floor.

"Awake—awake!" added Jack. "Awake, there!"

"I am awake," said Dick. "What the deuce is the matter? Is the house on fire?"

"Worse!"

"Worse than that? Oh, you must be joking, Jack—for I think it is your voice."

Dick had scrambled to his feet by this time, and opened the door, where, by the light of a small oil-lamp that was upon a bracket in the corridor, he saw Jack.

"Good Heavens, Jack," he cried, "you look as pale as death. What has happened? Are you ill?"

"Oh, no—no, but in a few minutes—perhaps even now, as we speak, the house is surrounded by our foes. I saw an armed party on the Common, and the destination of it was this place."

"You saw, do you say, Jack?"

"Yes, I was keeping watch."

"I'll be hanged if I didn't think you would, and told Claude so, but he thought otherwise, and would not say anything further to you about it. I will dress as rapidly as I can. The next door is Claude's—wake him up, Jack, directly, that's a good fellow."

"I will—I will."

There was no occasion for Jack to make any efforts to awaken Claude, for the little commotion, and the kind of disturbance that had taken place in Dick's rooms, had had that effect; and feeling certain that something was amiss, Claude had hastily dressed himself, and now came out to see what was happening.

"Hilloa! Jack or Dick," he said, "or both of you, what is amiss?"

"Save yourself, Claude," cried Dick; "save yourself. The house will be surrounded by a force that it will be madness to try to cope with. Every moment is precious,"

"Ah! say you so, Jack?"

"I do, indeed, Claude. You know the premises well, and I beg of you at once to make use of that knowledge to leave them as quick as you can. It is you, and probably you only, who are sought. Oh, Claude, away with you—away at once!"

"Hush! Jack, you know not what you say. Everything is to be lost by precipitation and nothing gained. Tell me exactly what the danger is, and how you discerned it?"

"Ah," said Dick, who was busy priming one of his pistols, "that is it. Let us know all about it, Jack."

"Alas! alas!" said Jack. "These may be precious moments, but if you must know, you shall. I could not sleep, and I went to walk in the plantation skirting the common."

"Or in other words, Jack," said Claude, "you went to keep watch, while we slept. Is it not so?"

"Well—well, do not heed that at present. It does not matter much; but as I was there I saw a throng of people in regular marching order making their way towards the farm."

"By the cross-path, Jack?"

"Yes, I waited in order that I might not raise a false alarm, until I saw them turn from the road into the cross-path, and you know that that conducts to nowhere but to here."

"True—true."

"Then the danger is sufficiently great," said Dick, "and I am now quite ready to meet it."

"Cicely!" said Claude; and then he at once returned to the chamber again which he had left. Cicely had heard that something was wrong, and had availed herself of the time that Claude had been conversing with Jack and Dick to dress herself, so that when Claude went back to the room, he found her up and ready to leave it. He had formed something like a determination as to what to do in the event of such an emergency as the present arising, and now he spoke earnestly to Cicely to induce her to carry it out.

"Listen to me, Cicely," he said; "Jack brings us the news that the officers are about the place. Now, let me beg of you to believe that you cannot aid me, but that, if I have the anxiety of your safety to add to my own perils, I may very likely fall. What I wish you to do is, to go at once to the sleeping-rooms of some of the females of the family here, and there remain until you hear from me, and not on any account to interfere with us in the conflict that may ensue."

"But you will be in danger?"

"Yes. It is my vocation to be in danger, Cicely. Heed it not. You and I have passed through very much greater dangers than this together. Let me not have the frightful feeling that you are involved in the dangers and chances of the conflict."

"Then it is veritable?"

"Perhaps not. I would not say as much to Jack, on any account, as it might have the effect of wronging his good and honest feelings towards me, but as the alarm comes from him, I feel that it is apt to be rather exaggerated than otherwise."

"Oh, Claude, you give me a faint hope by saying that."

"Let me hope, then, Cicely, that you will act upon that feeling, and go at once as I wish, to a place of safety, and leave me and my friends to settle this matter, as best we may."

"Yes—yes, I will—I ought."

"Now, indeed, I feel easy. Dear Cicely, I shall not forget this ready acquiescence to my wishes. Go at once. Do you know the way?"

"Oh, Claude, you forget that this house is most familiar to me now. There is not a nook or a corner of it that I do not know full well."

"Go, then, dear one, at once."

Cicely, after an embrace from Claude, left the room hastily, and proceeded, as he had directed her, to the rooms occupied by the family, who were not yet aware of anything being amiss in the place. She, however, could inform them, so that they could take the best course their judgments and their feelings should suggest under the circumstances.

In a moment after he had thus—to the greatest extent in his power—provided for the safety of Cicely, Claude was with his two friends, who had occupied the time they had been by themselves in seeing that all their pistols were in good ord.r.

"Any more news?" said Claude.

"No," replied Dick, "but the best thing we can do now, I think, is to make our way to the stables, and get out our cattle. If we are to leave, the sooner we do so the better."

"Come on, then," said Claude. "If we lose our horses, we lose everything but our lives; and I don't know that they would be worth much after that. But let us once get mounted and be off, and I don't care."

"Nor I," said Dick, "the danger will be then by no means a special one. Is this the way?"

"Follow me," said Claude, "I know it well."

They both followed Claude to the lower part of the house, and he was upon the point of unbolting a door that led into the stable-yard, when Dick suddenly laid his hand upon his arm, and said—

"Hush!"

"What is it?" said Claude.

The question answered itself, in a manner of speaking, for at the moment that he (Claude) asked it, he heard the tramp of feet in the stable-yard, and a voice said in short, authoritative accents—

'You will keep careful watch here; and you will understand that you are to make prisoners of whoever shall attempt to pass your post, and if any resistance be offered, you are to use your arms."

There was then the clash of some weapon upon the stones in the stable-yard, and Claude said in a low tone—

"Why they have brought the military upon us."

"It seems so," said Dick.

"It is but too evident," said Jack. "This is a planned attack, and one that will give us no small trouble."

"Never mind," said Claude, "we will beat them yet. Never despair. The soldiers don't go about this affair with a good heart."

"But we had some trouble with them at Winchester," said Jack.

"Yes, and they had some trouble with us, and I think that, upon the whole, they were the worst off."

"They were," said Jack. "They were, for it cost a few lives upon that occasion."

"And it may cost a few more upon this," said Claude, in a tone of determination. "If society hunts me, I shall not be very tender as to how I treat the hounds, I can assure you."

"But the horses—the horses!" said Dick; "what can be done to save them? Are we quite helpless as far as they are concerned, now, do you think, Claude?"

"I am afraid so; but there is something that is hopeful in this affair, and that is, that no interference seems to be made with them at present. A guard is posted in the yard, but the horses are not touched."

"That is something."

"It is everything. As long as our horses are safe, surely we can fight out everything. But I confess that this affair is one that looks a little serious, and that, in all likelihood, will call up all the energies and the means of defence that we possess."

"It will, indeed," said Jack. "Hush!—hush! Is that a bell?"

CHAPTER CCXLV.

A SERIOUS FIGHT TAKES PLACE IN AND ABOUT THE FARM.

Jack was right. A bell rung fiercely, or, at all events, in the silence of the night, it seemed to ring fiercely, whether it really did or not.

"Where is that bell?" said Dick.

"It is at the front door of the farm," replied Claude, "and its being rung at all, is a very tolerable indication to me that the place is surrounded."

"We are lost," said Jack.

"Not so," cried Claude, in a higher tone than in truth it was at all prudent to speak in. "Not so, Jack. No one is lost until he gives up himself, and that is a thing that I do not intend to do."

"Pardon me," said Jack, "I ought not to have thought what I said, and if I did think it, this was not a time in which to say it."

"Make no excuses, Jack," said Claude; "we all know very well that you never shrink from real danger, whatever you may say about it beforehand. It strikes me, though, that if we are to make an escape at all, it will be at this point where we are now."

"But the sentinels?" said Dick.

"I am sorry for them," said Claude.

The tone of voice in which Claude Duval uttered those few words was quite sufficiently indicative of what he meant, and both Jack and Dick were from that moment fully possessed with the conviction that Duval meant to make his way past the sentinels, even at the expense of their lives, if needs were.

Before, however, anything could be concluded, the party was perceived by one of the young men of the farm, who, with consternation in his face, said—

"Oh, Claude, what will now become of you?"

"I don't know, my friend," said Duval. "The only thing that very particularly vexes me is, that I am bringing trouble and annoyance upon your house. That is what I would, indeed, fain have avoided."

"Do not mention that. But my brother thinks that by your all three putting on smock frocks, and so disguising yourselves, you might pass for persons at work upon the farm."

Claude shook his head.

"That I doubt," he said. "It would be a very faint hope, indeed. I think, rather, that if you can manage to detain those who are at the front door in any way, we will make an attempt to leave this place by the back of it here."

"It shall be done. You know much better than we can, possibly, what is proper and what is not. I will go at once, and let my brother know what you wish us to do."

At this moment another furious ring at the bell announced that those who were at the door waiting for admission were getting rather impatient than otherwise. Indeed, it was quite a wonder that they had waited so long; and they certainly would not have done so, but that they had so completely surrounded the house by a chain of sentinels, that they believed the escape of those whom they came to capture to be the next thing to an impossibility.

"Now," said Claude, "I will not kill this soldier who is in the stable-yard if I can help it. He is only here in pursuance of orders that he dared not disobey, and I have no doubt but that the job is as distasteful a one to him as can very well be imagined. I hope he will have the discretion to know when he is beaten, and not insist upon being killed."

"Will you go alone?"

"Yes, Dick. But you and Jack can follow closely. You will soon see what kind of a fellow I have got to deal with. The only thing will be to prevent him from firing his carbine, if he has one, or his pistols, if he has not, but that he has fire-arms of some sort is almost certain. Not a word now—caution is everything."

Claude now waited until he heard the sentinel walking away from the door, and choosing then that moment, he cautiously, yet quickly opened the door, and they all three passed out into the yard.

"Stand close up against the wall," whispered Claude. "We must let him pass again before anything can be done with him."

Fortunately, that side of the house was in very deep shadow, indeed, so that the three friends, when they stood quite close to the wall alongside the door through which they had issued, could scarcely have been seen by any one not previously aware tkat there was some one there to see.

The path of the soldier was about half-a-dozen paces from the house, a little removed from the shadow that it cast, so that he was in sufficient light, even upon that rather dark night, to be seen with something like distinctness.

It was the intention of Duval to pounce upon that man, and, if possible, disarm him before he could give any alarm of the presence of an enemy upon his post.

That the soldiers he would have to contend with were dismounted cavalry, Claude felt assured, as they were just the sort of troops that would be sent upon such a duty; and, besides, he well-knew that while the cavalry were frequently called upon to act upon foot, the infantry were never by any accident mounted; but what he wanted to find out before he made his attack upon the soldier was, what kind of arms he had. If it were a carbine, it would be much easier to rush upon him and disarm him, than if he had pistols merely.

With a slow and steady marching step, the soldier now made his appearance again; and as Claude watched him, he not only saw that it was a horse-pistol he held in his hand, but he found that the man's head was rather suspiciously inclined towards the door at which he, Claude, stood.

It seemed as though the sentinel thought that he saw a something there, but was not quite certain of that fact.

Under these circumstances, Duval hit upon a manœuvre, which answered the object of completely directing the attention of the man in another direction. He took from his pocket the largest piece of money he had, which was half-a-crown, and then threw it over the sentinel's head among the bushes beyond him. In its descent, the coin made a sudden crashing noise, that at once arrested the soldier's attention, and turning instantly in the direction of the sound, he cried—

"Who goes there? Answer, or I fire."

With one bound that at once cleared the space between him and the sentinel, Duval was upon him, and they fell heavy to the earth together; but Claude had got hold of the pistol, and wrenching it from the soldier's grasp, he cast it from him, and then fastening his hand upon his throat, he said in quite calm, clear accents—

"Your life is in my power, but I have no desire to take it. On the contrary, I would fain do you no injury; but if you will not be beaten, and insensible to what is going on here, how can I help it?"

"What do you mean?" said the soldier.

"Why, that you have only to shut your eyes and be stunned, that is all; and if you don't like to be so as you are, why, you will be so in reality in another minute; so you can take your choice."

"Confound you, you have nearly broken every bone in my body as it is. Be off with you at once, and don't say how you got away."

"I won't talk about it. You lie still—that is all we want of you, my man. It will be your best course."

"I know that," said the soldier. "It's better to lie still without a knock on the head, than with one, I take it."

"You are a sensible fellow," said Claude, "and that is just what I mean. It is no shame to you either, for here are three of us, all strong and well armed men, so you can have no chance."

"Ah, it's all right. Be off with you, but don't take my pistol, as that would soon be missed."

"Certainly not. You shall have nothing to complain of on that score, and no one need be one bit the wiser when we are gone, if you keep your own secret."

"Ah, all's right. Be off."

"I rely, then, upon your honour," said Claude. "Dick, where are you, and you, Jack, where are you?"

"Here, here."

"Very good. Get the horses out quickly as you can, and then there will be a chance for us."

"As quick as thought," said Jack.

Both Dick and Jack went to attend to the horses, while Claude thought it prudent to keep the soldier company, lest he should rise and make some attempt at annoyance.

"I suppose," said the discomfited sentinel, "that you are the man we came after on this wild-goose errand?"

"Probably. But who did you come after?"

"Claude Duval, the highwayman."

"Then you are tolerably right, for I am that man, my friend; and if I mistake not, you would gain nothing by my capture, but the doubtful reputation of having assisted at it."

"That's true," said the soldier. "We, that is myself and comrades, are only ordered her to assist the constables, and we get nothing for our pains but the trouble."

"Precisely so; and now I would advise you, when we are gone, that you resume your march to and fro in this stable-yard, and it will be your own fault if any one knows anything of what has taken place here."

"I shan't blab it, you may depend."

"And you may equally depend that I shall not," said Claude, who was not a little pleased to find the soldier so reasonably compliant with his wishes.

At this juncture, Jack came up to Claude, and said—

"The cattle are quite ready, and the sooner we are off now the better. Come this way, Claude."

"All's right. There's nothing now to fear from the soldier. Good-night, my friend."

"Good-night," said the man, "and I think myself well out of the scrape."

Claude followed Jack to where the horses were standing, now ready saddled. Dick had mounted, and Jack had his foot in the stirrup, when the door at which Duval and his friends had got from the farm into the stable-yard, opened, and there sallied out two of the police officers, and a party of the soldiers. A voice rose above other sounds, in accents that Duval knew well.

"I tell you, it is no mistake, for he is here, somewhere. I am quite certain about it."

That voice convinced Claude at once regarding who it was that he owed his present embarrassment to, for he knew it to be the voice of Tom Brereton.

Claude had not harboured for one moment any suspicions regarding the good faith of the people of the farm towards him; but yet it was pleasant to be so completely confirmed in his opinion of them and their honour towards him, as the fact of finding who it was that had brought the police and the military upon him did.

How Tom Brereton had acquired a knowledge of his presence at the farm, he did not very well know, as he had no idea that he had been watched by that eccentric individual; but that such must have been the case, was now but too painfully apparent.

The officers had lights with them, so that there was a tolerable glare cast into the stable-yard, by the aid of which Claude certainly mounted his horse with rare celerity, while it at the same time had the effect of giving quite light enough to reveal him and his companions to their foes, whenever they might cast their eyes in that direction.

Rapidly Claude calculated in his own mind what obstacles were in the way of his progress to the common, and it was a gratification for him to know that there was no formidable obstacle. A little gate, and a very low hedge of privet, were the only hindrances to the path, and both could be leaped with ease by the well-bred cattle that Claude and his comrades called their own.

Like statues of men and horses, Claude and his two friends stood waiting the time when, by chance, the officers should cast their eyes in that direction, and see them. The light of the flambeau that one of them carried, shone so fully upon Duval, that every particle of his clothing to the minutest button was visible.

"Hilloa, sentinel!" said one of the officers. "Has any one passed, or tried to pass this way?"

There was no reply.

Upon this, the soldiers made a dash into the yard, and one of them shouted out—

"Sentry, where are you?"

"He is killed!" said another. "Here he lies dead!"

They all gathered round the soldier, who thought it best to take Claude's advice, and seem to be stunned, if he were not. The opportunity for Duval and his friends to get away, was now very tempting, indeed, and was not likely to occur again.

"Come on," said Claude, "come on at once."

He spoke in a too low tone to be heard by any but his two friends. They, however, could quite distinctly catch every word that he uttered; and at once they put their horses in motion to follow him. Upon the ground there was a quantity of litter, that sufficed to deaden the effect of the horses' feet, which otherwise, upon the stones with which the stable-yard was paved, must have produced an effect that would in a moment have discovered them to the soldiers, and so they succeeded in proceeding in silence until they got to the little gate. Duval hesitated about the leap, for he thought it would be more brave and honourable of him to be the last to leave the stable-yard; but Dick, who was immediately behind, said—

"For Heaven's sake, Claude, go on."

"Pardon me, both of you," said Claude. "I will follow you on the instant."

Before Dick could get his horse forward, or say one word for or against such a proposition, there came a loud cry from one of the officers, of—

"There they are—there they are!"

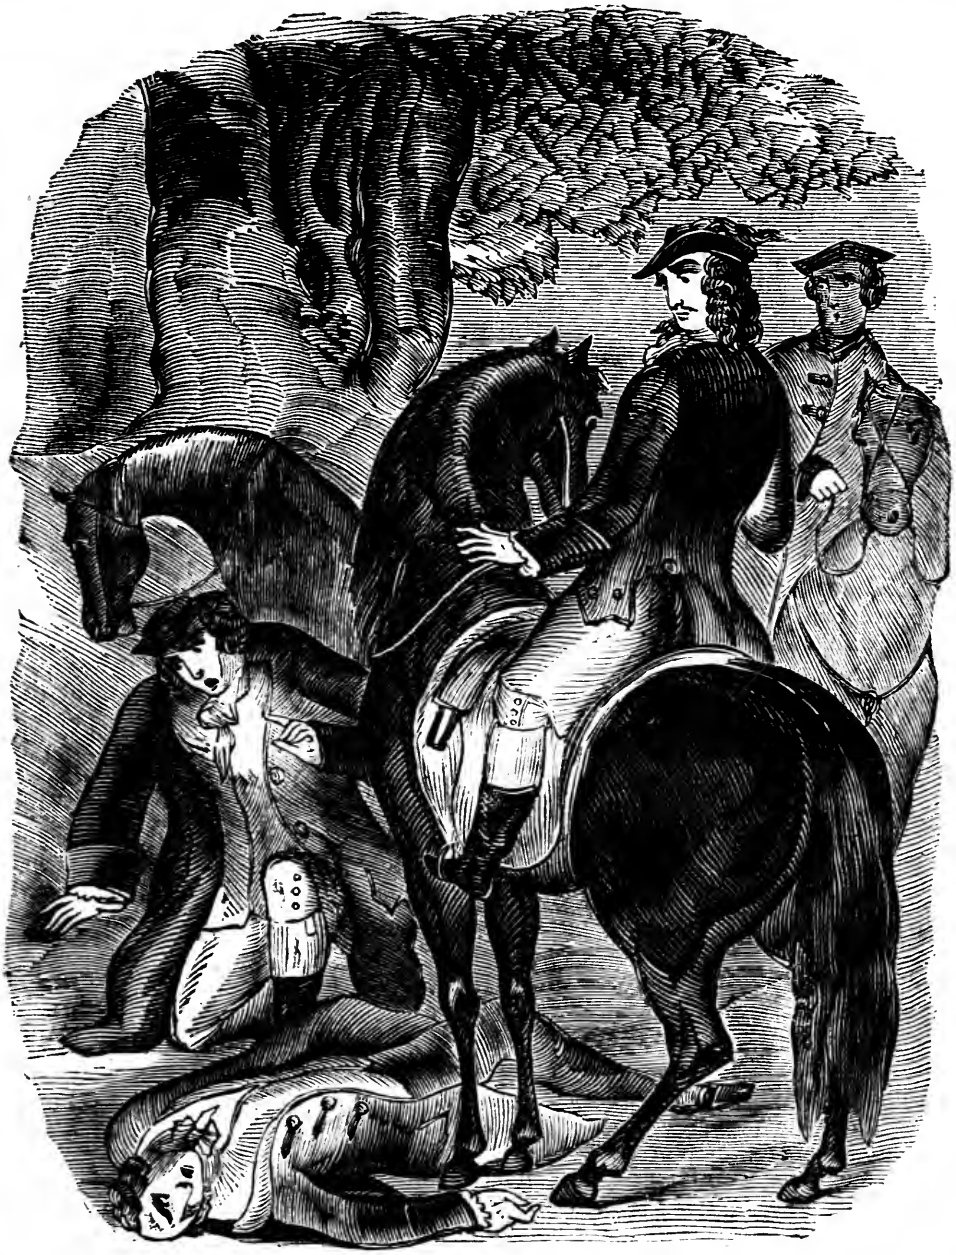
"We are found!" said Claude.

"We are lost!" said Jack.

It was strange that they should both really mean the same thing, although they expressed it in such very opposite terms; but there was no time for reflection.

"Forward!" cried the sergeant, who was with the few soldiers that had been sent to search the stable-yard. "Forward!"

"Yes!" cried Claude, in startlingly loud accents. "Forward is the word. I want you after me. Come on!"



As he spoke, he sprung at once over the little gate.

CHAPTER CCXLVI.

CLAUDE PLAYS A GOOD TRICK UPON THE SOLDIERS.

Dick and Jack were not slow in following the example of Claude.

The sudden escape of those whom they had all but believed they had in their grasp, quite infuriated the officers, and they made an united kind of rush through the farm-yard. The sergeant, with his men, found in a moment that to pursue men on horseback would be quite absurd, so he gave an order to fire.

The soldiers were sufficiently aggravated to do anything that could bring the affair to an end, and levelling their pistols, which they had brought from the holsters of their saddles, they sent a rattling volley after Claude and his friends.

Luckily, in the darkness of the night they could not take a very good aim, and if they had done so, the pistol is a weapon that certainly is not to be depended upon at any distance.

The discharge certainly failed to do any mischief.

"On—on," said Claude. "On, for your lives!"

As he spoke, the bugle of the military sounded one long note, and it was evident that it was for the purpose of giving notice to the party that still remained mounted upon the common to interrupt the fugitives. Claude had in his own mind a well-grounded suspicion that such was the case, and after proceeding a short distance he drew in.

Dick and Jack did the same.

"Hark ye, my friends," said Claude. "It is of no use to attempt to get away."

"Not attempt to get away?" cried Dick.

"No. I can imagine very well what the tactics of the enemy are. They have, as they think, driven us from our retreat in the farm-house, and the only thing they will think of doing now, will be to interrupt us on the common, where they, no doubt, have a force of horse ready for that purpose."

"It is so," said Jack; "and again I say we are lost."

"No. Here we are among the trees. The night is dark. If we can only persuade the horses to lie down among the brushwood, I think we might be safe yet."

"If that is the object," said Jack, "I know how to make any horse lie down in a moment. It is rather a secret; but I can do it."

"Do it, then, Jack, in the name of all that's good, for here comes the foe as closely upon us as possible."

Again the bugle sounded, and from the tramp of feet, it was quite clear that the dismounted soldiers were leaving the farm. Jack was not slow in carrying out his assertion that he could make the horses lie down. By taking hold of one ear of his own steed, and lifting one of the fore-feet, he gradually coaxed the creature to go quite down, and he then did the same by Claude's and Dick's steeds, and the creatures lay as still as possible, while their masters crouched down by their sides.

To be sure, three horses lying upon the ground, took up some space; but then the soldiers might not take that exact route, and if they did not, there was nothing to give them the least idea of the immediate vicinity of our friends.

Of course, they (the military) would be looking for some one on horseback; and with a complete faith in the notion that they had galloped right away on to the common, they would not be likely to be very particular in exploring the little woody spot which divided the farm from the common, and where Claude and his comrades were hidden.

"Forward, my men!" cried the sergeant. "You will find your horses where you left them, no doubt."

"Your comrades won't let the highwaymen pass, I suppose?" said a voice, "for now that they are fairly mounted and off, there will be no sort of chance of us officers taking them."

"Why, the best thing that can be done," said the sergeant, "is for the remainder of the troop to shoot them on the common. We don't want a twenty mile run into the country, I can tell you."

"Twenty mile!" said the officer. "They would think nothing of giving you a fifty mile run if once they had you in a line."

"The deuce they wouldn't!"

"No. Not they."

"Why, what sort of cattle, then, must they have?"

"I don't know, but sometimes I think their horses must be fiends, for they carry them through dangers and difficulties that would break down most completely any other steeds. But, Mr. Sergeant, everything seems to be wonderfully quiet on the common."

"So it does. Sound the bugle again."

The man who had the bugle sounded another long note as a signal to the mounted troop on the common to pursue the enemy; but as the said mounted troop could find no enemy to pursue, they merely looked sharply about them, and kept their station.

In the course of half a minute more, the dismounted soldiers had passed the spot on which lay the three friends and their steeds so quietly. The slightest sound from man or horse would have betrayed them. Upon themselves, of course, the adventurers could depend; but it was a very different thing regarding the cattle, and it was only a piece of extraordinary good luck that the horses made no sort of noise at that moment of the passing of the soldiers.

In the space of about two minutes after they had passed, neither of the three friends spoke; but then Claude in a whisper contrived to say something. His horse heard his voice, and immediately neighed.

"There," said Claude, "that would have done us."

"It would," said Dick.

"But what did you say?" said Jack.

"I was remarking," said Claude, "that the best thing we can do now is to go home again, as our enemies have left."

"Home again!" exclaimed Jack.

"Hush, Jack, not so loud. Be cautious."

"Yes—yes—I will; but what on earth do you mean, Claude, by going home again? It is so extraordinary a word for us to use, or to hear."

"Why, back to the farm, to be sure, I mean."

"Back to the farm?" said Dick. "You are not serious, Claude, surely, in that idea?"

"Yes, I am, though: and so will you be as soon as you have sufficient reason for being so. There can be no doubt now of two things."

"What are they?"

"One of them is, that the officers and the soldiers have pretty well searched the farm, and the other is, that both officers and soldiers are now quite convinced that we have left it, and taken our horses with us."

"Well?"

"Very well; then, the safest place we can go to now is where they don't think we are, and that is back to the farm again."

"There is reason in that," said Dick.

"And danger," said Jack.

"Yes, danger is everything."

"But much less in what I propose than in any other case, I think," added Claude, "that we could possibly just now adopt. What I wish is, that we should get our horses up, and as quickly as foot can fall, lead them back again to the stable."

"It is a bold step," said Jack.

"It is. But I incline to think that there lies its great safety and excellence. The devil himself, if he had no supernatural knowledge, would not think of looking for us on the farm premises again."

"You have convinced me, Claude," said Jack, "and the more I think of the plan, the more feasible it appears."

"Then, let us come on at once."

"For my part," said Dick, "I am quite sure that there could not be possibly a wiser and better course pursued; and if you will get up the horses, Jack, as quietly as you got them down, all will be well enough."

"That's easy," said Jack. "Among the few things that I may say that I understand thoroughly, I may mention horses, I believe."

Upon this, Jack made a sort of chirping noise, and the three horses got up at once as comfortably as though they had been sentient beings, and understood exactly what was required of them.

Claude could not forbear laughing at Jack's skill in the management of the creatures, and he said—

"I flatter myself that I know a trifle about horses; but you beat me out of the field regarding them, I admit."

"I have made the habits, manners, and feelings of the horse my peculiar study," said Jack, "for years, and I ought to know something about them by this time."

They neither of them mounted now, but led the horses by the bridles at a very slow pace after them through the little plantation. They trod as softly as feet could fall, and it would appear as though the cattle knew that silence was an object, for they placed their feet very gently to the ground.

Proceeding in this way for some few minutes, they reached the hedge that skirted the stable-yard; but it was quite impossible to get the horses through the hedge, so they had no resource but to skirt it until they came to the gate, or try to make a gap in it.

After a little consultation, they preferred the latter course, and with their pocket-knives, which were very strong, they began feeling for the thick bushes of the hedge, and cutting them away. A very few minutes sufficed to enable them to make an opening that the horses might step through, and then, with a saving of considerable space, they found themselves at once in the stable-yard of the farm, and not twenty paces from the stable in which the horses had been put up for the night.

"This will do," said Claude. "Now, I propose that we place the horses in the stable again, at once."

"And you may depend," said Dick, "the very best thing we can do is to stay with them."

"Be it so."

Claude opened the stable-door, and led his horse in. He was closely followed by Dick and Jack. They did not unsaddle the horses; but they let them each go into a stall, and then, as they stood by the door themselves, which they left open a short distance, so that they might be aware of the approach of any one, they endeavoured, by attentive listening, to ascertain, if possible, what was going on in the house and on the common.

The soldiers were evidently rather bewildered to know what to do; for at times a bugle was blown in one direction, and then in another, and the clatter of horses' feet, as the mounted party scoured the common in search of the fugitives, announced that they were not very willing to give up the chase.

That the officers would suspect there was some trick in the affair, and that Claude and his companions were in hiding after their escape, there could be very little doubt; but it was not likely they would think that they had had the audacity to come back to the farm, and actually take possession again of the very stable in which the cattle had been so short a time before the attack had been made upon the premises.

It was in the exceeding boldness of the act, that its great chance of safety lay.

As regarded the farm-house, all seemed tolerably quiet there for a time; but the adventurers could not feel assured that their foes had wholly left it without some better evidence than its mere quietude, and for such better evidence they resolved to wait.

The noises on the common grew less and less each moment, and Jack had just said that they might begin to consider the danger to be at an end, when a trampling of feet came upon their ears.

"Hush!" said Claude. "Far from the danger being at an end, I am afraid that it is only about to begin."

They now maintained a profound stillness, and from the noises they heard, they felt quite convinced that the soldiery and the officers were returning to the farm. That such a case of proceeding might naturally enough ensue, had entered into the calculation of Claude, and he felt that their only safety lay in the improbability of the stable being looked into again.

"Halt!" cried a voice.

In a moment the sound of footsteps ceased. A voice then said—

"Mr. Sergeant, we would not have troubled you to come here again, but if as your men say no person passed them, it is quite clear that those we seek must be hiding somewhere about this place. This plantation is the only shelter they can get, and three men and three horses cannot creep into a nutshell."

"Look about you, then," said the sergeant; "if you find them you may, of course, depend upon our assistance in capturing them; but it seems to me that they have given you the slip, and in some way or another got past our men on the common without being seen."

This conversation was going on in the little plantation close to the stables and gardens of the farm, but it did not appear from the tenor of it that there was any suspicion that the fugitives had taken shelter absolutely in the farm premises again.

Claude still maintained the opinion that in choosing the course he had chosen, he had done the wisest thing he could, and upon the whole, his two friends thought with him upon the subject.

At all events, if they were discovered, they were not much worse than they had been situated upon the former occasion, when they had to leave the stable-yard with so much precipitation. They could but at last have a race for their lives across the common, pursued by the soldiers, whose horses were by no means likely to be so fleet of foot, as those of the highwaymen, which were chosen for speed.

Still, it was a serious sort of thing to be in the stable, and to know that so close at hand there were armed men, who were intent upon their capture, dead or alive, and who, to save trouble, would in all probability prefer the former mode of settling the affair. After all, though, there was not much time to think, and men of real courage, when in the actual presence of danger, do not trouble themselves much with reflections upon its consequences.

The officers began looking about among the underwood of the plantation, and it did not apper that the soldiers thought it any part of their duty to assist them in that kind of search, but they remained merely as spectators of what was going on—perhaps, after all, in their own minds rather pleased than not at the non-success of the civil power.

"They are not here," said one of the officers.

"But they must be," said another.

"Very well, you find them."

"Where are they, then, if they are not here?—that is the question," persisted the other. "They must have vanished, you know, into the air like three ghosts."

"Very good," said the sergeant. "My officer directed me to come with you, and to remain a reasonable time while you searched for the men you want. I think a reasonable time has elapsed."

"Then you can go," said the officer, who seemed to be the principal spokesman of the civil force, "and you can tell your officer, that if he and his men had kept a better look out on the common, that Claude Duval and his comrades would not have escaped so easily as it is quite clear they have done."

"If you have anything of that sort to tell my officer," said the sergeant, "I will trouble you to tell him yourself, my friend, and then you can take the consequences of the telling. For my part, I beg to be excused. Right about, face—march!"

In another moment the soldiers were gone.

Claude gave Jack a sort of nudge with his elbow, as much as to say—"It's all right now, you see, Jack," but they neither of them spoke; for, to tell the truth, the officers were much too near at hand to make that a safe proceeding.

It was quite clear, too, that the officers were very far, indeed, from being satisfied with the whole affair. They were divided between the two opinions of whether the carelessness of the soldiers on the common had let Claude and his companions escape, or that they were still hiding somewhere in the immediate vicinity of the farm.

Some inclined to one of these opinions, and some to the other; perhaps they all had their doubts both ways; and that it was that made them loath to quit the farm, and the ground immediately surrounding it. A bugle note and the tramp of horses' feet gradually dying away, sufficiently proclaimed the fact that the troops were leaving the spot; and at every step they made towards London again Claude and his friends felt as if an additional piece of safety were granted to them, and as though they had taken a large lease of their lives.

The officers walked through the plantation until they came to the little gate leading into the yard of the farm. They opened it and passed through, and one of them actually leant against the stable-door, while his companions got up a sort of wrangle about what was next best to be done under the circumstances in which they found themselves.

CHAPTER CCXLVII.

TOM BRERETON FINDS THAT HE IS IN DANGER.

"It's all through the infernal red coats," said one of the officers, "or we must have had them this time."

"That I believe," said another, "and I thought it would be a bad job from the moment that I heard they were to have anything to do with it; but it was of no manner of use for me to speak."

"Nor me either."

"Well," said a third, "it's no use either growling or grumbling over the affair. What's to be done in it, that's the question. Are we to give it up as a bad job, or to try still to make something of it?"

"It's all very well to talk of trying, but how are you to try? To my thinking, Duval is half-a-dozen miles off here by now."

"Half-a-dozen? he is twice that distance."

"Well, I shouldn't wonder, and here I did think that we had 'em snug; for, from all I could learn, their horses were in the stable, and they had all gone comfortably to bed. Now, wouldn't one have thought they was as good as nabbed then?"

"To be sure."

"And yet here we are, and no good done—and there's the very stable they had their cattle in as empty as nothing now. Oh, it's enough to make a fellow wild, it is."

As he spoke, this officer gave the stable door a kick that sent it wide open, but luckily he did not go in, and the darkness was quite sufficiently intense to prevent any fear of the friends being seen. The door itself had an inclination to shut of itself, and as it swung, slowly closed again, or very nearly so.

"Yes," said another, "there's the nest, sure enough, but the birds have flown, and it strikes me it's about as much use our staying here as nothing at all. I think the best thing we can do, is to get back again to London, and tell the beaks that it's no go."

"Where's that whipper-snapper of a fellow who brought us here, I wonder—Tom Brereton as they call him?"

"Oh, he walked off as soon as any of the real work began, and I have not seen him since."

"Where can he have got to? But it don't matter. Let us call up the people of the farm, and see if we can get anything out of them."

"You may try it, but it won't do."

"Do you think not?"

"I certainly do. We have good reason to believe that the folks at the farm-house know perfectly well who they have been harbouring, notwithstanding they pretend that, having lodgings to let, they took the first offer they got, and did not know it was from Claude Duval."

"That's all the better."

"Is it?"

"To be sure it is, for if they knew Duval well, they, no doubt, know well where he is to be found, and so, perhaps, if they are paid well, they might assist us, now that we have got rid of the soldiers. Don't you know that everybody in the world is to be worked upon by threats and by rewards, and we can use both to these people."

"Try it, then."

"I will. In the first place, we can tell them that they will be prosecuted for harbouring a felon, and in the next place, we will offer them a handsome sum if they will give up Claude Duval and his friends to us, and I do think we shall prevail upon them."

"I hope so. One thing, of course, we may be quite sure of, and that is, that Duval must pay them, or they would not put themselves into a predicament to keep him out of harms way."

"Exactly, and if we offer them a better price for betraying him than he gives for keeping his secrets, they will give him up. I believe that's human nature, ain't it?"

"Rather so."

"Come on, then, and let us go into the house."

With this, the officers left the stable-yard, and made their way into the farm house, where, in consequence of the disturbance that had taken place, the family had kept themselves in readiness to meet whatever might happen in the further course of the night.

As soon as the officers were out of hearing, Duval spoke.

"Dick," he said. "This has been rather a close touch, has it not?"

"Very," said Dick.

"And it is one still," said Jack, "for they will come back again this way. What do you think of doing now, Claude?"

"Just nothing. I am inclined to think our experiences of their plans are such as to induce us to remain where we are."

"And I agree with you," said Dick. "There is nothing like the stable, you may depend upon it. They won't come in here."

"And there is another view of the question," said Claude, "that we may very well take, and that is to the effect, that I think, now that they have lost the help of their red coat friends, we might be too much for them. How many officers do you think there are?"

"Not above six or eight."

"Then, after all, it could but be a fight; and it is questionable whether three men who fight for their lives, and who are well armed, are not a match for six or eight who fight for money merely."

Dick laid his hand suddenly upon Claude's arm.

"Hush!" he said, "I hear footsteps. Not a word."

Upon this, they all three were profoundly still, and they could hear a very cautious footstep upon the flag-stones in the yard. It came in a slow, creeping manner past the stable door, and then it paused. Claude's idea was, that one of the officers, having some suspicion that those whom he sought were hidden in the immediate neighbourhood of that spot, had slunk back from his comrades for the purpose of listening for some sound confirmatory of that view.

Nothing could be more natural than that a wily officer of the police would do such a thing as that; but Claude soon found out that such was not the case. Suddenly, quite close to the door of the stable, a voice sounded, and Claude at once recognised it as the voice of his old foe, Tom Brereton.

"Oh, dear," he said, "I don't very well know what to do. This is a pretty piece of business. I made quite sure that Duval would be caught here, and that he would be comfortably hanged, while I retired to live as snug as possible upon the reward; but now they can't find him. Oh, dear—oh, dear! and I am in such a fright, for fear he should find out it was all through me they are after him."

This was a little bit of news to Duval.

"I wouldn't have come," added Tom Brereton, "if I could possibly have helped it, only I was afraid if I didn't that they would try to chisel me out of the reward in some sort of way. I don't like danger at all, not I. Why a man possibly might get hurt where there's any danger. That's what I don't like it for."

"A capital reason," whispered Dick.

"Hush—hush!" said Claude.

"And now," continued Tom Brereton, "I may say that I am at my wits-end almost. As soon as the row began, I took good care to hide in one of the rooms, so that they did not get hold of me any of them, and now that it's all over, I just slipped out at the window; and I do think the least thing I can do, is to go to town again."

"I should like to get hold of that rascal," thought Duval.

"Ah! dear me, the reward is everything," added Tom, "and I so short of money, too, that I don't know what to do. It would be so comfortable to catch Duval, and make a thousand pounds by getting him hanged, that it would."

"Duval," whispered Dick.

"Yes—yes."

"Let us go out and bring that fellow into the stable. When we have him here, the devil's in it but we can keep him quiet."

"His fear will do that. You can go and get him in if you like, but be careful that there is no noise in the transaction, for if once he begins bellowing, he will not be able to listen to reason, and there will be no such thing as quieting him, without hitting him on the head, and that I should not like to do, he is such an idiot."

"He may be an idiot, but he is a vicious one," said Dick. "I will make him believe I am one of the officers."

"Do so. It will be good sport, at all events."

Dick cautiously issued from the stable, and just as Tom Brereton was commencing his complaints, Dick said—

"Hist! hist! Who is there?"

"Oh, murder! who is that?" said Tom. "Spare me—oh, spare my wretched life. I haven't done anything, indeed I haven't. Oh, oh!"

"Hush. I am an officer."

"An officer? Police?"

"Yes. Bow-street."

"Oh," said Tom, "I'm as glad to hear that, as if anybody had given me a guinea—at least, nearly as glad. Are you looking for Claude Duval?"

"I am. Can you give me any intelligence of him? I think you are the gentleman who gave the information to the police."

"Yes, I am the gentleman; but I'm sorry the police have not found the fellow. Do you think there is any chance of yet doing so?"

"Every chance. With your assistance, I think—indeed, I may take upon myself to say that I know we must lay hold of them."

"Excuse me, then," said Tom Brereton, "I ain't very well, and as far as the laying hold of the business goes, I'm afraid I ain't equal to it just now."

"You shrink from the danger?"

"Most decidedly I do, my friend; I don't like danger."

"But the reward?"

"Ah, the reward is all very well; but pray what would be the use of it if I had a pistol-bullet in my brains first? Let me ask you that."

"Oh, nonsense."

"It's all very well for you to say, 'Oh, nonsense.' Perhaps you are used to such things, and if you are, I can only say that I am decidedly not."

"Well then, I must adopt my other plan, which is not quite so glorious, because it is perfectly safe, and people will say nothing about our courage in the transaction, that is the annoying feature of it."

"Is it? That may be the annoying feature of it to you, but to me I can assure you it is the beauty of it, and if you have really any plan by which Duval can be caught without danger to us, you may count upon me going through fire and water. That is to say, if the fire is just upon out, and the water is decidedly shallow."

"You are quite a wag," said Dick.

"No, I ain't. You are joking now, Mr. Officer."

"Oh, no—no—I never joke. Don't say that of me. But don't you think it would be a capital thing if you and I could manage the whole affair alone?"

"No."

"No? You don't mean that? Surely it is you who are joking now, my friend. Come—come, you don't mean really to say 'No,' to such a chance, especially as it is without danger, too? Think of that."

"Why, yes; that's just what I do think of; but I can tell you that the Secretary of State has promised me all the reward, so I don't want any of the glory as long as I finger the cash. That's glory enough for me, and I'd rather be on the safe side than take any trouble for you and I only to do it."

"Well, all that is just as you please; so, I will now disclose to you my plan, and I can only assure you that in the first instance, it is founed upon positive information that Duval is still in this neighbourhood."

"You don't say so?"

"I do. I have seen him since the soldiers left."

"The deuce you have! Why didn't you lay hold of him?"

"Why, to tell you the truth, sir, I was rather afraid he would kick up a row. You have heard the old story of catching a Tartar?"

"To be sure I have; and that would be just my sort of feeling, if I were to come across him, and between you and me and the post, I rather think I should feel inclined to get out of the way: He's a desperate villain."

"He is; but just step this way, for I am afraid that what we may say may be overheard by some one, and that might bring upon us a pistol-shot or two."

"Murder! You don't mean that!"

"Yes, I do. As I tell you, Claude Duval is somewhere rather close at hand, and if he saw us, I daresay he would not by any means be very particular about how he popped us out of the way. I have been hiding in a stable close at hand to here, and if you slip into it with me, you will find we shall be able to consult quite free from any interruption, and in perfect safety, too, from any stray pistol-shot that may be sent at our heads if we stay here."

"Lord bless me, yes!" said Tom Brereton. "Let us get anywhere, so that we are safe. Danger is just about the only thing I don't like, for, as I often say, what's the use of a man's being well off, if he gets a crack on the head that unsettles his brains, or a poke in the stomach that spoils his digestion for the remainder of his life?"

"You are quite a philosopher, and I must only say that I agree with you so entirely, that I hope we shall be capital friends for the future."

"Well, I have no objection, you seem a very reasonable sort of person; but for my sake let us get into the stable as quick as we can. I am all of a perspiration with the idea of being popped at by one of Duval's pistols in the way you mention. I will follow you."

"Do so. This way, This is the very stable in which Claude Duval and his friends had their horses."

"Oh, the highway villains! Don't I wish I saw the day, when they shall all be hanging upon one beam, and the hangman ready to turn them off. That would be a sight, wouldn't it?"

"It would, indeed; but should you have no pity for them under such circumstances, my friend?"

"Not a bit."

"Well, that is a pity. But here is the stable."

With this, Dick gently pushed Tom Brereton into the stable, and kept guard at the door of it himself, so that he should not by a sudden rush, when he found he was betrayed, manage to get out of it, as he would very likely attempt to do in his right

"How precious dark it is," said Tom.

"Yes, that's the beauty of it."

"The beauty of it?"

"To be sure, because you can't be seen in it, if any one were to open the door suddenly and take a peep in."

"Oh, ah, in that case I grant you it's all right," said Tom; "and now I sha be right glad to hear your plan of nobbing Claude Duval and the two fellow that are with him, for I suppose the scheme includes them all three. It would be a pity to let the other two off, you know."

"The scheme does include all three. You may take your oath, that if you catch Duval, you will catch the other two. Now I told you that I felt pretty sure he was not far off, and to convince you of that fact, I don't mind now letting you know that he is in this stable."

Before Tom Brereton then could open his mouth to express his horror, Claude said—

"Tom, if you remain quite quiet, I won't cut your throat; but if you make any disturbance I will; so you have for the present your fate in your own hands. I am Claude Duval."

CHAPTER CCXLVIII.

DETAILS THE SINGULAR ADVENTURE AT THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

If absolute terror had not destroyed all power of reflection with Tom Brereton reflection itself would have induced him to be quiet; but as it was, he as nearly feel into a swoon as it was possible to do, without actually lapsing into that state.

"All's right," said Jack.

"And hark you, Tom Brereton," added Claude. "I am not perhaps so much now in the mood of showing mercy to your folly and your vindictiveness as I have been at times before, for you have sought the destruction of others just because they were associated with me; so I tell you in all seriousness to beware."

Tom Brereton managed just to gasp out the word "Mercy!"

"Yes," added Claude, "that is ever the way with those who know not what the quality of mercy is in themselves. They call for it in others the moment they find themselves in any fearful circumstances. How dare you ask for mercy of me?"

"I—I don't know! Oh, dear!"

"He is a fool," said Dick.

"Nearly an idiot in point of real intellect," said Claude, "and yet you would not believe what a world of low, malignant cunning lurks in his brain."

"Is it possible!"

"Oh, no—no," said Tom Brereton. "Spare me, do!"

"Silence, or this moment is your last," said Claude, for in his fears, contingent upon the not very bright character Claude was giving him, he was beginning to speak much louder than the safety of the confederates in the stable warranted under the circumstances.

"I'll put him in one of the horse-racks," said Jack, "and if he stirs, I will shoot him, so that he can do as he likes, you know."

"Anywhere," said Tom. "Oh, dear, kind, sirs, put me anywhere, so that you spare my life. Oh, pray do!"

Jack took him by the collar, and finding one of the racks, he placed Tom Brereton in it, and then daring him to say a word, or to move an inch, he left him to his meditations.

Claude was close to the door of the stable, and he heard the sound of footsteps rapidly approaching the yard. In a moment or two, a voice came very plainly upon his ears.

"The best thing you can possibly do," said the voice, "is to give us all the information you can."

"I have no information to give," said the young farmer in reply.

"Well, we shall stay here all night, for we don't believe yet but that Claude Duval is somewhere in this neighbourhood."

"As regards your staying here all night," said the young farmer, "you are welcome enough to do so, and if you catch Claude Duval, I shall be as much surprised as you will, you may depend. Will you walk in?"

"Oh, yes, we will walk in. The night air is none so very pleasant just now."

They all left the stable-yard, and the moment they had gone, Claude said to his comrades—

"It strikes me that now is the time for us to go. These officers will no doubt wait in the house, and we do not want a collision with them, merely for the sake of one."

"Certainly not," said Dick, "so let us be off."

"But what are we to do with our prisoner?" said Jack.

"I see no help for it, but to leave him here," said Claude.

"No," interposed Dick, "that won't do. He is just the sort of animal to give the alarm the moment our backs are turned, and then we shall be pursued, which is just as well avoided, even although we don't care much about it. My horse is quite fresh, and will carry double for a few miles without thinking anything of it, so I propose that I take him behind me and carry him off."

"If you will do it, Dick, it is the best thing."

"Oh, I'll do it."

"And I'll fetch him for you," said Jack.

Jack soon ferreted out Tom Brereton from the rack into which he had placed him, and Dick having mounted, Tom was placed behind him on his horse, and securely tied round his waist by a spare rein that Jack had in case of accidents. Then Claude and Jack both gained their saddles, and Claude, pushing open the door of the stable, said,—

"Off and away! Let us go quietly till we get over the heath, and then we will treat our steeds to a gallop."

"All's right," said Dick; "I don't see or hear a soul."

Everything seemed to be very quiet indeed in the farm-yard, and the adventurers began to have a good expectation of getting away without any collision with the officers. To be sure, Claude did not blind himself to the likelihood of the fact that the farm was well watched being no idle threat, and he kept warily glancing about him as he proceeded.

The gate that led from the farm-yard was open, so that they did not even lose the time that would have been consumed in dismounting from their horses, and they gained the little wilderness of trees that separated the grounds of the farm from the common in safety.

"This is capital," said Jack.

"Do not say anything yet," said Claude; "we don't know what may happen in a little while. Get your pistols ready."

"Oh, gentlemen," said Tom Brereton, when he heard the clicking of the pistol-locks, and felt that there was some possibility of a contest, "if there's to be any fighting, do let me go, for I don't feel well at all. You know it can do you no sort of good to keep a poor fellow like me in such a situation. Oh, do let me go, and I make a solemn promise that I will walk all the way to London, and not interfere with you in any way or say one word about you again as long as I live."

"Be quiet," said Dick,

"Oh, but do, sir, do!"

"Shoot him," said Jack.

"Murder, no! I am quiet—I won't say another word—I am quiet, indeed I am."

After this highly practical threat, Tom thought it best to hold his tongue, but he shook so with fear that he quite annoyed Dick, who had him so close at hand; but it was of no use asking him to be still, when, perhaps, it was really out of his power to be so, and Dick, therefore, put up with the infliction.

Claude took the lead, and passed right through the little thick plantation. He was rather surprised at getting quite so far without some degree of danger or something happening to let them know that the enemy were at hand; but yet he did not venture to congratulate himself upon an escape, for he could not believe that all the worst danger could go off so easily, like a mere puff of smoke.

Jack and Dick, no doubt, shared with him that opinion, for they were perfectly still, and the manner, indeed, of the whole three of them was that of men waiting for some catastrophe that they would have to meet as best they might.

The common was gained, and then even Jack, who might be considered to be the most cautious expectant of something amiss of the whole three of them, began to have hopes.

"We shall get clear," he said.

Hardly had the words escaped his lips, when there came the sharp crack of a pistol-shot upon their ears from some distance. That this shot was a signal of some sort, they felt convinced; and that it was not actually fired at them, the distance showed pretty clearly.

"Now for it," said Claude.

As he spoke, he urged his horse on, and instead of going by the regular cross path to the high-road across the common, he struck off to the left, country ways, over the green sward itself, and hardly had he done so, than he heard the bugle sound, that at once indicated to him that if the main body of the military had left the spot, some, at all events, remained to lend aid to the civil authorities. This was a contingency that Duval had not left out of his calculation; but still, at the most, it could only involve a few pistol shots after him, and as regarded speed, he knew quite well that his and his companions horses would at any time beat those of the soldiery.

"Forward—forward!" he cried; "the red coats will be upon us."

"Murder!" shrieked Tom Brereton.

Dick gave him rather a severe poke in the ribs with his elbow, coupled with an injunction to be quiet, and Tom was still again.

Dashing on towards the village of Ealing, they all three went, keeping as nearly as possible in a line behind each other, because by so doing, if they were fired at there was the better chance of escape, at all events, for two of them. Dick brought up the rear. Jack was quite willing to do so, but Dick would not let him. Perhaps, there was a little bit of calculation for the good of them all in this manœuvre of Dick's.

"They come!" cried Jack.

At these words, Claude looked round. He was very anxious to know the exact nature of the danger that awaited them, and the number, as it could be told at a glance, of their foes. He saw that there were two mounted men in plain clothes, and five, as he thought, of the military, so that, take them altogether, there were seven to three, which was rather fearful odds, considering all things, for it was not likely that any of the seven were men who would shrink from the fight.

"We can't tackle them," cried Claude; "we must show them a light pair of heels for it. Follow me: I will double upon them as soon as I possibly can. On—on."

The slight delay that had ensued while Duval was examining the number of their foes, and the diagonal line that he and his friends took in evading their enemies, while the soldiers and officers came on the high road converging towards the same point, which was the entrance to the village of Ealing, brought the two parties in closer contact than Claude would have desired; still, he hoped to reach the commencement of the village sufficiently before the enemy to enable him to make the chase that seamen call a stern chase, and in that case he knew that each moment would be to his advantage and to the advantage of his friends—for in fleetness, the horses of the highwaymen could laugh at those opposed to them.

Yet it was rather a ticklish thing, for the soldiers urged their horses on at a gallop; but Claude did reach the village first, though not so far in advance of the enemy as he hoped.

Probably the soldiers had a shrewd suspicion that the state of affairs would be very soon changed, and that if they did not succeed in doing something at once, they would not have much chance in a little while, for they suddenly fired their carbines at the party they were in pursuit of, and the report rang loudly in the morning air.

"Who's hurt?" cried Claude.

"No one," said Dick and Jack both at once.

"That will do, then. Now, then, we can bid them good-by."

They were upon the level road, and the pace they went at was so prodigious, that they soon left the soldiers far behind them. It is no exaggeration to say that they covered three feet of ground to the soldiers' two feet, so that the progress out of their way was rather considerable.

Claude, however, had no wish to go just then right away into the country, and he knew very well that to his right hand he would soon come to a lane that would lead him round by Hanger Hill towards London again, and he slackened his speed a little when he saw that the lane was close at hand.

"This way," he shouted, as he dashed up it.

"Hurrah!" cried Dick. "Here we are."

Claude pursued the lane for a mile before he drew rein, and then gradually pulling up his horse, he cried out—

"Now, who will get up a tree, and look for the Philistines?"

"I will do that," said Jack. "My horse will stand still, and spare me one-half of the trouble. I can get upon his back, and then standing, I can reach a bough that otherwise I should be some time getting at."

"Do it, Jack, at once then. Shall I hold your horse?"

"No, he will move if you do."

Jack patted the horse for a few moments, and the creature seemed to understand thoroughly what he intended it to do, for it stood perfectly still, while Jack clambered on to its back, and then stood on the saddle. He had taken his position under the bough of a large chestnut tree, which he could then just reach, and he quickly drew himself up into the body of the tree, and gained a position some thirty feet or so from the level of the ground.

"Can you see them?" said Claude.

"Yes."

"Ah, indeed; where are they?"

"Holding a council of war at the corner of the lane. They don't seem to know which way to go yet. Yes they do. They are going along the road, but reluctantly to all appearance. One of them points up this lane."

"Then he is the wisest among them."

"The others overrule him, and they all go on. We are quite safe. They are off and away."

"Come down, then, Jack."

"What am I to do with this fellow behind me?" said Dick. "I am rather tired of him, I can tell you; and the sooner you rid me of him the better."

"We will leave him here," said Claude. "Come, Mr. Tom Brereton, you know quite well that if we were to hang you to the first convenient branch of a tree we came to, it would be serving you as you deserve at our hands; but you are such a fool, that I cannot bring my mind to do it."

Tom Bereton made no reply.

"Untie the reins," said Dick, "and take him down. He is leaning with all the weight he can upon my back."

"He is dead!" said Claude.

"Dead!"

Dick gave such a start, that his horse took the alarm, and reared and plunged so, that he had some difficulty in getting the creature to be quiet again.

"Woa!—woa!—easy! You don't mean to say that he is dead, Claude?"

"You will soon see."

Claude unfastened the rein that had attached Tom Brereton to Dick, and then Tom fell heavily from the horse to the ground.

"There he lies," added Claude. "He is quite dead, and I can easily comprehend how it has happened. The fact is, Dick, he has saved your life!"

"Saved my life?"

"Yes. When the soldiers fired, the bullet that would have taken effect in your back, took effect in his, and the distance was too great for it to go through you both, or you would both have caught it."

Dick dismounted, and looked silently at Tom Brereton for a few moments Then he said—

"Well, I little thought when I offered to take him on my horse, that I was doing what would save me from death; but, after all, I must confess, that I would much rather him than myself caught the bullet."

"Particularly," said Duval, "as it was fired by his friends, and not by one of ours."

"Yes; that makes all the difference, I admit."

By this time Jack had dropped from the tree, and was looking at Tom Brereton.

"Ah," he said, "there's an end of him now, at all events. He won't trouble us any longer. The fool has brought his own destruction upon his own head."

"Hush," said Claude, "I hear the sound of wheels."

They all listened, and quite plainly heard the sound of carriage wheels in the lane. The vehicle, whatever it was, was not proceeding at a very great rate, so they had time to consider what they had better do.

CHAPTER CCXLIX.

THE FRIENDS ACQUIRE A VERY LARGE BOOTY.

THE approach of the vehicle, whatever it was, that was plainly to be heard, had the effect of hastening their resolves concerning what they were to do with the dead body of Tom Brereton.

"The best thing in the world," said Dick Turpin, "is to put it through the hedge into the meadow, and leave it to be found or not by any one who may chance to be passing across the fields."

"Very well," said Claude. "I'll take him. He and I were tolerably well acquainted while he lived, and so I don't much mind pulling him along now that he is dead. Come, Master Tom Brereton, you and I will go together through the hedge, and that is almost the last that I want to have to do with you."

With these words, Claude picked up the body, and forced it through a weak part of the hedge on to the green sward of the meadow adjoining the side of the lane, and then replacing as well as he could hastily the displaced brnaches of the briers, he rejoined his companions.

"Look out; it's a gig that is coming," said Dick.

Claude stood by his horse, and looked in the direction the vehicle was coming, and saw that, as Dick said, it was a gig. In it was seated a white faced man with a white cravat, so alarmingly tight, that it was evidently quite a matter of impossibility for him to turn his head in any direction without moving his whole body likewise.

At the sight of the three men and horses, the gig was stopped, and a look of intense alarm came over the countenance of the driver of it.

"Hilloa!" he said, "who are you?"

Claude walked up to him with an easy air.

"Why, sir," he said, "as you are a gentleman, we don't mind telling you that we are on the look out for three highwaymen upon the road, and that the notorious Claude Duval is one of them.

"You don't say so?"

"Yes, I do; but, somehow, the villains have baffled us as yet, and we cannot find them, so we were just consulting what to do."

"And are you sure they are hereabouts?"

"Oh, yes; we traced them up this lane."

"Oh, what an escape for me! What an escape! I am the Reverend Peter Holmes, and am going to the Bank of England with a draft signed by the chairman and secretary of the Society for the Spiritual Regeneration of the younger children of Timbuctoo. The draft is for a thousand pounds."

"Indeed, sir! It is quite a good thing you did not encounter some unscrupulous person who might have taken it from you."

"Oh, but if they had, they would not have paid it at the bank, for they know me very well, and have orders not to pay the money to any one else."

"Then, sir, I presume that you are quite safe."

"Oh, but I have to come back with it, because it has to be decided between me and the chairman and the secretary—that is to say, we have to settle how it is to be used for the pious purposes for which it was collected."

"Exactly, sir. All we can do is to wish you good speed on your journey, and to beg of you to be very careful how you get back with the money."

The reverend gentleman seemed to be considering for a few moments, and then he said—

"Could I, do you think, in a reasonable way, make it worth your while to go with me to the Bank of England, and come back with me to my house, as a protection against the highwaymen you mention?"

"It is likely enough, sir. We should be very happy, of course, to give you any protection in our power upon the occasion, I am quite sure."

"Then, I tell you what, young man, you seem to be a very respectable officer, indeed, and I will give five guineas amongst you, if you can manage to protect me to the bank and back again, with my gig and my money."

"Allow me, sir, to consult with my brother officers a moment, and I daresay we shall find a means of meeting your wishes."

"Certainly—certainly, that is quite correct."

Duval, who could hardly keep his countenance, as he spoke to the parson who thus desired his protection, walked up to Dick and Jack, who had kept at a little distance, and said to them—

"Did you hear what we said to each other?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, I don't know a better chance of a thousand pounds than this. There is no doubt but it has been subscribed by fools, to go into the pockets of hypocrites, and we had much better have it than they."

"But how can it be done—shall we wait for him here?"

"If we all do so, he will be sure, after what I have told him, to get an escort of officers home with him. Now, what I propose is, that you two should wait here, while I go to the bank with him, in his gig, and bring him back to this spot with the money, where you two can rob us of it."

"A good joke," said Dick.

"Capital," said Jack. "Why, it wouldn't take you above two hours to go there and come back again. We can easily take a rest here until you return."

"You must take charge of my horse, too."

"Oh, yes. That, you know, you can leave us to do, Claude, with perfect confidence."

"I do, Jack; so now, I think, we understand all about it; and of all things in the world, I feel inclined to get possession of the money, that has been so stupidly subscribed to be so villanously used."

"Well, Mr. Officer," said the parson, "have you made up your mind?"

"Yes, sir," said Claude, advancing to the gig again, "my two comrades, as they have been specially ordered by the Secretary of State to remain here upon the look-out for Duval and his associates, dare not leave the spot; but I will leave my horse to their care, and ride with you to town and back again; and I can only say, that it will need to be a bold fellow who will take anything from you while I am with you, for I am well armed, and so very scrupulous how I use my weapons when there is occasion."

As he spoke, Claude took his pistols from his pocket and began to examine the flints, which warlike demonstration had quite an effect upon the parson, and made him more than ever anxious to secure the services of one who would be so efficient a safeguard in case of danger.

"Very well," he said, "if you can manage to come, I shall be well pleased, and you may depend upon receiving your reward."

"You will be so good, sir, if you please as not to say anything to anybody about the reward, as we, of course, are bound to do these kind of jobs for nothing, you know, sir."

"Oh, no, I won't say anything."

"Thank you, sir, then I will accompany you with the greatest pleasure, and I certainly promise you that no highwayman shall have a chance of robbing you while I am with you."

"I am quite pleased," said the parson; "upon my life, I do feel now something like secure. The idea of me driving through these green lanes and such a hardened and diabolical ruffian as Claude Duval in them."

"It was a risk," said Claude, as he got into the gig. "Good-by, comrades. I shall soon be back with you."

"Perhaps you don't mind driving?" said the parson.

"Not a bit. I will do so with pleasure; and if you will permit me to go at a good pace, as I see your horse is quite capable of it, I shall be glad, as the sooner I rejoin my comrades the better. They might not, you see, sir, without me be quite a match for Claude Duval."

"Certainly—certainly. What is your name?"

"Bland."

"What, are you Bland, the well known officer of Bow Street?"

"The same, sir, at your service."

"I'm quite delighted, and I do believe from all I have heard of you, that you are a match for any highwayman that ever was. Now, indeed, I feel calm and secure, and I know that the money is quite safe."

"You may think of anything you like, sir, for the money is just as safe, to my thinking, as if it were in my pocket."

"Ha! ha! Mr. Bland; but I would rather have it in my own, you know."

"Of course, sir."

Claude put the horse to speed, and was soon clear of the green lane. Once upon the high-road, he knew that he was leaving his foes behind him; as, from the report of Jack, he was sure that they had gone right on towards Hanwell and Southall; so he went rapidly to London without fear of recognition.

It was lucky for Duval that he was dressed plainly. The fact was, that he always, when he went to the farm, dressed himself as unlike his general appearance on the road as possible, so that no one would be likely to know him seated quietly in the gig by the side of the parson.

"I hope, sir," said Duval, "that your benevolent intentions respecting the youthful population of Timbuctoo will be successful."

"Oh, ah, yes—to be sure."

"Is the mission a very successful one, sir?"

"Pretty well, pretty well. They are worthy ladies who subscribe to it; and as long as there is a reverend gentleman at the head of the affair, and another for the secretary, and a nobleman for the chairman, they don't mind."

'Don't mind what, sir?"

"Come, come, Mr. Bland, you are rather too curious."

"I hope not, sir. For my part I would rather see the money in your pocket, than hear of its going to Africa, for I am sure it would be of more use to you. There's an old lady, now, that I know something of, who has got ten thousand pounds to leave, and she don't know which of the societies to will it to."

"You don't mean that, Mr. Bland?"

"I do, sir."

"My dear Bland, and do you know her?"

"Quite well, sir, and she has asked me to inquire about the different societies for the conversion of the heathen, that she may be guided by my report."

Claude was merely throwing out a bait to gain the confidence of the parson, as he was not a little curious to know how such affairs were managed.

"My dear Mr. Bland, allow me to assure you, that if you can only induce her to leave her money to our society, she will be highly gratified."

"What, when she is dead?"

"No—no. I mean that you will be highly gratified."

"I don't see how it is to gratify me, sir; for between you and me, I think all the money that is spent, or said to be spent, in converting little blackamoors, had better have been given to the poor and the destitute of our own country."

"Well, well, Mr. Bland, you are a man of the world."

"I rather think I am, sir."

"Not a doubt of it; and of course you do the best you can for yourself, like every one else in this sinful sphere."

"Rather, sir."

"Then, Mr. Bland, I feel that I may trust you with a degree of confidence that I should be very sorry to have in everybody. If you will induce the old lady you mention to leave her ten thousand pounds to our society, you shall have five hundred pounds for yourself. I give you my word for that amount."

"Five hundred pounds? That is not much out of ten thousand pounds. Make it a thousand pounds, and it's done."

"Done!"

"You will give me a thousand pounds if the old lady leaves her property to your society? That you clearly and distinctly promise?"

"That I clearly and distinctly promise."

"Then consider you have got it; and all I can say is, that if you send one penny piece of it to Africa, you are not the sort of gentleman I hope you are."

"I don't intend. Between you and me, my friend, I don't believe there is such a place at all as Timbuctoo; and if there is, all the little Heathens there may go to the ——, you understand, before they get any money out of me."

"All right."

The parson nodded and laughed.

"But how do you get the people to subscribe?"

"Why, our principal assistants are Lord Crashley, and a Mr. Gabble. They are both men eaten up with personal vanity, and they have no abilities to make themselves public men in a way that men of talent can do; so they take up what is known as the 'Public Charity Dodge.'"

"And the officials pocket the money?"

"Exactly."

"But don't these men subscribe a great deal of money."

"Oh, dear no. They only give their names as decoy ducks to others. Catch them subscribing! It's quite the other way; and it's an understood thing that they are never to be called upon for any money, so they put their names down for something handsome, and then never give it another thought. That's how they do it."

"Well," said Claude, "one must live and learn in this world; and, certainly, it don't improve upon acquaintance, I must say."

"Well, perhaps it don't; but don't you forget the old lady, Mr. Bland, and the ten thousand pounds."

"That you may depend I will not."

The horse in the gig under the skilful guidance of Claude Duval, went at a capital pace, so that Oxford Street was soon gained. There was not at that time—blessed quiet time!—one carriage in the streets of London to a hundred that are now, so that there was no difficulty in driving right on to the Bank of England, which now is only to be arrived at in any vehicle of less size than an omnibus, after half a dozen stoppages, and the risk of being smashed to pieces.

No one on the line of road took the smallest notice of Duval, although, no doubt, he passed many persons who would not have been a little pleased to have cried out his name, and apprehended him. The parson leant back in the gig with quite a contented air, little suspecting who it was he was in companionship with in that vehicle.

The bank was reached, and while Duval waited in the gig, the reverend gentleman went to get his cheque changed, with the proceeds of which he very shortly returned. Claude was rather anxious to know if all were guineas, or if he had taken any notes, for the latter was not of much value to any one in the line of business that Duval was. The bag in which the parson had the money was heavy.

"All gold?" said Duval.

"No. Five hundred pounds in gold; and the rest in notes."

"Oh, that's pretty well; and, now, sir, I presume we have nothing to do but to get back again as quickly as we possibly can?"

"That is all, my friend; and you may depend upon your reward as soon as you get back to my house."

"I make no doubt of my reward," said Claude, "and did not from the first; and I cannot help thinking that it is a very good two hour's work."

"Pretty fair; but I hope you will sometimes have a better."

"Sir, you are exceedingly kind, and I can only say that I cordially agree in that hope, so very delightfully uttered."

"I told the officer who is on duty at the bank that I had you with me, and he said he knew you quite well, and would have come out to see you if he had had time."

"What an escape!" thought Claude. "And so he had not time to come and say, 'How do you do,' to a friend?"

"No; he was waiting to speak to one of the bank directors who was expected to come out every minute; but he told me to remember him to you."

This was a piece of real good luck, for if the constable at the bank had only stepped out to the street the plot must in a moment have been blown to the winds by his repudiating any knowledge of Claude Duval, and distinctly averring that he was not Bland, the officer.

If possible, Claude put the parson's horse more upon its mettle in going back to the green lane, near Hanger Hill, than in coming from it, so that Oxford Street was passed, and Tyburn Gate dashed through at a strapping pace. The parson, indeed, requested that he would not go quite so fast, so that Claude was compelled to moderate his speed a little; but still, with all that, the pretty little green lane was very soon in sight.

CHAPTER CCL.

CLAUDE REJOINS HIS COMPANIONS, AND THEY GO TO A WEDDING.

"WHY, here are some soldiers," said the parson.

At that word, soldiers, Claude looked up rather hurriedly, for he had lapsed into a sort of reverie upon the folly of people who part with their money to enrich charitable and religious societies, and thus deprive themselves of one of the greatest pleasures that the world can bestow upon human nature—the pleasure of personally doing good.

"Soldiers!" he said. "What soldiers?"

"Why, soldiers on horseback. Don't you see them, Mr. Bland?"

"Oh, yes."

Rather to his chagrin, we will not say alarm, for Duval was not the sort of man to be alarmed exactly, he saw coming evidently back, tired and dusty from their fruitless chase after him and his companions, the five soldiers and the two officers who accompanied them. Claude Duval felt in a moment that he was rather in very great danger indeed, or none at all.

"Yes," he said, "I see them, sir. They must have been upon extraordinary duty, for they look rather fatigued and tired."

The great thing for Duval to find out now was if either of the officers knew him personally. The strong probability was that they did, for, otherwise, it would not have done them much good to select them to accompany the soldiery.

"Oh, dear," said Claude, suddenly putting his handkerchief up to his face; "did you ever have the tooth-ache, sir?"

"Dear me, yes, but not of late years, Mr. Bland. Have you got it now, sir?"

"I have, indeed. Oh, such a shooting pain! It is really enough to drive any one quite mad. Oh—oh—oh!"

"Well, that is very unfortunate, indeed. But have patience: it cannot last very long, coming on in such a violent manner."

"Oh, can't it, though! Pray, sir, take the reins; I cannot see to drive. I do hope it will go away, soon."

Duval fell as far back in the gig as he could conveniently go, and almost entirely covered up his face with his handkerchief, so that but very little of him could be seen, and then he waited the coming up of the soldiers.

"Sir!" he said to the parson, "sir!"

"Well, what, Mr. Bland?"

"I have, by accompanying you to London, sir, gone out of the sphere of my duty, for you know, sir, as I told you, I was ordered, by the Secretary of State, to keep watch for Duval in the green lanes, and as both these officers know me, without a doubt—for what officer of the police does not know Bland?—I should be glad if the did not recognise me."

"But what can I do?"

"Will you be so good as to say that I am your servant?"

"Oh, no, I cannot, Mr. Bland. I am quite surprised that you should ask one of my sacred profession to lie."

"Why, it's as easy as thieving," said Duval.

"As what, sir?"

"Nothing—nothing. I did but jest, I was thinking of the society for the conversion of the little blackamoors at Timbuctoo, that was all, sir; but without any violence to your conscience, you can say I am a sick friend of yours, for if I get the old lady's ten thousand pounds, you know, I shall be a friend of yours."

"So you will, Mr. Bland, so you will, and as I certainly do not wish to get you into any trouble on account of neglecting your duty to come with me, I will shield you as much as I can."

"Thank you, sir."

By the time this little agreement was entered into between Claude and the parson, the soldiers had reached the spot, and the officers of police rode up to the gig.

"Gentlemen," said one, "did you meet any suspicious characters on the road?"

"No," said the parson.

"Oh—oh!" said Duval.

"What is the matter with the gentleman?" said the other officer. "Is he ill?"

"Yes," said the parson. "He is a sick friend of mine, poor fellow, and he is suffering great pain from the toothache, I assure you, gentlemen. Pray who are you looking for?"

"Claude Duval and his associates."

"Then I sincerely hope you may find them. I have been to London on some business, and should have been afraid to go but for the company of this friend of mine, who was a sort of protection to me on the road."

"And pray, sir, who are you?" said the officer who had first spoken, looking rather inquisitively at the parson and Claude. "We are bound to be rather particular who we let pass on the road, I assure you."

"You may be as particular as you like. I am the rector of the parish."

"You may be, sir, but we don't know it, and we don't take your word for it exactly. Pray consider yourself in custody."

"In custody!"

"Come—come, no resistance, if you please, or we shall clap a pair of darbies upon you and your friend in a moment."

"Darbies? Who is Darbies, my friend?"

Duval very gently put his hand into his breast-pocket, and grasped the stock of a double-barrelled pistol. He was resolved that he would not be taken without a struggle, but at the moment that he thought that struggle was quite invevitable, there rode up to the spot a livery servant on horseback, who was going towards town.

"What's the matter?" he cried.

"Oh, that's right!" said the parson. "You know me. I think you are Mr. Price's groom, are you not?"

"I am, sir," said the servant, touching his hat.

"Well, then, I believe these police officers merely mistake me for Claude Duval the highwayman: will you have the goodness to say who I am?"

"Oh, yes, sir, certainly; you are the rector of the parish, sir, as everyone in this neighbourhood knows quite well."

"There," said the parson, "are you satisfied now?"

"Quite so, sir," said the officer, with a chagrined air. "But you will excuse us, sir, as we have a very difficult duty to perform, indeed."

"Don't say another word about it; as you are after that rascal Claude Duval, the highwayman, I can excuse anything that arises from zeal in the performance of your duty, in that particular; only I do think that I look more like a gentleman than a highwayman."

The officers were very much mortified that they had made such a mistake, and kept making excuses, while Duval was in an agony at the stupid delay of the parson, now that he might proceed without any hinderance to his doing so.

"Go on—go on," he said, in a low tone.

The parson touched the horse with his whip, and off they went again. Each moment that he left now his enemies behind him was a moment of intense gratification to Duval, for as they were proceeding to town, and he was going from it, the distance between him and them increased with great rapidity, and he was rejoiced accordingly.

"How is your toothache?" said the parson as he turned his horse's head up the green lane.

"Better."

"Ah, I told you how it would be, but you did not believe me. Folks, when they are suffering from pain, never listen to reason; but such a sudden and violent accession of the toothache could not possibly last long."

"You are right, sir; it is gradually dying away."

"Did you know either of those officers, Mr. Bland?"

"Oh, yes, both of them well. One of them is named Fat, and the other Taf."

"How very odd. Fat and Taf. Why, its just the letters reversed."

"Exactly so, sir. And now here we are where we started from, and my toothache, which I do believe comes on just at the convenient moment when it was necessary for me to hide my face from my friends, has gone again,"

"Why, you schemer," said the parson. "I don't now believe for a moment at you had the toothache at all, though I confess you took me in at the moment."

"Did I, though?"

"Yes, you did; you acted it capitally, I will say. But I don't see your brother officers yet. They ought to be hereabouts, I think."

"We shall see them, sir, in good time, never fear; but now that we are in this quiet lane, where we are tolerably secure from interruption, I will let you into a secret that very much concerns the one thousand pounds you have with you."

"Concerns my one thousand pounds! You don't mean it, do you?"

"Yes, I do."

"Then, for Heaven's sake, Mr. Bland, tell it to me at once. Do not keep me in ignorance another moment."

"I do not like to tell it to you very hurriedly, for fear it should be too great a shock to your feelings."

"Bother take my feelings! I have no feeling, and never had, but for my money. Anything that concerns my money is everything to me. Pray, Mr. Bland, do not keep me in suspense, for that is the worst of all."

"I will not, then. You will recollect that when I first met you upon this spot it was I who gave you the information that Claude Duval, the notorious highwayman, was about this neighbourhood."

"Yes—yes."

"Well, no one could be better able to give you that information, to a certainty, than myself."

"Of course not."

"Because I am that individual!"

"You are—that—oh, no—What—Murder!"

"I am Claude Duval!"

The parson opened his mouth and let his hands drop to his sides, as though he were about to give up the ghost. This ludicrous terror was highly amusing to Duval, who had a hearty contempt for the character of the parson, as he had himself explained it to him (Claude). For a few moments it seemed as though the rector were upon the point of fainting, but the thought, then, of the jeopardy that his beloved money was in, came over him and roused him to action, and in a shrill voice that echoed through the lane again, he cried—

"Murder!—murder!—murder!"

Duval immediately drew a pistol and placed the muzzle of it against his throat, crying—

"Another such shout, and it is your last in this world. I have but to press my finger slightly upon this hair trigger, and your brains are scattered in the lane."

The parson was silent in a moment.

"Listen to me," said Claude. "It is such men as you who bring true charity into contempt when it ought to stand upon the highest pinnacle in popular estimation, instead of being considered as one of the greatest humbugs in the metropolis. Nobody on earth now shall save your money from me and my companions, but if you will have it so, your life will likewise pay the penalty of your folly."

The parson had just sense enough left to comprehend what was said to him by Duval, and with a deep groan, he said—

"Oh, that I should have been such an idiot—oh, that I should have actually carried to town with me in my own gig the very man I so much dreaded! But say it is only a joke. Tell me again that you are Mr. Bland?"

"That I cannot do, for Claude Duval I am."

With this, Claude placed to his lips the small silver whistle that he always had in his waistcoat-pocket, and blew one loud clear note. It was answered by the appearance of Jack and Dick on the other side of the hedge, and Dick called out—

"Is all right?"

"Yes, Dick. Our friend, the parson, now knows who we really are, so pray make an appearance, and bring me my horse."

"Here he is," said Jack, as he threw on one side some portion of the hedge that they had employed themselves in effectually cutting down, so that it could be moved at a moment's notice by the hand. "Here he is, and as fresh as a rose in early morning, Claude."

"Oh, it's no mistake," said the parson, "it's no mistake! I see now that I am completely deceived."

"Yes," said Claude, "and now all I have got to say to you is—your money and your life, or your money without your life. Give it up quietly, and no harm will be done you, but if you resist, we must defend ourselves. We never resort to violence if we can help it, and we don't then unless it is quite forced upon us; so now, sir, you can please yourself."

"Take it—oh, take it," said the parson; and he drew a bag from beneath his seat of the gig, and handed it to Duval, who instantly placed it in his coat pocket.

"And now," said Claude, "allow me to introduce you to my two friends. If you please, reverend sir, this is Dick Turpin, of whom you may have heard?"

"Oh, dear, yes. Oh, the ——"

"And this reverend sir, is Sixteen-string Jack, of whom, in all probability, you have likewise heard something by popular rumours?"

"Yes, gentlemen, I have heard of you all. I can't compliment you upon your honesty, bnt if you let me go now at once, I shall say that you did rob me, certainly, but that it was done in as gentlemanly and good-humoured a style as possible, considering all things."

"We will not deprive you of the opportunity of saying that," said Claude; "but if I might advise so clever an individual, I should say that your best plan would be to keep the whole affair to yourself."

"Why so?"

"Because I don't think it will tell well; for, if you say much about the robbery, and make a racket in the country concerning it, I shall have to publish what you were good enough to tell me as the mode in which the money affairs of public charities are managed."

"That will do. Good-day."

"Let him go," said Duval. "Ha!—ha!"

"Ha!—ha!" laughed Jack and Dick. "Ha!—ha!—ha!"

The parson put his horse to a trot, and when he got about one hundred yards off he turned round in the chaise, and in a loud voice cried,—

"Ha—ha!"

Immediately, then, he laid the whip upon the horse's back, and went off at a furious gallop, but he need not have done so, for neither Duval nor his friends wished to pursue him.

"Well, he is a droll fellow," said Dick; "what did he mean by that, I wonder? One would think that he was in no laughing humour, at all events; but it was a hearty laugh."

"It was," said Jack.

"I don't comprehend," said Claude; "but it really is of no consequence. If he can laugh over his loss, let him."

"Yes—but," said Jack, "I'm afraid he is laughing over some scheme he has concocted against us; and as now he knows us all three well, it will be but wise to get away from this spot as quickly as possible. We do not know what force he may manage to bring against us."

"That's true," said Duval, as he mounted; "let us now be off, then, at once. We can give our cattle a gallop, for they must be well rested by this time; and I suppose they have feasted upon the fresh grass?"

"That they have, Duval. But where shall we go?"

"Let us get across the country towards Harrow. At the first post-office we come to, I will post a few lines to the farm, to let all them know that we are safe; for by this time they are tolerably anxious about us, no doubt."

"But they will have faith in our good luck," said Dick; "and I daresay they fancy we have distanced our foes by this time. Ah, this is the pace I like. It is a dashing one, and makes the blood dance in one's veins."

CHAPTER CCLI.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS MEET WITH A LITTLE DISAPPOINTMENT.

THE intimate acquaintance that Duval and his friends had with the neighbourhood was a great help to them, indeed. Without such a knowledge they could not have got across the country with the facility that they did; but now, by taking a northerly course, they in a very short time got to the Harrow Road, and halted at the little village of Harlesdon Green, which was then a very rural spot, indeed.

Even now that village, when you are fairly in it, is of a very primitive character in some places; and the pretty rural lane leading to Willesden will well repay a visit.

Claude Duval stopped opposite the only inn which the village then possessed, and with a smile, he said,—

"I don't know of an easier adventure than our last, or one which to us has been productive of such large results with so little trouble. In two hours we have earned one thousand pounds!"

"Don't say we," said Jack. "You have had it all to yourself, Duval, this time. We have had little enough to do with it, Heaven knows!"

"Yes, Jack, I say we; for are we not by special agreement bound together for the purposes that bring us on to the road? Come, I am rather tired of the saddle. Suppose we make a halt here, and have some refreshment, for I think by this time we must be all in need of it?"

"With all my heart," said Dick.

"And me, likewise," said Jack. "This place seems as quiet as it is possible for any place to be so near to London; and there is a garden and a pretty grass plot in the centre of it."

"Then, let us ride in," said Claude; "I like to see to my horse while I take some refreshment myself."

The entrance to the garden was through a pretty little gate, and the three friends at once rode through it on to the little plot of grass that Jack had admired, and which the horses seemed to admire as much as he did, for Claude Duval had no sooner dismounted than his horse took a fancy to have a roll on his back, which he did, to the great derangement of the saddle and its appendages.

Claude laughed, and then there came bustling out of the house towards them the landlord, who was evidently in quite a passion.

"Hilloa, gentlemen!" he said, "this won't do. This is not the place to bring your horses into. We have capital stalls, and you will find good entertainment for man and beast; but we can't have the horses in the garden, you know."

"Oh, nonsense!" said Claude, "they will do no harm. Bring us the best you have in the eating line in the house, and a couple of bottles of the wine you can most recommend, and one bottle of brandy."

Such an order was to the imagination of the landlord rather magnificent, and he calmed down in a moment concerning the impropriety of the horses being upon the grass plot in the garden.

"Well, gentlemen," he said, "of course, if you wish it, that is quite another thing. I like always to accommodate myself to the wishes of gentlemen as is gentlemen. Upon my life, it is quite a pleasant thing to see that horse enjoying himself in such a way. A very fine fellow, indeed!"

The landlord then bustled off to execute the order he had received, and Duval with his two friends sat down in a pretty little alcove in the garden, which was completely covered over by the boughs of a monster ash, of most luxuriant growth.

"Well," said Dick, "here we are; and if the refreshment of this place is as agreeable to us as this garden is pleasant and handy, we will come here again. I wonder, now, what sort of man the landlord really is as regards being trusted?"

"You would not," said Jack, "be so mad as to trust him, would you?"

"Oh, no; but it would be, you know, a wonderfully convenient thing to us if we could do so upon an emergency."

"This landlord," said Claude, "is human; and if it were worth his while to be a faithful friend to us, he would be such. Perhaps, at some other time, it will be worth the trying whether he would be so, and we must bear in mind that there are many men who would rather get from us a few guineas at a time, and often see us, than they would go through the notoriety and the obloquy of giving us up or betraying us to the police, and fingering a large reward at once."

"That I believe," said Jack; "but I am averse to making confidence. Hush! here he comes."

The landlord, followed by a very pretty young girl, now came to the alcove and laid a cloth, upon which they spread abundance of cold meat and home-made bread, together with the wine and the brandy that had been ordered by Claude.

The three friends could not keep their eyes off the girl, she was so really beautiful. There was such a look of feminine archness upon her face, and her eyes sparkled, and such pretty dimples disported around her mouth when she laughed, that they were quite delighted with her appearance.

"Your daughter, my friend?" said Dick to the landlord.

"No, sir, my niece, and a very good girl."

"If she is as good as she is fair," said Claude, "she is good, indeed."

The girl blushed at the compliment, and hastily retired to the house.

"Ah, sir," said the landlord, "she is rather a wilful girl, though I own that she is good-looking. Now, sometimes the gentlemen of the hunt will come here for a glass of our old ale, and she won't be civil to them as she might be, you know. Lor! gentlemen, that girl might bring loads of customers to the house if she wouldn't be so coy."

"Oh, she is coy, then, is she?"

"Yes, gentlemen; but as I often say, what harm is there in a kiss, when it does good to the house? It might sell me a bottle of wine."

"So it might. You are a capital landlord, and a most exemplary uncle."

This irony was rather too fine for the capacity of the landlord, and he took it as a compliment, replying to it that he always did his best, and that business was business. He then left his guests to enjoy their refreshment by themselves.

It turned out that the wine was good, so that they really did enjoy the little spread amazingly; and after they had thoroughly satisfied their hunger, Dick said—

"Was the money all in gold, Claude?"

"No, half gold and half notes; but I don't know what we shall do with the notes. I suppose we shall have to let the Jews have them, to take to the continent, at their own price."

"That will be little enough."

"Yes, but to us they will be completely useless, for coming, as they did, direct from the Bank of England, of course the numbers were perfectly well known, and they will be stopped in all directions."

"But we might change them quickly."

"Yes; but we don't know who we may victimise by doing so, and perhaps be the ruin of some honest tradesman. We rob, but we do not rob indiscriminately."

"Certainly not. You are quite right, Claude, so the Jews must have them."

"I expect so; but now that we are in a quiet place where we can say that we have a few minutes to ourselves, the best thing we can do is to divide the money, for if anything should happen to me, it is not then all lost to you two."

With these words, Claude Duval took the bag from his pocket containing the parson's money, and laid it on the table before him. It was a stout linen bag, such as is used for cash at the banking-houses, and was tied up with a piece of whipcord very tightly.

"He has taken care of it," laughed Dick.

"I dare say they tied it up so well for him at the bank," said Claude, "as he says they knew him. I wonder how I should have got out of the scrape if he had brought the bank officer out to see his old friend Bland?"

"It would have been one of the most awkward things that can be imagined, Claude," remarked Dick. "In the middle of London, too! Your only plan would have been to have run for it, and tried to reach some of the old family kens that are about Bishopsgate."

"I suppose that would have been about the only chance. But here is the money. The gold we can divide, and the notes—Hilloa!"

Dick and Jack sprung to their feet, and Claude looked in amazement at the contents of the bag. A quantity of farthings and old buttons rolled from it, together with some folded pieces of a newspaper.

"Done!" said Claude.

Dick and Jack looked as blank as possible, and then Claude, all at once, burst into a roar of laughter.

"Oh, dear—oh, dear!" he said. "This is good. I don't think I will ever set my wit up against a parson again. He has fairly done us, comrades. Look here—see what our one thousand pounds has diminished to! Oh—oh!"

"Confound him!" cried Dick.

"Hang him!" growled Jack.

"Well, but isn't it a good joke?"

"Joke?" shouted Dick. "No, I don't think it is a joke at all. It's a swindle. How the deuce could he take it into his head to serve us such an abominable trick as this, I wonder?"

"I can only account for it in one way," said Claude, wiping the tears from his eyes, which had started there in his mirth. "You may depend when he started from home before he met with us he provided himself with this bag of farthings in case of meeting with a highwayman on the road here, and when I declared myself to him, he thought that he might as well try it upon me?"

"You recollect how he laughed when he got to a little distance from us, and then at what a pretty rate he went off?"

"To be sure I do, and we laughed likewise; but he has got the laugh at us now."

"But he shan't have it long," said Dick. "He lives somewhere, and the money is in his house, or else he has a few brains that can be reached by a pistol-shot, I think."

"Now, Dick," said Claude, "with all due deference to you, you are talking nonsense, old fellow."

"Nonsense?"

"Yes, arrant nonsense. I am to the full as disappointed as you are, but I am not savage over it. The parson was quite justified in serving us such a trick if he could. I don't mean to say but that I should like to give him something for his cleverness; but it must be something very different from the violence of mere revenge."

"You are right, Claude—you are right," said Dick, as he sat down. "I ough to know better, but it is provoking."

"There, Dick, we agree. Hush! the landlord's pretty niece is coming this way I think, for I see her in yonder path."

The young girl approached the little alcove, and without waiting for anything to be said to her, she said in a low tone—

"Go at once. If you know yourselves to be such as other men may inquire after, with intentions of violence, go at once, and do not let this place be made the scene of death, perhaps!"

Dick and Jack half rose.

"Sit still," said Claude. "What is it, my dear, that you would warn us of?"

"Two mounted men are at the front door of the house inquiring for three such as you seem, and they tell my uncle to amuse you here as long as he possibly can."

"A thousand thanks."

"Oh, no, I want no thanks, but all I ask of you is to come here no more, for my uncle will betray you, although you are his guests, and I——"

"And you? Pray go on."

"I have no more to say. Look to your own safety."

The girl immediately ran off towards the house again.

"This may be serious," said Claude.

"It's the parson, I'd wager a thousand pounds," said Dick.

"And I a thousand buttons and farthings," said Claude, "for here they are, and I shouldn't care who won the stakes."

"How can you joke in such an emergency as this?"

"He always does," said Jack. "I never knew him begin to be so jocular as when he did not know if his life were his own for the next five minutes."

"And why not?" smiled Claude. "I disarm fate of all he procures to injure me by laughing at him. You may depend upon it that to laugh at our misfortunes is your only true philosophy; and by continually making a practice of it, you get regularly into the habit, so that if anything happens amiss, it is quite a capital jest, and fails in all its powers of annoyance."

Claude was losing no time, though, while he was speaking, for he had risen from his seat and put on his hat. At the moment that he did so, a boy of the most scampish look raced into the garden, and deliberately taking Claude's horse by the bridle, he cried, as he tried to lead it from the place—

"Kim up—gee ho!"

"Well," said Claude, "that's cool."

In a moment or two he was behind the boy, and caught hold of him by what he thought was a fur cap he had upon his head, but it turned out to be his own head of hair.

"If you please," said Claude, "I prefer my horse here."

"Oh, dear, I'm cotched!" said the boy; and then diving his hand into his pocket, he got out a clasped knife, which he tried to open with his teeth.

"Oh, indeed," said Duval, "you are such a young viper, are you? Then I must get rid of you."

Close at hand was a blackthorn bush or hedge, that separated the public garden of the inn from the little kitchen garden of the establishment, and in a moment the boy found himself swung through the air, and then alighting exactly into the centre of the blackthorn hedge, which, with its millions of prickles, resented the intrusion in the most energetic manner.

The boy roared for mercy, but blackthorn hedges are deaf to such appeals. The noise that he made, however, was such, that the landlord cantered into the garden, crying out—

"What's the matter—what's the matter?"

"Nothing particular," said Claude, as he mounted his horse. "What's to pay, landlord, for what we have had?"

"Oh, gentlemen, you are not going yet?"

"Yes we are. Get out of the way, unless you want to be ridden over."

"But just step into the house. I have got some rare old pictures I should like to show you, some of which will make you laugh till your side ache again. Pray dismount, and come in."

"What is to pay?" cried Claude.

"Oh, dear, they will go! It's three guineas."

"Moderate! There's one of them, then," added Claude, as he gave the landlord a cut with his horsewhip across the shoulders that made him dance with pain.

Dick and Jack followed Claude's example, and the landlord got three such slashes upon his back for his reckoning, that he roared again. The friends reached the little gate conducting into the high-road, and there they found about eight or ten horsemen drawn up to dispute their progress, while two or three country fellows, on foot, with pitchforks, hovered in the rear.

CHAPTER CCLII.

CLAUDE FINDS THAT THE PARSON'S FARTHINGS ARE OF USE.

THE situation of affairs looked anything but pleasant now, for the party opposed to the progress of the friends did not seem, by any means, of the sort to give way, upon a trifling consideration, to the highwaymen.

The only symptoms of consolation were to be observed among the country fellows in the rear, with the pitchforks; and they looked as though they would just as soon be somewhere else, and, indeed, no doubt they were quite prepared to run upon the first opportunity that presented itself for so doing.

"Hold!" cried one of the horsemen. "Bloodshed in this affair would only be folly: you are our prisoners."

"And pray, what for?" said Claude.

"On suspicion. That is quite enough for us; and I beg to inform you, that when I take a thing into my head, there's no such thing as getting it out again. I am called obstinate Jones, and am well known all over this part of the country for my determination; therefore, you had better give in at once, as you see I am opposed to you."

"Perhaps," said Duval, "you may get something in your head by your obstinacy, that you will be very glad to get out of it, but will not have the chance."

"What do you mean?"

"A pistol bullet."

"Oh, that's it, is it? Now, my friends, you hear what this fellow says? We have made up our minds to apprehend him and his two assistants, for we can have no doubt of what they are. Highwaymen they were, and highwaymen they are, and we shall be doing a public good by——"

"Pray be quiet, Mr. Jones," said another of the horsemen. "All this talking is of no avail. Allow me to say, that we are in such force that we ought to go in and win. Come on, friends; let us no longer parley with these fellows."

Upon this, the horseman made a dash forward to catch hold of Duval by the collar; but he was foiled by Claude giving just a touch to the rein of his horse, and swerving on one side, so that the man nearly fell to the road-way. Several of his friends, however, had followed him, and among the rest obstinate Jones; but, as yet, no fire-arms had been used by either side. It was a kind of failing with Claude, not to make use of his pistols until he was fired at by the foe.

The butt-end of the large horse-pistol that Claude had in his hand, very probably did quite as much execution as firing it would have done, and that he used liberally enough, for he laid it with such right good will upon the head of obstinate Jones, that down that worthy went as though he had been struck by lightning.

"Fire upon them!" said a voice.

A couple of pistols were discharged at Duval. The bullet from one of them knocked his hat off, and the other hit him on the shoulder without doing him any material injury.

"Forward!" shouted Claude, and his two friends knew perfectly well what he meant, and by suddenly applying the spurs to their horses, they all three succeeded in getting from the throng of horsemen that were pressing around them. Duval had a pistol ready for firing in his hand, but at the moment he thought of using it at the mounted men, one of the rustics with a pitchfork made a savage dig at his horse, and did indeed slightly wound the animal.

"Ah!" said Claude, "that I cannot and will not forgive."

As he spoke he levelled his pistol, and the bullet went through the fellows head.

The occurrence had at once the effect of dispersing the men who were on foot, and they scampered off as hard as they possibly could go, shouting for help as they went.

The horsemen, however, were not so easily shaken off, for although Claude and his companions had got temporarily free of them, they were well armed, and did not feel disposed yet to give up the idea of apprehending the three friends.

"Fire! fire upon them!" cried a voice. "They will have it."

"Stoop," said Claude.

Bang! bang! bang! went three or four pistol shots, and the bullets whistled over their heads.

"That will do," said Claude; "now for our broadside, since the enemy have tried their luck —fire!"

They all three fired at the horsemen, and then without waiting even for the smoke of their own fire-arms to pass away, in order that they should see if they had done any damage, they turned and went off at full speed.

"On—on," cried Claude. "Let us get clear of our pursuers, at least. On—on. They have no chance against us at a race."

This was a fact that both Dick and Jack knew pretty well, and although Claude's horse was a little restive on account of the wound he had received from the pitchfork, he went at a dashing pace.

The effort that was made to pursue them by four of the horsemen was so weak a one, that it is doubtful if any of the four really put their horses to speed in the affair, and they soon dropped off, leaving Claude and his friends to pursue their route at leisure. When Claude found out that such was the state of things, he pulled up, and said in a very anxious tone of voice—

"Who is hurt?"

"I am a little," said Dick, as he help up his hand.

"Not much I hope?" said Claude.

"Oh, no, it's a little scratch with a bullet, that's all. If it had only hit a little lower it would have rattled about among my finger bones, and if it had only hit a little higher, it would have gone past me altogether, which would have been by far the most comfortable course for it to have pursued, in my opinion; but as it is I caught it."

Dick's hand was bleeding, and Jack at once began to tie it up with a handkerchief.

"You escaped?" said Claude, addressing Jack.

"Yes, as far as I know. If there's a bullet lodged in my brains, I am not quite aware of it, that's all I have got to say about it. But you, Claude, I'm afraid they touched you."

"On the shoulder, yes; but, after all, it is nothing. As Dick says, though, if it had only been a little lower it might have done me harm, and if it had been a little higher, it would have been a little pleasanter."

"Let me bind it up for you."

"Oh, no. It has done bleeding; but if you will dismount, Jack, and see if that rascal has done any serious hurt to the horse, I shall thank you. It was a cowardly attempt."

"It was," said Jack. "Just place your hand on my horse's bridle, Claude. I don't feel any compunction at the fate of the fellow who would attack the horse. It was a dastardly thing."

"I'm afraid I blew his brains out," said Claude; "but the fact is, I can take am injury to myself pretty calmly, as Heaven knows I have taken and forgiven many; but I cannot stand by and see any animal ill-used, or attempted to be hurt by any one. Is he much damaged?"

"Hardly a bit, Claude. The point of the fork has just raised the skin on the shoulder here, in a long furrow, that is all."

"I am glad of that, indeed; but it was a cowardly thing to touch the creature in such a way. It won't lame him, Jack?"

"Not a bit."

"Then I feel a little better, for if it had, I don't know what I should have done. You can hardly calculate the kind of attachment that I have formed towards this animal that has carried me through so many dangers."

"I can easily understand it," said Jack, as he mounted.

"And I likewise," cried Dick. "Why, I wouldn't part with my gallant little steed for the best thousand pounds that was ever laid down before any man. But what is to be the move now, friends? It seems to me as if society at large were trying to make the roads unsafe for us, instead of us attacking society."

Claude laughed.

"That," he said, "is what they say of hunting the tiger in India. It is fine sport, they say, hunting the tiger, but when the tiger turns round and takes a fancy to hunt you, it is not by any means so remarkably pleasant."

"I should say it was not!"

"Ha! ha!" cried Jack. "Don't complain of nothing to do. Here's a coach."

"A family coach?"

"As big as a house, almost.—No—it's a mourning coach."

"The deuce it is!—Perhaps it's a funeral, and if so—No—it is only a single coach; but a mourning coach it is to all intents and purposes. Jack, will it be worth while to stop such an equipage, think you?"

"Hardly," said Dick.

"I don't know that," said Jack. "If there are persons in it, they are coming home from a funeral you may depend, and there is no reason why they should not have purses in their pockets, as well as any one else."

"True—true," said Claude; "so let us stop the mourning coach."

The mourning-coaches of those days differed in no respect to those that now lumber and wheeze along our thoroughfares; as they were then, so they are now, composed of old carriages blackened over to the sombre tint of fashionable woe. The vehicle which had so very unexpectedly come into sight of the three companions, was one of the oldest and most rickety of its class; and as it came along, drawn by the two stately long-tailed black horses, it swayed to and fro and kept up such a wheezing and groaning upon its springs, that you might have heard it a considerable distance off.

"It looks like cruelty to stop it," said Claude, laughing.

"A mercy, rather, to those who are within it," said Dick.

"Decidedly so," said Jack, "for if their teeth be not all what is called on edge by this time, they have no senses."

"Come on, then."

Claude galloped up to the coach, and while Jack and Dick without a word stationed themselves in the middle of the road, and each levelled a pistol at the coachman, Duval went to one of the windows.

The coachman understood pretty well what was wanted of him, and dropping the reins in a moment, he rolled off the box with an expedition that no doubt was very unusual with him, and dropping upon his knees, the moment he got to the ground, he cried—

"Oh, spare my life. Take all I have—which is nothing—but spare my life, gentlemen—oh, do!"

Dick was rather afraid that the horses might move on, so he held them while Jack was laughing at the terror of the coachman, and pretending to be only puzzled about where exactly to hit him; but in a moment or two the coachman thought of a notable device to protect himself, and in the most ludicrous manner that can be conceived, he held his hat between him and Jack's pistol, dodging it about as Jack moved the muzzle of the weapon, as though that would save him.

Claude, when he got to the door of the coach, at a glance saw that there were no ladies, and in a voice that sufficiently showed he was not to be trifled with, he cried—

"Your money or your lives, gentlemen! Be quick!"

CHAPTER CCLIII.

THE ADVENTURE WITH THE HEARSE, AND THE REFUGE AT KENSINGTON.

THE commotion that these words from the lips of Claude Duval produced in the coach was rather great.

There were no less than six persons in the vehicle, and they looked at each other, and then at the one man who had the audacity to attack them, for a few moments in wondering silence.

"Quick, if you please," said Claude. "I have no time to stand waiting your leisure. Your money, and watches, and rings, gentlemen, if you please."

"Well, that's cool," said one.

"Very," said another.

"Pray, my friend, are you aware," said a third, "that your conduct subjects you to the greatest suspicion of being a highwayman?"

CLAUDE COUNTERFEITS A LOVER AND TAKES UNTO HIMSELF A WIFE.

Claude could not exactly at the moment make up his mind whether those words were spoken in genuine simplicity, or were intended for a bit of grave irony at his expense; but he replied in a firm, clear tone—

"Gentlemen, I am not in a jesting mood. This is a matter of stern business with me. You see I am armed, and it is better to give up to me quietly what I require, than to force me to use violence."

"But we are six."

"If you were sixty, I would rob you. This is the highway."

"Well, that's an argument, certainly. I tell you what it is, Mr. Highwayman—gentlemen, when they go to a funeral, do not carry arms with them, and so I came without any, or you would not get my purse quite so easily. There it is. Take it."

"Thank you, sir. Now, gentlemen, be quick."

With some reluctance the purses were handed to Duval; but one, as he withdrew his hand, made a snatch at the pistol that Duval held in his left hand, and the barrel of which rested on the sill of the coach-window.

The attempt to drag it from Duval was unsuccessful, and with a shake of the head, he said—

"Now, sir, what if I were a hasty man, instead of being one with rather more than an ordinary share of temper? I should shoot you in a moment, if I were such."

The gentleman shrunk back.

"Oh, there is no danger, sir," said Claude. "I have stood a shot before now without returning it, and probably had I been in your situation, I should have tried the same thing."

"Who are you?" said the gentleman—"you are the devil himself, or Claude Duval."

"The latter, at your service."

"If I did not think so! Here is my watch. You will find it a good one, and here is my ring, that I value far more than its worth, which does not exceed a few guineas; but you must have it."

"Oh, no; keep it."

"Can you be so generous?"

"Ah, sir," said Claude, with a smile, "it is easy to be generous with what don't belong to one."

"I won't be robbed," said an old gentleman in a corner, who up to now had not said a word. "I won't stand it!"

"Oh, have I not had your purse, sir?" said Claude.

"No, nor you shan't either! There now. Be off with you, you vagabond! I never was robbed, and I ain't going to begin now."

"Then," said Claude, "I very much regret that I may possibly be of some inconvenience to these other gentlemen; but as I shall have to blow out the few brains you have, why I——"

As he spoke, Claude threw up the pan of his pistol, and sorted the priming.

"Oh, Lord, no!" cried the old gentleman. "Take the money! Oh, dear!—oh, dear! take the money: but I only hope I shall have the satisfaction of living to see you hanged some day."

"Thank you, sir—thank you. Your watch, if you please. Come, be a little quicker in your movements, if you please."

"Take it, you villain; and as I say, I only hope I shall see you——"

"Oh, you said that before, sir."

"Well, I have only to add to it that I would go twenty miles any day for the gratification, that I would."

"A very kind and christian-like idea," said Claude. "And now, gentlemen, I will bid you good day, and—Ah!"

Jack had blown a shrill call upon the whistle that he always had with him, and Claude knew that it was a warning of danger. Upon turning quickly, he saw Jack standing as high in his stirrups as he could, and looking across the fields.

"What is it, Jack?"

"The Philistines."

"Very well—I have completed the present job. Let us be off. Drive on, coachman, as soon as you like; your load is a trifle lighter, but not much."

"This way," cried Jack. "There is a strong force coming across the meadows. It is time we were off."

Duval's horse was a few inches taller than Jack's, and by raising himself in the stirrups, Claude was therefore enabled to take in a rather more extended line of vision. The sight that he saw in the meadows, about half a quarter of a mile off, was one sufficient to excite serious forebodings.

There were about twenty well-mounted men, with arms glistening in their hands, coming right on in the direction of the spot upon which the robbery had been committed.

"Humph!" said Claude. "This is a case in which it is wise to show your foes a swift pair of heels. Come on."

They did not pause another moment, but at a full gallop they dashed past the coach that was still stationary in the middle of the road, for the coachman had not yet summoned up sufficient courage to mount his box again and be off.

The speed at which Duval and his two friends went made them look more like three apparitions than living men, and they were very soon quite out of sight of the coach.

It would appear now, from the conduct of the strong force of mounted men that were coming by a short cut over the meadows, that they were well aware of the spot of ground upon which Duval and his comrades were stopping, and that their object had been to take them by surprise; for the moment the three highwaymen started off on such a gallop, the whole party renewed its speed, and speedily got into the main road, through a gate that a countryman officiously opened for them.

"There they go!" cried the man. "There they go—right away down the road. I was a-hiding, and seed 'em rob the coach—but I didn't say nothing, in course."

"And why not?" shouted the foremost of the horsemen.

"He! he!" laughed the countryman. "Why not? Ho! ho! That be a good joke. I beant a fool quite."

"Come on, my friends," cried the foremost horseman, now, paying no further heed to the countryman's protestations regarding his own wisdom. "Come on! We must have them now. It may be a long chase, but they must give in at last. On—on!"

With a cheer, for their numbers gave them courage, the whole party now put their steeds to speed, and dashed on after Claude Duval and his friends on the high road.

The principal disadvantage that the highwaymen now were under, consisted in the fact, that the whole of that part of the country in which they were had got gradually alarmed, and was cognisant of their presence somewhere or another about that spot. In every individual they saw an enemy, and, unfortunately, their course was towards London, and they were such a short distance from the metropolis, that there was, in truth, every likelihood of meeting foes in front, as well as by being hotly pursued by those behind.

This was a state of things that, no doubt, would have appalled men more accustomed to face extraordinary dangers than were our friends; but of all persons, they were the least likely to allow themselves to be beaten down by the difficulties of their present situation.

After the hair-breadth escapes they had had from time to time, and the adventurous kind of life they had led, we must not suppose that a trifle would subdue their spirits.

Confident in the speed of their horses—confident in their own courage, they rode on, until an unexpected circumstance began to show Claude, that since speed would be much longer out of the question, and since force would not avail against so many foes, they must have recourse to finesse to save themselves.

The circumstance that altered the whole aspect of affairs was, that Claude found his horse beginning to fail him, and upon glancing to the ground, he saw that the wound the animal had received from the dung-fork, and which had looked to be so superficial, was bleeding profusely.

"Hold!" he cried, and he drew up within as small a pace as he conveniently could. His two comrades shot past him for some distance before they could stop their steeds, but they did so as soon as possible, and turned and came back to him.

"For mercy's sake let us get on," cried Jack. "Every moment now is most precious to us."

"It is," said Dick. "What is the matter, Claude?"

"Everything. Look at my horse."

"Good gracious!" cried Jack.

Poor Jack was not exactly the man he was once, when he was upon the moment equal to any emergency; but still he had some of the old spirit left in him, and he saw in a moment what was necessary to be done for the horse that was wounded.

With a marvellous celerity, he tore open the vallise that was at his saddle-back and got out a bottle, from which he smeared a kind of white ointment on to his handkerchief. Then plucking from the road-side a handful of fine grass he made it as flat as he could and placed it over the wound of the horse. The handkerchief then he placed over it, and the white composition that he had taken from the bottle caused the handkerchief to adhere so fast to the coat of the horse, that the poultice of grass was well kept on, and the bleeding stopped.

"What was it?" said Claude.

"A blood vessel," said Jack, "that, no doubt, was grazed by the pitch-fork, and which would have given no trouble if the horse had had a night and a day to rest, but which has given way with the hard gallop he has had."

"Ah! no doubt."

"Mount and be off again," said Dick.

Claude put his foot in the stirrup, but the horse shook and hung its head, and he withdrew it again.

"It's of no use," said Jack mournfully. "The creature would go down with you the first step, Claude."

"Then we are in for it," said Dick, "and no mistake. Hark! how those fellows are coming on. It's like thunder."

"Fly!" cried Claude. "You two can save yourselves. I implore you do so. Leave me here. Good-by both of you. Be off."

CHAPTER CCLIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN HAVE TO ABANDON THEIR HORSES.

"Just say that again, Claude," said Dick, "that I may be sure of what you mean, my old friend, for I don't exactly think it was you who advised me to leave a friend in distress."

"Nor I either," said Jack.

"Nay, but self-preservation is the first law of nature. I cannot go with you, so you must go without me."

"Not I."

"Nor I; and as far as that goes, Claude, what is to hinder you from mounting my horse? I don't mean to say that the creature will carry double for many miles, or that it will make such good speed as when it has only one on its back; but it will go for a time."

"I should only impede you, Dick."

"Claude, you impede us both now," said Jack. "Is this fair to keep us here parleying with you, while our enemies are gaining on us at every step?"

Claude saw that if he were to persevere in his opposition he should run the risk of sacrificing his two friends. He no longer hesitated, but managed to scramble up behind Dick.

"That's right," said Jack; "now let us be off."

"And abandon my gallant steed?" said Claude. "Oh, that is, indeed, a pang to me. Stop, Dick. I will shoot it first. It shall not fall into the hands of my enemies."

"Hold!" said Jack. "You don't know what you are saying, Claude. Do you think your enemies have any animosity against your horse? Quite the contrary. They will take capital care of it, and who knows but you may recover it again?"

"There is hope in that. Off and away, then!"

By this time their pursuers had made great progress, and the position of Duval and his friends became one of the most doubtful character. Nevertheless, they did gallop off, and Dick, seeing a turning to the right that appeared to lead somewhere among trees and fields, took to it, for he felt by the manner in which his horse plunged forward, that it could not long sustain both his weight and that of Claude's.

"On—on!" cried Jack. "They see us, I do think."

Dick urged his horse forward until they came to a little kind of brook, and then the creature made an attempt to leap it, and fell, throwing off both its riders. Claude was not hurt, but Dick was a little stunned.

"Oh, this will be fatal!" said Jack.

"Not so," said Claude; "we have a few minutes yet that we can call our own. Yonder is a cottage. We must get in there for safety. I advise that we strip the horses of all their garniture, and turn them both into yon meadow. Who shall say that they are ours? The officers will see them quietly grazing, and probably take no notice of them."

"A good idea," said Jack.

On the moment, he began to carry the thought into operation. Dick was too much confused by his fall to know very well what they were about, and he allowed Claude to lead him to to the cottage, while Jack took the saddles and bridles from the horses, and hid them under the hedge, and then he turned both the animals into the field.

"You are not much hurt, Dick?" said Claude.

"Oh, no—no! only a little tap on the head. The trees are not spinning round and round with me half so fast as they were a moment or two ago. I shall be all right soon."

"I am rejoiced to hear it."

Jack soon came on at a quick pace behind them, and the sound of his feet had the effect of rather alarming Dick a little. He faced about hastily, saying—

"Your pistols, Claude—your pistols! Where are they? I hear some one coming."

"It's only Jack. All's right, Dick."

"Oh, Jack, is it? How confused I am still, to be sure. And where are our horses, old fellow?"

"All safe."

"Oh, well, if you say they are all safe, I know they are, and no mistake."

"On—on with you!" cried Jack, "or we shall be seen."

"This will do," said Claude, as he pushed open the door of the cottage, although at the time he did so he did not by any means feel sure that it would do, and had a strong suspicion that they might have to fight for their lives yet.

The cottage belonged to a labourer and his family. Fortunately, the only portion of the family that was at home was a girl of about twelve years of age; but the labourer and his wife were there, and they both started to their feet at the moment of the entrance of Claude and his friends.

The man was smoking a pipe, and he called out—

"Hilloa! Who are you, I wonder? You don't make much ceremony in coming into a man's house, I take it."

"Hush, Robert," said the wife, "they are gentlemen."

"Gentlemen be hanghed! I don't care. I pays my way, and since I have got the fifty pounds my brother Bill left me, I don't care for nobody, not I."

"There is no safety here," said Dick.

"Yes," said Claude. "Let me manage the affair."

Advancing, then, to the man, Claude looked him steadily in the face, saying—

"Hark you, my friend. I am Claude Duval, the highwayman, and these are two friends of mine. The officers are after us, and if you give us up, you will get a good reward—as much as five hundred pounds."

"Five hundred pounds! Oh, won't I!"

"No, you won't."

"What?"

"I say you won't, because if you do, your throat will be cut by some friends of mine as soon as they can conveniently spare time to do it; but if you hide us from the officers, I will give you this bag of money. It contains the splendid booty for which we have got into this scrape—a thousand pounds."

"A thousand pounds!" cried the labourer, staggering back.

"Yes, a thousand pounds. Our lives are worth, to us, more than that sum; but it is all we have with us—Hide us somewhere, and the money is yours."

"Oh, won't I!"

"That is right. There is not a moment to lose."

"Oh, Robert," said the wife, "where can you hide three men?"

"In the dry well," said the girl.

"Ah, yes, that's the very place," said the labourer. "Come this way, and I'll defy the devil himself to find you. Perhaps you won't like the place, though?"

"We will tell you that when we see it."

The man led the way to the back garden of his cottage, and showed Claude and his friends a dry well of about twelve feet only in depth, down which they could jump with ease, and which would just about hold them standing together.

"Now, I tell you what," said the labourer, "you three get in there, and I'll let down an old piece of tarpaulin on to your heads, and above that again I'll throw some straw and garden litter; and if that don't hide you, the deuce is in it."

"Don't smother us," said Dick.

"Oh, never fear, you'll get air enough."

"Hark!" said Jack. "Do you hear the horses' feet in the lane?"

They all listened, and they heard a loud voice say—

"Let a couple of men, with their fire-arms ready, stand by that stile, and another two of them keep guard at the beginning of the lane."

"Quick—quick! In with you," said the labourer.

The friends no longer hesitated, but got into the old dry well. The piece of tarpaulin was let down upon their heads, and the litter was thrown upon it. The weight was nothing, but the concealment was perfect.

"Claude," whispered Dick.

"Yes—yes. Are you all right, now, Dick?"

"Oh, yes, yes; but, I say, the parson's bag of dummies will do good service yet, won't it?"

"Capital!"

"Oh, don't talk," said Jack; "and don't you be laughing, Dick. How can you?"

"Oh, but it is such a capital thing."

"Hush! Oh, hush!"

The attention of the whole three of them was now directed to a scene of great confusion that took place in the cottage. It was quite evident that the pursuers were impressed with the idea that the three highwaymen had sought shelter there, and that they were in some hiding place about the little building. The labourer was expostulating, the officers were screaming, and occasionally the shrill voice of the woman protesting were heard above the other sounds.

"Do you want to knock my place down?" said the labourer. "What is the use of banging the walls of my little bit of a crib at that rate, I should like to know?"

"Oh, you ruffians!" shouted the woman, "what do you mean by it? Do you think that Heaven knows how many highwaymen can get under a chair, or up the chimney? Perhaps you had better look in the flower-tub, or the tea-caddy for them."

"There's my silver thimble up stairs," said the daughter; "would you like to look inside that for them?"

"They are here—they must be here!" cried a voice. "They can't disappear underground!"

"I don't know that," whispered Dick.

"Hush!—oh, hush!"

At this moment, a party of the officers sallied out into the garden, and began to look about them with rage and disappointment, for there was positively no perceptible hiding-place in it.

"Confound you, where are they?" cried one.

"How should I know."

"Do you mean, now, to tell us that a party of rascals did not a little while ago rush into your cottage, without even so much as asking your leave to do so?"

"Why, if you came to that, they did."

"Ah, now it is coming out, is it? Upon my word, you are a pretty fellow! And so, you admit that a set of vagabonds did make a rush into your cottage?"

"Oh, yes."

"Ah—good! Hilloa, friends, come round and listen to this fellow's confession. He is getting a little alarmed now, I take it, and is about to tell the truth at last. Let me interrogate him."

The officers collected around the labourer; and he who thought he was very successfully getting the truth out of him, continued—

"Do you admit that, a little while ago, a party of men broke into your cottage in a violent manner?"

"Oh, yes."

"Ah, well, that is something. Oh, I knew we should get it from him by a little perseverance—I have experience in such cases. Now, my friend, you are adopting a very prudent course. What did those men say to you when they came into your cottage a little while ago?"

"I was smoking my pipe."

"Yes, yes; well, go on."

"And they pushed open the door, and in they came."

"And what did they say? that is the point."

"Oh, you ought to know, for you spoke first. You know very well what you said. It was,—'Hilloa! is there any highwaymen here?' or something of that sort."

"You villain!"

"Lor, what for? You asked me if any rascals had broken into my cottage, and I couldn't gainsay you, for only five minutes ago that was just what you all did. It's the honest truth; and I'm only quite astonished that you should think I meant to say no to it,"

The officer was in such a rage at being thus tricked, that he could not find words in which to convey his indignation. He stamped and swore, to the great amusement of his comrades, who were quite willing to have a laugh at his expense, and then one of them said, in a loud voice,—

"It's clear enough, if those we have been after have been here, that they are now gone again. There isn't a hiding-place for a cat in the whole premises, that I can see."

"What's this?" said another, approaching the well.

"Why, we make that into a kind of litter-bin," said the labourer; "but if you like, I'll fork it all out."

"Oh, no—no."

The officers now collected in a knot, and whispered to each other. The consultation was anything but satisfactory, and was rather a lamentation over their non-success in finding the highwaymen, whom they had actually traced to that spot, and who then had disappeared as completely as though they had vanished into thin air like ghosts. The whole affair was quite inexplicable, for, although, in consequence of that cottage being the only one upon the spot, the officers thought it more than probable Claude and his friends had taken refuge there, yet they felt quite satisfied that now there they were not.

Yet the principal officer made one last appeal to the labourer.

"Listen to me, my good friend," he said. "You have had your joke, and there's an end of that, and now let us proceed to business. If you can take us to where we shall find those whom we seek, here is a twenty pound note at your service."

"Don't I wish I could!"

"I'll make it fifty pounds. Come, now, that will do, won't it?"

"How can you go on aggravating a poor man with your twenty and your fifty pound notes, in such a way? It's enough to unsettle a fellow for life, that it is. I don't know, I tell you, anything about the men."

"Now, my fine fellow, listen to me. The principal person that we seek is no other than Claude Duval."

"What, the great highwayman?"

"You may call him great if you like, but we consider him only a notorious criminal, for whom the gallows is waiting, and if you can tell us where to lay hands upon him, here is a hundred pound note you shall have."

"Oh, gracious! do you want to drive a fellow mad? Why, I'd give up my own father for half the money."

"Very well: good day."

With an astonishing abruptness, the officers left the cottage. They now felt pretty well satisfied that the labourer really knew nothing, and that they must have made a mistake in supposing that Claude and his two friends had entered the cottage; and yet that they were still somewhere close about the spot, they could not doubt, for that they had entered the lane, and were not come out of it, was a fact that it would have required a deal of evidence to induce them to doubt.

The officers collected together in the lane, and took serious counsel with each other, as to what should, or what could be next done. He who was the principal among them, spoke,—

"There is some trick in it," he said, "that's quite clear, and the only way in which we shall find it out will be by watching. There's some hiding-place hereabouts, that we might be months seeking for, and then never discover; but they must come out of it some day."

"The horses, too," said one, "that's one of the most singular parts of the whole affair to me, for, beyond the one horse that we have got hold of, and which they abandoned because it was hurt, we have seen nothing of the others."

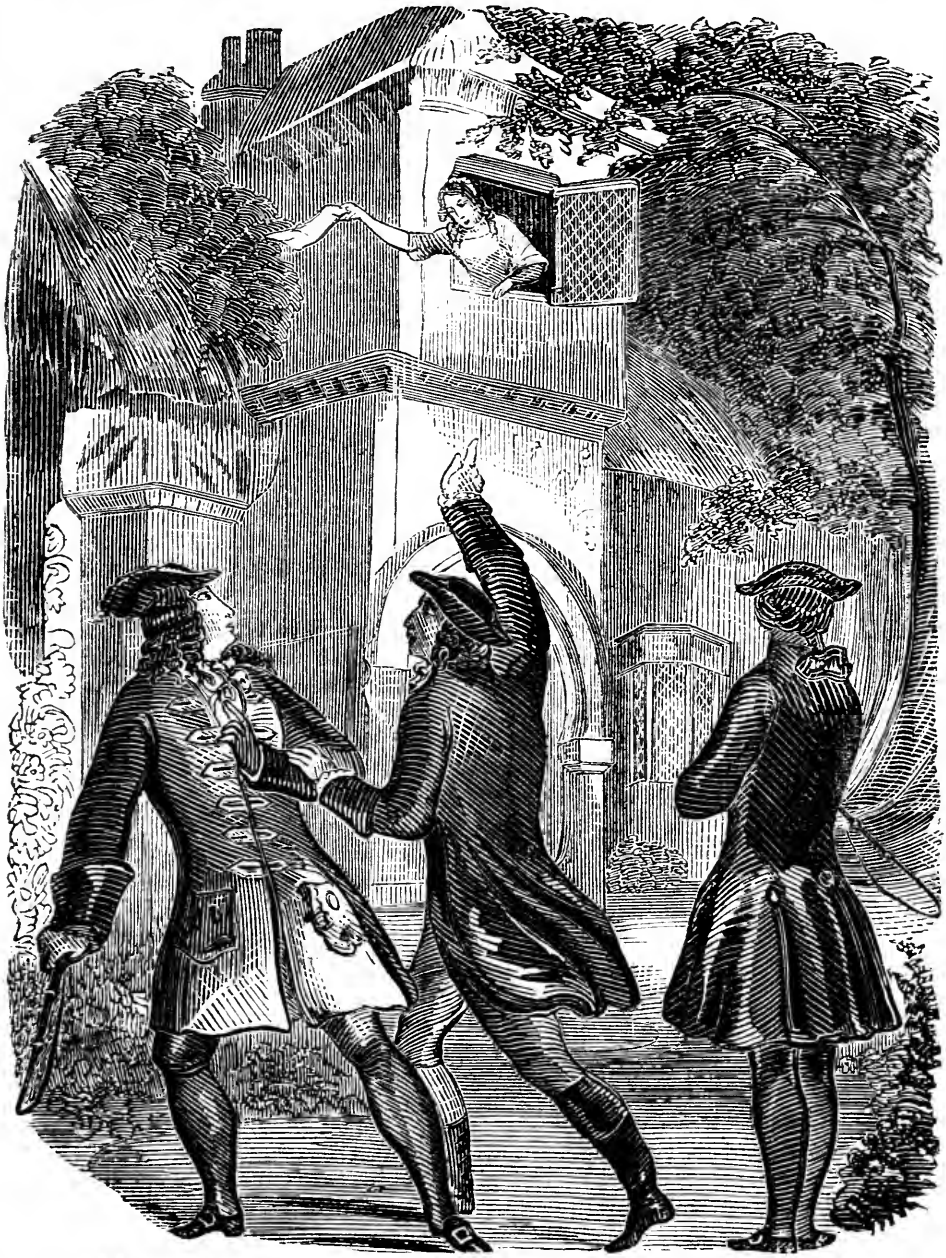
Even as this was spoken, Dick's and Jack's horses were quietly nibbling at the young grass within his sight; but so natural did it seem for horses to be in a meadow, that he never suspected they belonged to the highwaymen. Had the cattle not been divested of their harness, of course there would have been immediate suspicion; but as it was, they created none.

"Now, listen to me," said the principal officer. "I have a proposition to make to you all."

The others listened attentively.

"I propose that one of you get gently up into a tree, and there wait while all the rest of us trot off as though we had given the affair up as a bad job altogether. We must go above a mile, when we will turn round, and come very quietly back, and keep under the hedge at the top of the lane. The one who will be in the tree can then, if he sees anything of the highwaymen, fire a pistol, which will be a signal to us to push on."

"That will do," said the others.



"Very good. Now, which of you will go into the tree?"

This was a question that seemed to be much easier asked than answered; and after considerable contention among them, it was settled by drawing lots, and the one that it fell upon to go upon the troublesome and dangerous duty, looked as grim as possible about it.

"Well, if I must I must," he said; "so here goes."

With these words he commenced climbing a tall chestnut tree in the lane.

THE LABOURER'S DAUGHTER APPRISES THE THREE FRIENDS OF DANGER.

CHAPTER CCLV.

SHOWS HOW CLAUDE ESCAPED AND MET WITH A STRANGE ADVENTURE.

It was quite evident that the officer upon whom the lot had fallen to keep watch in the tree, was anything but pleased with his position, perched up in its branches.

"I say," he cried. "Hilloa!"

"What now?" said he who was in command of the party.

"Why, I only wish to call your attention to the fact, that I am a nice mark for a pistol bullet here, if Duval should take it into his head to fire at me."

"Oh, you keep quiet and you will be all right."

"Shall I?"

"Of course you will. If you don't fire at him, he won't fire at you; and if he should take it into his head to do so, you know you have all the chance of escaping the bullet, by its hitting against some of the branches of the tree."

"Yes, that's a comfort."

The other officers who had escaped the duty, and who, until the lots were being drawn, had looked rather serious over the affair, for fear it should come to their chance to have the onerous post, now seemed quite amused at the dolorous light in which their comrade viewed the affair, and they were all on the laugh.

"Now, let us be off," said the principal officer, "and, no doubt, Martin will be able to give us some information soon. Good-by, Martin."

"Oh, good-by! Are you going?"

"Yes—yes."

"Very well. Perhaps you will remember me in your prayers."

They all laughed at this; but Martin did not seem to see the remotest joke in it at all. When they galloped off, which they did purposely with as much clatter as they could, poor Martin looked down from his perch in the tree as disconsolately as might be.

"Umph!" he said; "it's all very well for a fellow to be perched up here to give notice when there's anything going on below; but I rather think if I do, that Claude Duval and his friends will not be very particular how they will have a pop at me with their pistols."

Full of this idea, Mr. Martin got up a little higher into the tree, and shielded himself as well as he could from the possibility of being seen from below; but still he considered that if he gave the alarm by firing a pistol, that that would be quite a sufficient indication of his whereabouts in the tree, to draw down upon him all the danger that he so much dreaded from the highwaymen.

With a shake of the head he said—

"I will take a thought of it before they get me to fire a pistol here. If I think it is a tolerably safe move to do so, why I will; but if I don't, why I won't, that's all."

With this highly prudent resolution, which was so very much against the probability of his giving the alarm his comrades anxiously expected, Mr. Martin, more for the sake of his own safety than from any ardent desire to come into collision with Claude Duval and his friends, kept what might be called a very particularly bright look-out.

"I don't see anything," he said, "and I'll be hanged if I hear anything either. Perhaps, after all, they are off. Well, I shan't wait above half an hour here, I'll be hanged if I do."

While the officers were making their disposition of affairs, in order yet to give themselves a chance of capturing Duval and his party, the labourer went into his cottage again, and sat down very calmly with his wife, while he smoked, and tried to look as if nothing were the matter.

The fact is, that he fully expected the officers would be upon the look-out after his proceedings, for that they still had a strong suspicion of his knowledge of the hiding place of Duval, he was quite acute enough to suppose.

"Wife," he said, "what shall we do?"

"What do you mean, Robert?"

"Shall we give them up even now, and get what we can, or shall we yet chance it for the thousand?"

"Oh, father," said the young girl, "it would be very cruel, besides very unfair, to give them up now."

"You hold your tongue, you young hussy, will you? I don't want you to say anything about it. Who asked your opinion, I should like to know?"

Thus rebuffed, the girl hung down her head, and shrunk to the farther end of the cottage. The labourer tapped the ashes out of his pipe upon the top bar of the little grate, and then he said—

"What do you think of it, wife? You don't speak."

"A thousand pounds is a very large sum, Robert."

"It is."

"It's almost enough to take one's breath away to hear speak of it, and it would make us for ever, I rather think, wouldn't it, Robert? Why, we should never know how to get through it."

"Ha!—ha! it would be easy enough got through. But that ain't the question, after all. The thing is, what are we to do?"

"Why, take the money."

"But the confounded police are on the look-out, I think."

"And what can they do, Robert?"

"Well, I don't know. Not much, I should say. Of course, they can take a fellow up for harbouring a felon; but, then, if one is put to a little inconvenience, a thousand pounds is capital pay for that. Where's the girl gone?"

"Out into the lane, I think."

"Call her back. I don't half like her interfering in the matter."

The woman went to the cottage door, and called the girl back, and she came with fright in her looks.

"Oh, mother, mother, there is a man in the old chestnut tree. I saw his foot just now!"

"Well, my dear, it's one of the officers, no doubt; but never you mind, it's no great matter to us. You go into your own little bed-room, and be quiet, that's the best thing you can do, while your father and I settle this affair."

"Yes, mother; but, you know, it wouldn't be fair to give them up to the officers, now, would it?"

"Be off with you, do. If your father hears you going on at this rate, and once gets angry, I don't know what he might not do to you; so go away at once, will you?"

A lively fear of her father seemed to come over the girl at once, and she hastened off and got out of his sight, while the woman went into the cottage front-room to inform her husband of what the girl had seen.

"That's just what I expected," he said. "They will hover about the place, and think to find out something yet."

"And what will you do, Robert?"

"I'm nonplussed, wife."

"Then, Robert, if you are nonplussed, it isn't at all likely that any one else will know what to do."

"Well, I reckon, I am rather a clever fellow, I must say; but yet there are circumstances, you know, wife, that bother even a clever fellow. You know that, though I now have to work, or at the least had to work till lately, when the fifty pounds was left us, I was a tradesman once; and if it hadn't been for my hard-hearted creditors, who would insist upon being paid, I should have done very well, indeed."

"Not a doubt of it, Robert."

"But it wasn't to be; and so, you see, with all my cleverness, I was forced to come and live here, the more's the pity. But touching these three men in the well, I—Oh, Lord, what's that?"

"Is all right?" said Claude, as he suddenly popped his head into the cottage from the back-door of it.

"Oh, dear, have you got out of the well?"

"To be sure. Why, you hardly supposed we were going to stay there one moment longer than was absolutely necessary? We would rather, I can assure you, let well alone."

"The officers are quite gone, then," said the labourer, giving a wink to his wife to say nothing about the man in the chestnut tree. "They are off at last, and you are safe."

'We heard the sound of their horses' feet, or we should not have left our secure retreat, I assure you. Come on, Jack and Dick. All's clear now, and safe."

"Oh, so safe," said the man of the cottage; "and I only hope, gentlemen, you won't forget your promise."

"It's a large sum," said Duval, as he took out the bag that he had got from the parson. "It is, I may say, a very large sum; but, yet, as I promised you it, you are entitled to it."

"There's one thing," said the labourer, rising, "that I think you ought to promise me, and that is, that if you happen to be taken, after leaving my place, you will say nothing about this money; for if you do, the law will come down upon us for it."

"Of course it will; but you may make your mind easy about that. If we are taken, it will go hard with us, and it would not do us one farthing's worth of good to deprive you of the money; so you may keep it so far as we are concerned."

"Then I'll hide it at once. Wife, get me a chisel."

The wife brought him a powerful chisel, with which he got up easily one of the flat red tiles with which the cottage was floored, and scooping a hole, he said—

"Now give me the bag."

"There it is," said Claude. "It is a large sum, but what is money without one's life?"

"What, indeed?" said the labourer, as quite complacently he conveyed the bag into the hole in the floor, and replaced the tile over it.

CHAPTER CCLVI.

THE REFUGE IN THE OLD MANOR-HOUSE, AND ITS RESULTS.

If the man at the cottage had been only half such a clever fellow as he thought himself to be, he would have looked into the bag first, before he conveyed it so snugly into the hole in the floor, and then he would have found out that it was anything but gold that he was so cleverly hiding; but he did not, and Duval could only congratulate himself, that, after all, the parson's mock bag of money had turned out to be so serviceable.

"Now then," he said, "my friend, we will leave you."

"I wish you luck," said the man.

Probably of the two he would much rather that Claude and his friends should not be taken; but still as he was paid he did not care much about it. If he had cared a straw, he would have told them of the man in the tree; but upon that subject he kept silent. His great object was to get the large sum they promised him, and then to get them out of the cottage.

When the door closed upon them he was quite delighted; he sat down to laugh. While he is so laughing, we will accompany our friends to the outside of the cottage.

"Done!" said Duval, as he looked smilingly at his two friends, "that fellow, with all his rascality and all his cupidity, is done."

"He is," said Jack, "but let us get our horses as quickly as we can now, and be off."

At this moment something hit Duval on the head. It was a little pebble, and upon looking up to see where it came from, he observed the labourer's daughter at the upper window of the cottage, for there was a room, or rather a kind of loft, above the sitting-room, in which she usually slept.

The girl placed her finger upon her lips to signify that he was not to speak, and then she threw out to him a little piece of paper, upon which was written—

"Thare his a man hin the bighest chestnut tree."

"Ah," said Claude, "this is news worth having. Look at this, Jack, and you too, Dick. We have to thank the girl for this."

He looked up to the window, but she was gone.

"A man in the chestnut-tree," said Jack. "The biggest chestnut-tree. Where is that?"

"In the lane," whispered Dick. "Hush! I see the branches of it now, and there cannot be a doubt but that this is a fair enough warning to us of danger. What is to be done now?"

Claude considered for a moment or two, and then he said—

"You two go and get the horses; I will settle with this gentleman in the tree. No doubt he is placed there to give an alarm to his friends, who are not far off. I see our position quite well now, and I shall look upon his conduct as that of a spy. It will be hard, indeed, if I can't hit a man in a tree with one of my pistols. Get the horses quickly."

"It is our only resource," said Dick. "Come along, Jack."

Dick and Jack made what haste they could to the meadow where the horses were grazing, and Claude went to the tree, about which there could be no mistake, as it was double the size of any other that grew around it.

As he neared it, he saw the branches at one spot shake a little, and that convinced him that the information he had had from the girl was perfectly well founded.

Whether or not the labourer had deceived him, he could not take upon himself to say, nor did he care much at that moment, as he had too much else to think of.

Taking a pistol from his pocket, he with great deliberation pointed it at the tree, and took a steady aim.

"Hold!" cried the officer from amid the branches. "Don't fire, Claude Duval, whatever you do. I know you very well. If you fire, you will have all my comrades upon you, for a pistol discharged is to be the signal, and I don't want to throw away my life that you may be hanged. You be quiet, and I will, so I hope you will listen to reason."

Duval laughed.

"Certainly, my friend," he said. "I never throw away a shot, and I always do listen to reason."

"I thought you would, Duval; you can be off all right with your friends, now, for the others won't gallop up till they hear a pistol shot, and I won't fire one till they can't do you much harm."

"You will excuse me, my friend," said Duval; "but I shall be much the better pleased if you drop your pistols to the foot of the tree now."

"Oh, but they may go off in falling."

"No, you can shake out the priming."

"Well but——"

"Oh, I see you are full of excuses, so our treaty is at an end."

Claude again levelled his pistol.

"Hold! You won't hear what I have to say," cried the officer. "I was only going to remark that if my brother-officers found that I was without my pistols, they would suspect what of all things I would wish to conceal from them, namely, that you and I had met."

"If that is all, you may make yourself easy. I will leave your pistols at the foot of the tree, so that you can get them when you descend."

"That'll do. Here they are."

Down came one pistol, and then the other, and Claude was satisfied that the officer's fears were quite sufficient to induce him to keep faith with him. It took only a moment or two to take the charge from the pistols, and then Claude threw them to the foot of the tree, saying—

"There are your arms. You will find them all right. And if you keep your own secret, no one need ever know to your detriment that you and I have had this little bit of conversation."

"It's not likely I'll tell, Duval, if you don't; and, of course, though I don't deny that I am bound to arrest you if I can, yet I am not such a goose as to throw away my life for it."

"Far from being a goose," said Claude, with a laugh, "I look upon you as a very sensible man, indeed, I assure you. Ah! here are my friends with our cattle."

At this juncture, Dick and Jack made their appearance with the two horses, and Jack said to Claude—

"Dick's horse, I do believe, although it is a few inches higher than mine, is less able to bear your extra weight than mine is. You had better mount behind me."

"Why, no, Jack," said Claude, drily. "The fact is, that fastened by the bridle to a gate a little lower down the road, I can see a horse."

"Oh, that's mine," cried the officer in the tree.

"You mean it was yours," said Claude. "It is mine now."

"Don't take it. I'm a ruined man, if you take the horse. I only borrowed it, and it's worth forty pounds if it's worth a halfpenny. Oh, Claude, don't take that horse whatever you do. I'm a man with a family, and what are they to do for victuals if you take the horse?"

"Why, you don't mean to say," said Claude, "that you feed your children on horse-flesh, do you?"

"Oh, dear!—Oh, dear!—There it comes."

Jack had gone to the gate that Claude had indicated, and fetched the officer's horse, to the immense chagrin of that individual, who kept up, now, quite a lament of groans upon the subject.

"Hark you, my friend," said Claude Duval; "you or some of your party shot or injured my horse, and I was forced to leave him behind; so this is but a fair exchange and no robbery. I would rather have my own."

"Come—oh, come," said Jack. "Come, Claude. Every moment that we linger here is fraught with danger."

"But, I tell you, I borrowed the horse of Mr. Stanhope," cried the officer, "and I—Oh, they are gone!"

Claude and his friends went off at a sharp canter, and the officer was left in the tree lamenting.

The route that the highwaymen took was, naturally enough, the very reverse of that which they had heard the officers take, and they soon came to the end of the lane, which terminated in a gate leading into the meadows.

Such a petty obstacle as a gate was not very likely to stop the career of such personages as Claude Duval and his two friends. Jack jumped the gate at once, but Dick, after the fall that his horse had had, did not like to risk him in a leap just then.

Duval was about putting his horse at the gate, but Jack cried out to him—

"Don't try it, Claude, with a horse you know nothing about. He may not be able to do it."

"I think he can," said Duval. "Don't you baulk me again, Jack."

"Well—well, I warn you."

"Thank you. If I break my neck, you may depend that I won't blame you for it, Jack."

With these words, Duval rode his horse at the gate, and to his great gratification, the creature went over it in beautiful style.

"Forty pounds," cried Duval, "did he say this horse was worth? Why, it would be a good eighty pounds that would be required to buy him, I take it: he is a famous hunter."

"Capital—oh, capital," said Jack. "I never did see a creature take a leap in better style. I do believe he would go over anything."

These words were scarcely out of Jack's mouth, when from a little pathway that was close by the side of a hedge that formed a continuation of the fence of the field, there rushed a young lady, who, clinging at once to the bridle of Claude Duval's horse, cried in frantic accents—

"He has come—he has come at last! Oh, God! Yes, he has come! Here he is! I know the horse, and I know him! Oh, he has come at last, in answer to my prayers!"

Duval was perfectly thunderstricken at this sudden appeal to him, and at the appearance of the young lady, who had rushed forward so very unexpectedly, that she might have been an apparition for all he knew to the contrary. Jack and Dick, too, looked quite paralyzed with astonishment, and for the space of time in which you might have counted twelve, not one of the three of them could speak a word.

"Yes—yes," added the young lady. "At last—at last I shall die happy—very happy, now that he has come. Do I not know the horse? Oh, yes. It is—it is my Stanhope!"

"Stanhope!" said Claude.

"Yes—yes. You know that you promised to come long ago; and now that you are here, the circle of friends that have been walking out with me, and jeering and gibbering at me for so long, have all taken to flight. Ha, ha, ha! I am happy, now, for you have come!"

"I am all amazement," said Claude.

"Father—father!" shrieked the young lady, in a voice that echoed again through the meadow. "Father, he is come—oh, he is come!"

"She is mad," said Dick.

"Quite mad," said Jack.

The young lady paid no attention to these remarks, but kept calling "Father!" until an elderly gentleman, with a lady about his own age, made their appearance in great haste and agitation.

CHAPTER CCLVII.

CLAUDE OFFICIATES AT A MARRIAGE, AND TAKES LEAVE OF THE BRIDE.

The elderly lady and gentleman were both evidently in very great grief, and the lady cried out—

"Oh, Emma—Emma, do come home. How is it that you are here with strangers? Come home, do, my dear child."

"No, mother—no," cried the girl. "This is Stanhope. He said he would come and marry me. He swore that he would, and you have nearly driven me mad among you by saying that he would not: and lo! here he is."

"Alas—alas!" said the old gentleman.

"This will kill me," said the old lady. "Oh, gentlemen, how came you to encounter this poor young creature? You can well see that her wits are gone. I pray you leave her to us at once."

"No—no," shrieked the girl, clinging to Claude's horse in such a way, that he was afraid to move for fear the animal should trample upon her feet. "No—no, I tell you this is Stanhope who said he would come and marry me."

"What a dreadful delusion!" said the father.

At that moment it flashed across the mind of Duval that the officer had said the horse was borrowed from a gentleman of the name of Stanhope, and he felt quite sure that it was the sight of the animal, which she no doubt well knew, that had induced the poor crazed girl to mistake Claude for the real owner of it.

The father tried to force her from her hold of the bridle of the horse, but she only uttered the most piercing shrieks, and called upon Duval, in the name of Stanhope, to protect her.

"Sir," said Claude to the father, "come round to the other side of the horse that I may speak to you. It is quite evident that this girl must be soothed, not cowed in any way."

"But alas! sir," said the father, as he stepped round to the other side of the horse, "what can I do?"

"She mistakes me for Mr. Stanhope."

"It seems so, sir; and yet you are not much like him; he is a much fairer man than you. It is his heart only that is black."

"Is he so bad?"

"He was the ruin of that young girl, and you see, from the remains of her beauty, what she might have been. Under the solemn promise of marriage he effected her ruin. Her intellect has given way with the full knowledge of his perfidy, and her mad idea now is that he will yet come to marry her. My son has met him in a duel, and wounded him so that he is laid up now, and richly he deserves the suffering that he no doubt endures. You see, sir, that we can do no more now but suffer."

"Understand me, now," said Duval, "that I do not know this Mr. Stanhope, and, to my knowledge, never set eyes upon him; but I can well understand how it is that your daughter, in her crazed intellect, has mistaken me for him, as this is his horse."

"This his horse?"

"Yes, sir; but don't run away with an idea that I am a friend to this Mr. Stanhope. I borrowed the horse of one who borrowed it of him, that is all, I give you my word of honour that it is so."

"I am satisfied, sir, and do not doubt you; but it is a most unfortunate thing that she should chance to meet you upon this horse."

"Be not too hasty, sir, in coming to that conclusion."

"How can I help it, sir? If you have any power over her imagination, by the fancy that she has of your being Mr. Stanhope, let me beg of you to exercise it at once by urging her to go home."

"I will try it. Emma!"

"Yes, Charles, yes. Oh, it is he!"

"I am coming up to the house. Pray go on with your mother."

"Oh, yes, anything you wish. We shall be married soon. Oh, God, what joy this is! They all said you would not come, but I knew you would, Charles; and you have come to prove your own truth and constancy."

"Yes, yes, Emma. Go on with your mother."

With a look of the most quiet obedience, she now placed her arm in that of her mother's, and allowed herself to be led off.

"Is she really so tractable?" said Duval.

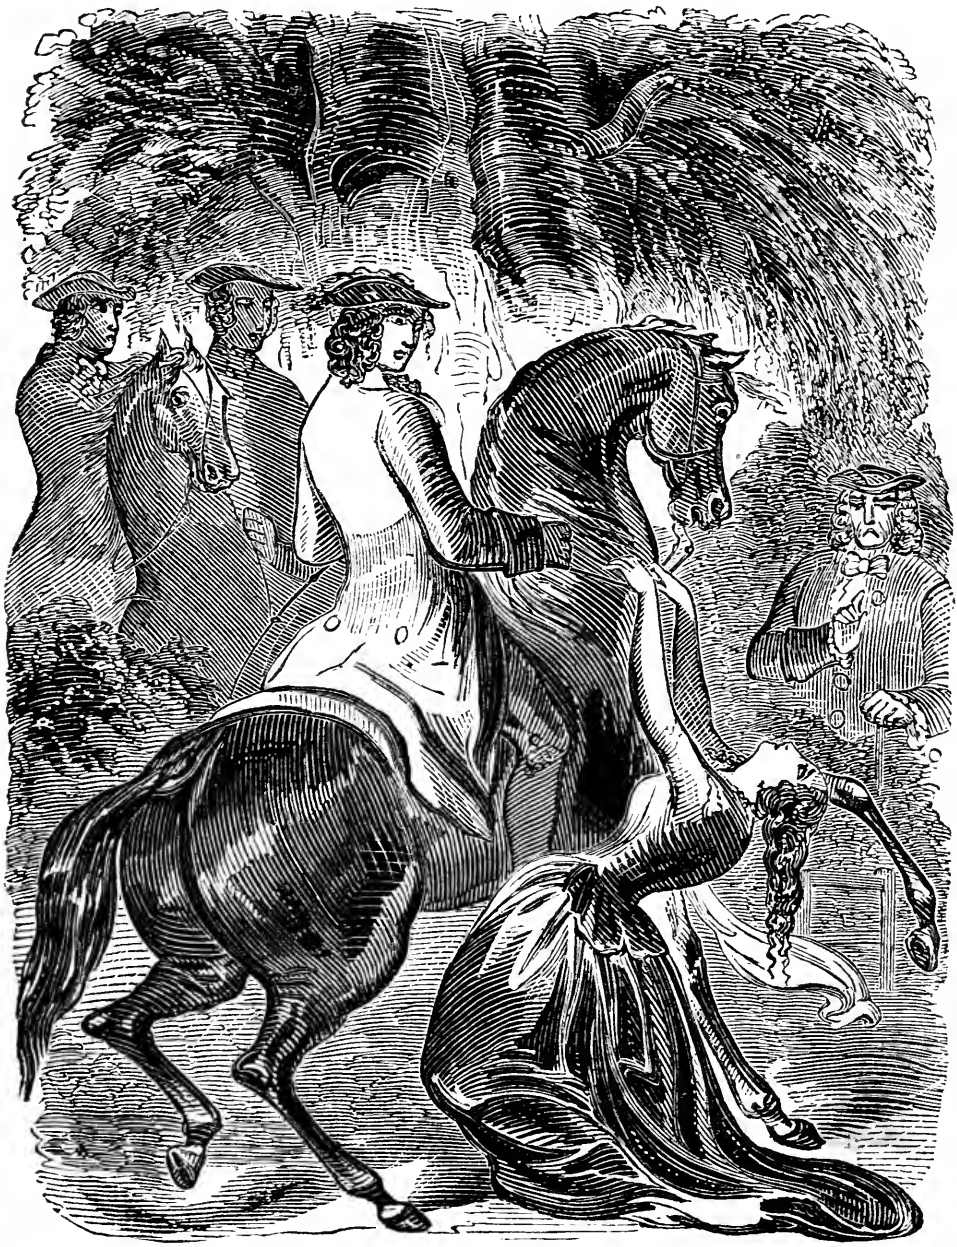
"Quite the reverse," said the father, as he turned aside to dash the tears from his eyes. "Oh, Heaven, is there no thunderbolt to reach the head of the villain who destroyed my child?"

"Listen to me, sir," said Duval, who truly pitied both the girl and her parents. "It is quite clear that this scoundrel, named Stanhope, will never come to redeem the promises he has made to your child."

"Never—Never!"

"And it is equally clear, that if he does not come, she will continue in this desperate state of mental disease."

"She will be worse, much worse now, after you are gone. I dread to meet her again."



"Then let me advise. The only thing that I can see, is for you to make her believe that I still really am the Mr. Stanhope she takes me for. Let me marry her."

"Marry her?"

"Yes, in a sham way, you know; one of my friends will personate the parson and perform the ceremony, immediately after which, I will tell her that I have an appointment in London, so that I must leave her. You can then, when I am gone, tell her that I am in the army, and unexpectedly ordered abroad. After that you can choose your own opportunity of telling her that I am dead, and, of course, she will feel grief, but how much better will that be than her present state."

The father looked thoughtful.

CLAUDE MEETS WITH AN ADVENTURE WITH A POOR MANIAC.

"Come, sir," said Duval "I propose all this to you out of pity to the young girl, as I do, from my heart, think that it will have the effect of changing the whole current of her thoughts, and probably of entirely recovering her from the state she is now in."

"It is feasible."

"It is, indeed, to my thinking; and anything is worth the trying, in a medicinal point of view, that promises for her an amendment of her present sad state, do you not think?"

"Oh, yes."

"Then, try it, sir. Do not hesitate. It is true that I am a stranger to you, but if I can be of such service to that poor, afflicted girl, I shall feel that it was a happy chance that brought me upon Mr. Stanhope's horse to this spot."

"Sir," said the father, "I must own to you that I feel a kind of repugnance to this plan."

"I do not wonder at it; but the case is so singular, and so distressing, that I have been induced to make you the offer that I have, with a view to saving you from further evil; but if it should still continue, upon reflection, to be repugnant to you, I have but to take my leave."

"Oh, no—no, do not go. Allow me to speak to her mother upon the subject, before I give you my final answer."

"I think that is only what ought to be done."

"Then, sir, will you be so good as to accompany me to my house, now, and I can only say, that whether your proposal, which I feel is dictated in all kindness, be acceded to or not, I shall feel always grateful to you for having made it."

"Do not think of that," said Duval, "I make it from sheer and genuine sympathy with that poor afflicted young thing."

This was strictly true, and the tone in which Claude said it, was enough to convince any one of his real sincerity of purpose.

"Is it asking too much, sir," said the old gentleman, "for me to ask your name, and who you are?"

"I am a gentleman," said Duval, "and if you will permit me to preserve an incognito, I would rather do it than impose upon you by telling you that I am what I am not."

"Very well, sir; I have no right to pry into your name, or your condition in life. Will your two friends likewise accompany us?"

"If you please."

There was no need to explain to Jack or Dick the affair, for they had both been sufficiently near at hand to hear it all, so that they followed Claude and the old gentleman across the meadow to the house, the chimneys of which they could just see peeping up from among the trees of a garden that was close at hand.

Claude dismounted, and slung the bridle of his new horse over his arm, as he walked by the side of the old gentleman; and it was quite evident that the latter was getting each moment more and more charmed by the manner of his new acquaintance.

"Ah, sir," he said, "I suspect that in not telling me your name and station you are concealing from me rank, and, perhaps, nobility, instead of anything that can be discreditable to you."

"Pray permit me to be silent upon that head," said Claude. "It may happen that at some future time we may meet, and then you may know me in my proper character. Until that time shall come, allow me to be your unknown friend."

"Certainly, sir, at your pleasure; and I can only say, that be you whom you may, my feelings of gratitude towards you will suffer no diminution whatever."

By this time they reached a garden gate that led from the meadow into the well-kept grounds of the house, and it was quite evident to Claude, that the owner of the place must be a man of some worth, for it was extremely well and trimly kept.

CHAPTER CCLVIII.

CLAUDE HAS TO LEAVE THE MANOR-HOUSE IN A HURRY.

We have not yet had time to do more than hint at the personal appearance of the young lady who, in that sad eclipse of the intellect under which she laboured, mistook Duval for the greatest, and, we may say, the only enemy she had ever had upon earth.

She was not above nineteen years of age, of the most delicately fair complexion that Claude had ever seen. Her hair was of that sunny auburn, which is really auburn, and not the sandy apology for that colour which is usually so called. Her eyes were of the most beautiful and liquid blue that imagination could picture, and although her figure was a trifle small for a connoisseur in female beauty, it was yet so exquisitely graceful, that no wonder Claude, with his appreciation of female beauty, was at once charmed and distressed.

He was charmed at the sight of such a piece of feminine loveliness, and he was distressed to think how that once glorious gift of reason that had lighted up all those charms had fled.

Jack and Dick both felt the warmest sympathy for the young girl, and they were quite willing to run some personal risk, if it would but in any way conduce to her welfare.

The house was an old-fashioned one, with a great number of odd corners and quaint gable-ends to it, and the windows were in many places of the old-fashioned diamond-shape panes, that are now so completely obsolete, except when they are purposely used to imitate the architecture of a former age.

"You have a charming old place here," said Claude to the father.

"Alas—no! It was once charming, but now all their beauties have but the effect of adding to our distress, for we recollect what was their appreciation by our darling, who to us is as one of the dead."

"Do not despair; you should recollect that this madness of hers is not the result of a disease, but of a powerful sad impression that has been made upon the mind. Such is the kind of insanity that is curable."

"You really think so, sir?"

"I do, indeed."

"Those are words of comfort. I should not know how to make enough of you if by this plan that you propose you should succeed in restoring my child to something like serenity."

"Try it, sir. If it fail in doing so, it at the least has the negative gratification that it cannot make her worse."

"I do not think it can. But it is time, sir, that I should tell you who I am. I am a Mr. Moffat; and after practising as an attorney for a number of years, I have returned home."

"An attorney?"

"Yes, sir. I hope that you have none of the worldly prejudices against my profession, for I assure you there may be honest attorneys."

"I do not doubt it, sir. I pray you not to suppose for a moment that I have any prejudice against you."

"I thank you, sir. The fact is that this, Mr. Stanhope is the son of a nobleman, who was an old client of mine, and that was how he got such a footing in my house."

"I understand."

They had now reached an elegant room upon the ground floor, and Mr. Moffat, after apologising for being there alone for a little while, went to consult his wife upon the proposal Claude had made concerning Emma.

"Well," said Claude, when he was alone with Jack and Dick, "what do you think of this adventure?"

"I approve of it," said Dick. "Let us do all the good we can as we go along in the world."

"And I likewise approve of it," said Jack, "on the same principle. By adopting such a course, too, we make friends; and in our position of life, we never know when friends may be servicable. Several times it has happened to me, when I have been in great straits, and must have been sacrificed, that I have encountered people who felt bound to me by some old tie of grateful feeling, and they have saved me."

"I quite concur with you, Jack, in that," said Claude, feelingly. "Heaven knows that no one has greater cause than I to feel grateful to my friends; but yet, upon the higher principle of endeavouring to soothe the afflictions of this young girl, I would act, if I were to be assured that from the moment that I should cross the threshold of this house I should be forgotten."

"That I can well believe of you, Claude. But some one comes."

The door of the apartment was opened, and the father and mother both appeared. Tears were in the lady's eyes, and advancing to Claude, she said, in a voice of great feeling—

"Sir, not only do I accept the kind offer you make regarding Emma, but I do think, under Providence, that it may and will be the means of calming the mind of that afflicted one."

"I hope so from my heart, madam."

"We all hope so," said Dick.

"Then," said the father, "let it be soon done. Poor Emma is getting impatient to be once more in company with him whom she supposes in her madness to be Mr. Stanhope."

"Let me speak to her," said Claude, "and I will soon soothe her to calmness. At a time like this, anything should be done that possibly can to make her think that all is well. Pray let her come into the room."

The mother moved to the door; but before she could reach it, it was rapidly opened, and the young girl came into the room.

"Where is he?" she said. "Where is my Charles? Why do you keep me from him? I told you all that he would come, and you would not believe me, and so I do think that at times you nearly drove me mad. But he is here. Ah, he is here now!"

She advanced towards Claude again, and grasped him by the arm. He had his hat off now, and she looked in his face rather composedly as she said, in a low plaintive voice—

"Are you not my Charles?"

"Yes," said Claude. "Can you doubt it?"

Her countenance cleared in the moment, and the little doubt that had obtruded itself by the aid of the small glimmering of reason that still remained to her, vanished at once.

"Oh, yes—yes," she said. "I know you are my Charles, and all is well now. Who could speak to me in such a tone, but he who loved me? And now, father and mother, I would have you take notice, that he has come, although you said he would not."

"We acknowledge that, Emma," said the father.

"Yes, my child," sobbed the mother, "it is as you say."

"Now, my dear Emma," said Claude, "will you listen to me quietly, and pay great attention to what I am about to say?"

"Yes—oh, yes. How I shall listen to you! I do not wish to listen to any one else in all the world, Charles."

"Then, Emma, you must know that I have come down here, at some inconvenience to marry you, for since I knew you and saw you last, I have gone into the army. Do you understand me?"

"Yes, quite. And you have come to marry me, Charles? You are an officer in the army, now, you say?"

"Exactly; that is quite right. I have come to marry you; but the moment the ceremony is performed, my military duties will call me to London, and perhaps a little way out of England; but you will recollect that you are my wife, and you will be patient. Only think how many soldiers wives have to wait the return of their husbands."

"Alas! I shall mourn."

"Yes; but you will feel much happier than you have felt."

"Happier, Charles! Oh, yes, I shall be myself again. My state will be one of Heaven, in comparison to what I have suffered. I shall be your wife. That will be to me everything, and those about me will know that such is the case, and I will try to be happy, even although you are away from me."

Claude glanced at the father and mother. The latter was weeping, but the father said in a low tone—

"It is more than I expected. She looks already more happy."

"And she will be," said Claude. "Now, Emma, you see here two friends of mine, one of them is a brother officer, and the other is the chaplain of our regiment. He will perform the marriage ceremony for us, and when you hear that you are my wife, I hope and trust that you will throw off all gloom and discomfort, and try all you can to make your fond parents happy and contented with you."

"I will, Charles. Yes, I will,"

"That is enough. By so doing, you will always preserve your place in my best affections, and let me be where I may, I shall think of you with the fondest regard."

"Ah, Charles, when you say that, you know that I would promise you anything in the world. But I ought to have a bridal dress of white, with roses upon it, and my hair should be bound with a silver wreath."

"You will do very well as you are," said Claude. "Recollect that I have no time to stay. My horse—the horse that you know quite well—waits without to take me to London again."

"Oh, yes—yes! I had really quite forgotten that. How foolish I am, to be sure. But I shall soon get better—much better. Did I not always say that you would come, Charles? Ah, I knew you better than they did, for when you told me that you would have me and no other, then I saw the moon look down upon you, and death would have come to you from its silvery beams if you had broken the vow."

"I should have deserved death," said Claude. "But, come, we will have the marriage performed in this very room, if your parents are agreeable."

"We are," said the old couple.

Claude beckoned to Jack to come and play the part of the chaplain; and then Jack, in a low, solemn voice, said,—

"I presume there is a book of prayers in the house?"

"Yes, sir," said the father. "I will fetch you one in a moment or two, if you will please to be seated for that space of time."

"That will do," said Jack. "I trust that when this ceremony is over that the young lady will know a peace of mind to which, I fear, she has been for some time a stranger."

"I shall—oh, yes, I shall!" cried the poor bewildered creature. "I know well that I shall. Where is the book of prayers? We are all quite ready, and my Charles has come all the way from London to marry me. You see, mother, that he has come?"

"I do, my dear," said the mother, who was hardly able to speak for emotion; "I do, my dear; and I sincerely hope that his coming will contribute greatly to your happiness, my child."

"I shall be as happy as the day is long. Nay, I fear that I shall be so merry and so full of spirits, now, that you will hardly know me; and I shall feel much better, here." She pressed her hands on her head as she spoke. "And then at night the fearful dreams will not come to me as they used to; and I shall not see fingers pointed at me in my own chamber, nor hear the hideous laughter of creatures that do not belong to this world."

"Hush—hush!" said Claude. He saw that she was getting excited, and that the colour on her cheek was deepening, and he heard that her voice was rising to a high and unwonted pitch. "Hush! It is quite impossible that we should be married now, if you are not much more still than you are, dear one."

She shuddered a little, and then in a low tone, as she crept closer to Claude, she said,—

"Oh, yes, I will be as still as the grave!"

CHAPTER CCLIX.

THE SINGULAR MARRIAGE TAKES PLACE, AND A STRANGE VISITOR ARRIVES.

THESE last words of the unhappy girl were spoken evidently under great terror that Claude would leave her again; and after a moment or two she looked up into his face with a glance of great sadness, and said,—

"I am not mad!"

The words seemed to be spoken as much in the light of a question as an assertion of sincerity; but Claude Duval thought proper to say all he could to reassure her.

"Mad!" he replied. "Oh, no—no! I am sure that no one can possibly call you mad. It is too absurd, that. You are quite as sane as any of us; and here comes a servant with the prayer-book, no doubt; and the chaplain here will at once unite us."

"Oh, yes—yes! That is joy, indeed!"

An old servant who had been dispatched to the library for a book of common-prayer, now made his appearance, and it was placed in the hands of Jack, who, partly from a feeling of superstition which would cling to him, and partly from pity for the unhappy young creature whom it became necessary to deceive for her own peace, looked as serious every bit as though he had been a real clergyman called in upon the spur of the moment to perform the ceremony.

"Now, Reverend Sir," said Claude, "we are perfectly ready if you please. Pray proceed with the ceremony."

Claude meant this as a hint to Jack to get it over as quickly as he could, and Jack replied—

"Take your places. I, too, am quite ready."

They all half-surrounded him in a kind of half circle, and Jack, in an impressive tone, read the marriage service. The formalities were all gone through with great gravity, and, finally, Jack closed the book, and with a slight inclination of his head, said—

"May the marriage be a blessed one, and produce all the good which every one here present hopes and expects from it."

"Amen!" said the father.

The young girl now turned to Claude, and with a shriek of joy she fell into his arms.

"Joy, joy!" she said. "I am indeed a wife. No more can the finger of scorn be pointed at me to drive me mad. I am a wife—I am your wife, Charles!"

"You are, my dear one; and now remember what I was compelled to tell you before this marriage took place. My horse is at the gate!"

She burst into tears and sobbed bitterly.

"And must you go? And must you really leave me? My own, my husband!"

"I must, indeed."

"It is imperative," said Jack.

"There cannot possibly be any delay," said Dick.

The young creature could not speak for her tears; and as a tray, with wine and other refreshments, was brought in, the father spoke to her.

"Now, my dear, let me hope that although the military duties of your husband call him away from you, that you will feel a calmness and a peace of mind to which you have long been a stranger, and that we shall all feel happier——"

"Oh, yes, yes, father," she said, interrupting him, "and I will write a long letter every day to Charles."

"Nay," said Claude, "you must not attempt to do that, for I shall be so short a time probably at one place, that it is doubtful if any of such letters would at all reach me."

"But you will write to me?"

"Do not expect it. You know the life of a soldier is one that scarcely may be said to belong to himself. Rest content that you are my wife, and that I will come to you as soon as my military duties will permit me."

"Yes, madam," said Jack, "that is just the fact; and I can only assure you that even in coming here now to render you that tardy justice which he felt conscientiously compelled to render to you, my gallant young friend here is commiting a breach of duty."

"And, therefore, must go at once," said the father.

"I am ready," said Claude, who took it now into his head that the father seemed rather anxious to get rid of him. "I am ready; my horse is at the gate."

He moved towards the door, but with a shriek, the girl followed him.

"No—no, not yet!—Oh, not yet!"

"Nay, but——"

"Oh, do not say me nay! You will take one cup of wine with us before you go.—Father, where is the cup of gold, that we consider the cup of honour? Where is it, father? Fill it for him who is entitled to it."

"It is here," said the father, as he handed a handsomely chased gold cup to Claude. "Drink sir, and then, as you must leave us, a short leave-taking is the best."

A loud ringing of the bell at this moment struck on the ears of the whole party.

"What is that?" said Dick.

"The great bell at the gate," said the father. "It is only some visitor for me; but the servants will show him into one of the other rooms. We shall not be intruded upon."

"I don't know that," said Claude. "Some one comes, that is quite clear."

The sound of a footstep approaching the room now came clearly upon all their ears.

"This is vexatious," said Jack. "Who can it be?"

"Let it be whom it may," said the poor blighted girl, "let it be whom it may, they shall congratulate me upon my marriage, and they will be the first to know of it."

The door was flung open, and a gentleman walked into the room, crying out as he did so—

"Well, old friend, how are you? You see that I have at last fulfilled my promise of coming down here for a little while, from the cares of my affairs in town, to——Oh, I beg your pardon; you have company!"

"Yes," said the girl, stepping forward, and holding Claude firmly by the cuff of the coat. "This, Sir John, is my husband?"

"Your husband?"

"Yes," said the father. "This is the husband of our dear girl, Sir John, and as you are a magistrate of London, I only wish you had been here to sanction with your presence the ceremony."

"The devil you do!"

"Yes—yes. Hush! All's right. Hem! Oh, yes."

"Why, what on earth is the meaning of all this? What is all this nodding and winking about, eh? What does it mean? What do you want me to do or say?"

"Nothing—nothing!"

"Oh, nothing!" cried everybody.

"Nothing at all," said Dick, "Now, I think, we will go."

As Dick spoke, he sidled to the door of the room, but the magistrate, with sudden vehemence, cried out—

"Why, old friend, are these gentlemen acquaintances of yours?"

"Oh, yes—yes."

"Well, if ever I saw Richard Turpin, the highwayman, in all my life, and I have had him twice before me, and he robbed me once upon the Fulham Road, here he is!"

Everybody was profoundly still for a few moments, and then the father, as he clasped his hands together, said—

"A highwayman? Oh, no—no!"

"But I say yes. I don't know the others, but this is the famous Dick Turpin, the highwayman, I will be upon my oath."

"Oh, my dear, sir," said Dick, "you make a very great mistake, indeed. I may be like Turpin, the highwayman; but there are in the world the most extraordinary likenesses."

"There are, indeed, my friend, and I can only say, that yours is so extraordinary a one to Turpin, that if you ride into London, the authorities will hang you on the strength of it."

"This is insulting!" said Claude. "I will now leave this house at once with my friends. Farewell dear wife—farewell, until we have the happiness of meeting you."

"Charles, Charles, must you indeed go?"

"Indeed I must. Jack, where has that Sir John gone?"

The magistrate had hastily left the room.

"Danger!" said Dick, as he took a small double-barrelled pistol from his pocket, and shook the powder in the pan. "Danger, most certainly, by all that's interesting!"

"This comes," said Jack, "of going out of one's way to do a kind thing by any one."

"Do not say that," said Claude. "I will not regret that I went out of my way for such a purpose. Good-by, dear."

Claude kissed the girl, and then darted to the door of the room. Jack and Dick had already left it, and stood in the passage beyond it with a pistol in each of their hands.

"All's right," said Claude. "Don't make any noise."

The father followed them hastily.

"Oh, tell me," he said, "tell me truly who and what you really are?"

"A highwayman," said Claude, "and my name is Claude Duval."

"Claude Duval, the highwayman?"

"The same. But do not you join all the world in abusing me, or I have tried to do you some good, as I think you will admit, and I leave your house, taking nothing with me but my danger. If you wish to do me a good turn in requital of the trouble I have taken to restore your child to peace of mind, have our horses taken care of, and let us at once mount and be off."

"You shall—you shall. Oh, if I could only see my friend, Sir John, and tell him that I would have no sort of interference with you in my house, all might yet be well."

At this moment the magistrate made his appearance, followed by a man with a remarkably large face, who had such a cunning expression that it was quite fearful to look at him.

"Now, Stevens," said the magistrate, "I have often heard you say you knew every highwayman and cracksman in and about London. Look at these three gentlemen, and just tell me who they are."

"Oh dear, yes, sir, I will; hum! ha! Oh, dear me. Oh! oh!"
"Why, what's the matter with you?"
"Nothing, Sir John; oh dear, nothing at all!"
"Then who are they?"
"Must I speak, Sir John?"

CLAUDE BARGAINS WITH THE GIPSY FOR CONCEALMENT IN THE CAMP.

"To be sure; I order you."
"Then, Sir John, that ere one that's rather big is Claude Duval, and that other one is Dick Turpin, and that other one there in the shade is either Sixteen-string Jack's ghost, or Sixteen-string Jack himself."
"The devil they are!" said Sir John.

Upon this, Claude Duval stepped forward, and holding his pistol, that he had taken from his bosom, carelsssly in his hand, he said,—

"Now, sir, I think I know you; you are Sir John Richards the magistrate, and I think I likewise know your very cunning friend here, Mr. Stevens. He and I have encountered once before, when I made his rather long face an inch or two longer. Now, gentlemen, you both know who we are, and it is difficult to conceive that you should know so much without likewise knowing a little more."

"And pray what is that?" said the magistrate.

"Simply, that we are not the sort of men to give up easily, and that when we are three and you only two, it don't look a very likely proposition that you should apprehend us."

"But it's my duty to do so."

"Oh, dear me, Sir John," said Stevens, "that's all very fine. The duty of everybody, Sir John, is to take care of his own skin, and to see that his own bones are safe. If I might humbly advise, Sir John, I should say—let 'em go."

"That I cannot do, Stevens. I order you to take these men into custody immediately, and if you are resisted, you are authorised, you know well, to call upon every one in the king's name to assist you in the capture. If you should come by a violent end in the affair, I will take care that honourable mention is made of you afterwards, and your death will be a shining example to other officers in all time to come."

"Oh, dear," said Stevens, "don't mention it, Sir John. I'd a great deal rather shine in life than in death."

"Do you refuse, then?"

"I decline, Sir John, I decline."

Claude laughed.

"Upon my word, Stevens," he said "you have much more discretion than your master here, and I admire you very much for it, and will do you a good turn if I have ever the opportunity. I am particularly anxious that there should not be a disturbance in the house. Good-day, Sir John, good-day. Keep your temper, Sir John."

CHAPTER CCLX.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS ARE BETRAYED BY THE GIPSIES.

The advice to keep his temper with which Claude favoured the magistrate, seemed, by the appearance of that personage, to be very much needed, for he was beginning to get red in the face. No doubt, the idea of being so near the effecting of three such important captures, and yet missing them, was very galling to the magistrate.

The father of the poor maddened girl plucked Claude by the sleeve, saying,—

"This way—this way. Come away, for the love of Heaven!"

"Yes," said Claude. "My horse?"

"It is here; follow me. My poor girl is rapidly getting ready to ride after you, and the only thing to stop her, is to convince her that you are gone. Come, oh, come!"

"I am as willing as possible," said Claude. "It was your friend, Sir John, here, who detained me. Good-day, Stevens."

"Good-day to you, Claude Duval," said Stevens. "I dare say you and I will meet again at some time or another, and then, let who will get the better of it, there need be no malice."

"None in the least, Stevens. Farewell."

Duval hastily followed the father, and Jack and Dick, who by no means had expected that the affair would have gone off so quietly, kept close to him. The magistrate sat down in one of the hall chairs, and fanned himself with his hat, while Stevens rubbed his great, rough hands together, and looked at him.

"A nice article you are, Mr. Stevens."

"Thank you, Sir John—Hem! Ha! Wait a bit, Sir John."

"What for?"

"Just to keep our brains in their proper places. Lord bless you, Sir John, that Duval, who is a civil enough fellow till he is put very much out of his way, would no more have scrupled to blow your brains out than he would to tread on a fly."

"You don't mean that, Stevens? I don't think I ever heard of a magistrate's brains being blown out."

"Yours, then, Sir John, would have made a beginning."

"The deuce they would!"

"Yes, Sir John, and no mistake at all, Sir John; but—but——"

Mr. Stevens crept closer to the magistrate, and in a mysterious whisper he said—

"I'll nab 'em."

"'You will?"

'Safe, Sir John. I'll nab 'em. Lord bless you, Sir John, it's all right; only, if we can nab 'em without any danger, it will be just as well, you know. I'll do it; but—but——"

"What the deuce are you making those abominable faces for? What do you mean by grinning at me like an old pole-cat, and saying nothing but—'But—but?'"

"Oh, Sir John! Oh, dear! Oh—Hem! If I do nab 'em, what am I to get Sir John—how much? That is the question, Sir John."

"Oh, it is, is it? Then you don't feel inclined to do it in a politic sort of way, and for the benefit of society?'

"Society may be robbed, and murdered, and d——"

"Hush! Don't let me hear such language, Stevens. I undertake, that if you take those three desperadoes into custody, you shall have the whole of the reward offered, as well as being highly recommended to the Secretary of State.'

"Oh, well—hem! it's as good as done now, Sir John; and so I will be off at once, and if anything should happen to me that I don't expect at all, why it will be nothing at all to nobody, for I'm a single man, and nobody cares for me, and I never cared for any one, that's a comfort. Hem—ha! Oh, dear!"

Mr. Stevens rubbed his hands again together, and then glided out of the hall.

"He'll have 'em," said the magistrate, "I feel that he will have 'em as sure as fate; he is quite a wonderful man is that Stevens, and have 'em he will, and the world will be rid of three fellows that make the roads perfectly unsafe. I am afraid to go five miles out of London myself with a penny-piece more than is just sufficient to pay the tolls."

While this little interesting conversation was going on between Sir John Richards and his man Stevens, Claude and his friends had been conducted by the father of the insane young lady to the garden, where sure enough their horses were, apparently ready for the road again.

"We are safe," said Jack, as he at once mounted, "I feel that we are safe now."

"Yes," said Dick, as he too sprung into the saddle. "I feel now all right, and can laugh at the danger we have passed."

"Not so can I," said Claude.

"Indeed, and why not?"

"You do not know that man, Stevens, as I know him. He is one of the most consummately cunning fellows that ever stepped, and I feel as confident as though he had himself told me of it, that he has some scheme on hand to take us. That it may fail, no doubt, and that by courage and resolution we may defeat, it. I will not for a moment doubt; but that he has such a scheme, take up your minds. And now, sir, allow me to bid you good day, and I sincerely hope you will not think the less of what little good we may have done your child, because we happen to be what we are—Knights of the Road."

"No," said the father, "and I can only say, that if either of you get into any trouble or difficulty, I hope and trust you will write to me, and all that is in my power will be done for you, in spite of my friend Sir John Richards."

"Thank you, sir. Farewell!"

Jack and Dick likewise made their farewells, and then they all three trotted across the meadow at the back of the garden, and soon reached the lane with the gate at the end of it, by the spot where Claude had been at first so much surprised by the kind of salutation he had got from the young lady.

"Hurrah!" cried Dick. "I, for one, defy Mr. Stevens, and all his meshes. I am mounted, and my bonny Black Bess will carry me through the flimsy cobwebs of his devices."

"Don't make too sure," said Claude.

"You alarm me, Claude," said Jack. "It is so seldom that you indulge in any forebodings, that you thoroughly alarm me when you do. Tell us what you think this cunning Stevens will attempt."

"I only wish I could, Jack. If I could tell that, I should not feel the slightest shadow of uneasiness about it, for when once you know so much, all the cunning of the scheme is lost, and open violence only remains, of which we are not afraid."

"But," interposed Dick, "you don't mean, Claude, to say now, in sober conscience, that you think this fellow, Stevens, can do anything that we need care about?"

"We shall see," said Claude. "He is the only man in the police who has what one may call a diabolically inventive genius, and one never can calculate upon what he is about."

"Then, in the name of all that's abominable, let us leave him as far behind us as possible. Put your horses to speed, and let us have a five mile canter."

"Agreed—agreed. Be it so."

They all three upon this set off at good speed, and the five mile canter that they promised themselves would very soon have been accomplished, but for rather an untoward accident occurring to prevent it.

They thought that it would be decidedly their best plan to take a route across the country by the lanes, so as to get into quite another line of high road as early as possible, and they had got about a mile and a half of the distance, when Dick suddenly pulled up, crying out in an alarmed voice—

"Hilloa! what is this?"

"What's what?" said Claude Duval, as he on the instant stopped his horse. "What do you mean, Dick?"

"The worst meaning ever I had in all my life. My Bess is dead lame."

"Lame?"

"Yes, to be sure. I have been suspecting it for the last half-mile, only I was so loth to believe it, that I did not like to pull-up; but I can no longer disguise the fact from myself, now that lame she is to all intents and purposes."

"Perhaps it's only a stone in the foot."

"I hope so."

Dick hastily dismounted and lifted, one by one, the feet of his mare.

"No," he said, "there is no stone, and I can't see anything amiss. It is, after all, just possible that she was doing it for fun. It may have been nothing, after all."

"Or, perhaps," said Jack, "a stone, which fell out the moment you changed her pace. Mount again, Dick, and let us be off."

"I will—I will."

Dick was in the saddle again in a minute, and then it became but too painfully evident, that the horse could not or would not move faster than a painful kind of walk. Before any comment could be made upon such a remarkable occurrence, Jack called out,—

"Why, my horse is taken in just the same sort of way. It is as lame as it well can be in all four feet."

"And mine," said Claude Duval, with all the coolness in the world; "so here we are at a dead fix."

"But what is the meaning of it, Claude? Are the horses bewitched? Are we to believe in necromancy, and evil eyes, and all that sort of thing? How else do you account for it, Duval?"

"Stevens!"

"What?"

"Stevens," repeated Claude, in the coolest way in the world, as if the affair really did not much matter to him. "Stevens."

"The devil!" said Dick.

Jack pulled a very long face.

'And so, Claude, you really think that we owe the lameness of our cattle to that cunning fellow, Stevens the officer?"

"There's no sort of doubt of it, Jack. It is a piece of his most infernal management to keep us about the neighbourhood until he can get together a sufficient force to attack us. I did not entertain a doubt for a moment but that he would try something or another."

Dick seemed to be thoroughly bewildered at this catastrophe, for the lameness of his horse, to him, quite amounted to own that he was entirely unable to suggest any mode of escape from the many perils that surrounded them. Jack almost shook, as he thought that this was only the commencement of the scheme by which that prince of wily officers, Stevens, was going to circumvent them.

"Claude—Claude," he cried. "Are you thinking of what to do? Shall we yet look to you for our means of escaping from this most dreadful dilemma."

"I hope so," said Claude, rousing himself. "We are not going to give in if we were all struck lame ourselves, as well as our horses. Let us lead them on at once—it is the only thing we can do, and trust to reaching some place of shelter as soon as possible. We are well armed, and it shall cost Mr. Stevens and his friends dear, if they make an attack upon us. They may prevent us from escaping, if they like."

"Yes," said Dick, "they have done that, but it is questionable if that is not about the worst thing they could have done us, as far as regards their own safety."

"We will fight to the last."

"Hush," said Jack. "Don't talk about fighting, just now; of course, if it comes to the worst, we will fight; but cunning is best met by cunning. Wait a bit while I look thoroughly at the horses' feet. It will be a great thing to find how and why they are lamed."

"It will—it will. Look your best, Jack, and you don't find it out, nobody will, that's one comfort."

Jack took one of his horse's feet in his lap, and with his handkerchief he carefully brushed from the hoof all the dust that it had collected from the road; after which, he felt it carefully, and then he said—

"Oh, here it is!"

"What?—where?" cried Dick and Claude in a breath.

"Here," added Jack. "A small piece of some adhesive kind of substance, no doubt impregnated with something very irritable to a horse's foot. Here it is, not, as you see, larger than a sixpence; but I had the greatest difficulty to get it off, it stuck so hard."

While Claude and Dick could hardly find words to vent their indignation in, Jack took from the off-foreleg hoof of each of their horses, a similar little plaster to what he had found upon his own, and the mystery of the lameness was discovered.

"What it is I don't know," said Jack, "but it has so much inflamed the feet of the horses, that they are only fit for rest and a poultice a-piece on the foot, now.

I don't think the mischief will last, as we have luckily found it out rather promptly."

"Oh, if I catch that fellow," said Dick, between his clenched teeth, "I should only like to know what was on the little plasters, and make him swallow a pailful of it."

"Hush!" said Claude, "some one comes. Take the horses to the side of the road, Jack. I will meet whoever it is."

"And I with you," said Dick.

"No, Dick, one is best. It is but a single footstep that I hear. Be assured that if I want assistance I will call to you. In fact, you will hear what passes."

"So I shall."

The person who was approaching turned out to be a gipsy boy driving a miserable-looking ass. At sight of Claude Duval, he stopped and seemed rather hesitating about whether it would be safe to advance or not. Once, too, he glanced over his shoulder, as though there was danger behind him, which made it a most important point with him whether it were better to advance or retreat.

"Come on, my lad," said Claude, who saw his hesitation. "Come on. There's nothing to fear. All's right with us."

Upon being thus encouraged, the gipsy boy came on, but in proportion as his fears of the persons towards whom he was advancing diminished, he showed more alarm at some undefined danger in the rear, for he kept glancing behind him with looks of terror mingled with anger and rage.

"What's the matter, boy?" said Claude; "you don't seem to be very well pleased at something?"

"How should I be pleased?" said the boy. "Are blows with the thong of a whip pleasing, because you can't tell what you don't know?"

"Certainly not; but you don't mean to say that any one has been serving you in that fashion, do you?"

"I do mean to say it, and I say more, which is, that I will have my revenge!"

The boy was passing on, but Claude stopped him, and placing a small coin in his hand, he said—

"Tell me who it is that has served you in such a way, and if you are so anxious for revenge, who knows but I may help you?"

CHAPTER CCLXI.

CLAUDE FINDS THAT THE APPEARANCE OF SAFETY IS NOT THE REALITY.

THESE words of Claude's seemed to have some effect upon the boy, for he at once stopped, and throwing the rope of hay, which formed the only halter he had for the ass, over his arm, he said—

"You will help me to revenge?"

"I think so. But there's no harm done if I cannot. You must tell me how it was, and who it was that cut you with the whip."

The boy turned his flashing eyes in the direction that he had come, and raising his arm, he said—

"At the other end of the lane, are twelve men on horseback, well armed. They are waiting for some one to lead them on in search of some highwaymen, so they said, and when I got up to them and would have passed on in peace, they asked me if I had seen three men on lame horses, and of course I had not, and told them so; but they would have it that the words of my mouth were lies, and they lashed me with their whips."

"Ah," cried Jack, "this is worth knowing."

Claude made a sign to Jack to be silent, and then he addressed the boy, saying—

"Tell me who and what you are, for upon that knowledge will depend whether I can help you to your revenge or not."

"I am a gip."

"That I see; but how comes it that you are alone? It is seldom that one of your people is met in this way. Where is your tribe, boy?—or have you none?"

"None? Where is the true gip without his fellows? I am not alone. Will you trust yourself upon this old bank with me?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Come on, then."

With wonderful agility, the gipsy boy made a kind of a rush at the bank by the side of the lane, and gained the top of it, where there grew a think hedge of blackthorn, alders, and many other indigenous shrubs, through which it was impossible to catch a glimpse beyond; but the young gipsy, with practised skill, dashed aside the branches until he made a clear space, and then he cried—

"Behold! In yonder valley by the sparkling water-course that at times borrows light and beauty from the sun of other climes, is my tribe—my people!"

Claude looked in the direction indicated by the young gipsy, and at some distance off, in a picturesque hollow, he saw the brown and ragged tents of the wanderers, and a thin wreath of blue smoke rising above the surrounding vegetation, as though to mark the spot.

"The boy watched his eyes, and then said—

"You see them?"

"I do."

Claude at once sprang down again from the hedge, and approaching Jack and Dick, he said in a low tone—

"What say you to asking of the hospitality of the gipsies for a while? I am sure that this boy knows some hidden and secure path to their encampment, and they will do anything for money. We will pay them well; and it is so essential that our horses should be in some place for safety, that I can get over all the risks of the application on the score of the chances of its success."

"It is a risk," said Dick.

"Yes," said Jack, "as regards the gipsies, it just comes to this, that you are either when with them as safe as they can possibly make you, or they will betray you to a certainty."

"What motive can they have to betray us?" said Claude Duval. "If they think at all, and have any feeling upon the subject of our position in society, that feeling ought to be in our favour."

"True."

"Then, shall I speak to the boy about it?"

"Use your own judgment, Claude," said Jack, "and I will follow you. If you think that it is the best chance for us, I'll believe it really is, and will brave all the risks of it."

"So will I," said Dick. "The falling lame of my horse, has placed me in such a predicament, that I am willing for anything that promises her a night's rest, poor thing."

"There is one thing," said Jack, "that looks well in this affair. We have found out so soon the mischief that Claude's friend, Stevens, did, that it cannot be very great, and a poultice to the horses' feet during the night will, in all probability, make them right by the morning."

"Then risk the gips," said Dick.

"What poultice would you use for the horses' feet, Jack?" said Claude.

"Ah, it's as well I should tell you what to do, in case anything should happen to me, Claude."

"Nay, Jack, nothing was further from my thoughts than the attempt to provide against such a contingency."

"I know that; I did but jest. But yet I will tell you both. You must pluck a handful of the flowering mallow, or marsh-mallow, as it is called, and pound it down as well as you can, with a small quantity of warm water. The juice will be quite green, and you must soak a rag doubled three times in it and apply it to the hurt in the horse's foot."

"Thank you, Jack; and that will cure it?" said Dick.

"It will. If it don't, it's a kind of hurt that horse never had before in all my experience."

"Then I will speak to the boy at once," said Claude, "since we are so far agreed about it."

He then stepped back to the hedge, from which the boy had now jumped, and was carelessly holding the halter that was around the ass's neck.

"Listen to me," said Claude Duval. "Your people have no objection to money. You have found out its value in all lands, and when the hand of sickness is upon any of you, you know well that money is your best friend."

"It is."

"When you want to cross the sea, too, you must have money; for although upon land you can take up the staff, and pack up your tents, and walk through the wilderness, the sea stops you, and you must pay money to those that have ships to transport you to the south."

"That is true."

"Very well, then; I and my two friends want to be concealed until to-morrow morning. Will your tribe, do you think, enable us to do so, by hiding us among them?"

The boy considered for a moment or two, and then he said—

"Yes. The tribe will do it. There is the consent of but one to ask; it is our queen. She is with us now."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. Her name is Zahara, and her home is the plains of Lower Egypt, but she is here now, and she will consent."

"Quick—quick!" cried Dick. "I am certain that I hear the sound of horses' feet in the lane, Claude."

"And so do I," said Jack.

The gipsy boy flung himself down upon the ground, and laid his ear close to it for a moment. Then, springing to his feet again, he said—

"They come. Follow me at once."

"And our horses?" said Dick. "We cannot leave them."

"The horse will be safe with its rider. Come on."

The lad immediately led the way along the lane until they came to a portion of it where there was a gate leading into a field. It appeared to be fastened, but the gipsy boy had found out a means of lifting it from its hinges, so that the party could pass through it with the greatest ease. Immediately upon the other side of the gate was one of those mysterious, double hedgerows, which are common enough in some parts of the country of England, and which look as though they had at one time been well-kept paths, but by the establishment of some other and better road, had been suffered to go to vegetation, and to become completely wild with weeds and trees and bushes again.

It was down this double hedge-row that the gipsy boy led the three friends and their horses.

In some places their route was so overgrown with weeds, and so interlaced by the long prickly arms of the blackberry, that it was no easy thing to get along, and more than once Claude Duval had to take out his knife and cut away some obstructing branch of a bush before they could get past.

"Will this lead us to the encampment of your people?" said Claude to the boy.

"It will," he replied. "It is the way we come and go; but a man can easily make his way through this tangled brake when a horse cannot. It is awkward for the cattle; but we shall soon be through it now."

This lane—for such it might really be called, although it had evidently been completely abandoned for many years—was about a quarter of a mile in extent, and finally ended in a spot where the grass and the tall rushes sufficiently evidenced there was abundance of water. In fact, as the adventurers trod upon the ground it yielded to them, and the impression of each footstep rapidly filled up with water.

CLAUDE LIBERATING HIS FRIENDS FROM THE LO K UP.

"Why, this is a regular swamp," said Dick.

"We shall soon be out of it," said the boy. "Follow me."

The ground now rose a little, and the boy led the way around the slope of a little eminence, when suddenly upon rounding a clump of three tall trees, the party came right upon the gip y encampment.

The sight that now presented itself was singular in the extreme. The encampment consisted of about a dozen tents, and occupied a space of ground of considerable extent. A group of naked children were playing before the entrance of the nearest tent, and upon the sudden arrival of the strangers, some very singular kind of horn was blown, which made a harsh screaming sort of noise.

Immediately upon this, there emerged from some of the other tents several men, who, with looks of anger, seemed to demand what the intruders wanted there.

"Wait here," said the boy. "I must go and explain what you have said to the people. Do not move from this spot, I pray you."

"We will not."

The boy left them, and to every man he met, he muttered something in the singular patois of the people, and each one to whom he spoke followed him, and they all made their way to a rather larger tent than the others, and which stood somewhat apart.

"Well," said Dick to Claude, "it is just possible we may be safe here. How much do you intend to offer them?"

"Oh, I shall ask them to name their price."

"It will be cheap at anything," said Jack, "if we can but get a night's rest and safety for the horses in this place."

The consultation in the larger tent did not appear to last very long, for the boy was seen coming back to the strangers rapidly. Upon reaching them, he spoke quickly.

"All is well," he said. "The gips do want money, and they will get it from those who are not of their people. Come on."

"Then our proposal is accepted?" said Claude.

"It is. Follow me."

The boy led the way, and the three adventurers followed him at once, each leading his horse, and it was a mortifying thing to them all to see that at each step it was quite evident the horses got worse and worse on their feet, so that it was really no easy matter to get them along at all. The boy paused at the entrance to the larger tent, and shouted out something in a language that neither of the friends had the least conception of.

Through a slit in the canvas, then, a hand was projected, grasping a bottle, which in a moment was cast to the ground and broken.

"That will do," said the boy. "Come away. You will be well and properly provided for."

"But what was the meaning of breaking a bottle at the sight of us?" said Claude.

"Merely to signify that until the pieces united again of themselves, we would not give you up to your enemies."

"Very well, that is all right."

A couple of men, now, without speaking a word, began to erect a rough tent. When it was finished, one of them said—

"It is for the beasts. Perhaps you will not disdain to join the fireside of the poor gip?"

"Certainly not," said Claude. "We would rather be with you than away from you. But, I tell you candidly, that we expect the officers of the police are in pursuit of us, and we must, in case they come here, be hidden in some way."

"Our people," said another of the men, "are over the wold now, and we shall have due notice of the approach of any one. It will be time enough then to look for hiding places."

"But you have come to no understanding as to what we must give you," said Claude.

"That we must leave to you," said the man. "We can see many things; but not into the fugitive's pocket."

"Very well; we will be as liberal to you as we can, and I do not think you will lose anything by leaving to us your reward."

The three horses were now led into the tent that had been prepared for them, and Jack at once set about his preparations for curing their feet. As he had come along the lane between the tall hedges, he had been able to gather as much of the marsh mallow as he wanted, so that he was quite prepared to commence operations at once, and in the course of a quarter of an hour, he had, by the assistance of Claude and Dick, made the horses comfortable enough.

The gipsies looked on in silence; but it was evident that they were interested greatly in what was going on. When everything was done for the cattle that could be, Claude said—

"Now we are ready to sit down in your tents, and to partake of such hospitality as you may be able to afford us."

"Strangers," said one of the gipsies, whom they had not seen before, but who seemed to be in some sort of authority in the tribe. "Strangers, it so happens that the present period with us is one of ceremony connected with our ancient faith, and we must not eat nor drink with the children of another people."

"Very well," said Claude, "as you please; but I was not aware that there were any particular periods in your faith, if you have any which make such a rule imperative."

"We have a faith."

"Pardon me. I had no intention of offending you by making the remark at all. I merely spoke of my own ignorance. That was all."

"It matters not. Come on."

The gipsy went before, and halting at the door of a tent, he said something in his own language, and then holding aside the torn and dirty canvas of which the tent was composed, he added in English—

"Enter."

The three friends stooped and entered the tent, in which there was a miscellaneous assemblage of the tribe, to the number of sixteen or seventeen, only three or four women being of the party.

CHAPTER CCLXII.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS LIGHT UPON EVIL TIMES.

The gipsies seemed to be all talking together as Claude and his companions entered the tent, and it was astonishing to note the little attention which the arrival of the new comers created.

The man who had played the part of their conductor to that tent, showed them some rough seats made from boughs of wood, and there was likewise a kind of table similarly constructed.

"Sit here," he said, "for although the gipsy may not eat nor drink with the Nazarene at this time, he will make him welcome in his house."

Claude glanced at Dick rather uneasily, and Dick inclining towards him, said in a whisper—

"Is there anything amiss?"

"I don't know that there is; but I don't like the idea of their refusing to eat or drink with us."

"Nor I," said Jack.

They all three spoke in such low tones that it was quite impossible the gipsies could overhear what they said. But yet they found that many an inquiring glance was bent upon them, and in the flashing of the dark eyes that succeeded them, Claude found there was more of cunning and mystery than of cordial welcome.

Whatever, however, might be his opinion of the character of the gipsy tribe he had got among, he, Claude, felt that it would be a most dangerous thing now to manifest anything in the shape of mistrust, so he only made up his mind to keep as wide awake as possible.

"We have nothing to offer you but water from the spring, and some cold victuals," said one of the men to Claude.

"That will do."

Upon this, a jug of water was placed before them, and a wooden bowl containing a not very dainty collection of the leavings of some dinner-table.

Dick shook his head. "The water for me," he said, "and as for the eatables, I think we can leave them for our friends the gips."

"With all my heart," said Claude, "they don't look very tempting."

At this moment a loaf of bread was flung into the tent on to the floor, and one of the gipsies, pointing to it, said to Jack—

"If you want bread, take it."

"You don't call that," said Dick, "the politest way in the world of handing a bit of a loaf to a gentleman?"

"Never mind," said Jack. "Never mind."

"Oh, but I do though," said Dick, as he lifted the loaf from the ground, and with almost the force of a cannon-shot, threw it back again out of the tent.

"We don't want any, thank you," he cried.

A howl outside showed that the loaf had hit some one, and the gipsies looked scowlingly at their guests.

"You have but yourselves to thank," said Dick, "for this. The only civil thing we could do was to follow your example; and as you threw the loaf at us to know if we wanted it, we had no resourse but to throw it back again, if we did not."

"Quite right," said the gipsy who appeared to have authority ever his companions. "It is quite right. Nothing can be possibly better, and we take no sort of offence at anything so very natural as your conduct."

Both Jack and Claude regretted that Dick had been so hasty upon the occasion; but since it was done, it could not be undone, and theytneither of them liked to say a word to him about it.

They all three drank the water in the jug, and then one of the gipsies came up to the table and said—

"Are you done with that?" pointing to the jug.

"Quite," said Claude. "It is at your service."

Without another word, the man took up the jug, and opening the canvas at the entrance of the tent, he flung it as far as he could, and when it fell, of course it was smashed to atoms.

"Well," said Dick, "upon my word we have got among very delightful company, indeed, I rather think."

"Hush," said Claude. "Let them have their own way. It is just possible enough that they have some religious ceremonies of their own which compel them in the fanaticism of the moment to behave in this way to us. But our stay will be short among them."

"The shorter the better," said Jack. "But see, we are nearly alone."

The gipsies one by one had left the tent, until there were but a man and a woman remaining, and they, too, were going towards the entrance of it, when Claude spoke—

"We will walk out of the tent," he said, "into the air, if you require it for any purpose. We have no wish to dispossess you."

Without a word in reply to this speech, which certainly required one, from its courtesy, the man and woman left the tent, and the three friends were alone completely.

"Well," said Dick, "I don't like this sort of thing at all. What do you think of it, Claude?"

"Be careful, Dick. We are surrounded but by walls of thin and tattered canvas, recollect; and every word we say is, no doubt, listened to. If we accomplish the end we have in view, of procuring safety till the morning, all will be well enough. We will pay them for that, and then we will depart in peace."

"Yes, but I must confess I should have liked a more cordial kind of reception from them. I wonder, too, what has become of the boy who brought us here? He seems to have completely disappeared."

"Claude," said Jack, suddenly, and he rose to his feet, "I know you are struggling against the conviction, in your own mind, that things are not as they ought to be here. Speak to us candidly, and say if it be not so."

"It is," said Claude, as he rose. "I will not remain with these people longer. They will not break bread with us, nor eat salt. They are not friends of ours."

"Let us to the horses, then, at once, and get away," said Dick.

"Yes—yes."

At this moment a wild kind of yell came upon their ears from without, and before they could take a step towards the opening of the tent, down it came in one mass of confusion upon them, and they were most completely entangled in the quantity of loose canvas and old rags of which it was composed.

"Betrayed!" cried Claude.

"Lost—oh, lost!" cried Jack.

Dick managed to get one of his pistols out and fired it at random. There was a loud cry, and then all was still for a moment; after which there was a bewildering shout, and a rush of men towards the fallen tent.

In the course of three minutes, Claude, Dick, and Jack were dragged out from the wreck of canvas, and found themselves in the grasp of a couple of officers, who, by the assistance of others who had nothing to do but help them, soon succeeded in handcuffing the whole three of them, and in tying ropes round their legs, so that any attempt to escape was out of the question.

The gipsies raised a wild kind of shout, more like the howling of a band of savages than anything else; and then Mr. Stevens the officer came up to Claude.

"Well, Duval," he said "Hem! Ah! I rather thought I should do it, somehow or another; but I didn't think to do it quite so easy."

"Oh, so this is a trick of yours, is it?"

"Yes, Claude Duval. Hem! I don't bear any malice, you know, and it's all in the way of business, you know, or else I shouldn't have thought of it."

"Oh, don't make any excuses."

"I must just search you, if you please, gentlemen, for your ease, that's all. You see, I was bound to take you, if I could, and so I have, you see. Hem! ha!"

"You are a genius, Stevens."

"Oh, dear, no; I did think you would have suspected that boy with the donkey, that I did."

Claude looked chagrined.

"And so, that was a take-in, was it?" he said.

"Oh, dear, yes. He did it pretty well; but yet I hardly, do you know, expected that it would have answered—A clever youth."

"So clever," said Dick, "that if ever I get hold of him I will put a final stop to his cleverness for the rest of his days."

"Hem! Ha! Oh yes. No doubt."

Poor Jack looked dreadfully cut up at this unexpected capture; but Claude laughed only, and said—

"Why, Jack, this is, after all, only a little resting. They can't keep us, you know that well enough."

"Oh dear! can't we?" said Stevens. "Hem!"

"Claude—Claude," said Jack, "the end has come."

"Not a bit of it," cried Claude. "All's right enough; I don't mean to give in, I assure you. There's plenty of time."

"I fired a pistol," said Dick. "Did I hit any one?"

"Yes," said Stevens. 'One of the gips. A man with a pair of ear-rings on, I believe,"

"Why, that's the very fellow who took us in hand when we came here, and seemed to be a sort of leader among them."

"Oh dear, very likely. Hem! Ha! He is quite dead. The bullet went into his right eye and came out at the back of his head, so it was rather a finisher."

"Well," said Dick, "for a chance shot, it was about the best I ever fired."

Stevens soon possessed himself of all the pistols that had belonged to the highwaymen, with the exception of one that Claude had so well hidden that it escapes even his scrutiny.

"Now, gentlemen," he said, "I beg to inform you that we will take you to London at once in a cart, and if you make any attempt to escape or to be mischievous on the way, I can only say that I shall blow your brains out, as soon as look at you."

"Bravo, Stevens!" said Claude.

"I am not joking."

"No," added Claude, "nor am I; and I tell you what it is, Stevens, you are a very clever fellow, but I still think that you will find yourself in the wrong box, after all."

"In the witness-box at the Old Bailey you mean, and you in the dock."

"Very good—very good! It's all right. Where's your cart?"

"Hem! Ha! You are a nice young man, Claude Duval, and you are a nice man, Dick Turpin, and you are an engaging person, Sixteen-string Jack; but there will be a terrible crowd when you are all three hanged on next Monday come a week. Hem!"

"Look here," said Claude, as he pointed as well as he could with his manacled hands to his head. "I will bet you this against yours, that we are not hung on Monday come a week."

"Bet me what? your head?"

"Yes."

"Done, then, Claude Duval. Hem! Ha! I shall ask the sheriff to let me take my stake, and I dare say there are people who would pay a good price for it."

A wailing cry now arose from a throng of the gipsies that had congregated around the dead body of the one of their tribe who had fallen, and Dick raised his voice, and spoke—

"The reward of treachery!" he said. "The reward of treachery. It has done you a deal of good to sell our blood. There will from this day forth be a curse upon your tribe. I curse it!"

"No—no!" shrieked a female voice.

"Yes," said Dick, "and the curse will stick to you, too, as long as your tribe is a tribe."

Upon this the gipsies made a rush towards Dick, but the officers with the pistols in their hands interposed.

"Dear me," said Stevens, "my good friends, what do you want?"

"His blood!" cried a gipsy. "We must have his blood and place it when the moon is at its full to the east, and then the curse will go from us. It is the curse of blood, and only may be so removed."

"Really, gentlemen," said Stevens, "I am sorry to disoblige you; but this is my prisoner and you must kill and eat me first before you get him; and the first man who attempts to lay a finger upon him, I will send to the other world to keep him company who lies yonder in his gore. Hem! Ha!"

The gipsies shrunk back.

At this moment one of the officers appeared with a cart, and Claude and his friends were placed in it. The gipsies were consulting among each other, and then just as the officers were all mounted and ready to go, there rushed out of the large hut an old hag of a woman, with a piece of scarlet cloth wound round her head, and in a screaming voice she addressed them in their own patois.

Whatever she said had the effect of rousing them to a state of fury and desperation, for catching up what weapons they could upon the spur of the moment, they began to advance threateningly towards the officers who surrounded the cart.

CHAPTER CCLXIII.

THE FIGHT WITH THE GIPSIES.—TREACHERY HAS ITS REWARD.

No doubt after what had happened, the gipsy tribe would have been but too glad, if such a thing had been possible, to have retraced its steps, and instead of bartering with the officers the fugitives for gold, would have felt greater satisfaction in defending the highwaymen, and trusting to their generosity for a recompense.

They had chosen the course, though, and the past was not be recalled. Vengeance for the death of their comrade seemed to be the principal feeling that actuated them.

The officer, Stevens, now, by his cool and courageous conduct, excited the admiration even of his captives. In a clear loud voice he spoke to the gipsies—

"Now listen to me, gipsies. These three men are my prisoners. I have taken some pains to get them, and I mean to keep them. When once I take a prisoner, I never part with him till I get a receipt for him from the proper authorities, and I warn you all that I will defend them to the last drop of my blood; and as I happen to know that my comrades here are of the same way of thinking, the most prudent thing you can do is to be as quiet as possible."

"Revenge!" cried the gipsies. "Blood for blood! It is the law of our old religion, and we will carry it out. Blood for blood!—A life for a life!"

"Hem! Very good, gentlemen. Come on, then."

With a frantic yell, which had the effect of rather frightening the officers' horses, the gipsies made a rush towards the cart in which the prisoners were, for the purpose of getting possession of Dick; and there can be very little doubt but that if they had succeeded, his life would not have been worth a moment's purchase.

The gipsies, however, had to do with men of cool nerves and steady valour—men who, with arms in their hands, knew they could hold their way, and who were not to be intimidated.

"Steady," said Stevens. "Steady."

The officers stood firm.

"Fire!" said Stevens.

In a volley, the pistols of the officers were discharged, and the rabble rout of the gipsies reeled back.

Again, then, there rose the shriek for vengeance, and those who had escaped from injury from the first volley, again rushed forward.

"Fire!" said Stevens; and again the officers sent a fearful volley among their assailants.

The smoke cleared away, and the gipsies were in full flight, with the exception of some dozen dead and dying, who lay upon the ground, deserted by the others.

"That will do," said Stevens. "They would have it, and now they have got it. We are for London."

The gipsies were evidently too much sickened of the affairs to attempt to rally again; and so, without any further molestation, the officers turned round and began to make their way towards the nearest high road.

"Well," said Claude, "this is a pretty affair, Mr. Stevens."

"Yes—Hem! Rather."

"It is not for us to regret it, for those rascals deserved amply all they have got, that is quite clear enough. They are a bad lot."

"Oh, very bad, indeed," said Stevens.

"And pray, what did you give them for betraying us, if it's a fair question, Mr. Stevens?"

"I don't mind telling you in confidence, Claude Duval, but, of course, you musn't let it go any further—that they agreed to do the job for five pounds."

"Five pounds?"

"Yes; that was all they got, and I paid them beforehand. It has cost some ten or twelve of them their lives, and you your liberty, and will hang you three shortly, and will put a good round sum in my pocket."

"And all for five pounds?" said Claude.

"Yes, it's cheap. Hem! Ha! Very cheap, indeed," said Stevens, as though he were speaking to somebody who really had no more concern in the affair than just to come to a passing opinion upon it.

"The price of blood should be rather high," said Claude. "To sell three lives for five pounds is too little."

"I said it was cheap."

"Too cheap to be good. Mr. Stevens, you may depend it will not answer. I shall win my wager of your head."

"Oh, dear no, you musn't do any such thing. You can easily imagine that I could not do without it in my business."

"Oh, that don't matter to me in the least."

"Certainly not; and I don't at all expect you to take that into consideration for a moment. But there is Sir John Richards. I told him if he waited just at that corner that I would bring you to him."

It was galling to Claude Duval to hear Stevens talk in such a style; but he made no remark upon it at the moment, only he resolved that he would strive more than mortal man had ever yet striven, that the day should come when he would pay him off with interest some, if not the whole, of that cool superiority with which he now showed off over him and his two friends.

"Cheer up, Jack," said Claude. "All are not lost that are in danger."

"It's all owing to that confounded mad girl's affair," said Jack.

Claude smiled, as he replied—

"No, Jack, don't say that. Who knows but that if we had never gone into that house, we might not have encountered a greater danger still out of it?"

"How could we encounter a greater danger than this, Claude?" said Jack, holding up his manacled hands.

It was a pang to the heart of Claude Duval to see that sight, and to feel how helpless he was at that moment to be of any use to alter their condition. Claude, however, would not allow any one to see that he was so deeply affected, but he turned it off with a sad smile, saying—

"Never mind, Jack. Live in hope."

"And die in despair," said Jack.

It was quite clear that poor Jack was in no mood to be reasoned with just then. As for Dick, he was looking rather moody and savage; and suddenly looking up, he said—

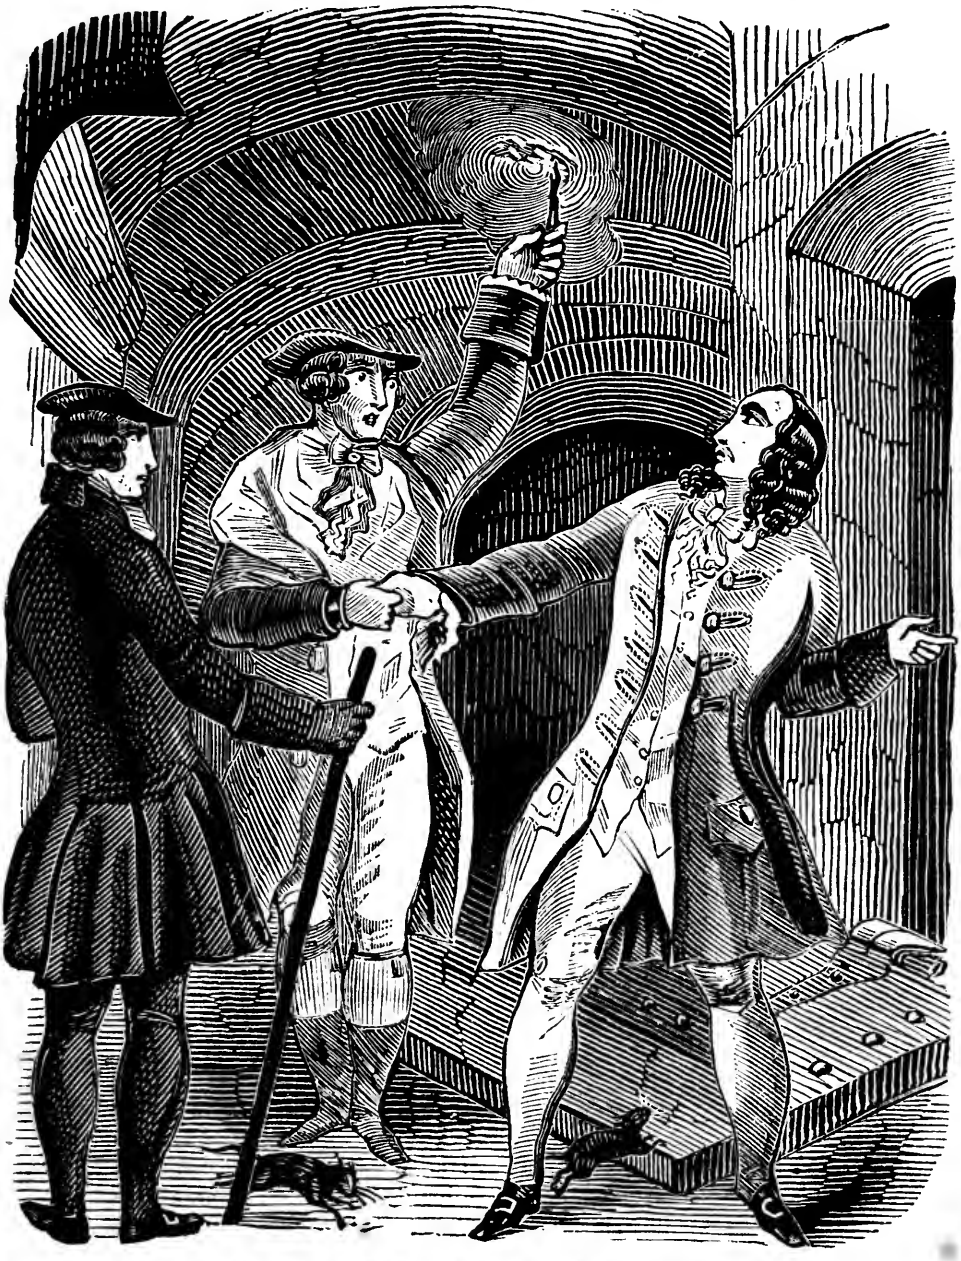
"Mr. Stevens?"

"Well, sir; what now?" said Stevens.

"My horse—all our horses. What has become of them?"

"They had not been ten minutes in the tent, where you thought you had them so secure, when we had possession of them."

"And it was you who stuck those infernal little plasters on their feet?"



"It was, Dick Turpin. Before I went into the house with Sir John Richards, I saw your three horses. The other two I did not know, but I did know your Black Bess, Turpin."

"Go to the devil!"

"It was not a pleasant trick," said Jack, "to lame a good steed."

"They will be all right," said Stevens. "I never use a thing of that sort that I have not an antidote for; and if it is any satisfaction to you to know it, the horses are as good as ever they were."

"Take care of my horse, Stevens," said Claude, "for when I get him on to the road again, it will provoke me not a little to find him out of condition.

CLAUDE AND DICK RESCUE JACK FROM THE BOW-STREET LOCK-UP.

Don't grudge the oats, whatever you do, and mind you bruize them well, for he is used to it."

Stevens made no answer to this cool speech of Claude Duval's, which was so anticipatory of freedom again; but, riding up to Sir John Richards, he said in his odd kind of way—

"Here they are, Sir John. I've brought 'em."

"Why, you don't mean it, Stevens?"

"Yes, I do, Sir John. Here they are, all three in the cart. You can go and look at them, if you please, sir."

"Well, upon my life, so they are! What a trouble now and a bother it would spare if they could be hung at once, wouldn't it, Stevens?"

"Indeed it would, sir. If you think proper, it can be done at once."

"Why no—I rather think that would exceed my commission as a magistrate, Stevens. But I heard a deal of firing. What was it all about?"

"A row with the gipsies, sir. They tried to get the prisoners away from us, and we were forced to fire, or they would not only have done that, but murdered us besides."

"Then if you have killed any of the rogues and vagabonds, it is justifiable homicide, Stevens; so let us get off to London, as quickly as we can. Oh, you vagabonds, your time has come at last, has it? The gallows groans for you, it does. Only see, now, what a disgraceful end you have come to. This is the result of all your finery, and your gallivanting on the road, and your galloping here and your galloping ther , and your scarlet coats and your lace ruffles."

"Have you learnt that bya heart," Claude, "or did you think of it only just now?"

"Come, come, sir; no impudence."

"That's just what I say myself—and I warn you that if you go on with any more of your speeches, I will recollect them when we meet in some lonely place on the road."

"I'll take my chance of that, you thorough bad one," said Sir John; "and if you are not hung this time, I shall recommend that the gallows be burnt for old fire-wood."

"It will make a good bon-fire," said Claude.

The magistrate disdained to hold any further parley with his prisoners, but turning his horse's head towards London, he directed Stevens to bring them on with all speed.

The distance was not so great as to make it necessary to have a halt upon the road, so that none of the chances of a long ourney presented themselves to our three adventurers for escape, and, to all appejrance, their situation was something even more than a critical one, since they were evidently being conveyed to London without any of those chances that, if they had been taken anywhere else, might have come in their way.

When they were quite near to the metropolis, Stevens turned to the magistrate, and spoke respectfully, saying,—

"Newgate, I suppose, Sir John?"

"Well, I don't know. They will have to be brought before me in the morning. Suppose you put them in the Bow-street lock-up for the night?"

"As you please, sir; but Newgate is the safest."

"Oh, pho! Don't let them think that we are afraid of them, and so are forced to carry them to Newgate at once. The fact is, there is too much fuss made about these fellows, that's the truth, and they think they are quite wonderful people on that account. Take them to the lock-up—you will find that strong enough; and, besides, in your hands, which they will still remain in, they haven't much chance."

"Very good, Sir John—hem!—it shall be as you please, and if they escape me, why, they have but another to get the better of, and that's Old Nick."

This little dialogue was overheard by Claude, who, giving Dick a slight nudge with his elbow, said,—

"Dick, we are to go to the lock-up in Bow Street."

"Are we really?"

"Yes; do you know anything of it?"

"A little."

There was a peculiar look about Dick's face that gave Claude a hope that he knew a great deal about the Bow-street lock-up, and for fear they should be separated when they got there into different cells, he was very anxious to know what Dick did know of the place.

"Speak low, Dick," he said, "and tell us all."

"I will. There's a tavern in the neighbourhood that supplies the place with anything the prisoners choose to buy, and there is a girl at the tavern who will do what she can for us."

"That is all?"

"Not quite, Claude."

"Go on, then, and tell me all, will you? But don't look as though you were speaking of anything interesting, for that d——d Stevens has his eye upon us now."

"I sea him. Then I can tell you, Claude, that I know a secret passage from the lock-up in Bow Street to——"

At this moment Stevens rode up to the side of the cart, and in a voice of mock friendship, he said—

"Hem! Really now, you seem to be having such a pleasant little discourse together, that it is quite a shame to keep it all to yourselves, that it is. What is it all about?"

"An ass in a fox's skin."

"Ah, indeed!"

"Yes, and his name was Stevens."

"Very good—very good, and very witty, I daresay; but people should keep their wit between their teeth, like their tongues, at times, or it won't do them any good; and it strikes me, Claude Duval, that it ain't the wisest thing in the world of you to make an enemy of me."

CHAPTER CCLXIV.

THE PRISONERS PASS A STRANGE NIGHT AT THE LOCK-UP.

"PSHAW!" said Claude, in answer to this last remark from Stevens. "You have done your worst, and you know it."

"Never mind. Here we are at the lock-up in Bow Street."

Those few words—"Here we are at the lock-up in Bow Street"—had a very chilling kind of sound to the faculties of the three prisoners, and it was not in human nature for them to be otherwise than just a little affected at such an announcement.

They were all unusually silent.

"Ha!" laughed Stevens; "so you are beginning not to like it, and to think about it, eh? I thought your high spirits would soon come down a bit."

They neither of them thought proper to make any reply to this rather ungenerous remark from Mr. Stevens, and he was quite delighted with the idea that he had subdued them at last. But such was far—very far from being the fact in reality. The real truth was, that Claude Duval and his friends felt how very important it was now that their whole attention should be directed to the means of escape, and they could no longer spare a ment to engage in any frivolity with Mr. Stevens. They did not know but that the chances of liberating themselves might entirely depend upon some little matter that they might now notice; so, like prudent men, they sacrificed the present to the future, and let Mr. Stevens enjoy his fancied triumph while they looked warily about them.

The lock-up in old Bow Street at the time of Claude Duval was, as the reader may very well suppose, a very different affair to what it is now. Not the smallest vestige of the ancient building that was devoted to that purpose now remains.

As at present, though, the lock-up was opposite to the police-office, and it was a low-roofed building of only one story in height, and principally built of massive wood-work. The cells were underground, and fitted up, as regards strength, principally upon that account.

The place was altogether one of the most gloomy that could be well imagined, and was highly calculated very much to affect the imagination of ordinary offenders.

We need hardly say that it had very little effect of that character upon the three prisoners now brought to it.

If there had been any idea upon the part of the idlers of the vicinity that the coach which stopped at the old lock-up contained such men as Claude Duval, Sixteen-string Jack, and Dick Turpin, it is very likely that in the course of a few minutes Bow Street would have been quite impassable; but such was not the case, and they were taken beneath the low-roofed and gloomy portal of the place without exciting any extraordinary sensations.

Immediately within the outer door was another one of iron—that is to say, it was called an iron door, in consequence of being coated with that metal to a considerable thickness on both sides, and it was likewise studded with those large nut-headed nails, which give so great an appearance of strength with so very little of the reality of it.

Immediately through that door was a kind of hall or vestibule, in which a couple of constables sat by a fire, that would throw out as much smoke into the air of the place as went up the chimney. Above the mantel-shelf were several cutlasses, and a blunderbuss, with a brass barrel, that was bell-shaped, and which was presumed to be loaded in some very deadly manner.

A door to the right and another to the left led to rooms appropriated to the officials of the place, and from one of these rooms opened a door to a narrow staircase, that led down to the cells.

Such was the general arrangement of the ground-floor of the old lock-up. Above, there were five rooms, in two of which the clerk to the magistrate at the office resided, and the others were unoccupied, except now and then, when some prisoner of importance, as regarded wealth or position, was placed there for a short time, pending his examination before the magistrate in the public office.

The mode by which these upper rooms were reached was by a staircase opening from the hall, and which was connected by a door that was always shut by a cord and weight. The hall itself was not above twelve feet square, and all the rooms were of the most paltry and confined dimensions.

"Now, gentlemen," said Stevens, "here we are."

"And this you call a lock-up?" said Dick.

"Rather."

"Is that blunderbuss loaded?"

"Just a few."

"Well, Heaven have mercy upon the man who shall attempt to fire it, for it will burst and blow his head off to a certainty if he does. That I can swear to."

"Oh," said Stevens, with a grin, "we are not so mighty particular about our heads as all that comes to; and if we feel inclined to fire it, off it will go, even if our heads follow it."

"That," said Claude, "is a matter of taste."

"You couldn't say a truer thing than that," replied Stevens. "And now, gentlemen, if you will give me leave, I will show you to the parlours below stairs; and if it's any satisfaction to you to know that I am to be found any hour of the night here in the hall, I beg to inform you that such will be the fact—without a doubt."

"Thank you," said Claude, as he looked up at a clock that was upon the wall. "I think we shall be with you about half-past two."

A savage expression crossed the face of Stevens, for he saw that one of the constables in the hall was upon the broad grin at the idea that he was getting the worst of the chaffing that was going on in the place.

"Very good," he said, as he slowly rubbed his hands together, "I quite understand you, Claude Duval. It is mere chaff. And yet I will shew you that I have a good feeling towards you, and, upon one condition, you shall sit up with me by the fireside here all night, which will be a thousand times more comfortable than being in one of the little parlours below."

"The condition?" said Claude. "What is it?"

"That you will all three give me your words of honour as men, that you willl make no attempt to escape."

"It is tempting," said Claude, "but I beg leave to decline."

"And I," said Dick.

"And I," said Jack.

"Very good. I am not at all surprised nor disappointed. It is only what I fully expected. But still, to shew you that I had a good feeling towards you, I gave you the chance. Where is the lock-up keeper?"

"Here you are, Mr. Stevens," said a short, stout man with a very red face, and peculiar little grey eyes, making his appearance from the upper floor. "Here you are. Who have you got here?"

"Claude Duval—Sixteen-string Jack, and Dick Turpin."

The lock-up keeper screwed his lips up to the position of whistling, but no whistle came from them. Then shaking his head, he said—

"No—no, that's too much of a good thing all at once."

"There is your order."

The lock-up keeper looked at the magistrate's order, and saw that it did indeed name the persons mentioned by the officer. A look of intense interest came across his face in a moment, and he cried—

"Well, this is something! I didn't think to have had three such in the old lock-up while its timbers held together, that I didn't! That is to say, all at once. Gentlemen, you are as welcome as flowers in May."

"We are very much obliged," said Claude.

"Now, Mr. Bolt," said Stevens, speaking in a sharp jerking tone, and addressing the lock-up keeper by his name. "Now, Mr. Bolt, you will quite understand that I don't intend these prisoners to get away, and that I will remain here, in the hall, until they leave this place again; and so help me everything that is good, bad or indifferent, I'll shoot the first man who tries to leave this place who ought not, or who in any way aids the prisoners to go——"

"Mr. Stevens," said Bolt, and his little eyes twinkled again, and his face got redder than usual, "if you mean to accuse me of letting prisoners go, say so at once, like a man, and I can meet you on the charge."

"That will do," said Stevens, drily. "I don't want to say another word about it."

"Oh, you are a humbug," said Bolt.

"I know it," said Stevens, with all the composure in the world. "I am quite aware of the fact."

This little quarrel between Stevens and Bolt was amusing enough to the three captives, and it gave them some hopes, too, that Bolt might, just to get the better of Stevens, and aggravate him a little, be of what service he could to them; so Claude Duval said—

"I am sure that it is a very ungracious thing of Stevens to say one word against Mr. Bolt, who is a gentleman, as all the world knows, although he keeps the lock-up."

Bolt looked gratified.

"My opinion is," said Dick, "that Stevens gets in an ill-humour when he sees Bolt, because he is not a quarter so good-looking, and can never hope to be so. Bolt is a handsome man, and the sight of such is aggravating to some selfish people."

Bolt rubbed his hands together, and smiled.

"Hold your row, all of you, will you?" cried Stevens; "and you, Bolt, how can you be such an ass as to stand smirking and smiling there in such a way, objects ause you are flattered in the most barefaced manner to your face, when all the world knows you are as ugly as the parish pump, and about as much of a gentleman as my old hat is a nosegay?"

"You envious humbug!" cried Bolt.

"You stupid idiot!" shouted Stevens.

"Go it," said Claude. "Go it. That's the thing—go it! All's right. Stick to him, Bolt; you know you are right, and that gives you strength."

"Stop!" said Stevens, suddenly, with almost preternatural calmness. "Stop, this is folly. Mr. Bolt, I beg your pardon."

"Oh, well, if you say that, Mr. Stevens, I have done."

"Yes, Bolt, I beg your pardon. It is I who am the ass to allow myself to be so played upon by these fellows, who are only desirous that you and I should quarrel, that out of that circumstance they may gather some hope of escaping from the lock-up. Give me your hand, Bolt. I did not mean what I said. The words were spoken in a moment of wrath, merely, and I will stand a bottle of the best wine that can be got to-night for you and I, as we sit up."

Bolt and Stevens now shook hands to the great disappointment of Claude Duval, and the former said—

"Mr. Stevens, you know, I always respected you as a man of extraordinary talents, and I hope we shall always be good friends."

Stevens looked at the prisoners with a twinkle of the eye, as he then said—

"Come, then, we will show them to their cells, and then we will have the bottle of wine, Mr. Bolt."

Claude Duval now turned his whole attention to studying their route to the cells. He glanced at the room that led to the staircase. He took notice of the doors, and upon which side the fastenings were. He counted the stone steps, and found they were fourteen that led to the cells, and he felt that the floor at the bottom was earth merely.

He had not a hope that they would all be confined in one cell—that was not to be expected; therefore, it was no disappointment to him to find that they were placed in different cells.

"Good-night, Dick," he said. "Good-night, Jack."

"Good-night," said Turpin, gaily.

"God bless you, Claude," said Jack.

It was evident that Jack's spirits were very much depressed by the tone in which he spoke; but Claude did not think it prudent to say anything to him of a consolatory character, as there were others to listen to it; so he made no remark.

In another minute he was in a cell alone, and the door double-locked and barred and bolted upon him.

"This is pleasant," he said, as he leant against the damp wall, and tried to pierce the obscurity of the place with his eyes in vain.

The most galling thing to Claude was, now, that he was handcuffed; and, although he possessed the art of compressing his hand sufficiently to escape from ordinary fetters, he very much feared that the handcuffs that were now upon him, were too tight for him to get out of so easily.

"Confound them," he said; "if they had only left my hands at liberty, I might do something; but what a piece of desperate cruelty it is to shut up a man all night with his hands locked together by iron manacles. What, now, if this were only a case of suspicion against me, and I was really innocent!"

It is needless to tell the reader that such positive cruelty is never practised now. Prison discipline is better understood than it was in those days, and the age is much more humane.

As Claude Duval was the most energetic in his movements after he had remained for while in the cell, we will, with the reader's permission, neglect Jack and Dick for a short time, while we attend to what our more immediate hero is about.

The idea of remaining in the lock-up at Bow Street, if he could by any possibility leave, was not one that was likely at all to take possession of such a mind as Claude Duval's; and from the moment of his arrest, although he could not be said to be concocting some scheme of escape, yet he was on the look out for some opportunity of laying the ground-work of such a proceeding.

It was quite evident, that during the time that had intervened from the arrest, and the moment when the key of the cell in the lock-up was turned upon him, there was no chance of doing anything that could in any way tend to give him or his companions a chance of liberty, so he had wisely forborne to make his situation worse by any weak and unavailing effort, the consequences of which would be sure to rest upon their own heads.

When he was now, however, alone in the lock-up, the affair assumed quite a different aspect, and escape for himself and his friends was the sole idea that filled up his imagination.

CHAPTER CCLXV.

THE FRIENDS DESPERATELY ESCAPE FROM THE LOCK-UP IN BOW STREET.

"Now for the handcuffs," said Claude, after he had felt quite certain that the officer had left him to himself, and that there was no intention of again visiting his cell.

It will be remembered, that Claude had had his fears that he might not be able to rid himself of the encumbrance of the handcuffs quite so easily as he would wish; but as yet he had not made the effort.

Now he set about the attempt.

Claude Duval was a small-boned man, although above the middle height; and although there was not a particle of fat about him, he yet had a roundness of contour, and an appearance of plumpness that looked like fat; but the out-of-doors life he led, and the exercise he took, had made him muscular, so that he had a chance of getting out of the handcuffs, which a more angular and bony man would not have had for a moment.

His first effort was to hold up his manacled hands above his head, so as to get the blood as much out of them as was possible, and then he fixed the handcuffs tightly between his knees, and tried to get his right hand out.

What an awful effort it was, and how impossible it felt! So he could not. But he soon found, from the slippery and damp condition of his hands, that he had broken the skin, and that they were bleeding from cuts inflicted by the edge of the manacles.

"Where there is a will," said Claude, quite calmly, "there is a way, and I will get out of the darbies if they carry half my hand along with them in the process."

Determination such as that was not to be defeated. By one frightful squeeze he slipped his right hand out of the fetter.

"That will do," he said, as he shook it to try and recover sensation in it. "That will do, though it was a bit of a twinge.

It was some time before he could get his right hand sufficiently recovered to enable him to make any effort to liberate his left; but when he made that effort he soon found it was in vain.

Possibly the bones of his left hand, as is the cast with many persons, were a little larger than those of the right, or his having wounded and lacerated the right in the way he had done, had made it impossible for him to make such another effort; but certain it is, that he was obliged, after a trial, to give it up in despair.

"Never mind," he said, "a bracelet will do me no particular harm now, and I dare say I can twist off the loose darby that hangs dangling by the wrist rather troublesomely."

By placing his foot upon the loose handcuff, and giving it a sudden jerk with the left hand, he snapped it off, so that, in reality, he was as free from the handcuffs for all practical purposes, as though he had got his left hand out as well as his right.

"That will do," he said; "and now, Mr. Stevens, with all his cunning, has left me a knife in a part of my clothing; and if I don't cut my way to freedom with it, why I can't, and there's an end of it; but, I will try, for all that."

Former experience had taught Claude Duval the value of such a weapon—it was a knife upon one side and a saw upon the other, and was exquisitely got up—so that while he had had time and opportunity to do so, he had procured it and hidden it about him in such a way, that it was next to impossible that he should be deprived of it.

The result had shown that he was right in his calculation, for even Mr. Stevens with all his tact and cunning, had managed in some way to overlook it.

It seemed but a small weapon, that knife, the blade of which was not above eight inches long, with which he was to work his way to freedom; but yet smaller tools than that in the hands of skilful cracksmen have worked a passage out of Newgate.

By feeling all along the edge of the knife with his finger, Claude found that it was in good condition, and then he placed himself close to the door to listen if any of the sounds from the upper part of the lock-up reached that place.

All he heard was a rumbling noise, that seemed to come from directly overhead and that confirmed him in the idea that the cells went under the street, for the rumbling sound he did not doubt was a carriage going along over the stones.

The idea did slightly occur to him of trying to work his way out through the roof of the cell, but he gave it up, as he considered that it would be next to impossible to do so without attracting the observation of some one passing, and so leading to an immediate discovery of his intentions.

"No," he said, "I must go the regular way out as I came the regular way in, I suppose; but the first thing will be to get out of the cell, and to liberate, if possible, Jack and Dick."

The cell was paved with a sort of red tiles, very thick, indeed, but in consequence of lying there a long while, the earth, from the dampness of the spot, had oozed up between them, and formed a sort of coating over them, so that, at first, Claude had thought that he trod upon merely hardened earth.

A very slight examination was sufficient to prove to him that such was not the case, and he thought that very possibly the passage on the outside of the cells might be paved in the same way, although he had had the impression that it was nothing but earth.

Such a state of things did not make much difference to his plans.

Throwing himself on the ground, he carefully felt the door at its lower part and found that it was about half an inch from the ground, and that a current of cold, damp air crept in under it.

"Now I shall set to work," he said, "and we will see what the next hour will do."

Claude was very careful in the way in which he used his knife, for fear of breaking it, for well he knew that however well-tempered a piece of steel might be, it was impossible to say that there might not be some flaw in it that would make it give way when least expected to do so; and that knife was to him too great a treasure for him to use it very recklessly.

He got up, without much difficulty, one of the tiles with which the floor was paved. It proved to be about the thickness of an ordinary brick, and, indeed, but that it was shaped squarer than a brick, might with propriety have been called one.

After this, his progress was easy enough, and he placed the knife in its hiding place in his apparel and only used his hands to the work. The tiles gave way without any trouble at all, and he soon got up a sufficient number of them to leave the spot of earth by the door of the cell quite free from any such encumbrance.

The object of Claude was to get under the door

He well knew that a small excavation would be sufficent for him to force himself through, and he did not for a moment doubt but that he should be able to accomplish it.

According, now, to his expectation, he found that the passage without the cell was paved with the same description of tiling that the cell itself was; but the difficulty of getting rid of any of that which was outside was very great.

THE THREE ADVENTURERS FOLLOWING THE MYSTERIOUS LIGHT, LEADING TO THE INN.

After incredible efforts, he did at last succeed in loosening one of the tiles, and in dragging it into his cell. After that, his progress was easier, and he pulled them away right and left, and in advance as far as he could reach.

The rapidity with which Claude Duval worked, was now amazing, for he felt that he was in a very dangerous position, as no one could come into the passage now, without at once seeing what was going on, in which case an instant defea of all his plans was to be at once looked for.

That such a discovery and such a defeat would be made the excuse for loading him with fetters, from which there would be no escape, he well knew; so that now he worked, indeed, for his life. Never did a human being, with inefficient means to do so, dig into the earth with the speed that Claude Duval now used in the process, and this process and the result was that he soon had thrown out sufficient of the soil to enable him to feel that there was a large cavity under the door.

"Will it do?" was the question.

After some little consideration, he thought the best way to creep through, was with his face downwards, and, accordingly, he made the attempt. He got his head under the door easily enough, but his shoulders stuck fast, and after a violent effort to get through, he was compelled to desist and set to work again deepening the excavation. He had it wide enough, for, in truth, it was just about as wide as the door itself.

It took him another ten minutes now to complete the job, and he found the broken handcuff of great assistance in helping him to scoop out the mould from the excavation. When he tried it again, he, to his great delight, slipped through easily, and although it gave him a rather awkward twist to do it, he did manage to scramble right under the door, and to get into the passage.

"Trouble the second over," said Claude. "The first was the handcuffs—the second, the cell; and now I have got plenty to do before me."

The first thing he now did was to run up the stone staircase, and listen intently at the door at the top of it. When there, he heard the murmur of voices, which he felt convinced came from the hall, and no doubt were the individual property of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Bolt, as they sat by the fire in that part of the lock-up.

What they were saying, he could not catch sufficiently distinct to understand, as the sound had to come right through the side room; but he was so far satisfied that they were quiet.

"They are discussing that bottle of wine, no doubt," thought Claude, "that Stevens was so liberal in procuring to treat Bolt with. I would give them fifty bottles of the very choicest, if they would only be quiet for another hour or so."

Claude now trod lightly down the stone steps again, and finding his way to the first of the cell doors on the opposite side to that upon which was his own from which he had recently escaped, he tapped at it with his knuckles pretty sharply twice.

There was no answer to the summons.

"They are neither of them in that one, I suppose," said Claude; so he felt his way to the next door, and tapped at it.

"Who's that?" said Dick's voice.

"Hush!" said Claude, placing his lips to the key-hole. "Hush! It is I—Claude Duval. Don't you know my voice, Dick?"

"God bless me, yes; I do, now. But how, in the name of all that is odd, have you got out of your cell? I have been working away at the hinges of my door all this time, and have only got one of them off now."

"Which one, Dick?"

"The lower one."

"Wait a minute, then, and I can give you a helping hand. There are iron bars across the doors, and if I can only get one of them loose, it will make a first rate jemmy, I rather think."

"But how, in the name of all that's wonderful, are you out and about, Claude? That puzzles me."

"Never mind about that just now. We shall have lots of time to talk at that when we are all three in some quiet spot in the far-off country, and enjoying a laugh over our night in the lock-up."

"Do you really think so?"

"Think what?"

"That we shall soon be in the country again, and enjoying a laugh?"

"To be sure. But be quiet. I'm trying for the bar."

To his great satisfaction, Claude found that the bars were only screwed in the floor by an iron pin hung by a bit of chain about six inches long to the wall, so that by taking the pin out, the bar could be at once lifted from its place with the greatest possible ease.

With that iron bar, which was about five feet in length, in his hand, Claude felt that he was rather a match for Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Bolt likewise, and all their myrmidons; but the first object was to release Dick. He did not choose Dick as the first to release; but as he had come to his cell, by accident, first, he felt bound to make Jack wait his time.

Claude found that he could just insinuate the end of the iron bar under the door of Dick's cell, and when he did so, he heard something, either about the lock or the hinges, given such a crack, that it was quite evidently broken.

Another moment and the door gave way by the hinge that was left, and Dick was as free as an escape from his cell went, at all events.

CHAPTER CCLXVI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN EFFECTUALLY ESCAPE FROM THE LOCK-UP.

Dick had still his handcuffs on him; but Claude now had his knife with the saw at the back of it, by which he could help him.

Claude shook hands with his friend as well as he could in the dark, and then he said—

"Let us make an effort to get you free from the darbies, Dick, for while they are upon your wrists, you are still a prisoner."

"No, Claude—no.

"No? What do you mean by that?"

"Just that I would prefer you should go and rescue poor Jack before anything else is thought of. He must suffer more than either you or I, for we both know that, poor fellow, after what he has gone through, he is not the man he was."

"True—most true—I will not delay a moment."

"Why did you not leave me alone, Claude, for a little while, and go to his cell at once?"

"Just because I did not know at all which was yours and which was his, and that yours was the first that by mere chance I came to."

Claude now felt his way to another of the doors, and tapped at it as he had done at that of Dick's cell, but no answer was returned; and so he went to another and to another, and it was the fourth before, in a weak voice, Jack replied from within, saying—

"Who knocks?—who knocks?"

"I, Jack," said Claude. "Dick and I have come to rescue you."

"Oh, no—no! Do not mock me. It is cruel to do so. We are all lost! We shall all die! The time has come. Do not mock me, Claude Duval, by any delusive hopes."

Claude did not want to argue the matter with Jack, for he knew that it would be quite useless—indeed, useless as it was dangerous, for time was of the greatest object to them that could possibly be. Turning to Dick, he said—

"We must try what we can do with the door of Jack's cell by the aid of the iron bar. Take this one, Dick. Have you got it?"

"Yes—yes. But you——"

"I know how to get another. But you can't work with your handcuffs on, I am certain."

"Yes, but I can, though. That's quite a mistake of yours, Master Claude. I can place both hands on a crow-bar and give a lift with it quite as well with a pair of handcuffs on as without them."

"Push it under this door, then, as well as you can. You will feel that there is a sort of crevice there, if you take the trouble so to do, and let us try what iron will do against wood and iron by a heave upwards, both at the same moment of time."

"You give the word then, Claude."

"I will. Are you ready?"

"In a moment. Not quite yet. Wait a bit—Now for it—I am all right. The end of the bar is a couple of inches under the door."

"Heave!" said Claude.

In a moment, crash! went the look of the door.

"Heave again!"

Crackle, went some of the wood-work.

"Oh, what is all that?" said Jack. "What is taking place, now?—Speak to me, somebody, do. What is it all about? Am I dreaming?"

"Jack, be calm," said Claude. "All is right, old friend. Don't you know my voice? It is I, Claude Duval. Why, you have been to sleep and don't know where you are."

Claude had thrown down his iron bar, and with all his strength was trying to drive the door inwards. In another moment in it went with a sudden crash, and Claude was very nearly precipitated into the cell along with it.

Dick was much afraid that the noise that had been made would have the effect of warning the officers above of something unusual going on in the cells, and he mentioned his dread to Claude.

"Speak to Jack," said Claude, "and I will go up the steps and listen."

Claude thereupon bounded up the stone steps, and stood for some few moments with his ears placed against the door at the top of them; but all was still, and he felt quite satisfied that their efforts to escape in that underground place had not made noise enough to reach the ears of the officers above. He went back, and heard Dick remonstrating with Jack.

"What's the matter with him, now?" said Claude. "Oh, Jack, I am quite astonished at you. What do you mean by all this?"

"I don't know what he means," said Dick; "but he won't know me at all."

"Light!" said Claude. "Oh! would that we had a light. It is the utter darkness that confounds him in this place."

"That is Claude's voice," said Jack.

"To be sure it is," said Claude, kindly. "I was quite sure you would know that, Jack. Recollect yourself. We are trying to escape from the lock-up in Bow-street. Don't you remember, old friend?"

"Oh, yes—yes. Pardon me, both of you. I know now. But the truth is, I I had fallen into a sort of slumber that had thoroughly confused me, and a noise that I heard completed the matter."

"That noise was made by our breaking open the door of your cell, Jack; so it ought to have been a welcome enough one to you. All we want now is a light."

"Then I can accommodate you," said Jack; "for I have the means of getting a light hidden about me so well, that they did not find them out when they searched me. Wait a moment."

Both Claude and Dick were very glad to hear Jack now speaking so rationally as he did, for they had been really apprehensive, from his strange mode of talking only a few moments before, that the peril he was in had had the effect of depriving him of his reason. Now, however, they no longer entertained such an idea, for the tone of voice in which he had last spoken had been quite sufficient to dissipate it.

In the course of about half a minute a faint light illumined the cell; and then Jack, as he held up an ignited phosphorus match, said—

"Here it is; but I have no candle or wax taper, so we can only see while the match lasts."

A couple of large rats made a bolt out of the cell at this moment, and passing Claude and Dick, went scampering down the passage, and were out of sight in a moment.

"A lively place this," said Dick.

"Very," said Claude; and then, as he spoke, out went the match, and all was profound darkness again.

"Confound it!" said Dick; "what a treat the commonest penny-dip candle that ever was made would be to us now!"

"It would, indeed, Dick," said Claude; "and I would gladly promise a guinea for it, or a couple, for the matter of that. But light up another match, Jack, if you can."

"Oh, yes. But I have only got six."

"Well, never mind; let us have another, so that I may see where to begin with a file I have here at Dick's handcuffs. I will soon have his off, and then I will begin upon yours, Jack."

"Never mind about getting them off, Claude. Separate them, and that will be quite sufficient, I assure you. The rings on my wrists are no harm so long as I have the use of my hands."

"I understand."

Jack ignited another of the little matches and held it until it burnt right down to his fingers; but by that time Dick had twisted up the lining of his hat closely, and lit it by the match, so that it made a temporary torch, although it did not burn over well.

Claude, by the light of it, however, was able to work away at the handcuffs much better than as if he had been in the dark, and the fine saw, with its exquisitely sharp teeth, soon bit through the iron, and so far as having his wrists separated, and his hands at liberty, Dick was comparatively free.

"Now, Jack, for you," said Claude.

Three minutes more sufficed to release Jack from his fetters, and then they felt as if they were something more than half way to freedom, indeed. All Jack's matches, however, but two, he had exhausted, and those Claude advised him to keep for the present in case of any emergency. They then each armed himself with one of the bars that went at the backs of the cell doors, and, Claude going first, they slowly ascended to the strong door at the head of the flight of little stone steps.

If they could but get that door open, it was but a fight with the officers, even if they encountered them, and then liberty might be theirs; but that door was likely enough to present many obstacles, for not only was it of very great strength, but it was so close at hand to the hall, that they dared not set to work with the expedition they would have liked, for fear of being overheard by the officers.

"Careful we must be, now," whispered Claude, "and I think we must have one of the two of Jack's matches to make a survey of the door with."

"Here it is," said Jack.

Whiz! went the match, and Jack handed it to Claude, who passed it steadily up and down the door, until it went fairly out; but it had kept alight long enough for him to see that the only way for him to work at the door was to cut out either the lock or the hinges, and either would be a work of some time and difficulty with the little saw that he only had to do it with.

"You had better both of you sit down on the steps," he said, "and make up your minds for a waiting job, now; for there is no resource but to cut away round the lock, and to have patience about it."

"Stop," said Jack.

"What is it, Jack?"

"You can do better than cut away at the lock."

"Can I?"

"Yes; I can just get my hand under the door, and surely your saw will go edgeways under, if that is the case. Can you not cut out a square large enough for us to creep through?"

"That will do, Jack. I can."

Claude saw at once the facilities of escape that this mode of operation suggested by Jack presented. The door was likewise to be attacked at a part of it that was not fortified by any extraordinary means, so that, in all likelihood, it would not offer any very great obstruction to the saw. He at once knelt upon the stairs and began operations.

In the first place, Claude found that the space between the bottom of the door and the top stair would just admit the saw edgeways, so that he could commence to work at once; and although it was rather an awkward thing sawing upwards, it was to be done, by a little perseverance, and that was a quality not wanting in Duval.

With a noiseless, but amazingly rapid motion, the fine-tempered saw cut through the wood-work and the sheets of iron which were used upon the door, and by feeling his way, Claude easily avoided any of the large nails by which it was clamped.

"How are you getting on?" said Dick.

"Capitally! If we go on at this rate, the opening in the door will be made in ten minutes; but speak low, whatever you do."

"I will—I will."

"Better not speak at all," said Jack.

They seemed to think this the wisest advice, for none of them exchanged a syllable now, while Claude worked away with the saw, which only made a dull, grating sort of sound, which could not extend very far, and which, if it did, would most likely be mistaken for something in the street. If the officers went on gossiping, however, which it was very likely they would, it was not at all probable that they would hear it at all.

Claude Duval was well aware through how small an apparent space the body of a man will pass, so he did not give himself more labour than he thought sufficient in the matter, but soon turned the saw to the horizontal, which was much easier in working.

"Do you want a light?" said Jack, in a low whisper.

"No—no. When I get the piece quite out will do. Then it will be as well for us to see our way in the matter; but not yet, Jack."

Another five minutes, and Claude had turned the corner, and was sawing the door downwards rapidly. A flash of light suddenly shot under the door, and he stopped sawing.

Some one was in the room to which the door communicated.

"Lost!" thought Claude, but he did not say a word.

His idea was, that the officers were going to see if all was right in the cells, and if that was the case, there was nothing for it but a hand to hand fight for liberty and life.

"Have you found it?" said a voice from the hall.

"No," said the man who was in the room with a light, and who had evidently come there upon some message for Mr. Bolt, as his was the voice that propounded the question from the hall.

"Look in the corner cupboard, then."

"Oh, here it is. All right, sir."

They heard something rattle like glass, and then Bolt cried out again in angry tones—

"What are you about there—are you drinking it?"

"Oh, no, sir; I'm coming."

"Just try the door leading to the stairs," said Stevens, "before you come away. It's as well to be quite sure everything is all right; and give it a good shake, Smith."

"I will, sir."

Smith, the officer, who had been sent to fetch a bottle containing some rather ardent compound from the room, now approached the door at which Claude Duval had been so industriously at work, and laying hold of the lock of it, he gave it a good shake, which satisfied him that it was all right and secure. He never thought of casting his eyes downwards. If he had, he must have seen the effect that the saw had produced.

"All right, sir," he said.

"Then come on, at once," said Bolt.

The man left the room, and slammed the door of it shut behind him.

"A narrow escape, that," said Claude. "Quite a squeak I call it."

"It was, indeed," said Dick. "I thought it would have been a case of 'war to the iron bars,' at the very least. I was resolved to sell my life dearly, if it was to go at all."

"No—no, Dick," said Jack; "don't talk of selling your life at all. Let us hope that that is a contingency not at all likely to come to pass; and as the danger has gone by now, we will not speculate upon what might have been its results."

"Very good, Jack—I say no more. Are you hard at work, Claude?"

"Indeed I am."

"But I do not hear the saw."

"No, I am working with such long sweeps that it makes no noise. Now do you hear it?"

"Yes, yes."

"Very good, then you will hear it no more, for, if I do not very much mistake, I have got so near to the end of my job, that the slightest force will break out the piece of wood."

"That's capital. Do it, Claude, do it."

"There it goes."

Claude just tapped with the toe of his boot at the piece of the door that he had cut all round, and out it went into the room beyond, leaving a clear opening of about fifteen inches square, through which, without a doubt, they could each of them creep."

"It is done," he said.

"Then we will follow you," said Dick.

"Very good. This is not a time to squabble about precedence, so here goes. What a treat it will be if it should turn out too small, after all, for us."

"It would be such a treat," said Dick, "as I would not have for the best hundred pounds that ever I saw in all my life."

"Nor I for double the amount," said Jack. "Put us out of our suspense, Claude, by trying it at once."

"Here goes," said Claude, and in a moment he popped through the orifice in the door with the agility of a Harlequin.

"Ah," said Jack, "he was but joking with us, for it is quite evident that he knew he could get through with ease. Follow him, Dick."

"As you please, Jack."

Dick was a trifle stouter than Claude, but he did get through the hole in the door, although it cost him a slight squeeze to do so, and he had had his doubts about it before he tried it.

Jack followed immediately, and they were all three in the outer room. The utmost caution was now requisite in their proceedings lest they should be ver heard by the officers in the vestibule or hall, for although the door of the room that opened into that portion of the lock-up was closed, yet sounds had not far to travel.

They could hear the officers conversing, and by the same rule, the officers might hear them, if they raised their voices above the merest whisper in addressing any remarks to each other.

Their success, so far, was sufficiently wonderful to induce them to entertain the most sanguine hopes of its being followed up by still greater success. They were intensely silent, however, for a few minutes, for they were exceedingly anxious to ascertain, if possible, who was in the hall.

CHAPTER CCLXVII.

THE ADVENTURERS MEET WITH A FRIEND THAT THEY DID NOT EXPECT.

It could not be said that either Claude Duval or his friends had formed any distinct plan of proceeding after they should reach the room they were now in. The fact was, there had been so many doubts about the reaching of it at all, that they had neither of them liked to ask each other what they should do if they did so far succeed.

Now, however, the question became one of the most serious importance, and Dick, in a low voice, said—

"Now that, thanks to Jack's suggestion about cutting a piece out of the bottom of the door, we have got so far, what are we to do? I would fain leave it all to you, now, Claude, to decide upon what course of action you may think the best."

"The obvious one," said Claude, "is to sally out, and fight our way; but that would certainly lead to murder, and that is what I, and what I suppose both of you likewise wish to avoid."

"Oh, yes, yes," said both Jack and Dick.

"Very good; then, it is quite clear that we must not sally out in the way I mention, if such is our feeling upon the subject, but we must try to get into the street in another way."

"By the front windows?" said Dick.

"I hope so."

"Impossible," said Jack; "they are all bound with iron. I noticed as much as I came in the coach to this place."

"And so did I," said Claude, "but the bars must be terribly old by this time, and their hold upon the wood-work must be slight indeed. I should say they cannot resist us."

"Maybe so; but how are we to get into the room above?"

"There is no way but one, and that is through the roof. Confound the man who built this place, who did not put a staircase in the wall of this apartment leading to the one above."

"That would have been almost too handy," said Dick; "but if we are to commence operations on the roof, the sooner we do so the better; and here goes for a beginning of it."

There was a large and very heavy table in the middle of the room, and as he spoke, Dick got upon it, but so lightly and with such agility, that he did not shake it in the least.

"Shall I begin the work?" he said, as he found that he could easily touch the ceiling with both his hands.

"Do so," whispered Claude, "but be cautious, Dick, whatever you do, and recollect the proximity of the officers. The only plan will be to take down the plaster of the ceiling bit by bit with your hands, after once making a beginning, and letting Jack and me take the pieces of you. If any should fall, we are found out, and there is then no chance but in a fight for it."

"I know; but spread your coats upon the table, so that if any should get loose and fall, it may make less noise."

All this was, it will be remembered, in the dark, with the exception of a little glimmering flash of light that came under the door, so that the situation of the three highwaymen was to the greatest degree full of danger, and no men but such as they could possibly have preserved their calmness and self-possession under such trying circumstances.

THE ARREST OF THE THREE FRIENDS IN THE GIPSIES' CAMP.

Both Jack and Claude spread their coats close to where Dick was standing upon the table, and then he set to work, and the plaster of the roof began to rattle down rather quickly.

"Cautious!—cautious, Dick!" said Claude.

"Yes. Here's a great piece. Take it. Have you got it?"

"I have—I have."

"That will do. Here's another."

By dint of feeling about carefully, Claude continued to take the pieces of the ceiling from Dick, who got them off with great rapidity, and Jack, finding that he was not wanted there, went to the door and kept his ear close to it, to listen if the officers should make any suspicious movement in the hall. From his voice it would appear that Bolt was telling some long story to Stevens, and that he had taken quite enough of the wine to make his utterance rather thick; and by the tone in which Stevens replied to him, it was quite evident that he was dying with sleep, and with the greatest difficulty struggling against the disposition to drop off into a sound slumber.

The fact was, that Stevens had been up two nights before that one, and it was hardly in human nature that he should be able to keep up much longer. Yet Stevens was so particularly anxious that the three prisoners should not escape him, that he made the most strenuous efforts to preserve himself from dropping off to sleep.

"Speak louder, Bolt," he said; "you go on in such a drawling kind of way, that it is enough to set any one off to sleep. Speak louder, and give me a nudge with your elbow if you see me going."

"I will."

"That's a good fellow; now go on with that story of yours. What's that?—oh, what's that?"

"Only me giving you a nudge," said Bolt. "You was closing up your eyes, and going to sleep like a blessed babby."

"Oh, was I? Well, I shan't do so any more. I am quite wide awake now, Mr. Bolt, as you see. Go on."

"Very good. Then, as I was saying to you, Mr. Stevens, before I got this situation of keeper to the lock-up, you see, I was, of course, like yourself, a runner, and many an odd adventure happened to me in the course of my professional experience, I can tell you. Sometimes things went all right, as they ought to do, and I nabbed my man; and sometimes things went all wrong, and I did't nab my man; and sometimes I caught a tartar."

"Murder!" cried Stevens.

"Lor, Mr. Stevens, what is the matter?"

"Something gave me such a pinch on the calf of the leg, I'm sure. What could it have been?"

"Why, me with the fire-tongs, to be sure; and I daresay, now, they are a little hot. But if you want to be kept awake, you must really put up with these little things, you know, Mr. Stevens."

"What, was I going off again?"

"Indeed, you were; and my private opinion is, that if I were not here, you would tumble right into the fire, that you would; and then there would be an end of you. Come—come, Mr. Stevens, rouse yourself up a little, and don't give way to—what do you call it?—Murphy, is it?"

"No—no. Morpheus."

"Oh, ah, I knew it was something very like Murphy, but I didn't feel quite sure about it, that's all."

Jack, from his position close to the door of the room, had heard all this quite plainly, and he was highly delighted to find that Stevens was so sleepy, and that Bolt was, in reality, half drunk, which was a fact that could very easily be deduced from the tone in which he spoke. Of course, the confederates had not been at all idle during that time; but Dick had managed to get a great quantity of the plaster of the roof down, and had reached the floor boards above, after cutting away the laths that impeded his progress.

The removal of a floor board or two would be the worst job of all; for however easy such a process would have been if they had happened to be above the floor to do it, yet it was by no means to be done with facility below.

If they had not had the little cutting saw that Claude possessed, it would have been now quite impossible for them to have proceeded any further that way towards escape. By its aid, however, Dick, who was a pretty good workman, contrived to get a part of the floor-boarding cut away, and then he made a grand effort to push one of the planks upwards. With a grating sound the nails gave way, and the plank was loosened, if not removed.

"Hush—hush!" said Claude.

"I can't help a little noise, now," said Dick. "It's the rusty nails in the wood. It will soon be done, now."

By a vigorous wrench, now, Dick got the plank quite out of its place, and brought down upon his head a great quantity of dust at the same time; but that was a minor event, and he immediately commenced operations upon the next board, which, when he should succeed in getting it up, would, no doubt, leave space enough for him and his companions to creep through.

The space between the joists was just about sufficient for them to pass through, but the width of a floor-board would not do exactly.

"We shall be all right in a few minutes, now," whispered Dick. "The other one is coming quickly."

At this moment Jack felt the greatest alarm for the safety of them all, for after repeated efforts to keep Stevens awake, Bolt had begun to give it up in despair; and after giving him a right good shake, he said—

"Mr. Stevens, do you think that a drop of anything else will keep you awake, if I get it for you?"

"Yes. Oh, dear yes—I—I think it would."

"What will you have, then?"

"Vinegar."

"Vinegar? You don't mean that. You don't mean sour vinegar, do you?"

"I never heard of any other. Get it, and I shall recover at once. I don't often give way in this sort of fashion, but there's nothing like a wine-glass of vinegar to keep a man awake."

"Well, I suppose that is upon the principle of giving him such a stomach-ache that he can't go to sleep for the pain of it. Hilloa! there you go again. Keep up, Mr. Stevens, or you will certainly fall into the fire."

"Get me the vinegar, then."

"Well, if you will have it, you shall. Let me see—oh, of course, there is some in the next room, and no mistake. I recollect now. It's in the corner cupboard. I'll go and get it in a moment for you, my dear friend. I—dear me, how the lock-up moves about—Why, I declare, it is quite, in a way of speaking, rotatory. Woa! woa!"

Mr. Bolt could manage to go on talking in his prosey way very well, as long as he kept his seat, but when he rose to his feet, it was quite a different affair, and the effect to him of his potations was just like being in a ship at sea with a cross gale. Of course, nobody ever heard of a drunken man yet who blamed himself for such apparent effects, and so, to be quite consistent, Mr. Bolt would have it that it was the lock-up that was going about in such a ludicrous manner with him.

"Well, this is odd," he said. "I can't make it out. The lock-up is drunk; It must be drunk, for sometimes the wall is here, and sometimes the door is here, and sometimes they are both there, and sometimes they are neither here nor there. It is very odd."

Mr. Bolt was so astonished at these phenomena connected with the hall of the lock-up, that he felt himself compelled to hold by the back of a chair while he considered them.

Mr. Stevens took that opportunity of letting his head droop upon his breast, and of falling fast asleep. It is just possible that if Bolt had been in a situation to get the vinegar with certainty, it might have had the effect of keeping Stevens awake; but as it was, nature yielded, and his sleep became profound.

Those who have had occasion to struggle against sleep will well understand what an uphill fight it is, and how the oftener you fancy you have defeated it the oftener it will renew the combat with you, until you give up the contest in despair. Such must have been Mr. Stevens' feeling; not but what if he had imagined for a moment that it was within the range of possibility that Duval and his companions should escape from the cells of the lock-up, it is likely enough that that would have had a sufficient effect to keep him wide awake.

But all his ideas went the other way, and it was only as a matter of principle, and not of necessity, that he had determined upon sitting up, for he believed the prisoners to be as safe as it was possible for any prisoners in the world to be. Mr. Stevens, however, like many other very clever men, made a mistake now and then.

"I'll try it again," said Bolt. "Who knows but that a drop of the vinegar would do me some good? I'll try it again. It's in the lower cupboard in the next room. Here goes!"

When Jack heard these words from Mr. Bolt, he thought that the danger was sufficiently imminent to say something to his friends about it, so leaving the door, he touched Claude upon the arm, and whispered—

"Bolt is coming."

"The devil he is!"

"Yes. He is coming to this room to get something out of the lower cupboard. He is drunk, but he is coming. It is for vinegar."

"Is it? Then, Jack, we must give him some pepper with it. How do you get on, Dick, with the floor-boards?"

"Capitally! the second one is just up. Holloa! what's that?"

There was a noise in the room above as of a chair thrown over, and the impression upon the mind of Dick was directly, that some one was there who, possibly enough, was cognisant of all his proceedings. A feeling of the most blank and bitter disappointment came over his mind at such a notion as this, and he paused in his work.

"Did you hear that?" he said.

"Yes," said Claude. "My opinion is, that a chair had one or two of its legs resting upon the floor-board that you were pushing up, and that you consequently upset it, as you could not avoid doing."

"Oh, yes, that is it. I did not think of that. What a relief it is to feel certain, as I do now, that that was it."

"I think you may be certain, Dick."

"I am sure I may. It is too probable. But what is that that Jack is saying about Bolt? I thought I heard his name?"

"Simply that he is coming here, that's all."

"Confound the fellow, is he?"

Dick jumped off the table as he spoke, and pointing to the hole in the ceiling, he said—

"Now, Claude, escape! There is the road to freedom; I don't think you will have any difficulty in getting through the ceiling."

"After you," said Claude.

Dick sprang upon the table again, and was through the hole in the roof in a moment. It was no time, that, to stand upon ceremony, or to delay the precious moments by useless altercation as to who was to take precedence.

CHAPTER CCLXVIII.

THE CONFEDERATES ARE DISTRESSED FOR THEIR HORSES, AND HEAR NEWS OF THEM.

"Now, Jack," said Claude Duval.

It did not take half a minute, now, to place them all three in the room above; but their danger soon became of the most imminent description, as it was quite evident that their foes from the outer room were approaching.

With a sudden burst the door was opened, and the voice of Bolt cried out—

"Hilloa! Hilloa!"

"All right!" said Claude Duval.

"The devil it is," said Bolt. "Help!—help! Murder—escape! Help—murder! Hoi! They are off!"

"To be sure we are," said Claude, as he made a spring towards the window and flung it open. "Come on, Jack and Dick. Speed does it now."

Claude felt quite convinced, now, that anything in the shape of further caution with regatd to the doings of himself and his friends was completely out of the question, and that it made not the slightest matter now with regard to the amount of noise they made in their escape.

The window was by no means so high from the open street as to present any serious difficulty in the way of leaping or dropping from it to men who had been accustomed to the sort of life that Duval and his associates led. They did not, however, at the moment notice that Mr. Bolt had a floricultural taste, and that the balcony of the window had a row of garden pots upon it, which went crashing into the street.

They were, however, but a trivial hinderance, and just as a gun or blunderbuss was fired through the opening in the roof from the room below, Claude had sprung through the open window and alighted safely in the street.

"Run Claude—run!" cried Jack.

"Not yet. Is anybody hurt?"

"No—no."

Dick now followed Claude's example and bounded through the window, but Jack was slow to follow.

"Save yourselves," he said, "and leave me. Oh, save yourselves!"

"Not for a thousand pounds," cried Claude. "If you do not wish to sacrifice us, you will come at once. Good Heavens, Jack, what has come over you?"

A kind of blight or stagnation seemed for the moment to have come over Jack, but from these words from Claude, he shook it off and sprang from the window. Claude partially broke his fall, and so they were all three in the street.

It was at this moment that Bolt and the officer who had taken such pains to secure Claude and his friends, and who had, to a certain extent, been so successful, made a rush into the street. The occurrence of the escape of the prisoners seemed to have had the effect of sobering them both on the instant.

Now, Claude had fully expected that such a result would ensue as these two men rushing out upon him and his friends; and as nothing was so disagreeable to him or so seriously dangerous as being chased through the streets by the officers, he had made up his mind that the contest with them should be there and then upon that spot.

"Dick," he said, "tackle one of them."

"All right," said Dick.

Claude, upon this, sprang upon the officer, as though he meant to devour him, and before he could possibly defend himself from the impetuosity of such an attack, which was more like that of a tiger upon his prey than one human being upon another, Claude had fairly lifted him off the ground and thrown him headlong into the lower room of the lock-up, where his head came into such violent contact with the little stove at which they had been so snugly enjoying themselves, that he lay as one dead.

While Claude was thus disposing of the officer, Mr. Bolt had ran right into the arms of Dick, who immediately grappled him, saying as he did so—

"Do you wrestle, old fellow?"

"A little," said Bolt, as he made one of the most determined efforts to throw Dick that was in his power.

"Good," said Dick, and then exerting all his strength and skill in an art that he almost stood alone in, Mr. Bolt's heels were soon up in the air, and his head came in rather disagreeable contact with the rough road paving of Bow

Street, and there he lay, with a full conviction in his own mind that every bone in his body was broken.

"All right!" cried Dick.

"Come on, then," said Claude, "follow me."

Duval turned the corner of Bow Street, and made towards Covent Garden Market, which at that hour of the morning was as still as the grave. After tumbling over some twenty or thirty of the poor, harmless wretches who nightly congregated there to sleep, he got right through the market and emerged opposite the church.

They were unperceived by any one.

"Our horses," said Dick, "oh, that we could find our horses."

"What's that?" said Jack, as a strange sound came upon his ears.

"Watchmen's rattles," said Claude, "that's all. I wonder how many watchmen it would take, now, at a moderate computation, to arrest us?"

"It's hardly possible to say," smiled Dick; "but, oh, for our horses!"

"Do not despair, Dick; we may yet find a way to get possession of them; and, for the present, I don't think we can do better than go to one of the kens, where we shall be safe enough till we can turn over in our minds what to do."

"We will follow you, Claude."

"Jack, where do you advise that we should go?"

"To Lipstone's," said Jack, "down by the river side. You can get to it by a dive down the dark arches by the Savoy."

"True. Come on, I had forgotten that. It will be the best place we can go to, for there is escape both by land and water, if it should be necessary. We have no time to lose. Come on."

Claude went first, and taking a slight turn to the left, he made his way down Southampton Street into the Strand, and in the course of two or three minutes they reached the mouth of one of those yawning arches opposite the Adelphi, which look as if they led to the infernal regions.

A watchman stood there, holding up his lantern and looking as well as he could down the archway, as he cried—

"Hilloa! hilloa! Come out of that, will you, or I shall be after coming and fetching you, and giving you a night's lodging in the lock-up, my hearty. Come out of that, will you?"

"What's the row?" said Claude, as with one blow he sent the watchman's hat right down over his eyes, and forced him to a sitting posture upon the stones at the entrance of the cavernous-looking place.

"Murder! murder! My rattle!"

"There it is," said Dick, as he seized it and swung it an amazing distance along the street. The confederates did not pause for the watchman to get his hat off his eyes and see them, but they at once, now, dived down the archway, and were lost to all sight in a moment.

How very dark it was in that place. Even Claude paused and instinctively held his hand out before him, for fear of suddenly encountering some obstacle to his progress.

"Jack! Jack!" he said. "Where are you?"

"I am here, Claude."

"Well, I think you know the way to where we want to go better than I do, or than Dick does, so will you take the lead? It is so precious dark here I cannot see in the smallest degree where I am going."

"I don't wonder at it. But it's not likely there is anything to obstruct you. However, we will not go any further till I have made the signal to some of old Lipstone's servants, if there are any about, to let them know that it is all right, and that we are friends."

"Do so, Jack."

"I don't know that signal," said Dick, "for my experience has, after all, lain more in the country than in town."

A very strange whistle, like that of some bird in the dark, who had an idea of singing, and yet was half afraid to trust his voice, now came upon the ears of Claude and Dick. The latter said in a low tone—

"Is that Jack?"

"Yes," said Claude; "listen to him. He does it beautifully. Don't speak a word until he has finished."

Dick and Claude now were profoundly still, while Jack went on with the odd whistling, which at moments sounded in tone as though the bird were thoroughly waking up, and asking himself if it were daylight yet; and at last he finished with a long clear note, and then all was still.

"It's a failure," said Dick. "There is no reply!"

"Hush!" said Jack.

At that moment, there came three clear notes, that any one would have sworn were those of a blackbird, and then a faint star-like light appeared, as if far away in the intense darkness of the place.

"All's right," said Jack. "That is our way. Keep that light in view, and you will go right, and we shall soon see less darkness."

They all three now kept the little star-like light steadily in view, and it seemed to move before them as they advanced in the cavern, for such it really looked like, did that gloomy arch leading right down to the banks of the Thames from the Strand.

Claude had the most absolute faith in the security of the position they would occupy, when once they should reach the place they were going to, and which among the "family" was called "Lipstone's Ken." It was well enough known to the police of London that there was such a place, but none had been able even to reach it, although the most persevering efforts had been made to do so, and every kind of treachery that could be practised was put into requisition for the purpose of getting a full knowledge of the place.

It is, after all, though, very doubtful if the officers at that time had any intention of breaking up this establishment of theirs. The policy of the police at the period when the numerous incidents of our tale occurred, was not to prevent crime, but to find it out.

The whole affair was looked upon as a lucrative branch of business, and the officers reasoned with themselves, that if there were no thieves, why, then there would be no officers, and so they should be out of trade. What they wanted was that there would be plenty of robberies, and plenty of officers to find them out, so that they had no desire in the world to break up these nurseries of crime, the kens, as they were called, of London.

In point of fact, at that period the morality of officers and of thieves was pretty much upon a par the one with the other, and it was by no means an unfrequent thing for a well-know cracksman or highwayman who might not happen to be "wanted" just then, as the slang term was, to meet an officer and take him into the nearest public-house, and treat him handsomely to the best the place afforded.

But to return to our friends, if we may call them such upon the strength of so long an acquaintance with them.

The little star-like light continued to retreat before them, until one would have thought that it must be going right into the Thames, and then suddenly it disappeared.

"What now?" said Dick.

"Oh, it's all right," said Jack.

"Yes, I recollect now," remarked Claude. "I suppose we shall have a visitor soon."

"We shall," replied Jack; "and here he is."

"Well," said a mild voice suddenly. "Who am I to have the pleasure of saying have arrived at this house?"

"It is all right," said Jack. "I am a blackbird, and so is one of my companions, and we two can introduce another according to rule."

"That is all right," said a voice; "but who are you?"

"I am called Sixteen-string Jack."

"Ah, I thought I knew the voice. Why, Jack, we have not seen you for an age. I don't know any that can whistle the blackbird's pass as you do!"

"Are you young Will Lipstone?"

"I am. Did you know my voice?"

"I thought I did; but I am very glad to find it is you, and I now tell you without further ceremony, that I am accompanied by Claude Duval and Dick Turpin."

"Is that possible!"

"It is true, Will, whether it is possible or not. Can they be in safety in the ken till we can think of what to do next, for we have just come out of the lock-up at Bow Street, without asking leave of any one but ourselves?"

"You don't know how glad I am to see you—no, not see you, for it would require better eyes than I have to do that here, but to know that you are coming to the old ken. There is not many there now. We must make Turpin a genuine blackbird before he leaves us."

"I shall be much gratified," said Dick.

"It shall be done. I can tell you, Turpin, that it is not every one who comes with two such sponsors as Jack and Claude Duval, who I am as glad to hear speak as possible."

"We are much beholden to your kindness, Will," said Claude. "Should you know me by my voice?"

"Ah, yes, I should, though it is four years since I heard it."

"Our horses," said Dick, "is what we are distressed for, or we should not have troubled you on this occasion."

"Don't speak of that. We will find out where the cattle are, by some means, and get possession of them, I dare say. Lay hold of me, Jack, if you please, and then if your two friends lay hold of you by the coat, we can all go right, for I can, so to speak, see my way in the dark here as well as in the light."

This arrangement was adopted, and they proceeded for about twenty paces in the most profound darkness, until a dull grating sound, as of a door moving upon very rusty hinges—then there came a flash of light, and the three friends could see each other and their guide, and likewise perceive that they were in a narrow passage with a vaulted roof and an earthen floor.

Dick was the only one of the three who was rather surprised at the appearance of young Will Lipstone. This young giant—for he really might be called such—was no less than six feet four inches, and he looked as he stooped in the narrow passage—which was only six feet in height—taller even than that, and that was nearly enough, Heaven knows.

Both Jack and Claude, who knew how tall Will was, were rather amused to see Dick moving his head up and down very gravely to get a good look at him, and Jack said—

"He is one of the littles ones, you see, Dick."

"He is, indeed."

"It ain't thought that I shall grow much more," said Will, in a rather apologetic tone of voice.

"It's to be sincerely hoped you won't," said Jack, "unless it's downwards a little; for you could very well spare half a dozen inches, Will."

"Well, they do say I'm rather long."

"And they are right," said Dick. "But where are we now?"

"Oh, we shall soon be in the ken, now. It's all right enough. We have got to pass one of our servants."

"In case, I suppose," said Jack, "anything should occur to you in the outer passage, Will?"

"Why, yes, there is no knowing. They do say that the officers have made a dead set upon the old ken, lately; but we have kept them out as yet, and I don't think, after all, anything but a good rousing fire would oust us now."

"Nor I, either."

Will still went on as he spoke, and at the end of the passage in which they were, they came to a little room, not much bigger than twice the size of a watch-box, but here there was a man with a lamp, who called out—

THE BLACKBIRDS MAKING THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE KEN.

"Who is it?"

"All's right," said Will.

"Oh, it's you, Will, is it?"

"Yes, friends all. Open the door of the crib, Tom, and let us pass through.

It ain't worth while anybody being quite outside now, but you can keep a kind of look-out from No. 1 door."

"I will. It can't be far off morning now, I take it."

CHAPTER CCLXIX.

A TRAGEDY IS PLAYED AT THE OLD KEN.

THE room in which the man named Tom kept guard—and which we have noticed as being so small—had what appeared to be panelled walls; but the fact was, that each of the seeming panelled walls was a door, being just about the ordinary shape and size of one.

Tom touched a spring bolt at the top of one of them, and it swung open at once; but all beyond it seemed to be very dark and drear, indeed; and yet the confused hum of voices came upon the ears of the friends.

"Here we are," said Will.

At the moment that he spoke, he drew aside a very large blanket that hung from the floor to the ceiling, and in an instant Jack and his companions found themselves in the old ken.

The place that they were in now, was nothing more nor less in appearance than a very large cellar. The roof was low, being not above eight feet at the highest from the floor, and the place was capable, probably, of accommodating about a hundred people altogether. Tables and chairs of all sorts and sizes were round the walls, but running down the centre there was one long table, evidently enough formed of three long planks of wood put together, and supported upon trestles. The table, if it might be so called as a matter of courtesy, was covered with a green baize cover, and at intervals there were lights upon it, so that the place was fairly enough illuminated.

The odour of tobacco made the air very offensive for a short time, until the lungs got a little used to it.

"Here we are," said Will. "I think Joe the Cracksman is king of the ken to-night. You can't very well see him from here, though."

Will was right enough when he spoke of the difficulty of seeing to the farther end of the ken, for about twenty or thirty of the persons present were smoking, and there was a thick gray cloud enveloping almost every object.

A bell hung close to the entrance, and now Will struck it in a peculiar manner, and in an instant all the confusion of sounds were hushed as if by magic, and all eyes were turned to Will and those who were with him.

"Who comes?" said a voice from the farther end of the room.

"Two blackbirds," said Will, "and one linnet."

"Oh, very good. The two blackbirds answer for the linnet?"

"Yes, and so do I."

"That's better. One guinea, linnet, if you please."

"Am I to pay a guinea?" said Dick.

"Yes," said Will. "It's all right: I will pay it."

"Thank you. The fact is, my exchequer is rather low just now. I will make it all right with you."

"Oh, stuff—don't mention it."

"Who are the blackbirds?" said the voice from the farther end of the room, and which may be concluded to come from Joe the Cracksman, although it sounded quite mystic from the midst of the vapours of tobacco smoke.

"One is our old friend, Sixteen-string Jack!"

"Hurrah!" shouted everybody in the old ken. "Hurrah!—hurrah!" and the lights danced again with the concussion of the air.

"The other?" shouted Joe the Cracksman, who now, as the majority had left off smoking to take a good look at the new comers, was just beginning to be dimly seen.

"The other is Claude Duval!"

At the sound of this name, which by that time had acquired almost an European celebrity, everybody rose, and there was a grand rush to get to the end of the ken where Claude was, for although they all knew that he had been there before, yet few had had an opportunity of thus seeing him, and all his most renowned exploits had been done during the few years that he had been away.

"Stand back, blockheads," said Joe, "stand back. We are well pleased to see Claude Duval here, and Sixteen-string Jack, and if it is danger that brings them to the old den, we will stand by them like men."

"We will—we will!" shouted everybody.

"I don't know how to thank you all for this kind reception," said Claude. "It is danger that has brought us among you. The fact is, the Philistines thought proper to place us in the lock-up at Bow Street, but we thought we would rather be here by a great deal, so here we are."

"Hurrah! That's it—all right. Did you burn down the blessed crib?"

"No, but I am afraid we have damaged it a little, as well as some of those who were so delighted with our company that they wanted us to stay all night, and then be introduced to their friends in the morning."

A roar of laughter greeted this speech.

"But you haven't told us who the second is," said Joe the Cracksman.

"I will, though," said Will. "They call him Dick Turpin."

The sensation at the announcement of this other name, so well known to fame and the road, was tremendous. Never before had three such luminaries, in the highwayman world, been in the old place all at once, and the enthusiasm of those who hoped that the time would come when they should be able to emulate the exploits of the three friends was unbounded.

About a dozen glasses were held to the lips of each of the visitors, and it was only by Claude crying out that they had had plenty to drink already, and had work to do before the morning, that they escaped being deluged by all sorts of liquors.

Some half dozen voices declared that they had heard of the arrival of the confederates, and then, in a momentary calm, Claude said—

"If there should be any one here who can get us information of where our cattle are stowed, we shall be much obliged. Without our horses we hardly know what to do, but if we can only discover where they are, we have no sort of doubt of recovering them."

A variety of conjectures were immediately hazarded, and, finally, two of those present were despatched to make all the inquiry possible upon that subject. Joe the Cracksman put it to the meeting that Dick be forthwith declared a blackbird by acclamation, which was done, and then he was initiated into those particularities which would at any time procure him admittance to the ken, and all the assistance and support that the fraternity could offer him. The rules were read over to him; and the punishment for any treachery, or the introduction of an officer to the ken, was hanging.

"I shall not incur that," said Dick, with a smile. "The officers and I don't usually hit it very well, and I rather think now that I shall be like my two friends here, that is to say—"Wanted" for the rest of my life."

Tingle went the bell at the door at the moment, and the voice of the man who had been named Tom, by long Will, called out—

"A blackbird and a linnet!"

There was a deathlike stillness now, as two persons made their appearance in the ken.

One of the persons was a small, wiry-looking man, who was a member of the ken; but the person with him was a much stouter personage, and a stranger to all appearance to all present.

"Who is the blackbird?" said Joe the Cracksman.

"I am, as is tolerably well known to all the highly honourable fraternity," said the smaller of the two men, "John Stokes, and a cracksman."

"Who is the linnet?"

"The linnet is a friend of mine, who has taken to the road, gentlemen, and who wishes to be errolled in the brotherhood. He took two watches upon Hounslow Heath, only last week, and yesterday he stopped a coach upon Ealing Common, and with a good booty."

"I did," said the linnet.

"Very well; does he know our rules?"

"Yes, Joe, he does. Here's his guinea, and he puts another five to it for good fellowship, and is willing, at all times and in all seasons, to abide by the old ken."

"That is right. Has any member of the ken anything to say in the matter, for now is the time, before it is all settled, and the name of the new member put down in the roll?"

"Yes," said one rising, "I have something to say—Is the door closed, and are we all right?"

"All," said long Will.

"Very good; then I propose that the new member be searched. It ain't a th ng that we often do, but there's one of our rules that lets us do it if we like—I propose that he be searched, and if nothing suspicious is found upon him, I will be the first to drink his health."

No one made the slightest remark upon this but Joe the Cracksman, who occupied the position of authority in the chair, and he said—

"Very well. One of our rules says, that any blackbird can ask that a linnet should be searched upon his applying to be a member, so I can't say nay to it."

Those who were the nearest to the linnet saw, or fancied they saw, that he shook a little, and that he changed colour; but whether such was the fact or not was a very difficult thing to say in the uncertain light that was in the place: He spoke calmly enough.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I had no sort of idea that I should be looked upon with any degree of suspicion. If I had known that, I would have foregone even the great advantage of belonging to this honourable fraternity; but I really thought my friend here was in great esteem among you."

"No, he isn't!" said several voices.

"A sneak!" cried one.

"Order! order!" said Joe the Cracksman, "this must not be. It is true, enough that we have heard some things of John Stokes that we don't like; but so long as he kept good faith with us we were not bound to notice them."

"What things?" said the man named John Stokes.

"Oh, we will tell you. We heard that you were seen visiting the house of an officer named Hunt, and that, without doing a bit of work, you had plenty of money. We heard, too, that you had gone in a coach to the Secretary of State's offices in Downing-street. Is that true?"

"It is not. I have been very much maligned, or else I have been mistaken for some one else."

"I hope so."

"So do I," said the man who had come to be made a blackbird; "but if there be, really, any diffidence in admitting me, I will retire at once, hoping that at some future opportunity I may have the pleasure of being proposed by some more popular member of the assembly; and of being admitted as a blackbird into it is my great ambition to be, gentlemen, and I feel quite sure that you will admit that it is a laudable ambition, and that I have treated you all with the greatest possible respect, and so I humbly take my leave."

"Not quite so fast," said Will, who mistrusted the candidate. "We will admit you, no doubt."

"Then I am quite happy."

"After the search has proved satisfactory."

"Oh!"

"We don't behave shabbily. We will either admit you, or let you know some good reason why we won't, if you are proposed by the devil himself."

"Very good, very good. I will be back in a little while—I, that is.—What is this for?"

A couple of the blackbirds suddenly rushed upon the candidate and held his arms. They pulled his hand out from the breast of his apparel, into which he had plunged it, and found that it grasped something. Upon forcing open his fingers, they saw that is was a copper ball that he had in his hand, and a very slight examination showed that it was so constructed that it would explode if thrown hardly to the ground or against the wall, and they did not entertain a doubt but that the noise it would make would be terrific, if it did no further danger.

"The door! Guard the door," cried Joe the Cracksman.

"It is," said Will.

"Silence—silence! Peace in the blackbirds' nest!"

Every sound was hushed, but half a dozen strong men surrounded both the candidate and his friend.

"Now search him," said the king of the blackbirds, as the president of the night was called.

"Hold!" said the Linnet. "What is it that you want to know?"

"Who and what you are, that's what we want to know."

"Then I will tell you."

"Oh, no—no!" cried John Stokes—"oh, no.—That will do no good. Are you quite mad?"

"Hold, John Stokes," cried Joe the Cracksman.

There is no knowing exactly what, in his rage, John Stokes might have done, if violent hands had not been laid upon him in such a fashion that he was made as secure from perpetrating any mischief as if he had been in a vice.

"Now go on, linnet," said the president, to the man who stood resolutely, but still very pale, before the fearful array of angry faces around him.

"I will," he said. "When there is no longer any use in disguising the truth, it is much better to admit it at once. I do not pay you the bad compliment of supposing you are such fools as to make it possible that I can deceive you any longer."

"Mad! mad! Quite mad!" cried John Stokes.

"Not at all," said the other. "Listen attentively to me, all of you. It is the duty of an officer of the police to do all he can in his vocation against you. It is but natural that he should do so; and so long as he does that without any other feeling than a public one, he is not to be condemned."

"Go on," said the president.

Claude and his friends felt an interest in this man who, in so critical a situation, had the boldness to defend himself in such a way. They all three hoped that he would be spared, although if they might judge by the scowling, angry countenances about them, they doubted it.

"Go on. Go on!" cried several.

"I will go on," said the man. "I have told you that it is the duty of an officer of the police to do what he can in a legitimate way against you, and at the same time that I tell you all this, I pay you the compliment of supposing that you are all real, downright Englishmen, and not assassins. I am an officer of police!"

The yell that arose at this speech was deafening, and several made a rush forward towards the officer. Claude stepped before him.

"Hold!" he said. "Is it a fact that when this man called you Englishmen, it was only a piece of gross flattery?"

They shrank back, but a voice called out—

"Death to the spy?"

"Death—death!" shouted twenty others.

"Not now," said Claude, as he held his arm over the head of the officer. "You shall not in a moment of passion play the parts of cowards, and then regret it afterwards when it is past recalling. We will hear what this man has further to say."

"Who are you?" cried a ferocious looking fellow with a large red face. "Who, are you that comes here to interfere with us?"

"I am a blackbird, I believe," said Claude, "and if you have any desire to know anything further of me, I advise you to come within reach of my arm, that is all."

"Oh, you can bully, can you?"

"I can threaten when I see occasion, and it is well for those whom I do threaten to take warning by those threats."

"We will soon see about that."

The fellow made a rush upon Claude, but the latter was quite prepared for him, and grappled him by the throat. The struggle that ensued was short but decisive, for Claude threw his opponent on to the middle of the long table, with a crash that broke down a portion of it and scattered the lights in all directions, as well as leaving the bully in a state of complete insensibility upon the floor, in the midst of the wreck which his fall had occasioned upon that spot.

CHAPTER CCLXX.

THE CONFEDERATES ESCAPE BY THE RIVER.

"Is there any other gentleman," said Claude calmly, "who is inclined to try his skill upon me, or are we all friends as we ought to be, joined together in one common cause? Is there any one who suspects me of being other than a true member of the family, or that I, with my reputation and my name, and with five hundred pounds reward hanging over my head for my body, dead or alive, can have any other intentions than those in common with all here?"

This speech, with its rough logic, was so much to the purpose, that it was quite impossible but that it should have its due effect upon those who heard it. It came, too, from one whom they were quite prepared to listen to with respect, and the exhibition of physical power that Claude Duval had so recently made was not without its effect in his favour.

One voice cried out—

"Long live Claude Duval! Hurrah!"

It only wanted such an impulse as that, and then all followed it, and Duval saw at once that he possessed a large share of influence with the strange assemblage around him. He wished to use that influence, if he possibly could, in saving the life of the officer.

This was a task which any one but Claude Duval might well have shrunk from with dismay; but the fact was, that he was so much in the habit of doing things that other people would not attempt, that he did not feel inclined to shrink from this one.

"My good friends," he said, "I understand that you give me credit for being, indeed, your friend, and I can say that I would risk my life at any moment rather than a hair of the head of any one of you should be injured. When, four years, ago I came to this place and joined your fraternity, I did not do so in idleness or in sport, but I did so in truth and reality, and I look upon you all as my associates and friends."

"Hear! hear! That's it, Duval. That's right!"

"Then let us hear what this man has to say."

"Stop a bit," said the cracksman who was in the chair. "It is quite clear, Claude Duval, that the blackbirds to-night will pay a deal more attention to what you say, than to what I say, and I don't at all object to it, for I admire your courage and your talents as much as anybody can do, so I propose that you take the chair, and that I leave it, when you will not find a more devoted friend and adherent than Joe the Cracksman."

"That's right, Joe," cried some dozen or so of voices. "That's a fine speech, Joe! That's all right, old fellow! You won't better that—We don't think the worse of you, old boy! Hurrah for Joe!"

Claude Duval tried to say something of a deprecatory character, but he was voted into the chair, and declared, for that night, king of the blackbirds, with all the honours usually given upon such an occasion.

Upon the whole, Claude was glad that he was placed in such a situation. He felt that it gave him the influence of authority as well as that of an individual, and he hoped that it would arm him with power to prevent any act of violence that might be in the contemplation of the more energetic portion of the fraternity about him.

Jack and Dick kept close to him when he was installed in the chair, and after the cheers had subsided that had heralded him to it, he rose, and showed by his gestures that he had something to say to the rather motley assemblage before him.

All was immediately silent, and it was quite clear from the looks of the officer, that from the moment Claude Duval was placed in the chair he had some hopes of escape from the perplexing situation in which he had placed himself.

"Good friends," said Claude, "I wish that we should all of us hear out what that man has to say. It is impossible we can come to any decision concerning him, without we give him a patient hearing."

"Hear him! Hear him!"

"Now, Mr. Officer," said Claude, "what is your name?"

"James Brand!"

A groan and a shout burst from the lips of the blackbirds as they heard in that name the designation of one of the most formidable and bold of the Bow Street runners.

"Very well; you are a bold man."

"I hope so," said the officer.

"You need not hope it, for you are so—that is past a doubt; and it is a quality that we all rather admire than otherwise; but we have our safety to look to before we give way to admiration of your bravery; so, now, what have you to say to us in your self-preservation?"

"Not much," said Brand. "I knew very well before I came here that I was running a great risk, and yet I do not think you ought to feel so very much infuriated at me as some of you seem to do. As I said before, it is my duty to do what I can to vindicate the law against the law-breakers; but I would fain say something for the man who brought me here, John Stokes."

"Hang him!" shouted several voices.

"Do you mean me, gentlemen," said the officer, with the most innocent look in the world, "or do you mean my friend, Stokes?"

It was impossible to avoid laughing at the tone and manner in which this question was put; and Claude, with his friends, could not but admire the consummate coolness and courage of a man who was in such really imminent danger as that which surrounded the officer.

"Both of you," cried several.

"Oh, that is very expressive indeed," said Brand, "and allow me, in the first instance, to tell you what I can tell you in excuse of this John Stokes; as for myself, I consider that I require no further justification than that I am doing my duty; and there is not one of you who, if he had been an officer and had the courage, which I daresay you all have, who would have scrupled to do just as I have done. And now, regarding Stokes."

John Stoker was very far from putting the bold front upon the affair that the officer did. It was quite evident that he was oppressed by the most abject fear, and that it was as much as he could do to keep himself from some very pitiful display of it. He looked about him as though he were seeking for some face in which he might see a ray of compassion; but he found none, and Claude was too far off to be looked at.

"Go on," said Duval to the officer, for he was not a little curious to hear what he could possibly find to say for John Stokes.

"I will go on. This man, Stokes, then, committed a robbery, and was caught. He was caught in the very fact, and the proofs of the case were so clear and so undeniable, that it would only have saved trouble if he had hung himself at once, for death by the hangman's hands stared him in the face next sessions."

"Yes—oh, yes," stammered John Stokes.

"Well, it was a great point with the magistracy to apprehend the whole of you here present calling yourselves the blackbirds."

A yell of execration interrupted the speech.

"Oh, be patient, gentlemen; you are not apprehended yet."

"Confound the fellow's impudence," whispered Dick to Claude.

"Hear him out," said Claude.

"No, gentlemen, you are not apprehended yet," added Brand; "but an offer was made to this man, John Stokes, by the Secretary of State, an offer between life and death—the cord or liberty. He was offered his freedom, and a sum of money to go to a foreign country with, if he would betray you all."

"Hang him!—hang him!"

"Now, gentlemen, consider, what was poor John Stokes to do? If he refused, we would assuredly have hung him; if he consented, he had the chance of saving himself; so, upon the principle of self-preservation, John Stokes was right to bring me here to-night."

"Curse the impudence of that fellow," said Dick.

"It is cool," said Claude, "and yet I like the fellow for it. I never could have supposed that there was such a man in the police."

"Nor I," said Jack, "and I should be very sorrow if he were to be murdered in this place to-night."

"He shall not be," said Claude, in a low voice, "if I can possibly help it."

The officer ceased speaking, and then Claude, turning to John Stokes, said—

"Is all that true that Brand has stated?"

"It is," gasped Stokes. "Oh, spare my life!—Have mercy upon me!—It will do you no good to kill me."

"Silence! You will do yourself no good by entreaties of this kind."

"There is one thing," added Brand, "that I may tell you, and that is, that I am as ignorant of the way into this place as I was before. My eyes were blindfolded as I was brought in here, and I know no more than I did before, namely that there is such a place."

"How was that?" said Claude; "were his eyes blindfolded."

"Yes," said Long Will. "Tom was suspicious of any friend of John Stokes's, so he did so as a matter of precaution."

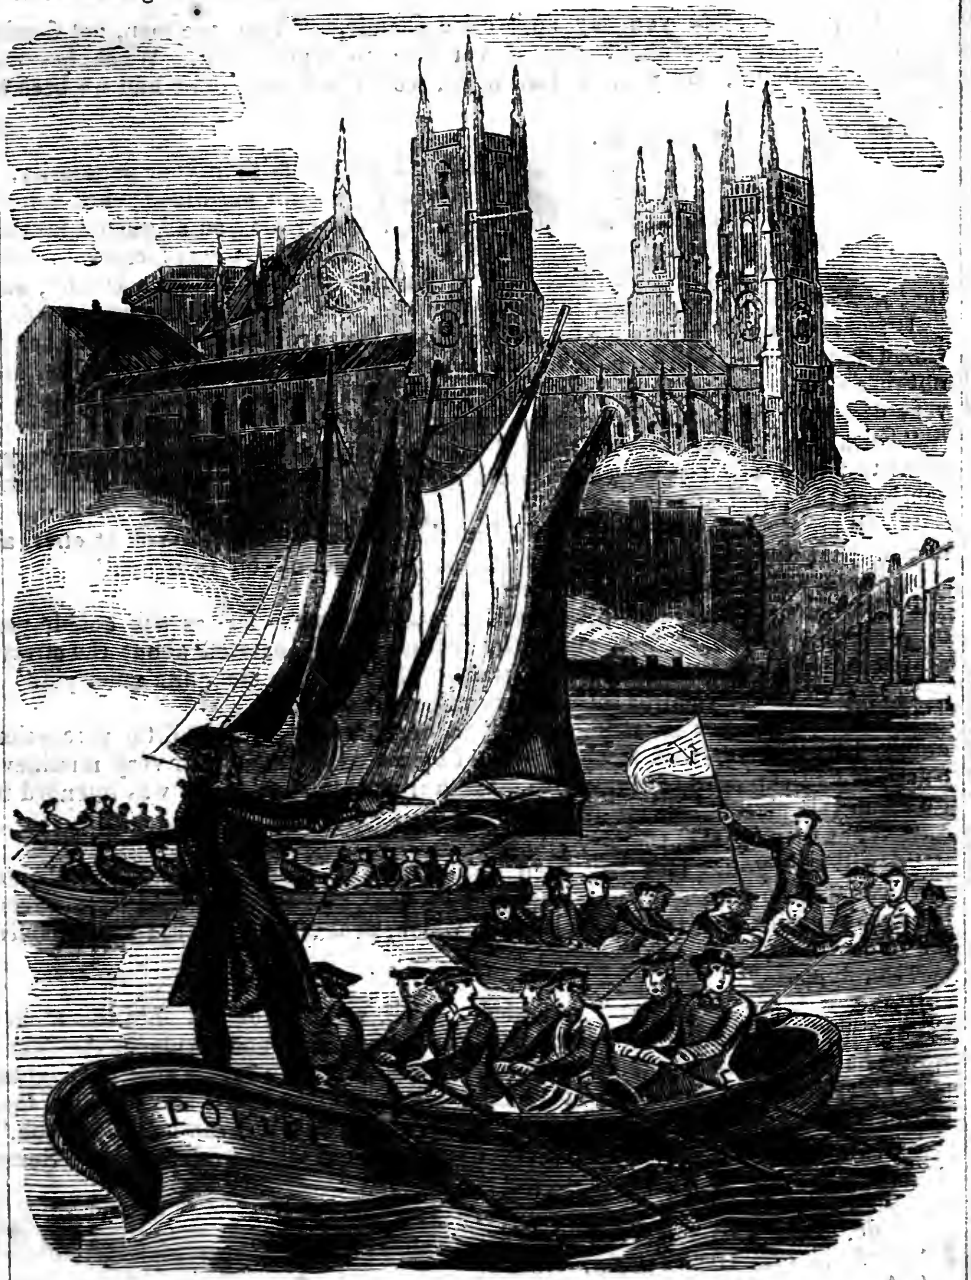
"Well," said Claude, "perhaps, as you are so candid, Mr. Brand, you will tell me what was the use of the copper ball you had in your possession?"

Brand was silent.

"Will you answer?"

"I hardly know what answer to say to you," he said, at length. "Life is as sw et to me as it is to most folks, and I think that you ought to make a bargain with me, that if I do you all a good turn, you will allow me to go in peace from you this time."

"No—no!" cried almost every one. "Hang him!—hang him!"



"Hush!" said Claude. "I think you are all too precipitate. It is possible enough that to save his own life, Brand may give us valuable information."

"That is just what I am willing to do," said the officer.

"And my life, too," howled John Stokes.

"Oh, hold your tongue," said Brand; "nobody will think your life worth the taking; don't make that hideous noise."

Claude bit his lips to keep himself from laughing, and then, as he saw doubt and hesitation upon the faces of the blackbirds, he seized the opportunity of endeavouring to turn them in the direction he wished them to go.

THE PURSUIT AFTER THE BLACKBIRDS BY THE POLICE-GALLEY.

"Let me beg of you all to consider," he said, "that your own preservation is of much more importance than the gratification of a blind revenge against Brand, who, setting aside the fact that he certainly is our enemy, is a man whom we may all respect for his bold and straightforward conduct."

Some murmurs of disapprobation came from the blackbirds, but Claude would not notice them, and continued speaking.

"We ought to look to ourselves, and I think that we might safely make a conditional promise to Mr. Brand, that if his information be of great importance to us, we will let him go free."

"No—no!"

"Oh, pause before you say no," cried Claude. "You are men, not fiends. You have good sense about you, if you like to appeal to it. What has this officer done that I, and you, and all of us, would not have done had we been in his situation?"

The blackbirds were silent.

"Listen to me, all of you," said Brand. "I will put faith in your generosity. I don't think that there is one among you who thirsts for my blood; but I don't expect you will let me off for nothing. I will, however, do you all such a favour, then, if there is a grateful feeling in any of your hearts, you will reply to it by giving me my liberty. I will trust you with the secret that will save you all, and that if you like to murder me, the infamy of the deed be upon your own heads."

It would be quite impossible by any language to convey the tone and manner in which these words were spoken. They were boldness itself, and yet there was nothing at all arragont in them, or in any way defiant or offensive. They made a very decidedly favourable impression upon all who heard them.

"Speak on," said Claude, "we will hear you; and if it will be any encouragement to you, I will tell you, that you are adopting the only course that I think can have the effect of saving you."

"You are a good authority," said Brand, "and so I will tell you at once, all of you, that there is a plan on foot to arrest every one of you to-night."

An uneasy movement pervaded the assemblage.

"The particulars of that plan I will explain to you so far as will enable you to escape its action. There are now, by this time, concealed about the streets a hundred well-armed men. Do not start. They will remain quite quiet yet."

Several of the blackbirds looked very uneasy indeed.

"What I tell you is strictly true," added Brand. "The little percussion copper ball that you took from me, would by no means have been very mischievous if it had exploded, but it would make a tremendous noise. It was intended to go off in this place."

"What then?" said Claude.

"I will tell you. If I had been duly elected a brother blackbird, I should have counted how many of you were here present, and then I should have taken the first plausible opportunity of leaving, which, probably, youwould have enabled me to do freely."

"Surely, yes."

"And with my eyes not blindfolded. Well, when I got out into the arches beyond here, I should have cast down the copper ball and exploded it. That would have been the signal for the men in ambush to rush to this spot with lights, and every possible means of overcoming all opposition, and I should then, too, have been in a position to guide them to this apartment, if it can be called such."

The blackbirds looked at each other with consternation and surprise. Some were incredulous of the fact.

"You surely believe it?" said Brand.

"I do," said Claude Duval.

"And I," said Dick Turpin.

"And I," said Sixteen-string Jack.

"Gentlemen, I thank you for giving credence to me, and it will be well if others do the same, for it will be the only means by which they can be saved."

"How do you make that out?" cried one.

"This way," said Mr. Brand, as he very coolly took out his watch and consulted it. "I make it twenty minutes to three exactly. What do you say, gentlemen?"

"Right! right!" cried several.

"What of that?" said Claude. "Go on, Mr. Brand."

"Very well, then. Of course it was not likely to escape the calculation of those who requested me to come upon this expedition that something might happen to me to prevent me from giving the signal at all, and in that case it was agreed that a vigorous attack was to be made upon this place as three o'clock struck by the church in the street yonder, so that, you see, that you have all of you just twenty minutes to get comfortably away in, and to save yourselves."

Everybody rose now in disorder, and as everybody began to say something at once, it was no easy matter to know what they would be about. Claude raised his voice above the din and said—

"Silence! Those who wish to perish will continu this tumult—those who would save themselves will be still.

"That's right," said Bland."

Every voice was hushed upon the instant.

"Hark you all," said Claude. "I think that Brand has nobly redeemed his promise. He has given us information that is of the utmost importance to us; and considering such, I propose that he be let go free."

"No!—no!"

"Oh, consider all of you. It would be not only a criminal act, but, to my thinking, it would be a base act to take his life."

"Hang him!—hang him!" cried all the voices, with the exception of a very few, indeed.

"No," shouted Claude, "it must not, and shall not be! If you reach that man to take his life, it shall first be over my dead body. I will not sit here and see a brutal murder done."

CHAPTER CCLXXI.

CLAUDE FINDS THAT BRAND CAN BE GRATEFUL.—

The feelings of Claude were wound up to such a pitch by the brutal designs of the blackbirds to kill the officer, after he had really given such information to them, that, heedless of what might possibly be the personal consequences to himself, he made a rush as he spoke right along the whole length of the table in the centre of the ken, and jumped down to the floor at the other end of it close to Brand.

Dick and Jack followed his example.

"Now," shouted Claude, in his clear manly voice, while the colour heightened upon his cheek, "now, who will side with me and with justice? Who will be barve enough to do what is right as well as what is wise, along with Claude Duval?"

"And with Dick Turpin too," cried Dick.

"And wtih Sixteen-string Jack," said Jack.

"I—I—I," shouted some eight or ten of the blackbirds, and then there arose a loud shout from the whole of them, for those who still had the wish to put Brand to death, found that they were in a small minority, and that they would have no chance of carrying their point now against Claude Duval and his adherents.

"That's all settled, then," said Claude, "and I admire you all for so settling it. Mr. Brand, you are free; but you will not make so bad a use of that freedom as to play us false, I am sure."

"I will go with you," said Brand, "until you are out of danger, and then you will be quite at ease upon that point."

Nothing could be very well more judicious than this proposal, as it at once put an end to all fears upon the parts even of the most suspicious regarding the good faith of Brand.

"That is all right," said Claude Duval; "and now you all of you know better what to do than we, so let us follow you at once."

At this moment, one of the scouts who had been sent forth to make inquiries concerning the horses of our adventurers entered, and coming up to Claude, he said in a low tone—

"News of your cattle, Claude Duval."

"Ah, have you?"

"Yes; you will find the exact address where they are written upon this little slip of paper."

"A thousand thanks," said Claude, as he took the slip of paper, folded up as it was, and placed it in his pocket.

The blackbirds had now begun to stir themselves in earnest to leave the old ken, and by the general agreement of various watches that were produced, it was tolerably evident that only ten minutes remained for them to evacuate the place in.

"What course will you adopt?" said Claude. "Recollect that we cannot leave as we came in. There is an armed force there."

"The river!—The river!" cried half a dozen voices. "We must all leave by the river."

"Good," said Claude. "I think. with you, that it is the only chance."

The proceedings of the blackbirds were now tolerably quick. In the first place they got, without much ceremony, from the pockets of Mr. Brand, the officer, a pair of handcuffs, which they placed upon the wrists of John Stokes, and it was tolerably evident that, notwithstanding the imminent character of the dangers that beset them, they did not intend to let him go.

"You will spare him now?" said Brand.

"You mind your own business," replied one who was active in the affair. "Claude Duval has got you off, and that's enough for you."

Brand was silent.

There could be no sort of doubt upon the mind of the officer but that he would have been sacrificed to the fury of the thieves if it had not been for Claude Duval's presence there, and the extraordinary influence which he managed to exercise over the party.

We shall see whether such a favour from Duval to the officer awakened any corresponding sensations in his breast.

It was curious now for Claude and Dick and Jack, to notice the dexterity with which the blackbirds acted. Both Jack and Claude knew that there was another way of getting out of the ken than by the route they had taken to get into it, but Dick did not, he was too lately initiated into the society to have received that information.

Immediately behind the elevated seat—indeed, the seat was placed upon the table—upon which Joe the Cracksman had sat, and into which Claude had been inducted upon his merits, the wall of the ken seemed to be constructed of rather roughly put together wainscoting; and now two of the blackbirds who were good workmen approached it, and had down one of the long panels in a moment.

Another and another of the panels were removed, and then when the whole space was nearly open, there appeared a room, which had evidently been built by workmen who knew their trade.

"What place is that?" said Dick to Jack.

"That is a house," said Jack, "that stands upon the banks of the river. It is empty, but it is rented by one of the blackbirds, who now and then makes a show of living in it. It commands a direct course to the water side, and there is a little quay specially belonging to it."

"That is capital."

"Well, it is not altogether the worst place in the world. But see, they are going fast!"

"How will they get off when they get to the river side?"

"Oh, there are short of forty of them altogether, and they will easily enough get away. A few boats that they can hail will take them off, and they have a desire to avoid observation."

"They would need to have one."

"You shall see."

"Come on," said Claude, at this moment; "we shall be late."

The three friends were nearly the last to leave the ken. The officer, Mr. Brand, had gone away the first, for he had been carefully looked to by four of the blackbirds, who contrived pretty well to keep around him in such a way, that any attempt to escape from them would be utterly fruitless. The officer did not appear to be at all put out of humour by this species of surveillance. He felt that, situated as he was, it was of no use to object to anything, and that there was likewise abundance of room to have a little suspicion of him.

Brand, in the whole affair, acted evidently upon the most philosophical principles. He was determined to save his own life if he could; and as he, no doubt, considered that he would be much more useful as an officer for the future alive than dead, he considered that the present escape of the blackbirds was quite a minor evil in comparison to his being knocked on the head, which, by the by, would still not have prevented their escape at all.

He was a clever man, that Brand.

The same number of blackbirds likewise attended upon John Stokes, although in the state of abject terror that that individual was in, one would have been quite sufficient; but they thought that it was probably quite as well to make assurance doubly sure, so they did him the honour of giving him a good guard.

The hour at which the attack was to be made upon the place was now fearfully near at hand, and Claude Duval thought that yet there might be some catastrophe.

After passing through the room that was immediately behind the ken, the wall was put up again with great dexterity, and if it looked as well upon what may be called the ken-side of it as it had done before it was taken down, the officers who should come into the place might well be deceived into the idea that there was no other outlet from the place than that by which they had managed to enter it.

It was Joe the Cracksman who appeared to know exactly the route to pursue, for he took the lead, and every now and then he kept crying out—

"This way, blackbirds. This way. Follow me. This way, blackbirds, and all will be right!"

One, and one only, carried a light, which shed a lurid and strange flickering glare upon the mouldy walls of the old deserted house that they were passing through.

Claude counted no less than five rooms that they made their way through, before a gush of cold damp air told him that they must be close to the bank of the river. Then Joe the Cracksman called out—

"Silence, noble blackbirds! Here we are. Half a dozen steps more takes us to the quay. We must get off cautiously."

"The flag," said one.

"Yes, I will not forget the flag."

"What the deuce do they mean by that?" said Dick.

"I don't know," said Claude. "It is some new device that I know nothing of, but you may depend it is all right."

"I can tell you," said Jack.

Just as Jack was upon the point of giving to Claude and Dick the required information, a loud shout from the direction of the ken that they had just left came upon their ears, and then there was a discharge of fire-arms.

"Ah," said Jack, "the officers have made the attack."

"They have, indeed."

"I told you so," said a voice close to Claude, and he recognised it as the voice of Brand the officer, although it was too dark where they stood for him to be seen.

"Yes," said Claude, "you spoke the truth."

"There was no good to be done in any other way."

"I quite agree with you there."

"The fact is, that they were more likely to be, from their impatience, a few minutes before their time than after it, and I would advise our friends, the blackbirds here, to get away as fast as they can, for disappointment will, perhaps, induce those who, by this time, are in the ken, to pursue their inquiries a little further, and a fight in the dark here would just be a scene of the most horrible slaughter."

"You are right," said Claude. "What are they doing now upon the river-side, I wonder?"

"It's all right," said a strange voice. "Joe is getting the boats—ah, here he comes."

A shrill whistle at this moment sounded upon the night air, and then there came the strange imitation of the notes of the blackbird, which were the private call or pass note of the association. Directly the sound came upon the ears of those around Claude and his friends, they began to move silently towards the banks of the river. Claude followed, and in a few seconds they were all by the side of the stream.

Fortunately for the blackbirds, it was high water.

How they had procured the boats it is hard to say. It is only just possible that they had managed—at that dull hour, when no one was upon the look out—to steal them from a rather popular landing-place that was in the immediate neighbourhood; but be this as it may, boats they had.

The Thames wherries have only of late years been such little miserable things as they are. As time rolls on they will be quite extinct, for now it is a thing of foolish temerity to venture upon the bosom of the stream in a boat not much more secure than a cockle shell, where steamers are crossing and re-crossing in all possible directions.

The boats that were by the bank now, and into which the blackbirds silently made their way, were of a good size, and would very well hold from twelve to fourteen persons each, so that three of them did very well for the whole party with a little crowding.

CHAPTER CCLXXII.

THE PROGRESS DOWN THE RIVER, AND THE POLICE-GALLEY.

The blackbirds went apparently upon the principle of placing the most precious freight all in one boat; for in the first boat of the little squadron there was Claude Duval, and there was Jack and Dick, and Brand the officer, and John Stokes the treacherous blackbird, who may be considered to have brought all this danger upon them.

In the two other boats, which kept, as Claude thought, very inconsiderately close to the first one, were the other blackbirds.

As they pushed off from the little landing-place, that belonged very especially to the house at the river bank, the early light of the dawn was just visible, and if it had not been that there was a light kind of fog upon the river, no doubt objects would have been visible tolerably plainly. The fog or mist, however, got whiter and whiter every moment, so that it was quite evident that it would soon clear off, and then the daylight would be upon and about them rather suddenly.

"The flag," said Joe the Cracksman, "now for the flag."

"Yes, Joe, all right; here it is."

"What can be the meaning of this, Jack?" said Claude; "you were going to tell us when we were interrupted."

"Why, the fact of it is," said Jack, "the flag is very religious."

"Religious?"

"Yes. It is a common custom at this time of the year for various religious sects to go upon water parties on the river, and they generally carry a flag with them, with the name of their sect or society upon it; and sing hymns as they go along. The River Police don't at all interfere with them, and our friends the blackbirds being provided against such an emergency as this, put on her such a flag, and I shouldn't be at all surprised if they burst into a hymn."

"Well," said Claude, "it is rather a clever trick."

"It will answer, too."

Brand laughed.

"What do you think of all this, Mr. Brand?" added Claude.

"Well, to tell the truth, I don't like it."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, I cannot shut my eyes to it, and I feel that I have no right to know it, since it is by accident that it all comes to my knowledge, you see; and if I were to make use of this information, it would not, to my thinking, seem like fair play."

"You are an honourable fellow, Brand."

"I try to be so, Claude Duval, and I can safely say this much, that I will not, if I can possibly help it, take any sort of advantage of the little secrets that have come to my knowledge this night."

"You are quite right. Good God, what is that?"

"The hymn," said Jack.

Two dozen of the blackbirds had at this moment tried their sweet voices at a hymn; and although there were some among them who could really sing very well, the effect upon the whole was very ludicrous, for not even the conviction that they were all in the most imminent danger could induced them to execute the hymn with that steadiness and gravity that it required.

"Really," said Claude, "that hymn, or pretended hymn, is the most execrable thing I have heard for a long time."

"It is foolish," said Jack; "they had better, by all means, leave it alone, than bring it out in the manner they do."

Jack gave this opinion aloud, so that it soon spread over the boat; but it had no effect, except to cause some laughing, and the hymn was sung right through, notwithstanding all the disapprobation with which it was regarded by those who were keenly alive to the danger of the position in which the boats, with their closely packed living freights, were.

Suddenly, as if by magic, the white mist that had been upon the surface of the river rolled off, leaving the water bright and clear, for the Thames was in not quite so bad a state then as it is now. There were not so many abominations upon the banks of it, and you might go from Blackfriars Bridge up to Chelsea every day without being poisoned by the horrid stenches on the Surry-side, where certainly all kinds of abominations exist.

The day-light had made some progress now, and although the boats were in the centre of the river, as nearly as possible, they could see the bank upon either side quite plainly.

But in addition to the bank, they could see a large galley, with eight oarsmen in her, and about half a dozen well-armed men likewise, lazily creeping along with the tide.

"What is that?" said Claude.

"A police-galley," said Brand.

The words "Police-galley" were not spoken very loudly, but still they reached the ears of every one in the boat, and created a little consternation.

"Strike up another hymn," said Joe the Cracksman.

"No—no," said Claude. "Allow me, with all deference, to suggest that you do no such thing!"

"Why not, Duval?"

"The chant is so dire a performance, that I am confident it could not possibly deceive any one who had ever heard a hymn in their lives before; so it is better left alone."

"Oh, you don't know how we can do it. We have practised it. That was only a joke; but now that it is necessary, I assure you we can do the real thing, as you shall hear, if you will be so good as to listen to us at all as we sing it."

"Of course I will, and if I am mistaken in the matter, pray pardon me."

"No offence, Claude Duval. It's all right. I don't wonder at your saying what you did. Now brothers"—here Joe the Cracksman imitated, in a most exquisite manner, the twang of the conventicle. "Now, brothers, raise the flag and sing the hundred and fourth hymn, if you please. Now begin, and confound the scoffers and the mockers."

The flag, which was held by two persons in the stern of the boat, and upon which was painted the words "Lambs of the Fold," was quietly waved to and fro, and the hymn begun.

Claude Duval was astonished! Nothing could be sung better, or with more devotional grace than that hymn. There was not a smile upon any one's face, nor a wrong note uttered. All was excellent and harmonious.

The police galley was brought to, and it was evident that the officers on board of it were regarding the three boats with their full contents with great curiosity.

"Do you think they will be deceived?" whispered Claude to Brand the officer.

"Likely enough. The hymn is beautiful."

"It is, indeed."

"And the flag is just the thing. There is only one danger."

"What is that?"

"It is that the police-galley should come so close as to see that neither the countenances nor the costume of your friends, the blackbirds, are favourable to the assumption of their pious character."

"That is true; but see, they just rest upon their oars to see us pass as a matter of curiosity, and they don't seem disposed to take any further notice of us."

"I own it looks like it. They shan't see me, if I can help it. I said I would do the best I could for you all, and I will keep my word."

With this, Brand took a white pocket-handkerchief from his pocket and tied it round the lower part of his face. He then took off his hat, and in some indescribable manner squeezed it and worked it about for a few moments until he had made it quite a different shape, and when he put it on, no one could have known him for the same man.

"You are good at disguises," said Claude.

"It is part of my business. But here comes the police galley—I thought that all was not quite right, by the whispering of her crew."

CHAPTER CCLXXIII.

DETAILS FURTHER ADVENTURES AND PERILS ON THE THAMES.

It was quite clear now, that the galley with the police on board it was making way towards the three boats.

"Steady," said Joe the Cracksman in a low tone. "Steady, blackbirds—give them another hymn."

The hymn that they had been singing was duly finished, and a pause had taken place; but now, in obedience to the command of Joe, who was evidently held in high esteem by his comrades, another one was commenced, the soft melody of which floated gently over the waters, and really ought to have had all its effect upon the officers in the galley; but officers' hearts are of a very flinty description indeed.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE POLICE-GALLEY.

Of course, nothing could have been more indiscreet than for the three boats with the blackbirds in them to have made any effort to escape from the officers, for that would not only have been most futile, loaded as they were, but would at once have engendered suspicion if there were none; and if there were only a slight suspicion, would have converted it into the certainty that something was amiss.

They steadily pursued their track, and as the police-galley was well manned, a very few moments indeed sufficed to bring it close up to the three large boats with the blackbirds in them.

"Hilloa!" cried an officer from the galley. "Boats-ahoi!"

"Go on with the hymn," whispered Joe.

"Silence, there, with your bawling," cried the officer again. "You can sing your hymns another time, if it's all the same to you."

The hymn at this moment came naturally to a close, and the last notes of it died away very sweetly on the water.

"Hilloa!" cried the officer again. "Do you hear, stupids?"

"What do you want, sinners?" said Joe the Cracksman, in his capital voice in imitation of the accredited twang of a fanatical preacher. "What do you want, sinners?"

"Sinners be hanged!" said the officer. "I daresay you are as great sinners as other people! But come, now, what do you call yourselves?"

"Lambs of the Fold!"

"Lambs of the Fold? Well, I can't understand a bit of what that means, but if you understand it, it's all right, I daresay. Have you seen any suspicious characters on the river?"

"Do you mean in a spiritual sense, or in a worldly sense?" said Joe, with such admirable gravity, that it was as much as Claude Duval could possibly do to keep himself serious.

"Bother your spiritual senses! I mean suspicious characters. That's what I mean, and surely all the world knows what that is."

"Repent! Repent! Repent!" said Joe. "I hope that you have time all of you, and I hope that you have grace enough left to feel the importance of so using that time, as to listen to me while I hold forth to you in a little discourse that will not occupy more than one hour and three quarters in delivering, and at the end of which, I do think, that you all will become lambs of the fold."

"No, thank you," said the officer. "We would rather not. It ain't at all in our line."

"Yes, but I beg of you to listen."

"Hold your row."

Joe the Cracksman put himself into a capital attitude, and then, in a nasal tone, he began—

"Miserable and benighted sinners, you will all go to the devil—you will all be grilled——"

"Oh, come on," cried the officer. "Pull away, my lads. Don't let us listen to this ranting any more."

The eight oarsmen bent their oars, and the police-galley shot past the three boats full of blackbirds.

"What an escape," said Claude.

"It was an escape," whispered Brand. "I know that officer very well, and I could see by the glance of his eye that at first he had his suspicions; but it was the exquisitely sung hymn, and the admirable acting of your friend Joe the Cracksman there, that completely deceived him."

"Not a doubt of it."

"That fellow throws his talents away by not being upon the stage. Nothing could be better than his tones and his attitudes; and a man who can act one thing well can act another."

"Certainly. I suppose, now, we consider ourselves to be free of your friends in the galley?"

"Oh, yes; it's all right. Nothing but some new circumstance altogether could bring them back, after they have once sheered off in such a way."

"That is not likely to occur?"

"Not at all."

Now, both Claude Duval and the officer were clever men, but it will be seen how they jumped to a conclusion rather too hastily, for a new circumstance did occur to bring back the police-galley.

It so happened that a very indiscreet blackbird, indeed, sat in the hindmost boat, and he, fully believing that the little affair with the police-galley was quite over, and that those on board of her had not cared to look even at the three boats, executed the well-known manœuvre of placing his thumb against the end of his nose and spreading out his fingers fan-like, so as in fact to produce what is called a "sight," in the direction of the police-galley.

Now as nothing could be very well more at variance with the true character of a Lamb of the Fold than to do such a thing as that, even at a boat full of sinners, it had all its effect upon the officer who was in command of the police-galley, and who happened at the moment to be looking from under the rim of his hat precisely in that direction, and so to see the "sight" executed.

The first surprise he had before had that all was not quite right deepened in a moment, and he said a few words to his companions. The result of these words was, that the police-galley tacked about again, and came on in rapid pursuit of the three boats containing the blackbirds.

The "sight" that the indiscreet blackbird made was not seen by any one of his companions, or they would have been at no lost to discover the reason why the police-galley came after them again; bat as it was, it merely looked like a piece of caprice.

The man who had brought this danger upon himself and his friends knew well the cause of it, and he felt keenly the consequences of his own indiscretion, although he said nothing, for fear of the vengeance of his comrades.

"What does this mean?" said Claude, as he indicated the police-galley to Brand, just as it turned.

"Ah!" said Brand.

"They are coming back again."

"They are. There will be a brush for it now, I am sorry to say; but something has happened to strengthen the suspicion that they evidently had from the first."

"It is a pity. Joe, do you see the galley?"

"I do, Claude Duval, and I think it's all up now. Blackbirds, look to your arms. If it comes to the worst, it is better to die in a fight, than to go out of the world with the compliments of the Sheriff of London, and a rope round your neck."

"Silence," said Brand, "all of you. It may mean nothing after all; do not be premature in anything you say or do."

The police galley now came on very rapidly, and, although by the time the unfortunate "sight" had been made that induced the pursuit, the three boats had got a considerable distance from it, it was evident that three or four minutes now at the outside would render that distance as nothing, and bring the galley on a level with them.

Truly the situation of Claude and his friends was now most perilous, and nothing but one of those extraordinary incidents which beset the career of such men could by any possibility save them from the consequences of capture by the police in the galley.

CHAPTER CCLXXIV.

DETAILS THE DESTRUCTION OF THE POLICE-GALLEY.

"I RATHER think," said Dick Turpin, "that we are in for it now."

Jack looked rather pale, but he said nothing, while Duval began to ransack his mind for some device, by the aid of which he could escape from the rather fearful dilemma in which he and his friends were in. There can be but little doubt that if the fraternity thronging the boats had been at all aware of the indiscretion of one of their number in the "sight" business, they would have taken some extraordinary vengeance upon him; but as no one had noticed him, and as he was not now likely to call attention to his own folly, he escaped the consequences of it.

Brand had thought it just possible enough that the police galley was upon some other task than that which would bring it close upon the boat in which he and his new friends sat; but a very few moments, indeed, sufficed to put an end to any such idea. There could not be any reasonable doubt but that the police were overhauling the large wherry.

"Lie too, will you?" cried a loud voice.

"Pull away," said he who took the chief conduct of the boat; "pull away, now, for your lives."

"It is useless," said Brand. "They have not only more power, but are not half the weight that we are."

"Then we are lost," said Jack.

"I regret to say," added Brand, "that I think you will be all taken, and I only hope that you will avoid bloodshed in this affair."

There was an ominous silence as these words were uttered, and the click of the lock of more than one pistol came upon the ear of the officer.

"Lie too! will you?" cried a voice again.

"For Heaven's sake stop," said Brand. "They will fire into you if you do not, for they are not the most patient of men. I know the officer in command well."

"No—no! All's right."

"Right? What do you mean by right."

It was the chief of the club who had said all's right, and now he turned and looked Brand in the face as he added, in a low, hissing whisper—

"My friend Brand, you have been so truthful and candid in other things, that I hope you have been so in one that to us is more important than all the others put together."

"What is that?"

"It is regarding that little explosive projectile that we took from you in the old ken."

"Ah!"

"Yes, you understand me now, I feel assured. I ask you as a man to tell me if it really possesses the explosive power you attributed to it?"

"Alas, it does."

"Then we are saved."

"Saved? Why, surely you would not—you could not——"

"Duval?"

"I am here," said Duval; "what would you have of me?"

"Would you be so kind as to look to Mr. Brand. He is a brave and a bold man, and he has now some scruples as to what I may think proper to do, as we are likely to come to close quarters with the gentlemen in yonder boat. I don't ask you to do him any mischief, but only to prevent him from doing us one."

"I understand," said Claude.

"And so do I," said Brand. "I don't see the use of throwing away my life for nothing, so I must just be a spectator of these proceedings, looking upon myself as a prisoner the while."

"It is a wise determination," said Duval. "No one here, I am sure, has any wish to injure you if it can possibly be avoided."

Brand was silent now, but he looked both sorrowful and anxious, for he saw but too well that a fearful collision was about to ensue between the thieves and the officers in the police-galley.

"Tip them another stave," said the Cracksman. "Let us sing the ninety-second hymn, if you please, my brethren, and who knows but it may have some effect even upon the flinty hearts of the Philistines?"

It was not with the best grace in the world that the members of the old ken struck up the hymn now, but it showed what great faith they had in the skill and in the judgment of their leader that they struck it up at all. Probably it prevented the officers in the police-galley from firing at them, by getting up again a doubt in their minds as to the real character of those in the boat.

It will be understood that the thieves, although they had not at all slackened their pace, had not increased it visibly, so that the police galley had to make a stern chase of it, which it is quite understood by all persons, is a long chase; and although they appeared to be quite close to the boat, they took much more time than any one would have supposed to overhaul the fugitives. However, there was time enough to make a few little arrangements consequent upon the altered state of affairs.

The Cracksman, who was evidently so highly thought of by the thieves that they all looked to him in the present emergency for advice and direction what to do, stood in the bow of the boat, and his voice was higher than any one's elses in chaunting the hymn that rose from so many throats, and still puzzled the officers regarding the character of the assemblage in the boat. In his right hand, however, partially enveloped in a handkerchief, he held something concealed.

Brand knew too well what that something was. It was nothing else than the detonating ball or shell with which he had intended to give the alarm while in the ken, and which seemed highly likely to answer a very different purpose, indeed.

"Hilloa!" cried a rough-looking man with a very red face, as he stood up in the police-galley. "Hilloa, you, in the boats there. Stop that canting and singing, and answer me, or I shall be compelled to send a few bullets among you."

The police-galley was now so near, that it would have been the height os indiscretion to refuse to stop, and especially as the hymn had come naturally to an end; so the Cracksman cried out in the same conventicle twang which he had before adopted—

"My brethren, stop, and let us hear what the heathen has got to say to u now."

In a moment the rowers stopped pulling, and all eyes were turned upon the police-galley as it came right alongside, and a man in the bow of it put out a boat-hook, and grappled the other craft by the larboard quarter of it.

"Well, friend," said Joe the Cracksman, "what is it now?"

"Why, hilloa!" shouted the man with the red face, "if there isn't Brand!"

"Yes," cried Brand, in a tone of desperation. "My life, I know, is lost by what I say: but I am a prisoner, and these are your men that you want."

These words were hardly out of Brand's mouth, when Duval presented the pistol that he had in his right hand at his head, and placed his finger upon the trigger.

"Fire away," said Brand. "I expect it."

"No, by Heaven," said Claude, "I cannot. You are a brave fellow, and have only done what I should have done myself in your situation."

"I have done my duty," said Brand.

Duval lowered the pistol.

"You shall not die by my hand, Brand," he said. "It would be murder."

"By Heaven, I am sorry I spoke," said Brand, and then he let his head droop upon his breast, and would not look up.

"Surrender, all of you!" shouted the red-faced man from the police-galley. "Surrender at once, or, by all that's good, I'll sink you, and send every man of you to the devil."

"Friend," said Joe the Cracksman, "you don't call that good, do you?"

"Fire at that fellow!"

Bang, went a pistol, and the bullet whizzed past the head of Joe, who instantly cried—

"Blaze away—blaze away! They will have it."

Some half dozen shots were fired upon either side, now and then, and the cries of several who were wounded arose above the oaths and execrations of the others. It was quite a mimic naval engagement, and the folks upon the banks of the Thames must have been not a little amazed to see what was going on.

But this unequal fight was not to last beyond the moment. Suddenly there was a tremendous report, as if a cannon had gone off. A cloud of black smoke rose up in the morning air. There was one fearful shriek, and then all was still. A puff of cold wind blew the smoke aside, and the police-galley was gone.

"Pull away," said Joe the Cracksman, "pull away, and we will sing the two hundred and twenty third hymn, my brethren, commencing with the line;

'Let us love all human kind.'"

Those who had been rowing bent to their oars again, and about half-a-dozen voices struck up the hymn. Some who had been wounded by the fire-arms of the officers, lay at the bottom of the boat groaning, and two had ceased to groan any more in this world, for they had bidden it adieu, their wounds having proved immediately fatal.

Brand the officer heard the stunning report, but he did not move from the attitude he had assumed. He only slightly swayed to and fro, like a man in a state of great mental agony.

Duval was rather astonished at the extraordinary change that had taken place in the aspect of affairs, and although he was at a loss to account for what had happened, he could not help looking at Dick and Jack with an air of much more interest and excitement, than any ordinary circumstances could induce in him.

CHAPTER CCLXXIV.

THE CHALK LANE AT GRAVESEND.

That it was the fearful detonating shell which had done so much mischief in the police-galley, all the thieves were well aware, for they had seen it in the hands of Joe the Cracksman, and they had fully guessed to what use he intended to put it. Probably they had hardly thought that the effect of it would have been so stupendous as it was.

The fact is, that Joe the Cracksman had cast the shell with all his force into the galley, and in its explosion it had knocked the bottom out of the boat, and so confounded the police by the concussion, and the volume of thick, choking, blinding smoke that came from it, that they had not been able to take any steps for their own safety, and they had perished to a man. This wholesale mode of disposing of the police was rather shocking to Duval and his friends, and the looks they exchanged were quite translatable into the fact that they wished themselves out of the present company as soon as possible.

Joe the Cracksman saw their looks, and when the second hymn was over, he spoke to Claude—

"You don't like this sort of thing, Duval; neither do I; but let me ask you what else there was to do?"

"Nothing," said Duval. "Do not let me for one moment be thought to cast any censure upon you for what you have done. When men play at the sort of game we do with the officers, the penalty for the loss of which is death, we may as well do our best to win."

"Just so," said Joe the Cracksman; "it comes to this, that they would have killed us if we had not killed them; and for my own part, I prefer the latter course by a great deal."

"And so do I."

"So do we all!" cried some half-dozen of the thieves.

"What's to be done now?" asked Dick. "Of course this affair has been seen from the shore. Would it not be safer now to run in somewhere, and leave the boats?"

"Not yet," said Joe; "not yet."

"I defer to you entirely in the matter," said Dick, "and feel quite sure that you will decide correctly."

"And so do I," said Duval.

Jack, too, intimated his acquiscence in this feeling likewise, and then Joe the Cracksman, finding that he was duly elected the commander-in-chief of the expedition, spoke firmly.

"I recommend," he said, "that we push right on for Gravesend."

The nods of his companions showed that they thought this a good and wise determination.

"The fact is," added Joe, "that we have safe quarters at Gravesend. We know where to go. There are landing places there that are only known to our fraternity, and this affair, I feel confident, will make such a noise that it will be weeks before we dare show our faces again."

"I hope it will not be so long," said Dick, "before we are on the road once more."

"Well," said Joe, "of course, you can do as you like, all of you, but we have hiding-places among the old abandoned——"

"Hush!" said one, and he pointed significantly to Brand.

Joe bit his lips and uttered a not very complimentary exclamation upon his own forgetfulness of the fact of the officer's presence in the boat, and the stillness that succeeded was only broken by the roll of the oars in the rowlocks, and the wash of the water past the sides of the boat, as it sped along at a good rate.

Brand could not possibly be off knowing and feeling that some reference was being made to him, by the abrupt manner in which the council of war, as it might be called, had terminated. He looked up and saw some dozen pairs of eyes scowling at him.

After looking from one to the other for a few moments, and finding little else than threatening aspects bent upon him, Brand spoke, saying in a much calmer and bolder tone than most men could have assumed, in his position—

"I know that you dread what I may do and what I may say, but you should all of you recollect that I have kept my word with you, and given you all the information that I had. You have overcome your foes in a complete and frightful manner, and I think that now you might put me on shore somewhere, and so get rid of me."

"There are other ways of getting rid of people than putting them on shore," growled one of the thieves.

"Would you murder me?"

"No," cried Duval. "That cannot be done. It would be a murder in cold blood, and nothing but a murder. I hope that there is no man here who would stoop to such an act."

The silence that followed this bold avowal of an opinion was sufficiently expressive of the fact, that it was not exactly tasteful to the majority, and from that moment Duval feared for the life of Brand.

The officer himself was evidently of the same opinion, but yet he managed to carry the idea off in a way that showed the indomitable courage of the man, and that he would do all that was possible for his life.

"I wait your answer," he said. "Whatever crimes may be laid to your charge, I don't think you will be inclined to add to them want of faith with one who trusted you."

"Oh, we will talk of all that when we get to Gravesend," said Joe.

"Very good, gentlemen. I am, of course, as regards the time and mode of my liberation, quite at your disposal."

"But it is understood, let me hope," said Duval, "that no harm is to be done Mr. Brand?—for, as he truly says, he has kept faith with us."

"How do you make that out?" growled one of the thieves. "Didn't he call out to the boat's crew that we were the men they wanted?"

"He did; but you, if you had been in the same situation, would have done the same thing, but for one little circumstance."

"And what's that?"

"Just that, judging from your thirst for blood, it is doubtful to me if you would have had the courage."

"What, do you doubt my courage? Blood and fury, the man who doubts my courage is—is——"

"What?"

"Nothing. Never mind. It don't become me to call names. I treat such aspersions with the contempt they deserve. Doubt my courage, indeed! That is a good one!'

The other blackbirds only laughed at this.

CHAPTER CCLXXV.

CLAUDE AND HIS COMPANIONS SAVE BRAND'S LIFE.

The tone in which Joe had said that it would be at Gravesend that they would talk further about the liberation of Brand, was one that was so decisive, that there could be no doubt of his fully meaning it. Claude did not think it wise to say anything more just then upon the subject, or to press his advocacy for Brand too far.

From the looks, however, that Duval exchanged with Dick and Jack, he saw that they were fully of his mind, and that they would aid him by force, if necessary, in saving Brand from death. It would appear, too, that the officer was not himself backward himself in noticing these friendly indications, for he watched his opportunity, and when he thought no one observed him, he took Duval's hand in his, and gave it a friendly pressure, which Duval returned, for there was something touching in the situation of that man now, surrounded as he was by foes, appealing to him, Claude, as his only friend.

It must not be supposed that during this time the rowers has been idle. On the contrary, the boats had been impelled through the water at considerable speed, and had got a long way from the spot of encounter with the police-galley.

One of the blackbirds spoke to Joe in a surly tone.

"Bill is gone," he said, "and so is Job."

"What do you mean?"

"Dead as mutton, that's all."

"Ah, is it so? Poor fellows! Well, it can't be helped. Is any one else baldly hurt?"

"No—no!" said several voices.

These words called Duval's attention to the fact that there were two dead bodies lying in the bottom of the boat. The pistol shots from the officers had done more execution than he had thought.

"Well," said Joe, "it won't do to go to shore with such witnesses of having had a brush with the police, as these two bodies would be; so, over they must go. The Thames is as good a family vault as any of us are likely to have."

"Are you sure they are dead?" said Jack.

"Lor, yes," said one of the thieves. "They is stiff 'uns, and no sort o' mistake, I can tell you."

"Over with them, then," said another.

"Stop a bit," said Joe the Cracksman. "Let me take a good look about us first."

He glanced carefully all round, and finding that no other craft was sufficiently near to take notice of what they were about, he said—

"Yes, over with them. All's right."

It will be recollected that at that time the Thames was not, by any means, such a crowded highway as it is now. There were no steamboats, and a wherry might go gliding along for a long distance upon the quiet bosom of the stream without meeting another; nor were the banks of the river near so populous as they are at present, when not a square inch is unoccupied. Under these circumstances, then, it was not a difficult thing to throw the corpses of the two men overboard without exciting any attention.

THE BLACKBIRDS THROWING OVER THE DEAD BODIES INTO THE THAMES.

Those who were rowing rested for a moment or two upon their oars, and the others dragged up one of the dead bodies from among their feet, and sent it over with a sullen plunge.

"Good day," said a voice.

"Silence!" said Joe. "This is no time for joking. Over with the other. That will do. Now pull away, comrades, and forget the past, except so far as it may do us good for the future."

The two dead bodies slowly sunk, and the muddy water rolled over all that remained of those two men, who, but half an hour before, were engaged in jesting and laughing, as though their tenure of life were eternal.

As if, too, by a sort of retributive justice, one of the men was he who had made the "sight," and brought the police-galley upon them; and so, by that trifling, ridiculous, and heedless action, he had not only lost his own life, but he had hurried into eternity more than a dozen fellow creatures.

Such are the great events that occur in this world from trivialities, that bear no sort of comparison with their results.

"Now," said Joe, "the sooner we see Gravesend the better, for there will be a hot pursuit, I can tell you, within the next hour or so. Give me an oar, and I will have a pull at it. Keep in to the shore, and we shall be out of the current, which is adverse to us at this bend of the river."

The thieves now worked away with right good will, and although the boat was rather heavily loaded, it shot through the water at good speed, and in another hour they were within sight of the rough, straggling coast of Gravesend.

Joe gave his directions to his friends in an undertone, and from the route of the boat now, it was evidently not his intention to go to any of the regular landing-places by the town, but to run on shore at some unfrequented spot. There could be no part of the banks of the Thames that at that time presented greater facilities for such a manœuvre than the bit of coast close to Gravesend.

There is still to this day the corner of the lane, abutting upon the river, at which the blackbirds landed, along with Claude Duval and his companions. A few of the most miserable cottages that can very well be imagined stood at the entrance of it, and extended for about a couple of hundred feet up the lane, These cottages are in the same state now that they were sixty years ago, and are apparently in the occupation of the very poorest of the laundress class.

What other hidden and mysterious modes the inhabitants of those pestiferous little dens have of obtaining a livelihood, Heaven only knows; but their appearance is of the most squalid character that can be possibly conceived.

When the boats touched the shore, Joe the Cracksman sprang out on to the straggling, chalky beach, if it may be called such, and then he called out—

"Hand me Mr. Brand."

From this little circumstance alone it was tolerably evident that it was considered to be a great point to keep Brand a prisoner in perfect safety, and Claude Duval had his suspicions that all would not go so well as he would wish with the officer.

Brand was of the same opinion, and from the glance he cast at Duval, seemed to say—"I look to you and to your friends for safety!" Duval nodded in answer to that glance, and Brand looked satisfied. Whether he felt so or no was quite another affair.

"Now, Mr. Brand," said Joe, "a bullet always hits a man at speed, so I should advise you to remain with us quietly."

'I have no intention to try to escape by running," said Brand.

'That's right."

'I don't see that I have anything to gain by such a course."

'Why, no, of course you haven't. You have, on the contrary, everything to lose"

"So I suppose, for it is hardly likely that you or you friends would be so cowardly as to take my life."

Joe looked at him, and then co mmenced whistling, as he pretended to be watching the disembarkation of the blackbirds.

A couple of dirty, squa id-looking children came from the lane and looked on in amazement, for it was not often that any boat put in at that not very tempting spot.

"Be off with you," cried Joe, to them, "or I will smash you."

This was quite an intelligible threat to the children, who, no doubt, were used to all sorts of violence, and they at once, at top-speed, made their way into the first of the little cottages that they came to.

"What's to be done with the boats?" said one.

"Send them adrift," said Joe the Cracksman.

CHAPTER CCLXXVI.

SHOWS HOW THE ROBBERS TRIED TO DECEIVE CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS.

"This way," said Joe, and he led the way up the lane: he had previously given some whispered orders to two of his co mpanions, who, from that moment, attached themselves to Brand the officer, one walking on one side of him and one on the other, so that it was quite out of the question his giving the blackbirds the slip, even if he had had any intention so to do.

Joe walked up to Duval, and began a whispered conversation with him.

"Well, Master Claude," he said, "I think we may take upon ourselves to say that we are all safe, now."

"I am glad to hear that."

"I knew you would be, for the sake of others more than yourself. That was a capital move that sinking of the boat, with the officers in it, by the very means they had thought they should ensure our capture with."

"It was a sad necessity."

"Oh, yes—yes, sad enough. It's one of my principles to never do mischief till you can't help it; but when you do do it, take care that it is quite effectual."

"Not a bad principle, Joe."

"No, I should think not. By the bye, did one of our fellows let you know where your cattle were?"

"He did. I have in my pocket a note of the place. The horses are in the city, and, in fact, they are put up at a stable in the Old Bailey, as nearly opposite the gate of Newgate as possible."

"Humph! Rather an awkward place."

"A little; but I am not going to abandon my horse because he happens to be in an awkward place."

"Certainly not. Any one who knows anything of you can safely enough swear to that; and, between you and me, you can't do better than get them as soon as possible, for one good reason."

"There is not much reason wanted, beyond my own wish to be mounted and upon the road again."

"Yes, but there is another reason for expedition, and that is, that as your escape, by the next few hours, will be spread all over London, it is just possible that the officers, knowing what sort of person you are, will remove your horse to some other place, where it will be in greater safety."

This was a possibility that had not struck Claude Duval; but now that it was proposed to his consideration, it had all its effect upon his mind, and he looked rather anxious.

"You understand me?" said Joe.

"Too well. Dick, where are you?"

Both Dick and Jack were close at hand; and now when Claude turned towards them, they stepped up to him and Joe, upon which he told them the state of affairs, and added—

"I think that we can't do better than get to London as quickly as we can, and make some attempt to secure our cattle."

"In daylight?" said Jack.

"It is daylight, indeed, now," said Claude, looking about him. "It is very awkward, to be sure."

"I fear," said Dick, "that we must wait till night before we set about it. Where are the horses, Claude?"

"In the Old Bailey, at the old Angel Yard, just opposite the regular entrance."

Dick perpetrated a long whistle as he got this, to tell the truth, rather startling intelligence, and Jack looked rather aghast.

"I hope," said Claude, "you neither of you see anything in that circumstance to lead to the conclusion that we are to lose our horses?"

"Why, no, confound it, that would be a pity."

"Such a pity," added Claude, "that I feel inclined to run some risk to prevent it; so, if the cattle were in the prison itself, I would make an attempt to get them out."

"I believe you would," said Dick.

"And I am sure he would," said Jack. "He is fool-hardy enough for anything. My advice may not be palatable, I daresay, but I give it against making any attempt for the horses while they are in their present situation. They won't be killed, and it is ridiculous to suppese that they will be always kept in the Old Bailey; so there are sure to be plenty of better opportunities for getting hold of them than the present one."

"I don't deny the truth of what you say, Jack," said Claude, "but what are we to do, my good friends, in the meantime?"

"Oh, we shall live somehow."

"Well, I don't desire the assistance of any one upon this enterprise, if they don't like it; of course, if a man thinks any particular expedition a fool-hardy thing, I can't expect him to patronise it with his presence; so I shall go alone."

"No," said Dick, "I am with you."

"And do you think," said Jack, "that I would let you go alone? No, Claude, I may have my own ideas of the affair, and I may be right or I may be wrong; but I do not know that I have, as yet, shrunk from going where you chose to lead."

"Never, Jack; and, what is more, I will take upon myself to say that you never will."

"Then," said Joe the Cracksman, "the very best thing you can all do is to go at once to London and make your arrangements. You can get into the high-road by passing right through this lane and turning to your right, and you will be sure to find some sort of conveyance to the metropolis."

"But I thought," said Jack, "you had some hiding-places here?"

"We have."

"Then I am decidedly of opinion that the best thing we can do is to stay in it till night. We are twenty miles off London, it is true, but that is not such a very serious distance, even if we had to walk it, which is not very likely, as we should get a lift on the road in some sort of conveyance, without a doubt. But till night, if I were you, Claude, I would remain; for if we go to London now, we must hide somewhere, and if that is to be the case, why not hide here?"

"You speak reasonably, Jack," said Claude; "be it so, provided our friends the blackbirds have no objection."

"Objection! How can we?" said Joe. "Are you not one of us?"

It was quite impossible, under the circumstances, for Joe to make any other kind of reply; but yet it is difficult for a man to conceal wholly those nice shades in his tone and manner which enables another to see that he is consenting to something with a bad grace; and Claude and his friends could not but suspect that Joe wished them away. The question then arose in Claude's mind of "Why did he so wish them away?" and to that he could not at the present find a ready answer.

"Then that is quite settled," said Dick, "that we remain here till nightfall again, is it?"

"Quite," said Claude.

Joe the Cracksman, upon this, rather abruptly quitted the side of Claude Duval, and made his way to his own more immediate friends and comrades. As he went on he said something to each of the blackbirds whom he met, and they in general replied to him by a nod; but what that something was, neither Duval nor his friends had any means of knowing.

"I only wish I felt quite sure," said Jack, in a whisper, "of the good faith of that fellow."

"Do you doubt him?" said Claude.

"Indeed I do. His conduct is, to say the least of it, rather extraordinary and suspicious, don't you think so?"

"Perhaps I do, Jack, but not in the way that you mean. I believe thoroughly and entirely in his good faith to us."

"Then that alters the case."

"I think you understand me, Dick, and that you, Jack, will understand me likewise when I say that the apparent odd conduct of Joe the Cracksman does not arise from any want of faith towards us, but from want of faith to another who is in danger."

"Ah!" said Jack, "you mean Brand?"

"I do."

"You are right there, Claude, by Jove; and I would wager a thousand pounds to a sixpence that they want to hill him."

"Heaven forbid," said Claude. "It would be a dastardly act, and, what is more, it shall not be done. If they take his life, they shall first dispose of mine."

"And mine! And mine!" said Dick and Jack.

CHAPTER CCLXXVII.

A NIGHT OF PERIL AND ADVENTURE.

WITHOUT a doubt, the officer, Brand, thought that Claude Duval and his two friends would protect him to some degree; but it is hardly to be supposed that he imagined they would go so far as to fight for him. Such, however, was the intention of Duval and his friends.

The officer was evidently uneasy, for he saw how strictly guarded he was, and the looks of some of the blackbirds about him were certainly not very pleasant or assuring. Ever and anon he sought the eye of Duval to give him assurance that he had yet a friend, and as often as he did so, Claude nodded to him, so as to re-assure him and convince him that such was the case.

What a miserable state of mind Brand must have been in during all the time that he was in such very unusal company, for him, with the dread continually pressing upon him that he would never be able to leave that company a living man.

But now Joe the Cracksman had apoken a word or two to almost every one of the blackbirds, and he made his way up to Claude again, assuming as he did so as easy and unconstrained an air as he could, as though there was no hidden motive upon his mind.

"Duval," he said, "our hiding-place is close at hand."

"So I imagined."

"It will be very useful to you to know it, for if you should be ever hard pressed, and within a few miles of this spot, you will be able to avail yourself of it, and once within it, you may almost defy the efforts of the police to seize you."

"Indeed?"

"Ah, I see you are incredulous, but I shall soon have the pleasure of convincing you that all is right."

Duval had looked about him, and for the life of him he could not devise where the hiding-place could be.

It will be proper now briefly to describe the place that he and his friends and the blackbirds were in. We have already said that the place which they had chosen to land at was the commencement of a lane that was at right angles to the river.

The fact was, that all that part of the coast had been extensively worked as chalk pits. It had at one time been a precipitous cliff of chalk, rising some two hundred feet from the edge of the water, something like the cliffs that so profusely and so majestically terminate the coast of Kent, some fifty miles further on than Gravesend. These chalk pits, thus lying so near to London, had been very profitably worked, and immense pits, where the chalk had been taken from, were in all directions; and in some places the solid face of the cliff had been taken down, and the pit had changed its character, and looked more like an immense cavern opening to the river.

For the convenience of getting the chalk to the immediate bank of the Thames, various cuttings had been made in the shape of lanes, right through the cliff, beginning at its base close to the river and terminating upon the bleak and barren loam, which supported a scanty crop of grass and nettles, at its summit. Of course, these cuttings were slanting, having just as much incline as would enable horses to ascend them without too much fatigue; and, as a consequence, they had to be of considerable length.

Time had done much in the way of picturesquely adorning these cuttings with vegetation. The naked chalk cliff for years had on each side raised itself like a solid white wall merely, but in the course of time weeds had sprung out of crevices; and as a little loam had, by rains and storms, been washed down the face of the chalk, a goodly crop of weeds had found root.

Here and there, too, from the roots of old tree that had been cut through, there sprung up young saplings; so that a space of twenty years made the bare, bleak, barren-looking chalk cutting, an umbrageous lane, the thick vegetation of which almost hid its sides, and frequently closed over head, to the almost total exclusion of the daylight.

Such, then, was the place in which the blackbirds were upon this most memorable occasion.

It did not seem as if, beyond the place being rather dark at all times, and every now and then sides of great height, that there was any extraordinary facilities for hiding; but there were such.

Joe observed that Duval looked curiously around him, and he said with a smile—

"Well, Claude Duval, have you found out our hiding-place?"

"No."

"Nor will you, I think; but come, it is time we took possession of it, for we don't know how soon the Philistines may be after us."

"There is danger, certainly," said Claude Duval.

"Yes, much. Hilloa! Blackbirds, are the scouts all right at the top of the lane?"

"All right, Joe," cried a voice.

"Do you place sentinels?" said Claude.

"We do. A couple of our number are at the top of this cutting in the old chalk cliff, and a couple at the commencement of it by the cottages. They will whistle us an alarm should any one attempt to come either way."

"But it is a regular path."

"It is, and yet days will pass before any one comes up it or down it, and upon the present occasion it won't be very pleasant for any one to attempt to do either."

"Well, where is your hiding-place?"

"I will tell you first, and then I will show you. To the left of this lane there is one of the oldest of the abandoned chalk-pits, and about twenty feet upon the face of the wall of chalk in the midst of the old weeds, and the blackberry bushes, and the tall thistles that all but choke up its entrance, there is a narrow slanting opening that leads right through the wall into the pit."

"Ah, I understand it now."

"Of course you do; but it requires a little nerve and a little dexterity to descend into the old excavation. Some folks would go head first, perhaps."

Claude smiled.

"But that is not our way. All you have to do is to place your feet in, and place your arms over your head, and you will slide down all the way as comfortably as possible. On the floor of the pit where you will alight, there is a truss or two of hay and straw, and the incline of the narrow passage is such that you reach within six feet of the ground, and alight upon it in perfect safety."

"So I should think; but how do you get out of the old gravel pit again? You do not ascend the hole in the wall?"

"No. There is another orifice that leads from there into the lane again in the same way, so that as we stand here as in the pit, there are two hollows crossing each other."

"I understand."

"That will do. The sooner we avail ourselves of the accommodation on the other side the better."

"Yes, but——"

"What would you say, Duval?"

"Do you mean to show Brand the secret?"

"Yes."

"Would it not be a wiser plan to let him go now at once, before he knows too much?"

"He knows too much already. Do not bother yourself about him, Duval. That part of the affair will all come straight enough, I warrant you. Come along. Let us ascend the cliff. There are some old footholds in the precipitous sides, which you will soon see when once you begin the ascent. Come— come."

Duval followed Joe the Cracksman; but as he did so, he said to himself—

"I will not have Brand murdered, though, for all that."

CHAPTER CCLXXVIII.

CONDUCTS THE FRIENDS TO THE THIEVES' HAUNT.

Joe the Cracksman ascended first the face of the cliff, and Claude Duval followed him. It was no part of Joe's intention, though, to be the first to descend through the little hole in the chalk. He went to a small ledge about five feet above it, and pointed it out to Duval.

"Do you see it?"

"I do see what I suppose is it."

"All's right."

"It may be all right, and I dare say it is; but it looks for all the world like getting down somebody's chimney."

"Yes, it has that look, I grant you; but it is amazingly comfortable when once you are in it."

"Umph!"

"Now, blackbirds, time and tide wait for no man. Let us be off while we may. Who'll go first down the flue?"

"Oh, I will," said a rather surly-looking fellow.

"That's the ticket. You are a good weight, and if there should be any obstacle, you are just the sort of fellow to clear it away for us. Mind how you go, now; good folks are scarce, old fellow."

"Oh, none o' your gammon," said the man, as he thrust his feet into the hole in the side of the cliff. "None o' your blessed gammon, Mr. Joe, if yer pleases Good mornin'."

The man clasped his hands over his head, and as he said, in his own classical vernacular, "good mornin'," away he went out of sight in a moment through the hole in the wall.

It looked a perilous and most uncomfortable thing to slide out of sight in such a fashion through that narrow opening in the cliff, which certainly was not so wide as to leave a tolerably bulky person a couple of inches of room to spare.

Joe the Cracksman laughed at the expresssion of Duval's face.

"He is all right enough, I dare say," he said.

"So do I," replied Duval; "but it is not pleasant"

"Hilloa!" said Joe, with his mouth to the opening.

"All's right," replied the man who had descended, and the voice came up through the shaft in strange, hollow tones and echoes.

"There, you see," said Joe, "he is in the pit now."

"I wish I was," said Claude with a smile.

"Will you go now?"

"Not just yet. Wait a bit; I will see some more of the blackbirds make the descent, for it is rather curious to observe them disappear in such a fashion from the daylight."

By this time, Jack and Dick were upon the same ledge with Claude Duval and Joe the Cracksman; but they had not seen any one make the descent yet. The blackbirds, however, now began very rapidly to do so, and the "All's right" that came sounding up as each one reached the pit in safety, sounded like a voice from the infernal regions.

After more than half of them had disappeared, Joe called out in a rather odd tone of voice—

"Mr. Brand."

"Iam here," said the officer.

"You have seen what has been going on here, Mr. Brand, so I will now trouble you to do so likewise. You may descend with perfect safety. Hilloa in the pit there!"

"Ay, ay!" said a voice.

"Brand is coming."

"All's right."

"Now, Mr. Brand, if you please. They will take care of you in the pit, as you are not used to this mode of descending. All you have to be careful of is, not to stick out your toes or your elbows; you will slide, then, along the chalk like a lump of butter on a hot plate."

Some of the blackbirds set up a laugh at this little joke, but Brand did not seem to think the affair, take it for all in all, was any laughing matter at all, and he spoke seriously, and yet he spoke in a manly way, without exhibiting any signs of fear.

"I address myself to you all," he said, "and I appeal to you all if I have not kept my word with you. It was an understood thing that I was to be released as soon as it could be done consistently with your safety. Surely that time has now come—I do not want to know any of your secrets. You might have dispensed with my presence before this had it so pleased you, and I can only say that it would have pleased me very well if you had done so. What on earth now can be the use of me accompanying you to your haunts?"

"That's not the question, Mr. Brand," said Joe. "Here is the hole in the wall, and it is my particular request that down you go."

Joe looked angry, and the blackbirds looked excited.

"I will speak," added Duval, "and I care nothing for the black looks of any man. I say that the officer ought to have been released before now. Surely, I and my two friends here have as great a stake in this affair as any of you; our safety and our lives are as precious to us as your own, and we are all three of the same mind, namely, that Brand ought to have been let go before, but not having been so let go, it is full time to do it now."

JOE, THE CRACKSMAN, COMMANDS BRAND TO DESCEND INTO THE CHALK-PIT.

"No—no!"

"Who says no?"

"I do," said Joe the Cracksman. "I suppose I may presume to have an opinion, although Claude Duval is here?"

"I don't know what you mean about having an opinion," said Claude.

"Right and wrong are scarcely matters of opinion, and in this case, in particular, it is a matter of fact that the officer was promised his freedom, and upon the strength of that promise he made to us all certain disclosures."

"No!" said a voice.

"I say yes, and that those certain disclosures saved us all."

"No!" said the voice again.

"Whoever says no to that, lies," said Claude Duval.

"Don't call me a liar," said a burly-looking ruffian, "or I'll mark it down against you in my memorandum book."

"If you will have the goodness to come up here," said Claude, "and show me any such book in which you keep the record of revenges you are too cowardly to pay off at once, I will cram it down your throat and make you swallow it, as sure as you are a living man."

The blackbirds rather laughed at this, but the man who had provoked such a speech from Duval thought that it was just as well not to put him to the proof of his words, so he remained where he was.

"If Claude Duval has said all he has to say," remarked Joe, carelessly, "I will speak."

"I have finished," said Claude.

"Very well. Then all I have to say is, that I differ very much in opinion with him, and that I think that Mr. Brand, the officer, ought to be detained some time longer. I will not take upon myself to say how long; that will depend entirely upon circumstances."

"What is to be done, then?" said Dick.

"What we always do," added Joe, "when there is a difference of opinion among us, and what I humbly suppose you will think reasonable enough, which is to put it to a show of hands. We are all blackbirds, and no doubt we all mean what's right by each other—it would be a hard thing if we did not; so I propose that it be put at once to the vote whether Mr. Brand be liberated now, or kept a little longer with us. Do you object to that, Claude Duval?"

"I cannot object to it."

"Very well. Blackbirds, you understand the question. As many of you as wish Brand to go at once, hold up one hand."

There were only three hands held up, namely Claude's, Dick's, and Jack's.

"On the contrary."

All the blackbirds held up their hands.

"Mr Brand," said Joe, with all the coolness in life, "I will trouble you to descend through the flue, if you please. Turn in your toes and keep your elbows straight as you go down."

CHAPTER CCLXXIX.

THE EXECUTION IN THE OLD CHALK PIT.

Brand looked amazed at this mode of settling the question, and Claude Duval felt that it placed him in such an awkward position, that there was really no help for it but to acquiesce in the arrangement. The taking the vote was so specious a mode of getting out of the difficulty, that for the time being he was puzzled to know what to say.

Brand looked at him imploringly:

"I think you must descend," said Claude.

"If you say I must, I must."

"Stop a bit. I will go first, I think; and you Dick, and you, Jack, will follow Mr. Brand."

"We will."

There was just the ghost of a smile upon the face of Joe the Cracksman for a moment, as Claude spoke and adopted such an arrangement. He knew perfectly well that Duval had his doubts as to the sort of reception which Brand would get in the pit when he should descend.

Just as he was then preparing to go down himself, Jack laid his hand upon his, Claude's, shoulder, saying—

"Stop a moment, Duval. It will be just as well to let our dear friends in the pit know that it is not Brand that is coming, but you."

"So it will."

Claude had not thought of that. If Brand was to encounter any immediate danger upon effecting his descent, it might, in the hurry of the moment, fall upon him, Claude; so he turned to Joe as he said—

"Will you be so good as to say who is coming?"

"With pleasure; but you are not correct in your surmises. There is no foul play meditated. I will not pretend to be so blind as not to understand perfectly what you mean."

"Nor will I," said Duval, "be so unwise as to deny it; but I will ake your word that all is right."

"You may."

"Heregoes, then."

Despite of everything in the shape of warning that Jack began to say, Claude Duval allowed himself to go through the opening in the side of the cliff. It was a very odd sensation so to shoot out of the daylight into such a narrow and gloomy place, and if the transit had not been very rapid, it would have been almost intolerable. As it was, it did not last anything like half a minute, and then Duval let his feet sink into some hay and straw, and opening his eyes, he found himself flying on his back in the daylight again.

"Hilloa! is it you?" said a voice.

"Yes," said Claude. "Here I am."

He scrambled to his feet and looked about him with surprise and pleasure, for he found himself in one of the most picturesque-looking spots that he had ever beheld, and one which he little expected ever to be found so close to London as it was.

The chalk pit was of considerable extent, and the rugged sides of it rose up to a height of upwards of one hundred and fifty feet around it. The bottom of it was one mass of vegetation, and trailing weeds depended from the sides in the most picturesque confusion. There was a sombre calm, too, over the whole place, which lent it quite a mysterious air.

"This is the blackbirds' nest," said one. "How do you like it?"

"I think it charming,"

"That's a good job, for it shows that you think with us; for to tell the truth, we all think it charming."

"It merits the title. Why it is an abode fit for a prince. I must say that I never saw a spot that I liked better. If I was to go about picking and choosing for a retreat, this is the very one I should hit upon, I assure you. It has many advantages."

"A few."

"Not a few, to my judgment. And now show me the way you get out of it, if you please."

"It's quite impossible for any one to get out of it," said the man, "unless he happens to know the secret. To climb the face of the excavation looks an easy thing, but far from being that, it is quite impossible. There are some little rivulets from the high ground above, that keep the chalk wet; and it is so confoundedly slippery, that no one can possibly keep a foothold upon it for a moment."

"I should think not."

"It has been tried, and all have failed at that kind of fun; but you see that clump of thistles about twenty feet up above you?"

"I do."

"Well, there are steps to that spot from here, just the same as there are to the hole in the wall on the other side in the lane; and when you are up there, you will find just such another opening, into which you go in the same way, and it brings you out among the old weeds in an obscure corner in the lane, as safe as possible."

"Thank you for the information," said Duval. "I shall not forget it."

"You can't very well, when once you know it. And when once the officers find it out, why, the sooner the old chalk pit is blown in the better, for it will be of no further use to the family, I take it, after that."

"Hilloa!" said a voice that sounded as if it were miles off, in the centre of the earth. It made Claude start round with surprise.

"That's Joe calling through the flue," said one of the blackbirds, as he stooped close down to the little opening through which Claude Duval had so recently only emerged, and cried in answer—

"Hilloa, above there!"

"Brand's coming."

"All right."

The blackbird stepped aside, and in another moment the officer appeared from the opening, and fell upon the hay and straw there collected: he immediately, however, sprang to his feet, looking rather scared at this mode of transit from the lane to the chalk pit.

"All's safe," said Duval.

"Oh, yes," said Brand, "so long as I can hear your voice, I do think all is safe, indeed.—It was much against my will that I came here."

"Oh, never mind that," said one of the blackbirds, "you will not regret it, I can tell you."

Brand was silent. Probably he detected the double meaning that lurked under that speech, and felt that, without imprudence, he could not make a reply to it.

Duval looked at him.

"Well," added the blackbird, "it's all right."

"Oh, yes," said Brand, "there can be no doubt in the world about it's being all right, can there, Mr. Duval?"

"There shall be no doubt," said Claude, and the words as well as the manner in which they were spoken seemed to have the effect of very much reassuring the officer, who managed to creep still closer to Claude Duval, feeling, as no doubt he did, that he was his staunch friend.

In the course of the next few minutes, both Jack and Dick had descended the curious little tunnel into the chalk pit. The remainder of the blackbirds followed in rapid succession, and last of all came Joe the Cracksman himself.

"Here we are," said Joe, with a forced kind of jocularity, "here we are, all of us, as snug and as comfortable as we can possibly be. Why, Duval, don't you think you might stand a siege in this place?"

Claude shook his head.

"Why, what's the matter with it?"

"Nothing at all; but as for a siege in it, that would be rather awkward if the enemy got upon the heights and took a fancy to pepper us with a few bullets."

"Oh, that can't happen. There is a space of fifty feet, if there's a bit, between the brink of the pit above there, and the high road, so that there is no sort of likelihood of our being seen by any one. But we won't deal in possibilities, nor bespeak danger. We have found this a good shelter before, and we shall find it a good one again, no doubt."

"It is my fervent hope that you will," said Claude; "and I don't know how you may feel, but for my part, something in the shape of a breakfast would not be the worst thing in the world."

"I have been thinking of that. Who will volunteer to go to Gravesend and get some victuals and drink for the lot?"

"I—I—I!" cried several voices.

"Very well; settle it among yourselves; only two of you are quite enough.

Here's money. You must keep a sharp eye about you that no one follows you, my men."

The blackbirds promised to do that, and departed on their errand. Jack and Dick were as much pleased with the aspect of the old chalk pit, as Claude had been, and was still. They could hardly have conceived it possible that so thoroughly romantic a region could be found in such a place; but there it was, with all its rich and extraordinary vegetation before their eyes; and if they had not been disturbed in their minds by various considerations, they would greatly have enjoyed the beauties of the place.

That mental distraction that they felt. the reader will, no doubt, attribute to its right cause, namely, an increasing anxiety regarding the probable fate of Brand the officer. The blackbirds were in numbers quite sufficient to have insisted, in defiance of Claude Duval and his two friends, upon the sacrifice of that unfortunate man; but it would seem as if they had a lurking dread of so cold-blooded a deed; for although, as the sequel sufficiently proved, it was all along determined upon, they would much rather have got rid of Claude and his associates before putting the sentence into execution.

The strange, enforced kind of jollity with which Joe the Cracksman spoke, would, without anything else, have been sufficient to convince Claude that something was meditated; and he kept as close to Brand as he could without such a proceeding looking too marked, for fear some random blow should be dealt to the unhappy man which might do the deed he, Claude, wished so much to prevent.

"Now, my lads," said Joe, "who is the cleverest at making a fire? for I don't see that there is any necessity for our taking our victuals cold."

CHAPTER CCLXXX.

A DREADFUL SCENE TAKES PLACE IN THE OLD CHALK PIT.

THERE was nothing now that Duval longed so much for as an opportunity for a little private conversation with Dick and Jack. He could pretty well tell by their looks that they were of the same opinion as himself regarding the dangerous predicament in which the officer was; but then, if it had any effect at all upon him, it had that of making him still more anxious to consult with them as regarded the best means of ensuring the safety of Brand.

The fact was, that Claude Duval, under the circumstances, considered himself quite committed to the preservation of the officer; and he would have left the blackbirds with the conviction that he had connived at a deliberate and cold-blooded murder, if he had shut his eyes for a moment to the fact that Brand stood in imminent danger of death.

What the grand mass of the thieves thought of the affair, it was hard to say; but they looked upon Claude Duval and his friends now as decided encumbrances, and, no doubt, wished them far enough off, although it was not likely that they would commit any overt act against them.

While some of the blackbirds were busy in lighting a fire in a hollow close to one of the chalk walls of the pit, Claude caught the eye of Dick, and very slightly intimated to him to follow him. Dick, who was standing close by Jack, gave him a nudge with his elbow as a hint to come after him; and then, as Claude strolled about, affecting to be admiring and examining the pit, his two friends soon joined him.

They were at a sufficient distance from the blackbirds for what they said to each other, provided they said it in a low tone of voice, not to be heard, and it was Claude who spoke first.

"My friends," he said, "these fellows want to murder Brand."

"I know it," said Dick.

"And so do I," said Jack.

"We must not permit it."

Jack looked rather alarmed.

"Nay, Claude," he said, "what do you suppose we three can do against so many as are here assembled?"

"Much. We can do much. Three determined men can do an immense deal, especially when they are upon the right side."

"I agree with you there," said Dick, "and while I am here he shall not fall a victim to the fears or the passions of these men. It is that fellow, Joe the Cracksman, who is at the bottom of the whole affair. I don't think for a moment but what the others would really have let him go."

"I am of your opinion there," said Jack; "but still, the question is, what is to be done in the matter?"

"That, Jack," said Claude, "I was in hopes you would have been able to suggest."

"You are jesting with me, Claude."

"Ah, Jack, you are lukewarm in this affair."

"No, I am not, and to prove to you that I am not, I here tell you that I will, without question, debate, or objection, accede at once to whatever plan Dick and you decide upon for the purpose of attempting the rescue of Brand."

"That is something like yourself, Jack."

"There is one mode of doing the business," said Dick, "which I think ought to succeed. You know that these fellows think a great deal of putting things to the vote, 'Ay or No,' as, indeed, they did the question concerning the liberation or otherwise of Brand, you recollect, only a little while ago. Now, I think that the very best thing we can do is to bring the question forward of his life or death, and have it decided one way or the other by them. We shall, at least, know then what they mean to do."

"A good thought, Dick."

"If they decide upon sparing him, I think they will keep their words; but if, on the contrary, we find that they carry their intention to take his life, it will be time then for us to adopt more particular and efficacious measures to preserve him. Nothing will be easier than to put arms into his hands, and then we are four."

"Capital!" said Claude. "What do you think of it, Jack?"

"I agree that it is the only way of proceeding."

"Very well; then, I will propose the question to the blackbirds. Let the breakfast, or whatever meal they choose to call it, pass off in peace first, and then I will move in the business."

All this time that they had been thus talking, Joe the Cracksman had, with an uneasy, sidelong step, been moving towards them, but Claude Duval had had his eye upon him, and suddenly turning round, he said—

"Well, Joe, we have settled it."

"Settled what?"

"Why, that nothing in the world could take us alive out of this place. The only mischief that could be done, would be by fire-arms from the brow of the cliff yonder."

"Oh! ah! Yes—yes!"

Joe was evidently disappointed: he had, no doubt, expected some sort of communication regarding the intentions of Claude and his friends in the matter of the officer, for he could have taken his oath, from his own conviction, that it was concerning Brand they had been consulting.

"Yes," said Jack, "we are quite unanimous upon that head."

Joe put as good a face on the matter as he could, as he said, after looking about him a few moments—

"I don't think that even then they could do us much harm, there are so many hiding places, and the vegetation is so thick that it would be all random firing."

"So it would—so it would," said Duval. "And now I am quite ready for the breakfast, if the breakfast will only return the compliment and be ready for me."

"This way," said Joe. "All is ready now. We are old soldiers in this kind of war against property that we are always engaged in, and we don't take long in getting a meal served up."

The blackbirds fully merited the eulogies as regards quickness in their cookery that Joe passed upon them, for they had managed the affair capitally; and although the repast was rather of the roughest sort, still it was extremely welcome to hungry men.

They did not scruple to give Brand something to eat, but it was evident that the poor fellow took it with a very bad relish. The thought that he would never get out of that chalk pit alive was clinging to him, and his sensations must have rather closely resembled those of a man condemned to death, and who, by the cold courtesy of his jailers, is accommodated with a breakfast before the hour of execution.

In about a quarter of an hour the meal was completely dispatched. The men who had gone to Gravesend had brought back word that all was quite favourable, and that not the slightest idea seemed to be abroad that any such parties as the blackbirds were in the neighbourhood, so that, in perfect safety, the congregation of questionable characters rejoiced at the announcement of this report, and prepared to pass the day in that place of rest.

It was then that Claude Duval suddenly rose, and in a clear voice said—

"Blackbirds!"

There was a general commotion at this sudden address upon the part of Claude Duval, and Joe the Cracksman bit his under lip, to conceal the deep vexation that beset him.

Jack and Dick stood close to Duval, for they did not know what the affair might end in, and Brand, too, was within a very few paces, looking very pale and ill indeed. The deep anxieties of the last few hours had told very much even upon his strong and well-knit frame.

"Blackbirds," added Claude Duval, "I have something rather particular to say to you."

"Say it," cried Joe.

"I mean to say it, but I hope that the mere fact that I have it to say is not very disagreeable to any here present."

"Oh, no—no," cried several; and then Joe forced a laugh that sat but oddly upon his countenance, as he said—

"Oh, no—no; disagreeable, indeed—disagreeable to any of us! I am quite sure that is it impossible for Claude Duval to say anything that is disagreeable; quite—quite."

"Thank you," said Claude. "With such encouragement as that, I will proceed at once; and feeling myself to be one of the fraternity, I speak freely when I say, what is to be done with Brand, the officer?"

There was a blank silence upon this.

"I say again, what is to be done with Brand, the officer?"

No one spoke.

"It is quite out of the question but that you all have formed some sort of opinion upon the affair. I have, and so have my two friends here; and all that I want settled is the question that I ask. In fairness to the man himself, it ought to be settled. It is unworthy of us all to keep him here in a state of suspense."

A confused murmur arose from the blackbirds, and Joe the Cracksman looked around him, and nodded to two or three of them; then he spoke:

"Perhaps we might answer you, Claude Duval, in what you would think terms not at all agreeable. But there is one thing that I will do, and that is to put you in mind that it is necessary for the safety of us all to observe—

"Hold!" said Dick.

"Why should I stop in what I am going to say? It is no harm. I was only going to add the one word, caution. Is there any harm in that?"

"None," said Dick, "none whatever; and I, too, will add a word, and that is sincerity; and I hope that that will be thought quite as much, if not a little more of than caution."

"Very good," said Joe, "I have no objection. Sincerity and caution! Blackbirds, these are the two words that are to guide you. And now let us hear what further our distinguished friend, Claude Duval, has to say."

Duval was afraid that the experiment he was about to try would prove a failure, in more ways than one; but still, as he had made a beginning, he felt strongly the impolicy of leaving off, and he was determined to go through with the affair.

The blackbirds were evidently very deeply interested in what was going on, and they crowded round Duval, his friends, Brand, and Joe in a rather dense throng. There was a heightened colour upon the face of Claude, and Dick had his hands in his pockets, where each of them grasped the stock of a pistol upon which he knew he could depend. Jack looked much excited and full of serious anticipations of a disturbance.

CHAPTER CCLXXXI.

THE BLACKBIRDS PLAY A TREACHEROUS PART.

"For the sake of common justice between man and man," said Duval, "for the sake of our peace in the time that is to come, and for the sake of this man, Brand, who was brought with us contrary to his wish to this place, I ask you to decide by your votes his fate."

"Hear! hear!"

"All right," said Joe.

"I think that it is beneath us one and all, to keep any man in such a state of doubt and uncertainty, as to what is to become of him, as Brand must be in; and now, as I have, I hope, said enough to convince you that we ought to come to a decision, let me say a little as to what I think the decision ought to be."

"Excellent!" said Joe; "excellent! Hear him, blackbirds!"

"In the first place, then," added Claude Duval, "we made a sort of bargain with this man Brand in the old ken, that if he gave us valuable information his life should be spared. That we are all here now is a proof that he did give us valuable information; and I put it to you all to say whether we have not found that the information he gave us was strictly correct."

"Quite so," said one.

"Very well, then, such being the case, as he has kept his word with us, it surely behoves us to keep ours with him. It would be, I have no scruples in saying, one of the most dastardly, cowardly, and ill-advised acts in the world, to break faith with this man. And yet there have been some dark hints, some strange words, and some actions, that would lead one to believe that some mischief was intended to him. I cannot really think it; but if it should be so, I hope that you will all of you now take a better thought, and if I have been wrong entirely, it will be a good thing that it should be at once definitely settled that no such piece of folly and villany, for it would be both, is intended."

"Hear! hear!"

Claude ceased speaking, and all eyes were turned upon Joe the Cracksman, who, finding that something was expected of him, said—

"Well, I am ready to vote."

There was a slight laugh at this, for everybody had expected that he was going to make a speech. Duval did not dislike anything that would put the blackbirds in good humour, for he knew that when people laugh they are not very bloodthirsty, so he laughed likewise, and cried out—

"Let it go to the vote, then, at once. Life or death to Brand, the officer. Let all who are of opinion that his life should be spared, hold up one hand."

The whole of the blackbirds held up their hands, including Joe, who then said—

"Why, it is carried unanimously, Claude."

"So I perceive. On the contrary—None. That is settled."

Brand drew a long breath.

"Now, then," said Dick, in a voice that all might hear, "all we have to do is to slow Brand out of this place, and have done with him."

"We will take his pssitive promise and engagement," said Duval, "that he will say nothing of the existence of this place."

"Mind how you go," said Joe to Claude. "Here is the opening in the cliff, and you will find it land you comfortably in the lane."

"Thank you, that will do. It is all clear, no doubt."

"I should say so. It is not very likely that our friend, Brand, has stuck in the way, as he would have let us known as much by this time."

"So he would. Farewell."

Without another moment's hesitation, Duval let himself through the opening in the cliff, and found himself in the lane with great alacrity. The moon was slowly rising, and the scene around him was one of great beauty. Jack came next, and then Dick. After that the voice of Joe the Cracksman sounded through the opening.

"All right?" he asked.

"Quite," called out Claude Duval, "quite right. Good evening, and good luck to you all! Farewell!"

CHAPTER CCLXXXII.

THE TRAGEDY IN THE OLD LANE.

THE object of the three friends was, now, to get to London as quickly as they could, and then to adopt some bold and decisive step for the recovering of their horses; so they, at a quick pace, made their way up the lane, and reached the high road, which was at some distance from the old chalk pit.

"Now for a conveyance to London, if one can be got," said Dick. "I should think that some cart or waggon would be sure to pass us soon."

"Not a doubt of it, Dick," said Claude, "and as such is to be our mode of getting on, we need not hurry, I take it, but walk at our ease."

"Exactly; but still, every mite is a mite nearer our destination; so come on."

They walked at a strutting kind of pace; but they had not got many hundred feet from the head of the cave, when such a shriek came upon their ears, that they all three involuntarily stopped, and faced about to the direction from whence it came.

"What on earth is that?" said Jack. "What a dreadful cry!"

"Hush," said Claude, "hush! It may come again! No—all is still.—It echoes through my head. It was a fearful cry. Oh, Dick, and you, Jack, it sounds perhaps odd to you both, and you will think me too much the slave of my imagination, after what we thought we saw; but, something seems to whisper to me, that that shriek came from the lips of Brand, the officer."

"Good Heaven!" said Jack.

"I will see to it," said Dick, with sudden energy. "I had my suspicions all along, and now they are confirmed. You are not mad, Claude, nor are you the slave of your imagination. We have all been duped by some clever trick in supposing that Brand was free, and my opinion is now, that the blackbirds are murdering the man."

"Come," said Claude.

Without another word, he set off back again towards the lane and the chalk pit.

While Duval and his two friends are now making the best of their way to the spot from whence they had so recently come, we will carry the reader back again to that chalk pit where the blackbirds were assembled, and which was yet to be the scene of a tragedy that they had one and all determined should take place as soon as Claude Duval and his friends were got rid of.

That tragedy was the death of Brand, the officer, for Claude had been juggled, and Brand was still a prisoner in the hands of the thieves.

The blackbirds made sure that Claude Duval and his two friends would start for London as quickly as they could.—The great importance to them that the recovery of their horses was seemed to point to such a proceeding as beyond a doubt; and if Claude Duval had gone off at speed, ten minutes at the most would have sufficed to take him and his friends far beyond earshot of anything that might take place in the chalk-pit.

But we will not anticipate. The reader is not yet well aware of how it was Duval was deceived regarding the supposed liberation of Brand.

We have stated, that when darkness did come over the face of the land, that in that chalk-pit, with its precipitous sides, it was a tenfold darkness; and so rapidly, too, did it come on, that in the course of a very short time it was impossible to distinguish objects with any degree of distinctness. It was at this juncture that, acting under the orders of Joe the Cracksman, two of the most active and determined of the blackbirds flung themselves upon Brand the officer, and bore him to the ground at once, and gagged him with a cork, which they had prepared for that purpose, and which effectually prevented him from giving any alarm.

After that, they took off his coat and hat, and it was one of the very men who had thrown him down only a short time before, that personated him to Duval, and made believe to leave the pit. As for Brand himself, he was securely hidden behind some luxuriant bushes that afforded a perfect place of security for him, and would, indeed, have sufficed to hide him even in broad daylight.

After this, there can be no doubt but that the death of the officer was determined upon.

The ten minutes, then, that Joe thought amply sufficient to ensure the sufficient distance of Claude and his friends having elapsed, a deathlike stillness reigning in the chalk-pit, he spoke—

"Blackbirds," he said, "we none of us like the job we feel forced to do.—We are forced only to it by self-preservation; but, as I say to you all, we none of us like it. Brand must die!"

"Yes," said the throng, and the whispered assent died away upon the night breeze.

Brand heard that "yes," and he knew that it was his death warrant; but the gag was not removed from his mouth, and he could not speak. It was very dreadful to think that he should die in such a fashion. No wonder that he made the strenuous efforts to free himself.

"Bring him here," said Joe.

The unfortunate wretch was brought forward, and the thieves gathered in a dense and small circle about him.

"Brand," said Joe, "I am sorry for you—we are all sorry for you; but men are at times compelled to do deeds that they may much regret, and yet must do them. The secret of this place must be kept; besides, you know us all now too well by sight, and it is too much to ask of you to neglect making use of the information which the last twelve hours have given you. If you were to promise to do so, and we were to let you go upon such a promise, we could not in our hearts blame you for breaking your word. It is your business to hunt us, and it is our business to take care of ourselves as well as we can; so I tell you that, without bearing any particular malice against you of any kind, or description whatever, we have no resource but to put you out of the way of doing us a mischief."

Brand made painful efforts to articulate; but he could only utter a strange noise in his throat.

"We will not hurry a man to another world," said Joe, "in such a way as this. I think he must see the justice of what we say. Take the gag out of his mouth, and let him speak."

The cork was at once removed from the mouth of the unhappy man, and the moment it was so, he uttered that loud and startling cry which had come upon the ears of Claude Duval and his companions.

"Help—help—help!" cried Brand, with the hope that his cries might reach some friendly ears. "Help!—murder!"

"Down with him!" shouted Joe.

He was knocked down in a moment, and a handkerchief twisted round his neck so tightly that he was nearly suffocated, and could not speak.

"I didn't expect this," added Joe, "or I should not have had the gag taken off him; but it's no matter. The sooner now we finish the job, my friends, the better."

"All's ready," said a voice.

"Very well. It's an ugly affair, so let us get it over."

In a hollow of the chalk-pit, where the debris of many seasons' vegetation had collected until there was a tolerable thickness of loam, a young tree had sprung up and thriven. It was about twenty feet in height, now, and there was a branch near to the top of it which was strong and supple. To this branch the blackbirds had fastened another piece of wood, so that they could run a stout cord over it.

They had made up their minds to hang Brand.

Hanging was in all probability the sort of exit from this world that most of them were doomed to make, and, therefore, it was no wonder that, as a mode of bidding good-bye to Brand, it was uppermost in their minds. The poor wretch himself had no idea of the mode by which they meant to take his life, although that he should be murdered by them was now a proposition that came before him in all its ghastly and horrible reality. He tried to scream again, but as often as he did so, they tightened the handkerchief firm round his throat, so that he could utter no sound but a faint gurgling noise, strongly indicative of the fact that he was half choked, and in this fashion they dragged him on towards the temporary gallows.

"Quick, blackbirds — quick!" said Joe. "The sooner this affair is settled the better for all parties now."

"Oh, no—no!" said Brand, suddenly slipping free of the handkerchief in consequence of it turning by the force with which it was held. "Oh, no—no! spare me! I will swear to anything you like, only spare my life!"

"Away with him!" said Joe.

"You will have nothing to fear from me. I will promise to come once a month, if you like, and place myself unarmed in your power, that you may deal with me according to my acts. Oh, spare me!"

"Quick! quick!"

"I will no longer be an officer! I will leave the police! Surely that will satisfy you. And, if you like, I will join your fraternity. Life is sweet, and it is better to be a living thief than a murdered officer."

"Pshaw! Hold your noise, Brand. Meet your fate like a man. If any of us in the course of fate get to the gallows-tree, you don't find us howling and begging to live, and offering to be police-officers if they will let us off."

This sounded so ridiculous, that, notwithstanding the awful job they had in hand, the blackbirds could not forbear a smile, and Brand was still dragged on towards the fatal tree.

"Now say your prayers, if you like," said Joe, "for in another minute off you go."

They fixed the noose they had constructed at one end of the rope round his neck, and four of the blackbirds took hold of the other end, at some few yards off.

"Will nothing save me?" said Brand.

"Nothing, so you had better put up with it, and die with a good grace like a bold fellow, as we always thought you were."

"No—no! you don't know what it is to die—to feel that the world and you are about to part for ever. I have a wife, too."

"So have I," said Joe; "and I would rather be hanged any day than know that she and I were in the same country; so that goes for nothing at all."

"I have children."

"Well, somebody else will have all the trouble of them; so that don't much matter; so once more good-night, Brand. I tell you, as I told you before, that we are sorry for it, but we can't do other than what we are doing, and it's just what you would do yourself, old fellow, if you were in our place."

"Oh, no—no! I have money—hidden money. Pause a little, while I recollect myself to tell you where it is."

"We don't want it."

"We may as well hear what he says about it, Joe," said one.

"Oh, nonsense! How can you be such a fool? A man with the rope round his neck will say anything to give hmself the chance of drawing half-a-dozen more breaths. It's all stuff!"

"Indeed, it is not, Joe," said Brand. "I have been always a careful man, as you all know, and I am not without means, I can tell you. Let me only free, and I will put a booty in your hands such as you little dream of."

"Oh, stuff, Brand—stuff!"

"Nay, Joe, let's hear him. These officers hide swag, you know, for years sometimes, that they lag hold of from some poor devil or another, who has risked his neck to get it. Come, Master Brand, what have you to say?"

"But if I give you such information, will you promise to spare my life?"

"Oh, we will consider of that."

"How can you expect me to speak without some sort of promise?"

"Why, if we do hang you, still, you know, you won't be any the worse off; and by telling us what you know about the swag, we shall be all the better off."

therefore, you will go out of the world with the satisfaction of having done a good action, you know; and only think of that!"

Brand was silent.

"Well," said Joe, "I have let you go on having your own way, all of you, in this, and you see now what a stupid affair you are making of it. You had better run him up to the tree at once."

"Oh, no—no!" cried Brand. "I will tell—in a moment I will tell. As you say, the swag is no good to me now."

"Not a bit."

"Well then, gentlemen, you must know that I always took care of myself in any little affair that I could do myself a good turn, and so, as I said before, I have collected some money as well as some goods. I should be able to tell you all better about it if this rope was not so tight round my neck, but it half stops my breath."

"Listen to me," said Joe.

"Well, Joe, we do."

"Am I captain of the blackbirds, or am I not?"

"Yes, you are, Joe—you are. You know that well enough."

"Very well, then. Unless my orders are obeyed, I here renounce all authority among you, and will never again set foot in a ken where any of you may be. Run that man up to the tree."

Brand uttered a last shriek, and in another moment he was swinging in the air, and the blackbirds were twisting the end of the rope round and round the stump of the tree.

"Halt!" cried a voice at the top of the cliff near the main road. "Make ready! present! fire!"

A rattling volley of musketry came into the chalk pit.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS GET THEIR HORSES AGAIN.

It will be remembered that we left Duval, and Dick, and Jack, making their way at full speed back from the London-road to the chalk-pit again, after having been alarmed by the first loud shriek of Brand, the officer.

That some fearful tragedy was being enacted in the chalk-pit they could not doubt, but what it was, considering that they were under a firm impression that Brand must have escaped, was beyond their conception to fathom.

They did not speak a word as they hurried on, but the sudden volley of musketry, the echoes of which spread far and wide, brought them to a standstill in a moment, and they were as still as statues, till Claude Duval broke the charm that held them, by saying—

"Good Heaven, can either of you say what is the meaning of all this?"

"Not I," said Jack.

"Nor I," said Dick Turpin; "but I suspect——"

"What, Dick?"

"That it is by far our best plan to look to ourselves. That volley of fire-arms is something more than suspicious. There was about it a military preciseness which gets up a suspicion in my mind."

"What is the suspicion, Dick? Do you think the blackbirds are really beleaguered in the old chalk-pit by the soldiery?"

"I do, indeed. But we are near at hand. Our appearance on the road cannot awaken any suspicion, as it is a public thoroughfare. Let us proceed as though we were going to Gravesend, and we shall then soon find out the state of affairs in the pit, and among the blackbirds."

There could be no possible objection to such a course as this, and they all three proceeded at a slow, but not creeping pace, towards the bit of high road above the chalk-pit.

They had not proceeded far when they saw, glancing in the dim light, the muskets of the soldiery, and then a voice called out—

"Who goes there?" and there was the ring of a musket as it was brought to the charge.

It was necessary at once to reply to the challenge, and Claude Duval said—

"We are peaceable people. What is the meaning of all this?"

A sergeant stepped up to them, and said—

"Where are you going, and where do you come from?"

"We are tradesmen," said Duval,

"and can give you our cards. We are on our route to Northfleet, but hearing a firing like guns, we came back to see what it was all about. I'm Mr. Brown, of the High-street, Gravesend, grocer and cheesemonger—and this is Mr. Smith, egg merchant—and this is Mr. Green, the well-known upholsterer, you understand."

"Well—well," said the sergeant, "you had better go back again. There are thieves in one of the old pits, here, and we are assisting the civil power to apprehend them, that's all; you had better be out of danger."

"Danger!" cried Claude Duval. "Did you say there was danger, sir?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Oh, dear, then I'm sure that don't suit us. Come along, neighbours! This gentleman in the red coat says that there is danger, and that is quite out of our lines of business. We bid you good evening, sir, and only hope you will be as successful and as cunning in all your undertakings as in this one."

The sergeant laughed as the three friends walked away. He was quite satisfied in his own mind that he had very much frightened them, and it did not at all surprise him to hear them set off at good speed the moment they got a little way from the spot. How little did that sergeant suspect that the united rewards for the apprehension of those three men, whom he had actually had at arm's length, and whom he could have surrounded with a force sufficient to render all resistance madness, exceeded the sum of two thousand pounds!

"It's all up with the blackbirds," said Dick Turpin, after they had gone about half a mile, and felt that they could speak freely.

"Not a doubt of it," said Claude Duval, "provided one thing has been done, and that is, a guard placed at the end of the lane. There is no sort of doubt now in my mind but that the fellow who went to Gravesend for provisions was watched back again, and that has brought the military upon them."

"But that scream," said Jack. "I can't forget that shriek!"

"We shall possibly get at the meaning of that some day, Jack, but not now. Our only course is to go to London at once, and get possession of our horses, if it be possible so to do."

"You know where they are, Claude, and, therefore, it is possible."

"I hope it is. They are at a stable adjoining to, or belonging to a carrier's yard immediately opposite to the door of Newgate in the Old Bailey; not a very pleasant locality for us to go to."

"Far from it; and yet possibly as safe a one as we could find. But I have no idea of walking all the way to London."

"Nor I; but, hark! I hear an odd rumbling noise upon the road, which betokens the presence of some vehicle, and the tinkling of bells makes me suspect that it is a waggon."

"Yes," said Dick, "and it seems to me to be proceeding at the magnificent rate of about two miles an hour."

Dick laughed; but they all three stood in the roadway watching for the waggon, the dangling lantern in the front of which was soon visible.

"Here it comes," said Claude. "I will speak to the driver. If he is going to London, we may as well go with him until we meet with a quicker conveyance; and, after all, the two miles you talk about, Dick, are four."

"But, good gracious! it would take us five hours to get to London Bridge."

"Never mind," said Jack. "Anything is better just now than being a post on the road; and, besides, as Claude says, we can leave the waggon as soon as any quicker mode of travelling suggests itself; and if it really gets on at the rate of four miles an hour, you must recollect, Dick, that on the average, we should not walk quicker than that, so we save our legs by the use of the waggon, at all events."

"Be it so," said Dick. "I am willing. Hail the waggoner, Claude, will you?"

"Yes. Hilloa! Waggoner there! Hillo!"

"Woa!" said the man, who was lazily trudging on by the side of the eight great fat horses who pulled the waggon. "Woa!"

The horses seemed to consider of it for a moment or two, and then they stopped.

"To London?" said Claude.

"Yes, master."

"And room for three?"

"Lor bless you, yes, to be sure. We comes from Charlton, but we ain't got nothing like a full waggon. Get in, gentlemen, if you pleases."

They all three got into the waggon with expedition, and as it was very dark, they, of course, fell over the legs of everybody that were there before them; but at last, when the cursing and swearing incidental to such a process were over, they succeeded in getting into a comfortable corner among some straw; and the waggoner having requested his lazy cattle to proceed, the huge lumbering vehicle was in motion again in a few minutes.

"Well, sir," said a voice, "pray go on."

By this, Duval and his friends found that by their entrance something in the shape of an anecdote or a very amusing gossip had been put a temporary stop to.

"Oh, I have not much more to say," replied a rough voice. "The fact is that we officers see strange things."

"Officers!" thought Claude and his companions.

"Of course you do," said another voice, "and you ought to be well paid, for yours is not only a dangerous profession, but it is one that gets you no credit, even after all your danger."

"But did they really escape them?" said a third voice.

"Oh, yes. I will tell you how it was. You see, the keeper of the lock-up at Bow Street and the officer who had apprehended them, sat by the fire in the lower room, and, of course, they rationally enough considered that all was right; but Duval and his associates actually made a hole in the ceiling of a room they got into, and then escaped out at the window of the apartment above."

"Oh—ah!" said everybody. "That was it, was it?"

Dick Turpin gave a slight kick to Claude Duval, for there, sure enough, was an officer interesting the people in the waggon with a tolerable accurate account of their last escape from the lock-up at Bow Street, and with which the reader is well acquainted.

"Do you know him?" whispered Claude to Dick Turpin.

"Not by his voice; and it is so plaguey dark that I can't see so much as the tip of any one's nose."

"Nor I. We can but wait a little."

"Hush!"

"There's one thing, however," added the officer, "that it is as well should be known to as many people as possible, as it may make the fortune of somebody, and that is, that the rewards offered for their apprehension are now increased."

"What's the amount?" said one.

"I can't say exactly; but it's nearer two thousand pounds than nothing."

At this there was a general expression of surprise, and the officer added—

"Ah! I should consider myself a made man if I could only lay hands upon Duval and those with him."

"What suppose they were to get into this waggon?" said one.

"Ah! that would be too good a thing."

"A great deal," said a woman's voice; "and as for me—I only hope they won't, for I should be frightened out of my life if they did."

"So should I," said another female.

"Well, so should not I," said the officer. "I should be ready to jump out of my skin with joy."

"Dick!" whispered Claude.

"Yes. Here you are."

"Answer me what I ask of you. We had better keep up some sort of conversation together, or they may take it into their heads that we are suspicious characters, for all we know."

"Very good."

Claude now spoke in a conversant tone, but so as he might be very well heard by all in the waggon.

"Well, neighbour," he said, "will you take four-and-eight for the sheep, or will you not? It's a fair offer."

"Four and ten," said Dick Turpin, "I do think would be nearer the mark. You won't see such in the market every day, I can tell you."

"Well, I will think of it. But do you anything in pigs?"

"Only at the fall of the year," said Dick. "I can let you have the pigs, though, at your own figure."

By this time, Jack became aware of what they meant, and he thought he might as well say something likewise, to keep up the delusion.

"I have laid down six acres of mangold this season," he said "and I do hope you'll take some of me, neighbour Smith."

"Well, I'll see when you cart 'em," said Claude.

By this time the people in the waggon were quite assured that the three strangers who had recently got in were in the farming line, and that they were intent upon bargaining with each other for beasts and for field produce. The conversation became rather general, until the officer said—

"Perhaps some of you farmers or graziers can say how the corn crop will be this year?"

"Why, hardly good, sir," said Claude; "but still, we hopes as it will be finish, not that we grows much ourselves, as we does more in beastes than in corn crops, you see."

"Yes, oh, yes; and you find that pay?"

"Tolerable, sir; but not like thief catching."

At this, there was a general laugh, in which the officer joined.

"Thief catching," he said, "is all very well, but sometimes we catch a tartar, and then, you know, it is not quite so pleasant."

There was another laugh at this, and then some one cried out—

"Hilloa! Mr. Waggoner, mind you stop the coach for me when it comes up, now, will you? Don't let it pass."

"It's a coming now," said the waggoner. "I can hear the guard's horn, now, and I can see the lights."

"Dang it, we will go by the coach," said Claude, "for I shall lose a good customer if I don't get to London quick."

The sound of the guard's horn belonging to some stage coach now came clearly upon the night air, and the waggoner called out—

"It's the royal mail from Maidstone. Here it comes. Hoi! hoi! coach a-hoi! hilloa!"

The flash of the lights of the mail-coach partially illumined the waggon, and the three friends got out of the slow and lumbering vehicle, and inquired if there were places.

"Yes, get up," said the guard.

The other person who went by the mail likewise, was a respectable-looking tradesman-like man, and they were all soon on the roof of the four-horsed coach, which looked quite bright and shining with its lamps, and its scarlet-coated guard, and heaps of luggage.

"All's right," said the guard.

The coachman then chirped to the horses, and in another moment the mail was off, and the lumbering, slow waggon with its team was far behind.

"This is an escape," said Duval.

"What did you say, sir?" said the guard.

"That it is quite an escape to get out of a waggon at the pace of four miles an hour, into such a coach as this with its spanking team."

"Oh, ah, sir, it is indeed. We do rather go along, I take it. Why, it's a matter of seventeen miles to London now."

"And when shall we get there?"

"In two hours, including all stoppages, and one bait to change horses at Greenwich. What do you think of that?"

"Why, that it is capital going, that can't be denied, my friend."

The guard was so satisfied with the approbation that Claude Duval bestowed upon the coach and its performance, that he entered quite into a history of it—how long it had been built—how it was at first not intended for a royal mail, until that honour was thrust upon it by reason of its being so light in draught, and such a capital coach altogether.

To all of this Claude listened as though he were deeply interested, and presently the coach stopped at Greenwich to change horses. This operation was performed with all that celerity which used to mark the proceedings of the then quickest mode of travelling in Great Britain. How all that is changed now, and how the railroad, with its panting engine, makes the mail-coaches of the last century seem in comparison what the slow waggons were to them in their day.

In due time the mail-coach rattled over old London Bridge, and the moment that it drew up, Claude and his companions dismounted, and paying liberally for the ride they had had, they stood in the midst of London just as St. Paul's clock pealed out the hour of twelve at night.

The streets of the city at that hour were not nigh so populous as they are now. The citizens of London went to bed at soberer hours than they now think of retiring, and the quietude of London was then as great as some country town can boast of now—for it is a boast surely to be able to hear oneself talk to a companion in the street, and not to be continually running the risk of being run over by some horrible omnibus, or infernal machine in the shape of a cab.

Alas! alas! it is the omnibus and the cab that have made London the Babel that it is, and filled the thoroughfares with racket and danger. We are not of the number who look upon the good old times, as they are called, for everything that is excellent: on the contrary, we admire many great changes that have taken place; but to the omnibus and to the cab we are enemies to the back bone; and, for the sake of peace, and comfort, and safety, and humanity to the horse, we proclaim war to the knife against such vehicles.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIV.

THE HORSES ARE RECOVERED BUT TO BE LOST AGAIN.

Claude Duval and Dick Turpin and Jack assembled by the light of a flickering old oil lamp, not far from the Royal Exchange, to debate upon the best course to pursue in furtherance of the great object that had brought them to the metropolis.

That object was the recovery of their horses.

"I have every possible reason," said Claude, "to rely upon the information that I have received from one of the blackbirds, that our cattle are in a stall, opposite to the wicket gate of Newgate."

"Of that there is little doubt," said Jack. "They are in the custody of the Sheriff of London; and I happen to know that there is the stable in which cattle belonging to persons who are amenable to the law are really placed, so that the information you have, Claude, tallies with experience and known facts."

"Ah!" said Dick, "mind you, I intend to make a try to get my gallant steed out of the power of the Philistines; but still, I cannot conceal from myself, nor am I at all desirous of concealing from you, too, that I look upon the enterprise as one of the most troublesome and doubtful that can possibly be undertaken."

"Well," said Claude, "there are but two ways of setting about it. The one is to try something to get at the cattle and gallop off with them, and the other is, to attempt by some bold manœuvre to persuade those who have the custody of them that we are entitled to them."

Dick shook his head, and Jack shook his, and then the former said—

"I don't think that any open mode of proceeding would answer. If we do anything at all, it strikes me it must be in the secret way. The hour is late. It is quite possible that there may be only some watchmen upon the premises, and if that is the case, a bold push might do the business."

"I would advise," said Jack, "that we go at once to the place and make what observations we can. Who knows but something may turn up when we get there that may alter all our plans?"

"Good," said Claude. "Come on."

A watchman, who had been looking at them from the other side of the way, now crossed over, and turned the full light of his lantern upon them.

"Ah! Charles!" said Claude to him in a boasting tone, "how are you to-night? Wife and family all well?"

"Move on, will you?" said the watchman.

"Oh, certainly, sir, with great pleasure!"

"I've half a mind to take you all up. I don't believe you are after any good, a-whispering and a-talking here at this time of night."

"Perhaps you would like to know what we are about?" said Dick.

"Yes, I should, stupid," said the watchman.

"Well, then, we intend to carry off the Bank of England to-night, and to divide it between us in the Hampstead fields."

"Now, if I don't take you upon my own account! Oh, murder!"

"You'll find some difficulty in taking yourself up, I think," said Dick, as with one blow he sent the watchman prostrate in the kennel.

It was quite expedient for them to get off now from that spot as quickly as they could, and they went arm-in-arm at a quick pace just as the watchman found his rattle and began to spring it. To the next guardian of the night they met, Duval said, in a very serious voice—

"There is a fire in Lombard Street, my good fellow, and you had better hasten there as soon as possible. It's at a banking-house, and they are throwing the gold out at the window with a shovel."

The watchman did not wait to thank them for such a piece of intelligence, but he set off as fast as his legs and his huge white great coat would let him, to the scene of commotion.

Fleet of foot as Claude Duval and his friends were, they soon scampered along Cheapside, and made their way down Newgate Street to the corner of the Old Bailey. There they had to draw aside, for the purpose of letting pass them a riotous set from some club in the neighbourhood, which had just broken up, and conveyed its noise and racket into the public streets. The shouts and the profane songs of the half drunken party died away in the distance, and then Duval and his two friends walked on to the other side of the way, and getting into a doorway, they confronted the gloomy old pile of Newgate.

"There it is," said Claude.

"Ay," said Jack with a shudder. "It would need, indeed, to be something particular that would tempt me to this spot."

"We won't look at it," said Dick. "Let us go to the inn yard, where our special business lies."

They walked on till they got to the inn yard, which was exactly opposite to the market of Newgate. All was dark and drear about the place. A solitary lamp, that was nearly out, cast a flickering light upon the spot, that was positively worse than darkness.

"I have thought," said Claude in a low tone, "that the best thing we can do will be to ring at the bell of the stables of the inn, and see if any one is up."

"Do so," said Dick; "we will keep back in the shadow here."

"They got right into a deep doorway with a huge overhanging portico, and Claude Duval finding a large wooden handle to a bell, slightly pulled it, and produced a tolling sound within the yard. No notice was taken of this, and after a few minutes he rang again. He then heard the sound of a bolt being worked up and down to withdraw it, as it evidently fitted very tightly into its socked, and then a little wicket was opened in the large wooden gate, and a man, with a dimly-burning lamp, appeared, and asked, in a sleepy voice, what was wanted.

"Is Mr. Groveland within?" said Claude.

"Groveland? You mean Wilkes, I suppose?"

"To be sure I do. Wilkes it is. I come from Mr. Groveland. How I do confuse names, to be sure."

"Well, then, he isn't, and he is."

"That's a strange answer, my friend."

"Well, he's abed, in course, at this hour o'night. But what do you want, now? Do say what it is at once."

"Are you the ostler?"

"Gracious, no! I'm the watchman. The ostler is gone to bed too. Now, do say what it is?"

"Why, I wanted to know if there was any chance to-morrow of my having a coach and four horses for about half the day. The coach belongs to Mr. Alderman Pump, you see, and so I——"

"Oh, dear me! can't you come, now, at a christian hour, my good fellow?"

"Well, I don't want to trouble you. Is there anybody else upon the premises?"

"Not a soul, I tell you."

"Then," said Claude, as he stepped at once within the wicket gate, and pointed a pistol right at the face of the watchman, "if you give the least alarm, or so much as speak above your breath, I'll scatter your brains over the yard."

The watchman retreated backwards till he fell over an iron chain that belonged to a crane close at hand, and there he lay upon his back as if he had been suddenly deprived of all sense and motion.

Claude went to the wicket and only said "Come in," and then Dick and Jack entered the inn yard, and Duval closed the little wicket door in a moment.

"Watchman!" said Duval.

The watchman only groaned.

"Get up at once; you shall have better pay for this one night's work than you can get for a year. Listen to me. You may as well make a hundred pounds as any one else. I am Claude Duval."

"Oh—oh, the dev——"

"Silence!"

"Yes, I—that is—oh, dear, of course; but I feel that I am the watchman of another world. I am as good, I mean as bad, as a dead watchman, and this is the last hour of my watch——"

"Silence, and listen to me. This is a matter of life and death to you, watchman. You may die upon the point of principle in not giving up the trust reposed in you, or you may live and pocket a hundred-pound-note."

"Principle, did you say, sir? Die upon principle? Principle be hanged! I'd rather live than have all the principle in the world."

"But your character?" said Dick.

"Character be blowed, sir! What's the use of character to a dead watchman, I should like to know? And touching that hundred pounds, why—why—"

"You would be very glad to touch it?"

"I should indeed, gentlemen."

"Very well, get up."

"Yes, gentlemen. Here I is. Don't be holding of that pistol in the line of my head, if you please, Mr. Duval. Oh, don't!"

"Listen to me. There are three horses here, in charge of the sheriff of London."

"Ah, I smell a rat."

"Well, never mind that just now. There are three horses here, I say, and they belong to us. We intend to have them. Can you take us to them?"

"To the stall where they is I can, but not to the 'osses. The stall is locked up, you see; but I can show you where they is, and no mistake. But I'll take the liberty of putting out my lantern, and they then won't have any chance of looking out at a window and seeing of us."

"Do so."

The watchman blew out the candle that was in his lantern, and he said, in a voice that was evidently struggling between fear and cupidity—

"Gentlemen, you offer me a hundred pounds to let you take the 'osses, if you can get 'em?"

"We do. And if you refuse, we shall be under the necessity of shooting you."

"Then I consent."

"But, look you, you will have to come for your money at twelve o'clock to-morrow night to Blackheath."

"Oh, lor!"

"You need not be alarmed. If you have ever heard anything of Claude Duval, you have heard that he don't break his word with any one, so you may make sure he is not going to begin to do so with you. We have not the money with us, but we will get it for you by midnight to-morrow, if you will be at the gate at Greenwich Park that opens to Blackheath at the hour mentioned. I tell you this beforehand, lest you should prefer being shot at once to aiding us in this little matter."

"Don't mention that again. Oh don't."

"You consent, then?"

"Rather. Of course I do. As for the 'osses, what can it matter to me whether you has 'em or the sheriff? It isn't the likes of me that the likes of you stops on the highway, and I have got a wife and family to look to, and only get nine shillings a week as a watchman; so I feel as if this was a kind of a bit of a God-send to a poor man, and I will trust to your word, Mr. Claude Duval."

"You have decided wisely. Now, take us to the stable, and we will manage to get at the cattle."

"Hilloa!" said a voice. "Brown! Brown!"

"Oh, lor, that's Mr. Wilkes," said the watchman, "a-calling to me out of his bed-room window. What shall I do now?"

"Answer him," said Claude, in a whisper; "tell him it's all right, and we will keep close here in the shadow of the court by the gate. You have nothing to fear. Answer him boldly."

CHAPTER CCLXXXV.

CLAUDE MEETS WITH A SEVERE SHOCK IN THE OLD BAILEY.

THE watchman was evidently frightened, as well indeed he might be, for such an adventure as that in which he was now engaged was rather new to him. He shook so that his teeth chattered in his head.

"Hilloa!" said the voice from the window. "Watchman, where are you now?"

"Answer him at once," said Duval, "or it will be the worse for you."

"I'm afraid it will," groaned the watchman, "but I'm going to answer. Yes, sir—yes, Mr. Wilkes, I'm here."

"Where are you? I don't see you."

"Tell him your lantern has gone out." said Claude.

"Please, sir, my lantern has gone out, that's the reason, sir."

"Then why don't you light it again?"

"Confound you," whispered Claude, "why don't you tell him you are going to do so directly?"

"Confound you," said the watchman in his fright, "I'm going to do so directly.'

"This fellow will ruin all," said Dick Turpin.

"What's that you say?" cried Mr. Wilkes. "You are drunk, fellow, and I'll take good care to discharge you in the morning. I tell you, you are drunk, fellow."

"Say you were speaking about the lantern, you idiot!" said Claude.

"I was speaking about my lantern, you idiot, if you please, sir," said the watchman.

"Upon my life, this is pretty language to use to your employer," said Mr. Wilkes, "and if I was not afraid of taking cold, I would come down stairs and turn you out of the place at once, you rascal, that I would; but, as it is, you may depend upon being discharged to-morrow, and without a character, too."

"Oh, dear—oh, dear!" murmured the watchman, "now I am in for it, rather, I take it! What will become of me?"

"The hundred pounds!" whispered Claude.

"Oh, ah—that is something."

"It is more than you could save if you were to stay in your place for twenty years, so you are better off with that and your discharge than you would be without it and still keeping your situation. But how came you to be so absurd as to speak to your employer in such a way?"

"Oh, dear! didn't you tell me?"

"Certainly not."

"Well, now, I'll be hanged if I didn't think you did. But it's done now, and can't be helped, so I must just do the best I can for you, gentlemen, and trust to you, for, you see, I have lost my place all through you."

"I beg your pardon," said Claude; "it is not through us at all."

"Oh, dear—yes."

"Oh, dear, no. It is through your own folly, my man—nothing else. If you had only answered your master as you ought to have done, all would have been well enough with your place. But we can't stop to dispute that question with you. Take us to the stable in which are our horses at once."

"Come on, gentlemen—this way."

The night-porter spoke in rather a gloomy tone. Perhaps, after all, he had his suspicions that the one hundred pounds was too much in perspective, and that there was no very good security of its forthcoming, even provided he did go to Blackheath to get it, according to the directions that had been given him; and the loss of his place was a positive event, that he could have very little doubt of indeed, after what had occurred between him and his master upon that interesting occasion.

The man led the way along the old walls of the yard, so that they should not be likely to be seen by getting into the open space, and then stopping before a pair of old doors, he said—

"Here is the stable that the three horses are in. They have been well fed; for the sheriff, who is a saddler by trade, has been several times to look at them, and says they are prime ones, and that he will ride the dark bay mare himself."

"Will he?" said Dick Turpin. "I should like to catch him, that's all."

"Then, that's yours, sir?"

"It is."

"Then, by Jove, you are Dick Turpin?"

"Well, what of that?"

"Oh, lor! that I should be with such a highwayman as Dick Turpin, and sich another highwayman as Claude Duval, at this time of night. It's enough to makes one's hair stand on end, it is. Please, what's the other gentleman's name?"

"Sixteen-string Jack!" cried Jack.

"Oh—oh! Is it possible? Well, I often thought I should have liked to be a highwayman myself; and if I had only thought nobody would have arrested me, and I should never have been took up for it, I don't know but that I should have gone upon the road some odd day. But there is the door, gentlemen, and, you see, it is fastened by a padlock."

"Was fastened, you mean," said Jack.

"Was, do you say, sir? Why, they have never forgot to lock it, have they?"

"No; but I have picked the lock, and the stable is open. Now, comrades, let us decide upon the best course."

"I think," said Claude, "that the thing to do will be, to saddle the three horses in the stable, and, likewise, mount them there. Then let the watchman go and throw open the outer gate sufficiently wide for us to go through, and then we can make a bold dash for it, and be off at once, and never mind how much clatter our horses' heels make. I'll warrant that before any one can be in the saddle to be after us, we shall be a couple of miles off."

"That is the way to do it," said Dick.

They all three went into the stable at once, and then Jack lit a match, and held it up, upon which Dick exclaimed—

"Ah! here is my Bonny Bess, looking as bright and as beautiful as ever."

At the sound of Dick's voice, the creature made a whining sound, and began to rub its head against him, to testify the pleasure it had in seeing him again. Jack and Claude found the saddles, and began hastily to fasten them on to their respective steeds, and Dick soon followed their example. The watchman remained hovering about the door of the stable, and in a great fright, as his muttered ejaculations sufficiently testified.

"Oh, lor!—oh, lor!" he said. "I do hope all this will end well. I never was in such a fright in all my life. Oh, dear! What, suppose there was to go for to come to be a scrimmige now, what a pretty situation I should be in, in the midst of it."

"Hold your row!" said Claude.

"Yes, sir; oh, yes."

"Don't keep up that muttering and grumbling at the stable door; somebody will hear you at last, and then we shall have a fight for it; and when that once begins, it is hard to say who may or who may not get a stray bullet in his head."

"Don't mention it, sir, I beg. I feel already as if one was going right through my nob, I do indeed."

"Are you all ready?" said Dick.

"In a moment, Dick," said Claude. "Now I am. How do you get on, Jack?"

"I have only to fasten the throat rein. Now it is done. Shall we mount?"

"To be sure."

They were all three in the saddle in a moment, and then it was that they felt a degree of exultation that on foot they could never feel. The mere fact that they were mounted again upon their good steeds, and thay were, both man and horse, quite fresh and full of life, was sufficient to give them great spirits; and they felt as though they could afford to scorn any danger that could possibly now approach them.

And yet one glance at their situation will show how very precarious it was. There they were in the midst of London—opposite to Newgate itself, and at the mercy of any little circumstance which might have the effect of betraying their position to their worst foes.

"Watchman," said Claude.

"Yes, gentlemen; oh, dear—oh, dear! Here I am."

"You are a poor coward. But remember that your money will be ready to-morrow night at the place I have mentioned to you, and it will be your own fault if you do not come for it. And now go and open the outer gate gently, so that we may ride out."

"Yes, yes; and the sooner you do ride out the better, gentlemen. Let me beg of you not to make a clatter in the inn yard. When you are outside, it don't matter, of course, to me a bit."

"We will be careful."

It was an anxious moment now that which preceded the opening of the great gate of the inn yard to allow Claude and his friends to pass out into the Old Bailey. They were in complete darkness; but, as well as they could, they kept their eyes fixed in the direction of the gate. Then they heard the fall of an iron bar, and Duval cursed the stupidity of the watchman, who thus doubled their danger by a want of ordinary caution in his proceedings.

"That fellow will ruin all yet, if he don't mind," said Jack.

"He is a desperate fumbler," said Claude; "but a moment or two will suffice now to save us."

"It will—it will."

The gate creaked back upon its old hinges, and by stooping in his saddle, Claude could see that it was fairly back.

"Now!" he said.

With one accord they walked their horses across the inn yard, but it was impossible upon the stones with which it was paved to prevent the shoes of the cattle from making a noise. Of course, the horses stepped freely and firmly, and twelve legs, each armed with an iron shoe, do not come down upon stones quite as softly as velvet upon velvet.

"Holloa! What's that?" cried the voice of Mr. Wilkes again, from his window. "I'm sure I hear something. What is it?"

"The devil, sir!" said Claude. "He has mistaken the house, that is all, but he will call upon you to-morrow. Don't you hear his hoofs?"

"Watch! watch! Thieves!"

"Off with you both," said Claude. "Let us turn to the left."

"Yes, yes!" cried Dick and Jack.

The watchman shrank on one side, and as they went out at the gate, he said—

"Don't forget me to-morrow, gentlemen, I beg of you."

"We won't," said Claude. "Hush!"

They were in the Old Bailey, and with a bound, Duval was half way towards the end of Newgate Street, when a hackney-coach came into the Old Bailey round the corner. It was accompanied by a couple of mounted men, and as it lumbered along, one of the windows was broken, and a voice cried in screaming accents—

"Claude—Claude! Oh, where are you now to save me?"

If the whole of Newgate had suddenly, without the least warning of the approach of such a catastrophe, tumbled down, and presented nothing but a mass of ruins before his eyes, Claude Duval could not have been more completely astounded than he was by this cry from the person in the hackney-coach. It thoroughly bewildered him. For the moment it stopped his breath, and he staggered in his saddle, as though some mental blow had been struck at his head by an invisible hand.

Then in a voice that rang through the street, he shouted—

"By Heaven, 'tis Cicely!"

Yes; too well had he recognised that voice as the voice of his wife—his Cicely, whom he thought he had left still in such perfect security and comfort at the farm-house by Ealing Common; and now suddenly, at such an awfully critical moment, to discover her in a coach in the Old Bailey, and to hear her calling for help, was enough to make him doubt for a moment the fact of his waking existence.

The sound of his voice reached the ears of Cicely, for, indeed, and in truth, she was in the hackney-coach, and the shriek of joy that came from her lips, was an answer to his in a moment.

"Drive on!" shouted one of the horsemen. "Drive on, coachman! Curses on you, don't you see you are close to Newgate?"

The coachman had been alarmed at the cries, and had instantly pulled up, as he would have done had he, in some crowded thoroughfare, been made aware that he either had driven over some one, or was upon the point of doing so. But before he could put the old miserable horses into motion again, Claude Duval was at the side of the coach.

"Cicely!" he cried, "speak again! Is it, indeed, you?"

"Oh, Claude!—Claude! Save me!"

"Ay, will I."

The two horsemen who accompanied the coach, when they heard the name of Claude mentioned, uttered a shout of gratification, and one cried—

"Why, here he is! This is our man. Down with him!"

One of them aimed a blow at Duval, and struck him on the shoulder with a staff. Claude had drawn a pistol, and at once he shot that man dead, as he cried out—

"Dick and Jack, ride off. Don't wait for me—ride off, both of you."

"Not yet," said Dick.

"Yes, you be off with you."

"I will die first," said Jack.

"Help!—help! Police! Watch! —watch!" cried the other horseman who was with the coach, as he slipped off his horse, and ran with all his speed towards Newgate.

The sound of rattles began to be heard from several quarters, and Claude dismounted as he shouted to the coachman—

"Keep your horses quiet, or I'll blow your brains out. Keep quiet, coachman, or it will be the worse for you."

"Oh, lor, yes," said the coachman; "all I want's among you all is my blessed fare. That's all I wants among you all, if you pleases, gents."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVI.

THE FRACAS IN THE OLD BAILEY HAS DISASTROUS RESULTS.

Claude Duval kept the bridle of his horse over his left arm, while with his right hand he tried to open the coach door, but it was made fast by some means, and resisted him.

"Cicely," he said, "how is this? The door is fast."

"It is tied with a cord."

"Ah, that will do—I see it. A knife—a knife!"

"Here," said Jack, close to his head. "Here is one."

"A thousand thanks."

With the knife that Jack handed to him, Claude cut the thick cord that kept the coach door shut, and in another moment Cicely was in his arms.

"Claude—Claude, you have come to save me! Oh, God! I thought they would have taken me to prison; but you have saved me."

"Mount—mount! Let me help you on the horse, Cicely."

"Yes, Claude—oh, yes. With you, to the world's end if need be. They took me a prisoner, Claude, because I would give them no information where they might find you, and they threatened me with death. Is this Newgate?"

"It is—it is. But you shall tell me all another time, Cicely. Moments are now most precious. Our lives all hang upon a thread."

"They do, indeed," said Jack.

Claude had just succeeded in getting Cicely upon the horse, and was upon the point of mounting himself, when, with a rush and a shout, some couple of dozen men from Newgate tore up the street, and began firing pistols at random, as they approached the party by the coach.

"Lost!" said Jack.

"No, no!" cried Claude. "Hold my horse's head, Dick, or you, Jack, do it. If I can only gain the saddle, all will be well again. Stoop low, Cicely—oh, stoop low, and avoid the bullets."

"Yes, Claude, yes; but the horse is hurt."

The horse began to plunge furiously. It was quite out of the question for either Dick or Jack to hold the half-maddened animal, and it was equally impossible for Claude Duval to mount it. Still he would not relinquish his hold of the bridle, and still his foes advanced.

"Surrender yourselves," cried a voice, "or you will be all butchered as you stand. Surrender, Claude Duval. You have not a chance."

"Never!" said Claude, as he now with difficulty drew his pistols with his disengaged hand, and fired them one by one at the advancing men, and then threw them to the ground as quickly as he discharged them.

"Fire, Dick! Use your pistols now, Jack. Our only chance is to keep them in check. They are cowards, after all."

Dick and Jack kept up such a continual fire for a moment or two that the officers and officials of Newgate who had rushed out to capture the party were staggered; but then a voice cried out—

"Fire a volley upon them. Dead or alive will do for us."

About twelve or fifteen fire-arms were discharged at once. Cicely uttered a shriek, and fell over upon the neck of the horse. Claude caught her in his arms, and with one piercing cry of anguish, he held her bleeding form to his breast. In another moment he was surrounded, and half-a-dozen hands had hold of him. Claude Duval was taken!

A man got hold of the bridle, too, of Dick Turpin's horse; but with one blow from the butt-end of rather a heavily-mounted pistol, Turpin laid him prostrate; and then putting spurs to his horse, he went off like the wind towards Holborn. Jack, too, escaped by riding over a couple of the officers, and striking right and left with the heavy end of his riding-whip, which had a couple of ounces of lead let into the handle of it, and did fearful execution.

Half-a-dozen of the officers pursued them; and the horses of the two who had been with the hackney-coach being mounted by a couple of the most courageous of the officers, they kept close upon their heels. It was a chase for life or death that.

That Dick and Jack would have had considerable trouble in escaping was pretty certain if one of the officer's horse's had not fallen upon the lower part of Skinner Street; and Jack perceiving it, turned upon the other, and made a blow at him that rather staggered him, although it did not hit him quite so fair as Jack intended to do.

This gave them a little latitude, and they went up Holborn at a pace that, considering the ascent, which was then much worse than it is now, was truly tremendous and appalling. It was well that the hill, though sharp, was short, and that they were soon upon the head ground, as the cattle could not have kept up at such a pace. As it was, however, Holborn was dashed through in its whole extent in a very short space of time, indeed, and they gained the long straggling thoroughfare of Tottenham-court-road, feeling satisfied then that no one was pursuing them.

It was then that Jack pulled up, and letting the reins of his horse slip along his arm, he placed both his hands upon his face, and sobbed aloud.

"Poor Claude!" he said—"poor Claude!"

Dick looked at him in silence. He felt that no ordinary topic of consolation would suffice at such a moment.

"Dead! dead!" said Jack. "Well, they are satisfied now. They have killed him at last, and Cicely, too, who loved him so well. They have died together!"

"Jack, you do not know that?"

"Oh, yes—yes. I saw her fall."

"But you did not see Claude fall?"

"I saw the hands of twenty murderers upon him, Dick. Do you think they would spare him?"

"Yes, Jack. They wanted to take him alive, and, in my opinion, they have. Oh, Jack, this has, indeed, been a fearful night!"

"It has—it has!"

"But come, now. We are men, and, therefore, like men, you know, we should meet such evil fortune as comes to us. Cheer up, Jack!"

"Cheer up, did you say?"

"Yes, I did; and why not?"

"Oh, no—no! This is the end of it all. I have but one wish now."

"Well—well, ride on gently, Jack. Remember that we are in London yet, and that our enemies may still be after us. What is your one wish?"

"That I were dead!"

"Oh, pho! You are not at all like a dead one yet, Jack, nor is Claude either, for all we know. Come—come, you look at the affair much too gloomily. There is hope yet, you know."

"Alas! it was a natural impulse for me to fly from the spot when I found that I could do him no good; but I ought to have staid and died by his side, that is what I ought to have done."

"No such thing, Jack."

"But I say yes, Dick. Do not tell me it is no such thing; you do not know how close was the bond of union between us."

Dick Turpin could not but see that Jack was in no mood to be reasoned with, nor did he blame him for the excess of feeling that he betrayed upon the occasion, for he knew how close had been the companionship between him and Claude Duval.

"Jack," he said, "your feeling is natural upon this occasion; but still, in the absence of information regarding the fate of Claude, you go too far."

"No—no. It will be a reproach to me as long as I live that I did not remain and die with him, as I ought to have done, and then all would have been well; I should have been spared the heartache which I have now, and which will never leave me."

Dick put his horse to a trot with the hope that Jack would instinctively follow the example, and he was not mistaken, for Jack assumed the same pace, probably hardly knowing that he did so at the moment.

Now a silence of some quarter of an hour's duration ensued between them, and they got right to Camden Town, and took the left-hand road, that would lead them to Highgate. More than once Dick Turpin looked back, and listened to hear if they were pursued by any one, but such was not the case. Of course, it was absurd for the officers on foot to come after two well-armed and well-mounted men; and the accident that had happened on Holborn Hill to the two officers who were on horseback had had the effect of completely stopping their progress.

It was Jack, now, who first broke the silence by turning to Dick, and saying—

"Can you form any opinion, Dick, as to how it came about that Cicely was in that hackney-coach?"

"Yes, Jack, I can. Did you not hear her say that they had taken her into custody because she would not give the information concerning Claude Duval?"

"Yes—yes, I heard something."

"That was it, and no doubt they would have made up some sort of a case against her; but it was the most unfortunate thing in the world that she should arrive in the Old Bailey at such a moment as that."

"It was—it was."

"Yes, it has ruined Claude, for, after all, what could they have done with Cicely? Even if they were quite sure she had nothing to do but to tell them at once where to find Claude, no jury could commit her of the only legal offence they could bring against her of harbouring a felon, considering that she is his wife, which fact she could easily prove."

"Yes—yes, it was most unfortunate, as you say, Dick. This is, indeed, a most sad night for all of us. Where are we going now, Dick?"

"Towards Highgate."

"But what good can we do to Claude at Highgate? It is of no use surely our going there."

"Yes it is, Jack. Listen to me, now, patiently. I think that you are in a more composed frame of mind than you were, and that, therefore, I may tell you all my hopes and fears. May I do so, Jack?"

"Oh, yes, go on—go on, Dick."

"Then, Jack, in the first place let us consider what we know and what we do not of the affair. We know that Cicely is taken—we know that Claude is taken, but we don't know if Cicely be severely hurt or not—and we don't know if Claude be hurt at all. Now, here are you and I, both free and uninjured, and capable and willing to assist them both in every possible way, so, after all, their situation may not be so bad as it looks."

"You give me better hopes," said Jack, drawing a long breath.

"To be sure I do; but you are so easily depressed, Jack. That is the one fault of your character."

"I cannot help it," said Jack, mournfully. "Claude himself, poor fellow, has often told me of it, and begged of me to try to conquer the feeling, but I cannot; however, Dick, I will now submit to your directions in all that has to be done; only let us, if you would keep me from going out of my mind a'together, do something as quickly as we can."

"We will—we will. But it must be evident to you, Jack, that the first thing is to get accurate information of what has taken place."

"Yes—yes!"

"Well, then, I propose that we go at once, now, on to the Gate-house Tavern at Highgate, and put up our horses at some other place, so that we shall be separated from them, and seem to arrive there from country-ways on foot. There we will wait until the newspapers tell us what situation Claude and Cicely are in, for the affair will make quite a sensation, you may depend, and every particular will be published."

"Be it so, Dick."

With this determination, then, they rode right through Highgate, avoiding the Gate-house as they went, and they did not pause until they got to Finchley, where they drew up and asked at a road-side inn if their horses could be kept for a few hours, as they were going to call upon a gentleman in the neighbourhood, who had no accommodation for them. The answer was, of course, in the affirmative, and they left their horses well housed; then, on foot, they turned back to Highgate.

On the road they made what alterations in their apparel were in their power to do, so that by the time they reached the long straggling High-street of the village, they could hardly have been recognised as the same two persons who had ridden through it only half an hour before at a canter.

The Gate-house Tavern at Highgate stood then upon the same spot that it does now, only the old building has disappeared and the modern structure, although bearing the same name, is not that which was at one time rather notorious as a baiting place for the knights of the road.

The change that Turpin and Jack had made in their appearance was rather for the better, as regarded their respectability and their looks, and they were received at the Gate-house with usual courtesy as gentlemen, although there was a little surprise at their appearing at such an hour as that. Still, there was then so much traffic on the Great North Road, that the hotels and inns were all open all the night.

All that they ordered was some mulled wine and a couple of beds, which, in the course of a quarter of an hour, they were accommodated with; and then Dick Turpin, as he shook hands with Jack for the night, said—

"Get some sleep, Jack. Remember that we can just now do nothing, but that if we are ever to do anything for Claude it must be by exertions that will require all our strength and power, so we ought to take care of ourselves."

"You are right, Dick. Good-night!"

They parted for the night, and Dick Turpin threw himself upon the bed, having only taken off his coat and his boots, and was soon fast asleep. Poor Jack, on the contrary, sat in an arm-chair, and ordered a fire to be lit in his room; and thus, for hour after hour, he sat, gazing at the burning embers, and in deep and profound thought regarding the position of Claude Duval.

It was not until the dim light of early dawn began to peep in at the window of the bedroom that Jack fell into an uneasy slumber; and then he was haunted with horrible dreams, and he fancied that he was in the midst of a vast crowd, that, with uproarious shouts, surrounded a scaffold, upon which he could see Claude Duval about to be executed. With all his exertion he could not get at him, and when he tried to call to him, he found that his voice had turned to a weak whisper.

With all the fright and terror of the dream upon his mind, Jack started and awoke, upon hearing some one knocking at the door of the room.

"Who is there?" he cried. "Who is there?"

"Don't you know me, Jack?" said Dick. "Open the door."

Jack did so, and Dick Turpin entered the room.

"Why, Jack," he said, "you have not slept a bit."

"Oh, yes, I have," said Jack, with a shudder. "I have had too much sleep."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVII.

THE ST. JAMES'S CHRONICLE GIVES NEWS TO DICK TURPIN AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

Dick could not but see by the face of Jack that he had passed but a very indifferent night, and he shook his head as he said—

"Jack—Jack, have you been husbanding your strength as I asked you to do, for the purpose of trying to do something for Claude?"

"No," said Jack, after a pause.

"I thought not."

"But I will, Dick. The morning light has brought something like peace to me, and I feel much better than I did. I am getting more myself. You shall not have cause to complain of me again. But I have had such a dream."

"A dream?"

"Oh, yes. You smile, Dick, but it was a dreadful dream. I thought that——"

"Hold, for mercy's sake, Jack! If you don't wish to give me the horrors for the rest of the day, I beg you won't tell me anything about your dream. Do you know, it almost drives me crazy when I hear any one begin with 'I thought that I was so-and-so, and then I thought,' and so on. Come—come, Jack, chase such nonsense from your brain. You know that one who was better acquainted with human nature than either your or I are has said—

'We are such things as dreams are made of.'"

"Yes, I remember; and he likewise says—

'And our little life is rounded by a sleep.'

I wish that mine were so. I should like to close my eyes for once and for ever. But I have promised you that I will make no more such allusions, or give way to such feelings, and I will keep my word. Only tell me what you would have me do."

"Why, in the first place, Jack, I would have you attend to what I consider is of the greatest importance just now to us both.

"What is that, Dick?"

"Breakfast."

"Ah! I might have guessed what you were going to say. Well, be it so. I will not say that it will be unwelcome to me, and I hope that by the time it is over, we shall hear something of Claude Duval."

"If the newspapers reach here by that time, of course we shall. Let us order breakfast in a private room, and ask for the morning paper as soon as it can be got; but we must not appear to be too anxious about it, you know."

"Oh, no—no."

"I will be careful."

The Gate-house Tavern at Highgate, was a very large old rambling house, and there were so many rooms in it upon the first floor, that twenty people might almost have breakfasted quite privately, so that Dick Turpin and Jack had no sort of difficulty in getting accommodated. In the course of a quarter of an hour, a good breakfast of hot coffee, rolls, ham, and fine fresh butter, and plenty of cream, was before them, to which they did justice.

The room that they were in was a very pretty one, so far as its aspect was concerned, for it looked upon one of the ponds that were in the town, and there grew, close up to the window, a plum tree, some of the think old branches of which were half inclined to make their way into the apartment, and, as it was, the leaves rattled in the morning air against the window panes.

"You can let us have a newspaper," said Dick to the waiter.

"Yes, sir, yesterday's."

"Thank you; that will do till to-day's comes. When do you have it?"

"The post-boy drops them at the door, sir, at ten o'clock every morning."

"Thank you; that will do."

The waiter bowed himself out. An hour had yet to be passed before the time when the post-boy would leave the papers of that morning; so Dick and Jack wiled away the time as well as they could; and there was one thing that they made up their minds to, which was, that it would be highly desirable to get some cash as quickly as possible.

"My exchequer," said Dick, "is rather on the wane, and I think we are bound to keep our appointment with the porter at the inn."

"Do you think he remains true to us?"

"Indeed, I do."

"Well, then, let him have his money by all means, Dick, if we can get it; and the only way we can do so, is by going on the road to-night, and seeing what kind of luck we shall have. I know, too, that Claude has little or no money; therefore, if he still lives, we must take care to get some for him."

"The St. James's Chronicle, gentlemen," said the waiter, as he laid the paper, still damp from the press, upon the table.

Jack did not dare to look at the waiter lest he should perceive the anxiety which was but too manifest upon his face; so he hid it in his pocket handkerchief until the man had gone out of the room, and then Dick took up the paper with a grave countenance.

"What does it say?" gasped out Jack.

"Have patience, and compose yourself. Recollect where we are."

"Oh, yes, yes. But look at once."

"Hush! I will read to you all that concerns us in a voice loud enough for us to hear; but not loud enough for any one else to overhear, I hope."

"Do so, Dick. I feel that my agitation is too great to permit me to read it for myself."

Dick unfolded the paper, and, as a heading to one of the columns on the inside, he saw the words, "Capture of the notorious Claude Duval. Dreadful affray in the Old Bailey."

"Here it is," he said. "Listen now, Jack, and whatever I read, do not let your feelings get the better of you."

"I will not, I promise you that, Dick, if you will solemnly promise not to keep a word of the statement from me."

"Upon my word I will not."

Jack sat with his hands tightly clasped together, and in profound silence, while Dick Turpin read as follows:—

"Last night, or rather at an early hour this morning, the Old Bailey and its neighbourhood were thrown into a state of indescribable confusion and alarm, by a scene which took place nearly opposite to the entrance of Newgate, concerning which, we will endeavour to give our readers the full particulars.

"It appears that the daring exploits of the notorious Claude Duval had so far attracted the attention of the highest authorities, that it was deemed desirable to resort to extraordinary means for his apprehension, and, after the most diligent inquiries, it was ascertained that a female of doubtful character, whom he calls his wife, was concealed at a farm in the neighbourhood of Ealing. It was then resolved at once to apprehend this person, and her capture was cleverly accomplished by a couple of active officers from Bow Street.

"Upon the coach in which she was being conveyed to Newgate reaching the corner of the Old Bailey, it appears that a most daring attempt was made to rescue her, by three mounted men, who shot one of the officers dead on the spot, and then proceeded to release the female from the carriage. The alarm, however, was given, and a strong force coming from Newgate, succeeded in capturing one of the ruffians, who turned out to be no other than the notorious Claude Duval himself.

"We regret to say that in the melée no fewer than four officers have received severe wounds, and two have been shot dead upon the spot. The female, too, who had been placed upon a horse, in order to effect her escape, was badly wounded.

"Claude Duval himself is now in Newgate, and it is expected that in a very few hours his associates will likewise be in custody."

Dick paused, and looked at Jack. He was very pale.

"You see, Jack," said Dick, "that there is no mention of Claude being hurt in the least."

"No. But poor Cicely—she is hurt badly."

"Yes. Shall I read on?"

"Is there more?"

"There is, Jack. The account goes on to another hour or two."

"Yes. Let me know all."

Dick now read in a subdued tone, which betrayed considerable emotion.

"We stop the press to announce shortly, that the female who was the original cause of the fracas is no more. She expired in the prison at about half-past four this morning, making the fourth victim already dead upon this extraordinary and desperate occasion."

"Dead!" said Dick. "So poor Cicely is dead, after all. Killed in a street brawl at last."

"It seems so"

"Alas, poor girl! It is a sad fate for her. Is it not so, Dick?"

"It is, indeed."

"After this, Claude will not look up. He will abandon hope. He will not even try to escape now, poor fellow! And if we see him, he will tell us that the best and the kindest thing we can do for him, is to let him die. I know that that is what he will say to us."

"Yes, Jack, in the first flush of his despair Claude Duval may say so, and may feel so, but that will pass away again."

"Think you so?"

"I am sure of it, Jack, and so we will not take such an answer from him, if we should succeed at all in seeing him. This has, indeed, been a sad—a very sad adventure."

"Is there no more?"

"No—no. Stop! What is this? Oh, only some editorial remarks: 'We congratulate the respectable portion of society upon the apprehension of the notorious Claude Duval the highwayman, who, no doubt, will now expiate his offences against the safety of his fellow-men at the Old Bailey."

"That will do for that," said Jack. "They will all have a kick at the dead lion."

"When you have quite done with the paper, gentlemen," said the waiter, popping his head into the room, "the gents down stairs would be much obliged if you could let them have it"

"Oh, certainly," said Dick, gaily. "There is no change whatever in the price of meat, or either of corn, I see."

"Ain't there, sir?"

"No. You can take the paper. Thank you."

"Thank you, sir. Coming—coming—coming!"

The bells below were ringing violently, and the waiter rushed out of the room with the St. James's Chronicle in his hand.

It was then that Dick Turpin and Jack looked at each other in silence for some few minutes, and Dick was just about to say something, when the door of the room was abruptly opened, and a man, attired in a rough great coat, made his appearance in the room. The moment he saw that some one was there, he drew back, saying—

"Beg pardon, gentlemen. Didn't know anybody was in this room."

He was gone, then, before Dick or Jack could make any reply to him; but to the surprise of Dick, Jack slowly rose, and going to the door, he locked it carefully, and likewise slid a bolt that was in the lower part of it into its place.

"What's the matter, Jack?"

"Did you know that man? But no. Why do I ask you? Of course you did not, or you would not sit so quietly there."

"Who is he?" said Dick, starting up.

"Hush!—hush! We must make no noise. You have heard of a Bow-street runner named Godfrey, I suppose?"

"Yes. By Jove, I have."

"That's the man, then."

Dick mechanically produced a pistol.

"Put it up again," said Jack. "It is of no use. By the sound of voices, there are plenty of people down stairs, and although we might take a life or two, we should be sure to be overpowered in the long run. Force will do nothing for us in this emergency, I assure you, Dick."

"You are right," said Turpin, as he put the pistol into his pocket again. "You are quite right, Jack. I am enraged, however, at—at——"

"At what, Dick?"

"Pardon me for saying it, but I was about to add, at your coolness and decision, Jack."

"Danger awakens me to the full use of all my faculties, I think," said Jack, "And now I tell you that my opinion is: this Godfrey only came up stairs to look on, and that it was no mistake his opening the door of this room. I think that he knows us, too, Dick."

"The devil you do!"

"Yes; and that he is now organizing a plan for our capture. We must concoct some plan, or we are lost, at once!"

"To be sure. The window!"

"Hush! hush! What do you hear?"

"Footsteps upon the stairs, and low voices. They come nearer, Jack. Open the window, that's a good fellow! I am quite convinced now that there are a dozen people slowly creeping up the old stairs. The window, Jack!—the window! But don't make any noise over it, or we are lost! That will do. Bravo! that will do!"

"Are they coming yet, Dick?"

"They are; but they come slow, for they think to take us by surprise."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVIII.

DICK AND JACK GO UPON THE HEATH, AND MAKE A TRAVELLER DISBURSE.

Jack, while Dick was listening within some couple of yards or so of the door, had so cautiously opened the window of the room that it made not the least noise. Those who were coming up to the apartment from below were evidently coming with extreme care; and no doubt they were marshalled by Godfrey, the officer, who contemplated making a secure capture, even if it were at the expense of a life or two.

"Come," said Jack.

Dick, quite noiselessly, went towards the window. There was a good view of a garden below; but the height was very inconsiderable indeed, and, besides, by the assistance of the plum-tree there could be no possible trouble in the way of descending.

What a mercy for them it was that they had not their horses there at such a time!

"After you, Jack," said Dick, in a low tone. "After you. Let us be off at once, if we can. Get out at the window."

"No, no—go first."

Tap! tap! came gently at the door of the room. There was no time to parley about precedence, and Dick at once got out, and slid down to the ground comfortably enough by the aid of the plum-tree. Jack got out of the window, too; but as he held on to the tree, he gently and noiselessly closed the casement again.

"That may give us five minutes' stretch," he said; "and a minuet is now to us as good as a life."

"Good!" said Dick. "Come on!"

They were both in the garden, now. A low fence was at the other end of it, and it was by that means only shielded from the high road through the village, so that it was a hazardous thing to cross that fence at all. But that was no time for doubts or hesitations, and they ran across the garden till they got to a kind of outhouse; but the moment they reached that, a voice said—

"Hilloa! who are you?"

Dick looked into the outhouse, and he saw a lad cleaning shoes and boots, and looking with amazement at them both.

"It's all right," said Dick. "It's only a joke! You didn't see us, mind, or we shall lose our wager."

"Wager?"

"Yes, to be sure. There's your share of it for not seeing us."

Dick placed some five or six guineas—he did not wait to see how many there were—in the hands of the boy, who immediately transferred them to his pocket, as he said—

"I am blind and deaf, too, gentlemen."

"That's right. We want to leave the garden."

"This way. Hilloa!"

A loud crash at that moment came upon all their ears. The door of the room so lately occupied by Dick and Jack had been burst open by Godfrey, the officer, and they knew that they had not another moment to spare.

"Quick!" said Dick, "which is the way?"

"Here you are," said the lad, as he opened a door at the back of the outhouse that led at once into the village, close to the top of a lane.

"That will do," said Dick. "Come on, Jack."

They did not pause another moment, but cowering down, they ran along by the garden railings of an old red brick house, and then past a blacksmith's forge, till they got to the top of the lane, down which they dashed at great speed. Those who know the lane, know that it goes down-hill from Highgate for some distance, and that circumstance gave the fugitives a great advantage in the speed they made. The hour was one at which not many persons were about, so that they escaped observation from any chance passenger in the lane, and Jack who was foremost, cried out to Dick—

"Follow me; I know every inch of this neighbourhood. Make no scruple of following me, Dick."

"All's right, Jack. I will keep up with you."

After they had got about a quarter of a mile down the lane, now, Jack made an abrupt turn to the right, and burst his way through the hedge that skirted the road. Dick followed him, and then they both set to work to pull the bushes and blackthorn over the gap they had made in getting through the hedge, so that it should not be observed. It was then that Dick said—

"Jack, I think we have done them!"

"Don't holloa before you are out of the wood, Dick."

"No, but there is a chance now."

"There is, and a good one, too. If we keep along this way at the back of this side of Highgate, we shall reach Finchley over the fields; and I do think if we can once get our horses we shall give them the slip."

"Not a doubt of it."

On Jack dashed across a wide meadow, and then they came to another hedge, at the base of which was rather a brawling, formidable water course. That was no time to stop for trifles, though, and they both jumped it without a moment's hesitation, and scrambled up the bank on the other side, little heeding the clay and mud that stuck to their hands and clothes. There was a turnip-field on the other side of that hedge.

Through the turnips they went at a good rate.

"Hoi! hoi!" cried a man with a smock-frock on. "Hoi! That won't do, you must not come there, you know. Go back."

"I think I see it," said Dick.

The man began to run after them, but they had got the start of him, and they cleared the hedge on the other side of his turnip field, and got into a meadow before he was half-way towards it.

TURPIN AND JACK RECOGNISED BY THE OFFICER AT THE GATEHOUSE TAVERN.

"On—on," said Jack. "We won't give up our speed, Dick, till we cannot help it. On—on!"

"All's right," was Dick's response, and over the field they went. But now they came to rather a serious obstacle. A wall, encircling some garden, skirted a long way out to the left, right into the fields. It was so formidable a thing to try to surmount, so they had no resource but to go round it, which with great regret they did; but they found that on the other side there was an enclosed paddock, with some cattle in it. No doubt that was private property, and they were trespassing by going thr ugh it; but they did not stand upon ceremony, but vaulting the pailing, over they went.

Their progress was rather accelerated across this paddock by a young ox taking it into his head to run after them, with the idea that they were running away from him; and as they did not admire being tossed, they got out of that individual's way as quickly as they could, and then Jack paused, and held his hand to his side, as he said—

"Done up, Dick."

"I don't wonder at it," said Dick. "We have run a mile."

"Have we, though?"

"To be sure we have, and I would rather slacken my pace a little, I assure you."

"Then I may well feel exhausted. But, Dick, if you think you can go on a little faster than I can you know, you had better do so, and let me come at my leisure. Save yourself, Dick."

"Pho! pho! Jack, don't be saying such things to me, old fellow, at this time of day. We will sink or swim together. If the Philistines catch one of us, they may as well catch both. You don't mean to say that you have come to a dead stop?"

"Oh, no—no. I am better now. A pain caught me in the side that was all, but it has gone again, Dick, and I can get on, though not so fast."

"Allow me to say, that there is no occasion now for such a mad sort of hurry about it, Jack."

"No—no, not so much occasion certainly, Dick, that I admit freely. There is not so much occasion; but still, our horses are some distance off, and the sooner we get to them the better it will be."

"No doubt; but let us regulate the pace, now. Stop a bit, though, Jack, altogether."

"What for, Dick?"

"I will get upon this stile, and take a look about me. Perhaps I shall see that, not being pursued, we can take things a little easier altogether. You lie down while I make an observation of as extended a character as I can."

Jack flung himself upon the grass, and after the race that he had had it was a great relief for him to do so, indeed; and Dick climbed right on to the top bar of the stile they were close to, and holding right on by the branch of an alder tree, he was able to see far away across the meadows.

"Not a soul," he said.

"That's a mercy," said Jack.

"Only our friend, the ox yonder, very angry at our escape. That is the only enemy; but I am sure, upon my life, Jack, I don't think that in all my experience I ever had such a desperately narrow escape as this of to-day."

"It was a close touch."

"Much too close to be at all pleasant, I can assure you. But we will go on, though we need not hurry ourselves."

Dick descended from his elevated position, and then Jack, having found much relief to the pain in his side from the few minutes' rest he had had, rose, and they went on at a brisk walk only.

They came now to several openings to the right, which, if they had chosen to avail themselves of, would have taken them into the main road; but they did not think it at all prudent to do so. They kept in the fields until they saw the house at which they had left their horses; and they considered that there would surely be some back way to it from the fields.

Just as they were talking about that probability, they came upon one of the openings we have mentioned as leading to the main road, and as they did so, they heard the clatter of horses feet. They drew back, and flung themselves flat upon the grass, by the side of some timber that had been recently felled; and they saw six horsemen come up, and pause at the entrance to the turning that led into the fields. There was a cottage with a garden full of clothes hanging out to dry at the corner of the turning.

"Hoi! hilloa!" cried one of the horsemen. "House! house! Is anybody at home?"

"What is the matter?" said a female voice.

"Have you seen a couple of men pass here, my good woman?"

"Oh, I don't know. What do I care about them? I don't attend to whether men pass or not."

"Well, but have you?"

"Go along with you, do, and don't bother! No, I haven't. There, now, I suppose that will satisfy you. But I have seen a boy and a cow."

"It's out of the question that they could have got this far," said another of the mounted men, "even allowing that they took this road at all. They are hid in Highgate, somewhere, that is my opinion."

"Well, well," cried he who had first spoken, "let us come on."

They rode off at a sharp trot.

"What the deuce are they going to do?" said Dick.

"Give notice, most likely," replied Jack, "to the different villages all down the road that if we are seen we are to be secured, if possible. They will stop at every public-house, including that at which our horses are; but as they will mention two men and not two horses, they will get no news of us, I think; and our best plan is to let them get a good quarter of an hour's start of us now."

"Be it so, Jack. It's a rest at the same time, if you are at all comfortably situated. Are you so?"

"Oh, yes! yes! But this is not the sort of thing that you are accustomed to, Dick."

"Why, no, I can't say it is; but variety, you know, Jack, is charming."

Jack shook his head.

"Not this sort of variety. A succession of pleasures may be delightful enough, but a succession of risks, such as have fallen to our share lately, I must confess I don't exactly like so well. We have fallen upon cruel times, Turpin."

"We have, so far as poor Claude is concerned; but if he were with us I should not much mind our present situation."

"Oh, but it is a dreadful thing, Dick Turpin, when you come to consider that here we are, like a couple of Esaus—all men's hands are lifted against us, and our hands are lifted against all men! Here we are in our native country, outcasts and wanderers upon the face of the earth—hunted like wild beasts from town to country, and from country to town—a price put upon our heads, and our deaths considered not only a lawful act but a public benefit. This is a dread ful state of things, is it not?"

"Sixteen-stringed Jack," said Dick, "allow me to advise you to leave the profession, and to go into the church. I have heard of many a fellow who has tried the road, and found he did not get on there, and then gone, by a divine call, of course, to be a parson. Why should you not leave the road, now, and take to the pulpit?"

"Ah, I see that you will not attend to me."

"Jack, I know, and you know, too that we cannot be no other than what we are. Society won't own us, Jack. If we were to offer ourselves to the community at large, all that we should get for our repentance, and our wish to amend our ways, would be a halter."

"True. That is true."

"And, therefore, Jack, do not let us waste our time in vain regrets. We are what we are, so such we must remain. So, now, my dear fellow, let us get on and secure our two good steeds. We will go upon Blackheath and Shooter's Hill to-night; and it will be a bad thing if between us we cannot get some good booty. We must pay our friend the watchman of the inn in the Old Bailey a part of his debt, if we cannot conveniently let him have all of it. Come on."

"I am ready," said Jack. "Come on, then. There is truth in what you say, Dick."

CHAPTER CCLXXXIX.

TAKES A GLANCE AT THE AFFAIRS IN NEWGATE.

They found, as they had anticipated, that there was a back entrance from the open country to the inn at which they had left their horses; and as they were instantly recognised by the ostler, they had no difficulty in substantiating their claim to their steeds.

"We came across the fields," said Dick, as he saw the man look with some surprise at the condition of their clothing, which, to tell the truth, had suffered not a little in their headlong route. We came across the fields, but we scarcely found the meadows dry enough."

"No, sir," said the man, "there's been a deal of rain, and they won't be dry for some time, I take it. I'll get a brush from the house, sir, and rub you down a bit."

"No, thank you. Just get out the horses, and we will be off."

"Very good, sir."

The horses were brought out, but Jack kept a good eye upon the road, as he could not exactly take upon himself to say if all the officers had ridden past or not, although a party of them had done so. Dick paid the ostler liberally, but not to such an amount as to create any surprise that he came by his money too easily, and they both mounted.

"You'd better look out on the road, gentlemen," said the ostler, "for they do say as there's a couple o'highway-men on it."

"Indeed! Who says so?"

"Why, the officers have been here, you see, and they says so, and I thought I had better tell you of it in case you happened to see anybody on the road that looked like 'em."

"Thank you. Good-day."

The ostler touched his seal-skin cap, and then Dick and Jack rode out of the inn-yard into the open road in the most independent-looking manner in all the world. If they had been magistrates of the country they could not possibly have looked more cool and self-possessed.

"Jack," said Dick, "does that fellow suspect us?"

"Yes."

"You really think he does?"

"I saw it in his eyes, Dick. I cannot take upon myself to say whether he means to do anything or not contingent upon his suspicions, but that he does think we may be the two highwaymen he spoke of is certain enough."

"Confound him!"

"Nay, we ought not to confound him till we know whether he is inclined to be an enemy or not to us. Recollect that he might have detained the horses."

"True; he might have done so; but as we have got them, I rather recommend a good canter, or perhaps a gallop."

"Fair and softly, Dick. We will get out of the high road as quick as we can; that will be one good job done. Ah!"

"What's the matter, Jack?"

"Look!"

Jack did look, and about twenty yards in front of him he saw a man on horseback with a cutlass by his side, and holsters to his saddle, and, altogether, a most mounted police-officer-like look about him.

"What's to be done?" whispered Jack.

"Put a bold face upon it, and ride up to him."

Dick did so, and bolting up to the man, he said, in a voice as though, he were very angry about something—

"Do you belong to the police?"

"Yes, sir, I do," said the man.

"Well, I only wish you were in the fields at the back of my house, instead of being on the road here. You see this horse that I am riding?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I very nearly had him stolen only a quarter of an hour ago from my paddock, at the back of Swains-lane to the north, by a couple of men, who were skulking about there for no good. They ran off when I called my servants."

"Two men, sir—on foot?"

"On foot, of course; but they did not seem inclined to be on foot for one moment longer than it would take them to steal a horse."

"Sir," cried the officer, "can you tell me which way they went?"

"Yes. Towards Hampstead, as fast as they could."

"Hang me, if I didn't think they would go that way, only Mr. Godfrey would not have it. Thank you, sir, for your information. The two men, sir, are notorious highwaymen that we are upon the look-out for. Good-day, sir."

With this, the officer, who was completely taken in by the bold, angry, and off-handed manner in which Dick Turpin had spoken, clapped spurs to his horse, and galloped in the direction of Highgate, to give the news that he thought he had now got of the fugitives.

"That will do," said Dick

"Yes," replied Jack, "I think it will. I could no more have faced the fellow in such a way, and looked so cool and collected while I spoke to him, than I could have flown,"

"Oh, Jack, extraordinary emergencies have to be met by extraordinary means, and there was no other way of disarming this great danger but by looking it steadily in the face."

"Which," added Jack, "is the way to disarm and to vanquish most great dangers, as well as small ones, if people could but be brought to think so."

Dick nodded, as an acquiescence to the truth of this proposition, and then they went on for about a mile at a rate which precluded the possibility of further conversation.

It was no easy thing to find direct routes to the neighbourhood they wanted to go to from such a very opposite end of the suburbs of London as they were now at. It was a long stretch to get to Blackheath from the neighbourhood of Finchley. There was the absolute necessity of crossing the Thames somewhere or another; and, beyond the fact that they did not think either London Bridge or Blackfriars at all safe for this purpose, they had no very distinct idea of which way they ought to go.

After about a mile further, they kept down a turning to the left, which, at all events, they thought was the best way they could then go; and Jack called out to Dick, saying—

"Have you decided upon our route, Turpin?"

"Troth! no! I have not. Have you?"

"Well, of course, I have not decided, because that is for you to do, as well as for me; but what do you say to getting across the country, now, westward to the Edgeware Road, and then skirting the parks, and getting boldly over the bridge at Westminster? If we, after that—admitting that we get so far in safety—keep to the left, we must come out about the Old Kent Road, and then all is easy."

"That will do, Jack. Be it so. I was just thinking what bridge would be the best, but now you mention Westminster, I cannot but believe that it will be the safest for us."

"The distance, too, Dick, will not be quite so great as it might look, considering where we now are, and where it is we want to go to."

"Certainly not. That will do, Jack, nicely. How far, now, should you say, at a rough guess, is it to Blackheath, from this present spot?"

"It will be but a rough guess, Dick; but talking of it in that way, and not at all pledging myself to accuracy as regards a mile or two, or, perhaps, three, I should say it is thirteen miles."

Dick nodded.

"Ah! Jack!" he said, "you know the country round about London pretty well, I do think."

"Tolerably," said Jack.

It was no part of the policy of the confederates to seek any adventures in the day-time. There was already too much racket about them, and too much excitement in the public mind concerning them and their doings, for them to run more risks by any attempted exercise of what they considered to be their professional calling on the road, as they went along. They thought, and no doubt, upon good grounds, that the impression would still be, both on the part of the officers, and the part of the public, that they were hanging about the northern suburbs of the metropolis, and so, their sudden appearance at Blackheath would be totally unlooked for, and they would be able to make, probably, a good night's work of it in that locality.

How far this calculation was correct or not, time, and a very short time, too, will now show to the reader.

The Edgeware Road was gained by traversing one of those long shady green lanes that lie between it and the Great North Road from London, and which in the summer time have such a delicate freshness and thoroughly country aspect about them, that it is marvellous they are not better known to the pale and dust-covered inhabitants of London. But the fact is, that when a cockney and his family goes a short distance into what he calls the country, it is always upon some high road, until he comes to a public-house, and there he sits him down over his glass until it is time for him to wend his way back again to the pent-up, confined place of his home again. The pleasant out-of-the-way spots—the cool lanes—the verdant meadows, are as much unknown to the genuine Londoner as though they were a thousand miles away from him, instead of almost at his very door.

But this is a digression. Dick Turpin and Jack of the sixteen-strings soon left the Edgeware Road behind them, and made their way down Park Lane without any molestation, after which they got through a portion of Pimlico, and fairly emerged close to Westminster Abbey and within sight of Westminster Bridge.

They could but feel now that they were, as regarded their personal safety, in rather a dangerous locality for Westminster was better protected by the police than any other locality, of London, on account of the number of persons of importance connected with the government, who resided within its limits. Still the danger was that of a few fleeting minutes, for when once the bridge should be crossed they would be in a different region—for squalid and dirty as the other side of the water is now, it was pretty, and cleanliness and beauty itself, in comparison with what it was a hundred years ago.

"Now," said Dick, as they cantered towards the bridge, "if any officer of the police should happen to see and recognise your face or mine, it would be a capital morning's work for him."

"It would, indeed, unless I thought proper to reward him for his cleverness and interference with a bullet."

Dick laughed.

"I don't know, Jack, but that such a thing would serve the fellow right, and I should feel myself inclined to add to the reward by giving him another."

They reached the bridge, however, and no one favoured them with more than a mere passing glance, so that their progress might be said to be exceedingly satisfactory indeed, so far; and so the moment they had cossed it and were in the old, dirty, and squalid road on the other side, Jack drew a long breath, as he said—

"Welcome to all the misery, and the squalor and the dirt of over the water. We are a hundred times safer here than we were on the other side of the bridge."

"I think we are, Jack, and now I have good hopes that we shall see Blackheath to-night, and feel something like the feelings of old times stealing over us."

"Ah, if Claude were but with us!"

"Yes, that is a damper indeed, Jack."

"It is. I do not wish to give way to superstition, but with a shudder I feel as if a something whispered to me that his doom is sealed."

"What mean you?"

"I think that his time has come, Dick."

"What! For death?"

"Ay, Dick, for death! I wish I did not think it, but I do in spite of myself. The shadow of a dreadful fate for Claude Duval seems to be resting upon my heart, and I cannot shake it off."

"But you must shake it off, Jack."

"Alas, I cannot!"

"Then it will be your master, and it will have one injurious effect which you do not calculate upon, if you do not rid yourself of it."

"What is that, Dick?"

"It will paralyse your energies so that, taking all your attempts to be useless, you will fail in everything that you try for the benefit of Claude Duval."

"Oh, no—no, it will not have that effect, Dick, for I will die for him if it be requisite; and, indeed, I have often wished that when his career ended, mine should do so likewise."

"I could heartily scold you, Jack, for giving way to such gloom, but I will not. Come on at a good canter now, and I'll warrant that if the moon peeps down upon you on Blackheath to-night, and if we have anything in the shape of good fortune, you will be in quite a different frame of mind."

"I hope I shall, Dick."

"I know you will. This is the pace to go at. How the folks look at us, Jack, as we pelt along; we are creating what may be called a sensation. Mind that pig, Jack."

Jack had very nearly ridden over a pig who was basking, if we may be allowed the term, in the kennel, with a depth of about six inches of very luxurious mud about him.

Jack, however, did not ride over the pig, but jumped over that obese and alderman-like individual, and they paced their way till they got into the Old Kent Road, and then at a more moderate pace they entered Greenwich, having done the distance from Finchley, which was rather more than thirteen miles that Jack had estimated it at, in the space of an hour and ten minutes.

"Pretty good going," said Dick, as they trotted through the town.

"Where shall we put up till night, Dick?"

"Let us ride on to Eltham. It is a quiet hum-drum sort of place, where you don't see a stranger above once a week. I think a man might go there and not be found out by his friends or by his creditors, if he were to remain there for twenty years. I am confident that he might stay until time had made a sufficient alteration in his appearance for him to pass as somebody else in the world."

CHAPTER CCXC.

A NIGHT SCENE UPON BLACKHEATH AND SHOOTER'S HILL.

The horses were not distressed by the ride from Finchley to Blackheath, and then on to the village of Eltham, but both Jack and Dick knew how very desirable it was to rest horses some time before they showed distress, so they alighted at the most creditable-looking inn in Eltham, after being well stared at by everybody in the village.

"Dinner," said Dick, "and the best of everything, and plenty of it, for the cattle."

This was an order that set everybody upon the stir at the inn, for the last gentleman that had been there had only had bread and cheese and half-a-pint of ale, and that was five weeks ago.

"A lively place this, landlord," said Dick, as he sat down with Jack in the well-sanded old parlour of the inn.

"Oh, very, sir," said the landlord, making a hideous grin. "However lively, sir, you may call it, we have had a good deal to think of lately."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, gentlemen. The pump has been out of order, and Mrs. Brown, who keeps the mangle of Eltham, has lost a hen, she says; therefore, with two such incidents, the public mind of Eltham, you see, sir, cannot exactly be brought to a state of stagnation."

"I should think not."

The landlord made his bow and exit, and Jack, looking at Dick, said with a laugh—

"Is that fellow a wag?"

"Not a bit of it. This place, I take it, would drive any man of ordinary energies insane in about a week, I think."

"It would me; but is there not an old palace or something of the sort, here?"

"Yes, but I think we had better, do you know, keep quiet. It don't want now but four hours or so to night, and the clouds are heavy, as if it would turn out a windy, and possibly enough, a rainy one, so we shall be able to get upon the heath and upon Shooter's Hill early. Let us stay here, Jack, till we feel that it is time to go out upon business."

"Be it so—and here comes the dinner."

We will now skip four hours and rather more by the leave of the reader, and behold the deep shadows of an unusually dark night dropping down upon Eltham and upon the whole country round about it, and wrapping up the bleak and bare heath as if in a shroud of direst black. Shooter's Hill, with its mass of vegetation to the right of the road, and the turret of its imitation castle, were completely lost amid the darkness, and ever and anon the wind came in fitful gusts across the wide expanse of the heath, carrying upon its noiseless wings particles of winter belating rain about the hour of midnight.

"It is time," said Dick, as he looked from the window of the snug room in which they were. "It is time, Jack."

"And I am ready, Dick. But before we leave this place, let us take the opportunity of looking to our pistols."

"Ah, yes, well thought of."

A few minutes sufficed for them to see that their arms were all in order, and then Dick Turpin rang the bell and ordered their horses.

"The horses, gentlemen?" said the landlord. "Oh, dear—oh, dear, it's a raining—that is to say, it's a mizzling. I did think you were going to stop here, gentlemen. There's capital beds. Hem! We haven't had anybody to sleep here, do you know, gentlemen, since last September twelvemonths."

"Your beds must be well aired, then," said Dick.

"Oh, yes, sir, they are, indeed. We all sleep in them in regular order. There's the blue room, and the green room, and the red room, and No. 10, 11, and 12. Those are the bed-rooms, gentlemen, and we go from one to the other to keep them well aired for the gents; and the cook, gentlemen, if there's one uncommonly damp, sleeps in it two nights, as she is rather a warm kind of individual, in consequence of the kitchen fires, you understand."

"We have no doubt about the excellence of your accommodation; but business calls us to London."

"Well, if you must go, gentlemen, you must; only I am very sorry to lose you, as I am afraid we shall be dull afterwards."

The horses were brought to the door, and Jack and Dick mounted, and rode off. The inhabitants of Eltham flew to their doors and windows to see them go as well as they could, in the darkness that was over all things; and, no doubt, the advent of two strangers in the place who had actually dined there, served these simple people as food for conversation, for not only the rest of the evening, but some days to come.

The heath was reached; and then Dick and Jack drew rein, and tried to look about them. How bleak, and how black and dim the place was! They might, for all that they could see, have been in the midst of some uninhabited region of vast extent, where neither bird nor beast had a home.

"Now, Jack," said Dick, "this is the sort of night upon which professional gentlemen such as you and I may cry 'Stand!' to a man in; and as we want money, we must get it in our old way here. Where shall we post ourselves?"

"On the commencement of the ascent of Shooter's Hill Road."

"Be it so. This is the direction, I think. Come on."

We must now premise that the snug villas and the rows of houses that skirt Blackheath now had no sort of existence at the period of the life of Gentleman Jack. The heath was nothing but a wide expanse of open country, and although several roads were made across its expanse, it was about as rude and uncouth a looking region to be near a great city as could be well conceived.

Blackheath had been famous, some years before that period, for a number of daring robberies that had taken place upon it, and in its immediate neighbourhood; but by the death of the perpetrator of them, who had been shot one night by a Colonel Standish, who resided at Lewisham, they had been arrested, and since then the heath had not been popular among the knights of the road. The present visit of Dick Turpin and Jack, however, promised to have the effect of raisings its reputation a little.

It was only by guess that they could at all make their way to Shooter's Hill, for see they could not, and there was every probability of their going out of the right track, which, in fact, they did to a limited extent to the left; but they regained it again, owing to striking upon the road itself, which wound around Greenwich Park, and over the heath, and then right up the hill.

"We are right now," said Jack. "The road is here."

"How far will you go upon it?"

"I think just to the cammencement of the rise, for there either horsemen or carriages are compelled to slacken their pace; so it will be a good opportunity for us to step forward and lighten their purses a little."

"Quite philanthropical, too," said Dick, "for they will be able to ascend the hill all the better."

"To be sure they will; and here we are. I can feel, as well as slightly see, that we are upon the rise of the hill. And now, Dick, I don't care how soon we make a little cash."

"How cold I am!" said Jack.

"It is what poor Claude used to call a shuddery night, Jack."

"Yes—yes. I recollect the expression. He has often used it."

As Jack spoke, they heard the tramp of footsteps approaching, and they were both silent in a moment. They had taken their station upon what horsemen and carriage drivers would call the near side of the road—that is, to the side next to Greenwich, so that they could come out from the deep shadow of the clump of trees close to which they were at a moment's notice, if it were requisite so to do. The person who was approaching came on at a quick pace, and there was a kind of hurry about the walk which led Dick and Jack both to suspect that he might have something about him worth the taking.

"Halt!" cried Dick.

"Ah! who is that?" said the traveller.

"Resistance is in vain," said Dick. "Your money is what we want. You are now covered by a pistol, and if you are indiscreet, you are a dead man."

"I have no money—indeed, I have none worth the taking. A few shillings, perhaps, are all that I have about me."

"We don't know that."

"But I assure you it is a fact. Now, if you want to stop any one with money, there is Mr. Croke coming in his chariot. He lives a little way over the heath. He is a rich man, and a lawyer, and he is too old, too, to show you the light pair of heels that I can; and so good-night."

With these words the man scampered off at such a rate, that, in the darkness, all pursuit was quite out of the question.

"Not a very good beginning," said Jack. "Which way did he go?"

"Up the hill. But what odd sort of light is that upon the heath, Jack? There is a something coming through the darkness. It looks like some great animal with two flaming eyes."

"Why, Dick, what are you talking about? It is a carriage, I tell you, and those are the lights. We can see them, but not the vehicle. I wonder if that fellow told us the truth when he said somebody worth the stopping was coming?"

"I should not wonder. Keep quiet."

From out of the gloom some distance now before them, emerged a man on horseback; and, as Dick and Jack had calculated upon every one driving up gently to about that spot, he slackened the speed of his horse, and, in fact, reduced it to a walk.

Dick made his steed give a bound that brought him right in the path of the horseman, and by good fortune and accident rather than that he saw to do it, he got hold of the bridleof his horse, as he cried—

"Stand, or you are a dead man! Your money, sir, quickly!"

"Oh, have mercy upon me!" cried the horseman. "Help!—Oh, mercy! Don't kill me!"

"Your life is not worth a minute's purchase if you don't be quiet," added Dick; "and if you do, it is as safe as if you were in your own bed. Your money, sir!"

"Yes—yes, good Mr. a—a—Highwayman—yes, if you please. I haven't but twenty pounds or so with me; but if you will spare my life, you shall have them."

"Quick—quick!"

"Yes, sir—oh, dear, yes. There is my purse, sir, if you please. Will you be so good as to let me go now?"

"Who are you?"

"Augustus, sir, if you please."

"Augustus who? You have some other name than that, I presume."

"Yes, sir. Augustus Croke, and that's the old man, I mean my father, who is coming in the carriage, sir, if you please."

"Indeed? What is he?"

"A lawyer, good sir, and he's got his cash-box from the office with him."

"Very good. Now, Mr. Augustus, you reside just over the hill?"

"We do, sir," said the trembling Augustus.

"Then I can inform you that there are no less than twenty of us, and all well armed, and we have made a determination to cut the throats of the whole family, if we don't get the cash-box that your father has with him. If we do, no one will be in the slightest degree hurt. Now, with that knowledge, you see, that your best way is to prevent bloodshed, and to ride home and say nothing."

"Yes, gentlemen—oh, dear yes. Besides, what's a cash-box to one's life? and father can easily swindle somebody out of as much again—dear me, I mean, put it into somebody's bill of costs in the regular way."

"Never mind, Mr. Augustus; you used the proper word at the first. Swindle will do. Now go on."

"I heartily thank you, sir."

Augustus, finding himself at liberty to proceed, did so at once, leaving the old man, as he called him, to take the consequences of a collision with the highwaymen, and only regardful of his own safety in the matter. If fathers show to their sons that quile and roguery are the mere characteristics of their proceedings, what kind of feeling can they expect their sons to have?

"Will that fellow really ride home and say nothing?" said Jack.

"To be sure. Selfishness is the badge of all the tribe, Jack. But here comes the carriage of this Mr. Croke, and it may be that in the cash-box which has been so kindly mentioned by the young gentleman, we may find enough to make this little expedition quite worth our while. Is it lighter, Jack?"

"In good truth it is. The mist is going, and the morning is coming. We shall have a fine night upon the old heath yet."

"We shall, indeed. Why, the fog grows whiter, and even now I can see the trees on the other side of the road quite plainly. Look, too, how the white mist rolls away in huge clouds. Ah, there is the morn."

"The beautiful morn," said Jack.

At the moment that they spoke, the bright sparkling silver edge of the moon—it was nearly a full one, too—peeped up from the horizon, and cast a long streak of light over the heath. The night mists, like a routed army, began to dissipate quickly, and particles of blue sky, with twinkling stars in them, began to peep down upon the earth.

"This is not exactly a highwayman's night," said Dick.

"No, but it is a beautiful one; and there comes the carriage—you can now see it quite plainly—it will be here in three or four minutes now. It is to be hoped that this Mr. Croke, the lawyer, will have something worth the taking in the cash box, that his son Augustus has spoken of."

"Yes, enough I hope to let us pay our friend the inn watchman, who will be waiting for us at twelve o'clock by the park gate yonder, and enough after that to spare for the exigencies of poor Claude."

"If not, Dick, we must still take toll here, upon the side of Shooter's Hill, until we do get enough."

It was astonishing to notice now how rapidly the moon rose, and what an effect it produced upon the whole landscape, as it showed its bright silver face to this half of the great world. The air became purer and clearer. A few floating white-tipped clouds alone remained of all the thick vapours that had hidden the face of nature, and the trees, and the heath, and the hill showed sharply and clearly in the light.

CHAPTER CCXCI.

THE INN-PORTER WANTS TO MAKE A FORTUNE RATHER TOO SOON.

It was with a heavy heart that Jack now listened to the sound of the rapidly approaching carriage wheels which announced that the lawyer was nearly on the spot where he and Dick were in waiting for him. Poor Jack was beginning to feel that his day was past, and that his career on the road was really over.

And yet, who had been more daring than he in the time gone past? Who had, with the wild and reckless generosity of an unselfish heart, done more good and less harm than he had, at a time when an adventure was only the more acceptable to him, the more perilous it proved to be?

But all that had been in the time before poor Jack had gone through the sea of horrors that had encompassed him, before his execution, the awful protractions of which, and his resuscitation, the reader is well acquainted with, since they have been narrated in the veritable pages of this narrative some time since. Those events had broken the spirit of the man, and had induced a nervousness that would stay by him until the grave should close over his hopes, his affections, and his fears.

After all, Jack was to be pitied, much as we, of course, must condemn his mode of life.

The spot upon which the confederates had chosen to wait for the coming of the lawyers carriage, was, as we have before intimated, a little upon the rise of the hill, so that the vehicle came but slowly towards them, owing to the necessity of slackening the speed of the horses up that steep ascent.

This was a great advantage to both Dick and Jack, and they were too old stagers on the road not to see it in that light, and to take every advantage of it.

The plan of operation of stopping a carriage when there were two men to do it was very simple, but very effective; one would go to the horses' heads, and threaten the coachman with death if he did not keep the animals quiet, while the other would pay his polite attentions to the occupants of the beleaguered vehicle.

"Now, Jack, you keep the coachman in check," said Dick, "and I will speak to the lawyer."

"Very good, Dick."

The bright moonlight shot through an opening between a chestnut tree and a tall poplar, making a complete path of light across the road, and just as the carriage came upon that spot, Jack dashed out from his hiding place and seized the horse next to him by the rein, while, pointing a pistol at the coachman, he cried out—

"Another step, and you are a dead man!"

The coachman dropped his whip in a moment, and sat looking as if the eyes of the highwayman, by their steady glare at him, had turned him at once to stone.

Now was Dick's turn, and he was at the door of the carriage on the near side in an instant. The glass was up, but with a touch Dick let it down, and resting the barrel of a large pistol upon the ledge of the little casement, he said—

"Now, Mr. Croke, it is not your money or your life, but it is your money, without your life or with it, whichever you choose."

"Thieves!" cried the lawyer.

"Oh, no, Mr. Croke. There is but one thief here, and that is sure to be you, for you are a lawyer. I am the toll keeper."

"The—the toll! What toll?"

"One that is levied by me upon rich rogues. So, be quick, or I will put half an ounce of lead into your brains."

"Oh, spare him!" said a female voice.

"Nonsense!" said Dick. "Spare a lawyer? Ha! That is a good idea. But as I never take even the life of a reptile without the necessity for so doing, why, I can afford to let you off this once."

"I won't be robbed," said the lawyer. "I never was robbed, and I won't be robbed by any man. This proceeding is contrary to all law, and I don't intend to put up with it."

"Oh, you don't?"

"No, sir, I don't; and rather than be robbed, I will wait here until assistance comes up, and I will have you apprehended, and appear against you at the Old Bailey. I can identify you, I am certain."

"Very good," said Dick, quite calmly. "It is the cash-box I want, that is all."

"The devil!" said the lawyer. "Who told you of that?"

"Augustus."

"My Augustus?"

"I presume so. I am only too happy in the consciousness that he is not near; so, Mr. Croke, I give you now about half a minute to decide whether you will trouble me to rifle your dead body, or give me up freely from your living one what I want."

"You will come to the gallows."

"Very likely; and you to a worse place than that, although you may die in a feather bed. You are pretty well known here, Mr. Croke, and as the half-minute is past, why —" Here Dick cocked the pistol, and before he could say another word, the lawyer handed him out a small canvas bag, saying—

"This is the whole of the money I have about me. It is a good sum, and I think you ought to feel satisfied with it."

"Perhaps I may; but, by the light of the moon, I can see some papers there upon the carriage seat. What are they?"

"Only some bonds, and bills, and promissory notes of no use to any one in the way of money, I assure you."

"Never mind," said Dick, as he reached his hand into the coach and took out the bundle of papers, "I will look them over at my leisure, and if they are no use, I will return them to you."

"Oh, no—no. Don't take them."

"I have them."

Something fell on to the road at Dick's feet from the papers, and upon looking down he saw that it was a watch, which the lawyer had slipped in there for safety.

"Is it a good one?" said Dick.

"No better," groaned Croke.

Dick sprang off his horse to pick up the watch, but just as he was rising with it in his hand, he heard the lawyer say—

"Take that," and at the same moment the report of a pocket pistol struck upon his ears, and his hat was struck from his head.

The first suspicion of Dick was, that he must be shot, considering the very small distance he was from Mr. Croke; and, indeed, if the lawyer had aimed at him anywhere but on the head he could not possibly have avoided hitting him; but, as it was, he missed him by a hair's breadth, and the bullet merely blew his hat off his head.

"Thank you," said Dick.

"Murder! help!" shouted the attorney, now, for having fired at the highwayman and missed him, he made quite certain that his own death would follow, as a matter of revenge. Dick fancied that these shouts would bring some one to the spot, so he opened the coach-door hurriedly, and seized the lawyer by the throat and dragged him into the road. Some female who was in the carriage was lying fainting at the bottom of it, so that the clamour she would have, no doubt, added to the scene was, very happily, so far as Dick Turpin was concerned, spared, and he only had to deal with Mr. Croke.

"Hilloa!" cried Jack. "How do you get on, Dick?"

"All right."

"I heard a shot."

"Yes, it was at me; but I have had my old luck, and it has missed me."

"Thank the fates for that," said Jack.

Mr. Croke was held by far too tightly by the throat by Dick to be able to do anything but make an odd gurgling kind of noise, more indicative of the difficulty of breathing than anything else; but he did manage to get upon his knees, for he thought that his last hour was surely come.

It was at this moment, when Dick hardly knew what to do with the man whom he did not wish to kill, that, Jack again spoke.

"Philistines, Dick," he said. "Down the hill they come."

This was quite a sufficient signal to Turpin of approaching danger; and upon the impulse of the moment, he flung the lawyer to the side of the road under the trees, and hearing a loud splash, he felt quite satisfied that he was in a ditch.

"Off and away," he then cried. "Come on, Jack."

Dick was mounted again in a moment, and, indeed, it was quite a beautiful thing to see how his horse had stood, amid all the confusion, as firm and quiet as a rock, waiting for him, and watching him as though the creature had a knowledge of what was going on, and felt a warm interest in the result.

They both now, although the time had so nearly arrived for them to meet the inn-porter at the gate of the park, made their way towards Eltham across the heath, intending to make a round to get to their destination.

They had, no doubt, but the lawyer would not be so bad but that he would be able to tell those who were approaching down the hill which way the highwaymen had gone.

"Jack," he said, "who is coming, do you know?"

"About half a dozen mounted men, I should say," replied Jack, "judging from the sound of the horses' feet."

"Ah, indeed! Then it was time to go."

"Why, yes; a general fight is not the thing exactly that suits us, you know, Dick. But what success did you have with the lawyer?"

"As good as could possibly be expected. I have a small bag of gold, I think, and I have taken a mass of papers from him."

"Of what use are they?"

"They may be of use to some poor devil or another. At our leisure, Jack, we will look over them, and possibly we may be doing the greatest favour to some one by destroying them. He said in his terror—and when a lawyer is thoroughly frightened, he speaks sometimes the truth—that they were bills and bonds, and such like documents."

"Then, let us destroy them all."

"No, we will hide them somewhere. What trees are those before us, Jack?"

"They belong to what is called the Manor House Estate, and they show us that we have crossed the heath. If you want to hide the packet of papers, it is easy enough to do so in one of these trees."

"A good thought. It shall be done."

The trees of which Jack had spoken belonged to a kind of wilderness that shielded an estate called the Manor House, that was upon the skirts of the heath. The wilderness was not at all enclosed in any way; so that our adventurers had no difficulty in darting in among them, and then they dismounted, and Dick climbed up a tree some short distance, with the packet of papers belonging to the lawyer in his hand, and safely lodged them in a corner formed by several branches, so that they could not fall.

"That will do," he said; "and now, I think, as there are no signs of pursuit, that we may as well get round to the park gate, for I should not at all like to break faith with the inn-porter."

"Heaven send that he keeps faith with us," said Jack.

"Don't doubt it. He would be a fool and a villain both not to do so. What could he gain by acting otherwise?"

"I don't know," said Jack. "He might think it was more to his interest to take the reward offered to him by the authorities for putting them in the way of our capture, than to keep faith with us, Dick. Mind you, I don't say that I have any special reason to doubt the fellow; but, still, he might do so."

"Then, Jack, we will be doubly cautious. Have you any of your phosphorous matches with you? I want to see what is in the bag that the lawyer handed to me from the coach."

"Oh, yes, Dick, I can throw a light upon the subject."

In a minute or two Jack had one of the little matches alight, and then Dick, rapidly counting the contents of the bag, found about one hundred and twenty guineas, besides some half-guineas wrapped up in paper, and separate in that manner from the whole ones.

"This will do," he said. "I will pay our friend, the inn-porter, and then, Jack, our whole energies must be directed to poor Claude."

"Alas! you may well call him poor Claude. Now, I am afraid, Dick, that he will never look upon the moonlight again."

"Don't despair, Jack. If you do, it will paralyse our efforts to aid him. Come at once to the park-gate, and let us settle that little business, and then all our thoughts belong to Claude."

CHAPTER CCXCII.

THE PERIL OF JACK AND DICK IS VERY GREAT INDEED.

It was quite impossible that any night could be more possibly lovely than that which now showed itself upon Blackheath upon the occasion of the visit of Jack and Dick. The few fleecy clouds that had been at intervals sweeping over the face of the moon had entirely disappeared, and there was the beautiful calm-looking luminary of the night sailing in a sea of azure of such a hue as is seldom seen in our climate.

It was a night upon which to dream of the past—upon which we might look with the radiance of hope upon the future—a night upon which the evil passions of human nature one would expect would cower from the presence of the soft and innocent-looking beauties of nature, and not show themselves till darker influences pervaded the material world.

Jack was very much affected, as he always was by such nights, and as he looked up at the moon, and the pale ray that fell upon his face robbed it of the little colour he had, he said—

"Dick, do you think you would like to go there?"

"Go where?"

Jack pointed to the moon.

"Are you mad, Jack? What the deuce do you mean by asking a fellow if he would like to go to the moon, eh?"

"I don't know; but it looks so quiet—so peaceful—and so serene, that it seems as if it would be a great privilege after death for the immortal part of us to wing its flight just through such a sky as this to night, to yonder far wondrous world, if it be one, and there rest in peace."

"Come, come, Jack, you will make yourself melancholy, as you know you always do, if you begin talking in that kind of way. Recollect how much we have to do in this world yet. Recollect Claude."

"Oh, yes, yes, we have him to cling to."

"And recollect poor Cicely."

"Alas! alas! Why did I not die long—long ago!"

"Because you are wanted now, Jack. That's the only reason I can think of, so don't talk of dying, I beg of you."

"I won't, Dick, till I have seen how Claude fares. I should not like to die and to leave him to suffer."

"No, Jack, come what may, we will get him out of the power of the Philistines, and so keep a good heart on it; and here we are close to the place of our destination. I have been thinking, Jack, that—that ——"

"That what, Dick? Ah, you too are beginning to think that our friend the inn-porter may not be to be trusted exactly."

"Well, perhaps, I have; but yet I think it is wrong to do so. Heaven knows that in the course of my career I have met with much good faith; although, at times, when and where I least expected it, I own that I have been betrayed; and, therefore, Jack, without doing any injustice to this man, whom we are called upon, by having pledged our words, to meet, we ought to be very cautious how we do meet him."

"You speak my sentiments, Dick, to the letter. What is the course that you advise?"

"Nay, Jack, I was going to ask you that, you know, because I know that the affair has been upon your mind some time, and that you have been giving it some consideration, and I should not wonder at all if you have thought of some plan of operations that would enable us to make a little sure of what we are about before we run any very serious risk."

"You are right, Dick," said Jack, with a faint smile. "I was going to propose something to you with that object, only as you had professed to have confidence in the man, I did not know very well how to begin it; but now I have no sort of difficulty, and this is what I would advise that we do. I would go to a part of the wall of the park over which we can easily get—for it is so damaged in places that there are plenty of footholds, and there I would leave the horses on the outside, fastened to a stake, which we can run into the ground; and when we are in the park, and on foot, there will be no difficulty in making our way through the trees to the inner side of the gate, and so seeing, at all events, if any one is on the watch."

"Good," said Dick.

"If," continued Jack, "there is any ambuscade, and we are to be betrayed in any way, of course, it will be from within the park, where any one might be hidden, and not on the heath-side of the door."

"Certainly not. There might be any force they chose to bring against us in the park, and we no further off it than the thickness of the doors opening to the heath, and not know it. Come on, Jack, I approve of the plan, and am desirous to put it into instant execution."

Having thus wisely determined upon what to do, they both dismounted, so that they should not be seen against the clear night sky, and they led the horses by a round-about route to a spot evidently to the left of the gate or door which, no doubt, is well known to all our readers as that which opens directly upon the heath from the beautiful old park.

They reached the wall in safety, and there, sure enough, they found several parts of it which were in a considerable state of decay. The difficulty now was to find a stake to which to picket the horses; but after a time they did find one, and they gave the creatures just liberty enough to move about a little, but not sufficient to leave the spot.

"Now for it," said Jack. "I will climb over first, as this is my plan, you know, Dick, and if the place is all clear, you can follow me."

"As you please Jack."

Jack, with great care, so as not to displace any of the old bricks, and so give an alarm, climbed to the top of the old park wall; and then crouching down, so low that he might be said to be almost lying along the top of it, he shaded his eyes with his hands, and took a long look into the park.

How sweetly the moonbeams broke among the quiet and leafy glades of that lovely spot at such an hour, and how calm and beautiful the green sward looked, tinted with its strange metallic-looking, spectral colour, from the full beams of the moon!

All was still. The place looked as if it were dedicated to the very genius of solitude, one could hardly imagine it possible that by any circumstances such a place could be the scene of crime, of frivolity, to say nothing of riot and disorder.

"Is it all right?" whispered Dick.

"I think so," said Jack, in a very low tone. There was something about the solitude of the place and the moonlight which would have made speaking loud seem like a piece of profanity. It is strange how such spots of nature in their solitary beauty, affect the imagination much in the same way that the dim majesty of some cathedral does.

"Come on," said Jack, "come on. This way that I have entered by is good. It is as easy as getting up a staircase."

Dick was by his side in a moment, and then he took a long look into the park.

TURPIN AND JACK STARTLED BY THE DEER IN GREENWICH PARK.

"How beautiful," he said. "Ah, what is that?"

"What—what?"

"There, moving among the trees. Don't you see something? There again now."

"Yes, a deer."

"Are you sure it was only a deer, Jack? Oh, yes, to be sure, there the creature comes out into the moonlight. It is one of the deer. How fair and beautiful it looks, now. Don't you admire it, Jack?"

"It don't seem like anything but the spectre of a deer in the moonlight," said Jack. "I wonder, now, if that creature's fine senses are cognisant of our presence? Look how its head is turned now, and how it listens. Ah! there it goes."

With a bound, the graceful creature was off in a moment, and disappeared among the trees.

"I think we may safely descend," said Jack. "Solitude and ourselves seem to hold possession of the old park."

They both cautiously now descended the wall, and after taking careful note of the spot, so that they should be sure to find it again, they began to creep along close to the wall, where there was a well-defined shadow cast by it, in the direction of the little gate.

Up to this time, everything had conspired to make both Jack and Dick think that they were suspecting the inn-porter wrongfully, and that nothing in the shape of an enemy was within either sight or hearing; but they had not proceeded very far, before they found some cause to come to a different opinion.

It was Jack who suddenly touched Dick upon the arm, and whispered to him—

"Stoop, and listen."

They both crouched quite close to the ground, and, indeed, Jack laid his ear to it, and then they heard a regular tramping of feet, that could not possibly be mistaken, and as they listened, they felt quite conscious that it was coming nearer and nearer each minute.

"What's that?" said Dick.

"Military," replied Jack. "They are coming this way, too. Ah, now they pause, and all is still—no, they come again, but they are straggling, and each man is making as little noise as he can. Dick, it is you and I that they are so obliging as to come to meet."

"Not a doubt of it."

Notwithstanding both Dick and Jack had taken all the precaution that we have seen they had taken, for the purpose of providing against such a contingency as this, it was quite evident that they had neither of them looked forward to it as very likely to happen, for there they were, now that they saw it had occurred, quite unable to think of what would be best to do. To be sure, flight was the most obvious thing, but their rage against the inn-porter was so great, it did not seem to them that anything was at all feasible but some plan of operation that would suffice to visit him with the retribution that he deserved.

At least, such was their first thought in the matter.

They drew back still further into the shade, and Dick was upon the point of saying something, when a low "Hush!" from Jack detained him, and then he heard a footstep upon the decayed leaves under some trees close at hand, and a voice said—

"It is time they came, surely, now."

"I should think it was," replied another one, "and once or twice I fancied I heard 'em. Well, they may come, but I don't see why half a dozen of us mightn't have done the job quite as well."

"That's my own idea, too. I don't like this mixing up of the soldiers with our affairs. We are officers, and we ought to be left to take the thieves, or not take 'em, as we think proper; but of late, it's nothing but—'Oh, let us have a guard of soldiers,' and then there's sure to be a mess made of the whole affair, for they don't like the job, and we feel put out of sorts, and no good is done."

"That's it," said the other. "But do you think, after all, that Turpin will be so green as to come?"

"I do. He is just the sort of fellow to come, if he said he would, and now that it's all up with Claude Duval, he and the other will like to make all the friends they can ?"

"And that other ?"

"I tell you again that it's Sixteen-string Jack."

"Yes, you tell me."

"It's true. He was hanged, but brought to life again. The story is well enough known, now, to the beaks; and if he would get out of way, and not go upon the road again, it's my idea they would leave him alone."

"Oh, would they, though ?—Don't you think it."

"They wouldn't ?"

"Not they. Of all men they want to catch him, I tell you. Don't you know that he robbed the Bishop of London near Fulham once, and that ever since then, the great folks have determined to make an end of him ?"

"Oh—ah ! That is decided."

"Well, come on ; I suppose all our set is in the park by this time, along with that fellow from the Old Bailey, bother him, who will pocket, I suppose, all, if not the greater part of the rewards."

"The ina-porter you mean ?"

"Yes, confound him ! Don't forget our private signal, though. It's 'Keys and locks,' so we shall all know each other among the trees. Come this way. I suppose those red coats from Tilbury are now not far off the gate."

The two officers passed on, and after they had gone both Jack and Dick felt that they had so much to think about that they were silent for some few minutes, although they might have spoken in an under tone to each other without any danger.

It was Dick who broke that silence.

"Jack," he said, "are you there ?"

"I am, Dick. Did you hear one of them fellows say it was all up with poor Claude Duval ? Oh, Dick, did you hear that, or have my ears as well as my fears deceived me ?"

"I did hear it, Jack, but it goes for nothing, or ought to go for nothing, with us. What does it come to, after all, but just to this, that the officers think they have him safe. You know that as soon as they get a fellow into Newgate they all think that his career is over ; but there's lots of chances after that, when there is courage within the walls and friends without."

"Heaven help him !" said Jack.

"Well, as to that, Jack, I suppose we are not the sort of fellows to call upon Heaven for help, although there are worse than we who often do so."

CHAPTER CCXCIII.

EVIL FORTUNE THICKENS ABOUT CLAUDE DUVAL.

It is time now that we turn our attention to the condition of Claude Duval himself, after that frightful struggle in the Old Bailey that had so very unexpectedly had the effect of placing him in the hands of his foes. We shall soon, however, take up again the proceedings of Jack and Dick in the endeavours they made to do something for their much esteemed associate.

The horror that came over poor Claude Duval when he found that it was Cicely who had fallen a victim to the scuffle that had taken place in the Old Bailey, was such that it completely confused his intellect for a time, and the first return to anything like positive consciousness that he had, was finding himself in a cell in Newgate.

"Hilloa !" cried a voice. "What do you bring it in now, Master Duval, eh ? How are you ? Better, I suppose ?"

"Who are you?" said Claude, faintly.

"Timothy Maggs."

"Oh," said Claude, "I don't know you."

"Why, no, I don't know how you should, seeing that we never was properly introduced; but you know as you are in the stone-jug?"

Duval nodded.

"Well, I'm a watching of you."

"Oh, indeed," said Claude again. "You are a turnkey, I suppose?"

"No, I'm a hextra."

"A what?"

"A hextra they calls me. I hangs about the stone-jug, you see, and if any of the regular chaps is ill and can't come and do duty, they gets me to do it, and the governor, he says, 'Where's Maggs?' he says; 'he's the man—where's Maggs?' he says."

Mr. Timothy Maggs seemed to be so delighted at the recollection of what the governor said, that he laughed until the tears came into his eyes, and then starting up, he cried out—

"There's the doctor, I hear him a coming. You wouldn't go for to say that I spoke to you, for my order was to wasn't, you see."

"Oh, no—no," said Claude faintly, "I will say nothing, you may depend; but, implore you to tell me if——"

"Hush! here they is."

The door of the cell was opened, and three or four people appeared upon the threshold of it. The cell was so situated, that in daytime it was not quite dark, inasmuch as through the thickness of the wall there came, close to the ceiling, from one of the inner courts of Newgate, a faint reflected light, which, when the eye got used to it, was quite sufficient to enable any one to see any object in the cell. No doubt, though, to any one coming directly from the open air the place would have been positively dark for a considerable time,

Claude looked at the people who came into the cell rather listlessly, and he saw that one was the governor of Newgate, he knew him very well by sight another of them he supposed to be one of the sheriffs, and by the manner of a third he soon found that he was the surgeon of the prison.

"Well, how is the patient?" said the latter.

"He's been a looking about him," said Mr. Timothy Maggs.

"Oh, indeed. Well, Duval, how are you to-day?"

Claude shook his head.

"Come—come," added the surgeon, "you are not much hurt, and you will soon recover from your present state."

"And go comfortably out and be hung," said the governor.

Duval looked him keenly in the face, as he said—

"I want an answer but to one question. I beg that some one of these who are here present, will have the charity to answer it truly for me."

"What is it?" said the sheriff.

"Is—is—she"——Poor Claude could get no further for a moment or two, and then gathering all his strength, he managed to say in a hoarse voice—"Is Cicely dead? That is my question."

There was a rapid glance passed between the governor and the surgeon, and then the former said—

"Yes, she is dead!"

Claude Duval closed his eyes, as if from that moment he would gladly shut out the world from all converse with him. They heard something like a low gasping sob, and then all was still.

"Gammon," said Mr. Maggs.

"How dare you!" cried the governor. "You scoundrel, how dare you say that?"

"Oh, dear me, sir. I only meant as it was all gammon of Claude Duval to go, for to pretend as he was a crying, that's all I meant."

"Leave the cell!"

"Yes, Mr. Governor, if you like, in course I shall leave the cell. Good-day to you all, gentlemen. I only said gammon—gammon."

Timothy left the cell, and then the sheriff, turning to the surgeon, said—

"Sir, can you say that this prisoner may be left with safety alone in his cell?"

"Yes, if frequently visited."

"Very well. You hear that, governor? That will be much better than leaving a man with him, and you will probably be so good as to send a different man upon each visit that is made to him."

"I will, sir," said the governor. "I know what you mean, sir. Lord bless you, these sort of fellows would offer a man five hundred pounds, as soon as look at him, if they thought he could help them out of here, but I think we shall be one too many for Claude Duval this time. Do you hear, Duval? You are to be left alone now, but you will be often visited, for all that, so that you had better keep quiet."

Duval made no reply whatever to this, and then they all left the cell, and he heard the lock shot into the socket, and the bolts and bars put up into their places, and he heard the retiring footsteps as they all left the cell door, and then he felt, indeed, that he was alone.

"Now," said Duval, "if I could only die—if I could only at the wish to do so bid a last adieu to this world, I might be happy. Death! Is it not, after all, within the grasp of all those who choose to clutch at it? Why should I not die? The power to leave this mortal life is one which has evidently been freely left to human nature. In a thousand different ways any one may shake off all the troubles and the griefs of this state. It is great and benificent of Providence to have given man such a power. Shall I not embrace it?"

This was the first time during all his eventful career that suicide had ever occurred to Claude Duval, and now it never would, but that he felt all the agony of spirit which the fate of poor Cicely, who had loved him so truly and so devotedly, was calculated to produce.

What had he now, he asked himself, to live for, now that that gentle spirit had gone from him?

With the inclination growing upon him each moment to take his own life, Claude Duval rose from the pallet bed which he had been laid upon, but he felt so weak and ill that the very effort to get to his feet brought on a death-like sickness, and he sunk back, fully believing that without raising his hand against himself, nature herself would soon relieve him of the ills that he seemed born to.

While Claude Duval is in this desperate condition we will follow Mr. Timothy Maggs from the cell, and take a brief glance at that rather eccentric gentleman's proceedings.

Mr. Maggs was, as he himself had intimated, a kind of supernumerary at Newgate, a "hextra" as he said in his peculiar vernacular. He was a man who had made himself singularly useful to the turnkeys of Newgate, and, indeed, to all the officials of the stone-jug, as it was facetiously called. His imperturbable good humour—his disregard of any fatigue, and the fidelity of his actions, all recommended him very much to the notice of the authorities.

If a turnkey were ill, or drunk, Maggs was the man who supplied his place. If ever the governor wanted any one for extra duty of any sort, he sent for Maggs. The Lord Mayor had, at the request of the Governor of Newgate, sworn him in as a constable, and he would have had a permanent situation in Newgate, but for his extreme usefulness as an extra. What would they do for the want of such a man, if Maggs had regular duties to perform? They would have to look out for another Maggs forthwith.

Upon one occasion, too, Maggs found out that half a dozen of the most desperate prisoners that Newgate ever held within its iron bounds, had planned an escape, and he took the information direct to the governor, and the whole affair was blown.

After that circumstance, all doubts, if there were any, regarding the fidelity of Maggs to the administration of the law, vanished, and the most unbounded confidence was reposed in him.

And yet, strange to say, in spite of all this, will it be believed that Maggs was playing a part? Yes, Maggs's sympathies were with the prisoners, and not with the jailers, and his mission to Newgate was to comfort, console, aid, and abet felons, which, according to act of parliament, is a high crime and misdemeanour.

But the sagacious reader will say—"Why, then, did Maggs go to the governor with information of the plot to escape of the half dozen desperate characters?" We will tell the sagacious reader. One of the party had already betrayed his comrades, and sent a letter to the sheriff containing the full particulars of the plot, so that Maggs having found out as much, not only disappointed that rascal of the reward he expected to get, but raised his own character above suspicion, by going to the governor with the particulars, so that when the sheriff came post-haste, and cried out to the governor—"Here is a plot to escape, hatching, sir, under your very nose," the governor rubbed his hands coolly together, and replied—"I know it."

By this little scheme, Maggs, therefore, did no harm whatever to the cause in which he really was enlisted, but raised his usefulness wonderfully by increasing his reputation.

True, that time the authorities chuckled over the idea, that in Maggs they had a cunning and efficient spy, while the "famiiy," as the thieves called themselves, knew that in him they had an able and daring assistant and friend in Newgate.

Several of those apparently perfectly inscrutable escapes from the prison had been managed by Maggs; and, indeed, with his facilities of going in and out of the stone-jug, it was comparatively easy for him to render what aid he chose to those there confined, for there was a general order to let him go about the building at pleasure.

Such, then, was the man who had been appointed by the governor to stay in the cell with Claude Duval, and to endeavour to get, if that were possible, some sort of information out of him regarding his associates.

When Maggs left the cell to the occupancy of the governor, the sheriff, and the surgeon, he took his way to the vestibule of Newgate, and was passing out through the wicket, when the man who was on the lock said—

"Well, Tim, do you think Duval will swing?"

"Rather."

"You do—do you? Well, he is rather an out-and-outer, ain't he, now? I did begin to think a little time ago, that we should never have him here at eight o'clock of a Monday morning."

"By-the-by," said Maggs, "have you heard anything more of what has been so much talked about. I mean about the hanging the fellows here in the Old Bailey. instead of at Tyburn."

"Why, yes, they do speak of it; but it won't do, Mr. Maggs. Oh, dear, no."

"You think not?"

"I know it won't do. Lor bless you, it's agin all custom and rule. Why, the fellows have been hung at Tyburn times out of mind, and the idea of hanging 'em here is outrageous."

"But, why?"

"Oh, you want to know why?"

"Yes, I do. For my part, I don't see, Mr. Wilks, what difference it makes to a family cove, whether he is tucked up and has to dance upon nothing here, or at Tyburn-tree. I should just as soon say good-by to this here world from one place as another."

The turnkey drew himself up, and giving his head a slight motion from side to side, he said in quite an oracular tone of voice, as he looked in the face of Maggs most steadfastly—

"I tell you what it is, Maggs. I don't mean for to go for to say as it really, mind you, makes much difference to a fellow whether, as you say, he is tucked up here or at Tyburn-tree; but what I look at is this—this here, Mr. Maggs, is what I look at."

"Well?"

"It's an innovation!"

"Ah, to be sure it is that."

"I rather think it is; and when I say that, I rather think as well that it's a clincher."

"So it is" said Maggs. "Good day."

The turnkey continued shaking his head some time after Maggs had left, for he really did consider within his politic brain, that what he had said was, in his own phraseology, a clincher. How many people now-a-days fancy they get over difficulties with just such clinchers as Maggs received from the turnkey!

A dubious smile played upon the lips of Maggs as he left Newgate, and he strolled very leisurely up the Old Bailey towards Holborn, and then took his route across Smithfield. Maggs never once looked behind him, but now and then there came that side-long glance which a man who thinks it just within the limits of human possibility that he may be followed, darts from his eyes, and once he made a full stop, and seemed quite absorbed in contemplation of the sheep pens in Smithfield.

It was quite evident Maggs was in no hurry, for it was a good half hour after he had left Newgate before he reached Barbican, and then turning down a narrow turning, he approached a little, mean looking public-house, and after one hasty glance around, entered it.

There was really nothing in the appearance of the public-house to indicate anything but rather straitened circumstances. One would have supposed it to be one of those little out of the way old fashioned houses that are cut out completely by the more modern blazing establishments of the day.

A ruddp faced, simple looking man was behind the bar, who just gave a nod to Maggs, as a couple of people were indulging in a pint of ale there.

"A nice day," said Maggs.

"Very," said the landlord. "What is it to be?"

"A glass of the old October."

"Ah, that's the drink. You know what to order, I rather take it."

"Why, yes, I ought by this time. Is the slate there?"

"Yes, here it is."

The landlord, from a high hook upon which it was hanging, took down a slate, to which by a piece of string was appended a pencil; upon this slate Mr. Maggs did not write anything, but he rudely scratched a compass, such as is placed at the corner of maps, with N. E. S. W. at its different points. Close to the W. Maggs scratched a hand with the finger extended, something after the fashion of a finger-post on a country road, and then he placed under that the figure 12.

"Hang it up again," said Maggs.

The landlord took a glance at it, and said—

"Rather particular?"

"A little."

With a nod, the landlord hung the slate up again, and then, after drinkingy his glass of old October, Mr. Maggs left the public-house, and went his way back to the Old Bailey.

Now, if any one had been very curious all that day at that little old fashioned public-house, they would have seen the landlord show that slate to at least twenty people, who only each gave a sort of nod when they saw it, and then it was hung up again.

We shall soon find that it had a significance of a peculiar kind.

CHAPTER CCXCIV.

THE THIEVES HAUNT AT WEST END, HAMPSTEAD.—MAGGS'S ADVICE.

THE mystery of the slate at the little public-house, near to Barbican, is one that will soon be made apparent to the reader. By the communication that Maggs had made to the "family," it was clearly understood that he meant as many of that fraternity as thought proper to do so, to meet him somewhere in the West.

Now, as there was but one place of rende zvous in that quarter of the environs of London, it was not possible to make a mistake upon the subject, and, therefore, it was well known where at the hour of twelve that night they were to meet.

We will now, therefore, at once conduct the reader to the place of meeting of the thieves at West End, Hampstead.

To those unacquainted with the district, we may state that there are two routes from London by which West End, Hampstead, may be easily reached. The one is a long narrow tortuous lane from Kilburn, and the other is by a road westward from the old church at Hampstead, and which, after crossing the several lanes that go northward, conducts the traveller to the little red looking village called West End.

At the period of our tale, West End consisted of a little cluster of cottages that stood in a hollow, and in the neighbourhood of them there were some mansions with very portentious iron gates and extensive lawns, past which the road went right on to the Edgeware-road.

Some daring robberies and one murder about the spot had, however, had the effect of making the neighbourhood not at all popular, and some of the largest of the mansions wanted tenants. One of them in particular had been for a long time deserted. It belonged to one of the aldermen of the City of London, and it was in the keeping of a highly respectable man, recommended by Maggs!

Yes, Maggs had sufficient influence to give such a recommendation, and, therefore, was it that Hawthorn House, West End, Hampstead, became one of the stations for the most active of the "family."

The worthy alderman, who, by the bye, amassed his money in the manufacture of candles, was much astonished that nobody gave him an offer for Hawthorn House; but if any one seeing the board up signifying that "This Family Mansion" was to be let, entered to look over it, something like the following conversation would take place between the projected tenant and the respectable man and his wife who took care of the premises:—

"Well," the visitor would say, "I think the place will suit me."

"I am so glad to hear that," the respectable man and his wife would both say in a breath; "for then we shall get somewhere else."

"Indeed? Why, why—What is your objection to this place?"

Upon this, they would both put on quite an air of confusion, and the wife would say,—"John, I think you ought to tell this gentleman, for he is a real gentleman as any one may see in a moment by his looks."

This was so highly flattering to the intending tenant, that he commonly proffered half-a-crown for the expected intelligence, and then John would say—

"It would be a very cruel and impious thing to let you and your amiable family come here without your knowing that you would never get a night's rest."

"Never get a night's rest? Why not?"

"On account of the shrieks, sir."

"The shrieks?"

"Yes, sir; they do say as the place is haunted, sir; but I can't bring my mind to believe it, and if any body was strong-minded enough to go on sleeping and never minding horrid screams and shrieks in their very ears till their heads seem ready to burst, they might like the place well enough."

"God bless my soul," the intending tenant would then say. "I—I, that is I shouldn't mind myself, but my wife is rather delicate. Dear me, it won't suit at all; good-day. I am very much obliged to you, my man, for mentioning it at all. Oh, dear—oh, dear, what a place to be in."

With some such expressions as the above the party walk off, and thus

DICK TURPIN STOPS AUGUSTUS CROKE NEAR SHOOTER'S HILL.

Hawthorn House will probably, to the great despair of its owner, who little suspects the sort of reputation his property is acquiring, remain without an offer or even a visitor.

It was to this place, then, as half-past eleven was pealed out by the old church clock of Hampstead, that several people might have been seen wending their way, both from Hampstead and from the lane leading to the spot by the way of Kilburn.

These people were part of the "family;" but they took good care to make their approaches to the house in such a manner, as not to attract much attention from the neighbourhood.

There was a door in the oaken paling at some distance from the regular entrance to the avenue leading to the front of the house, and it was by that door that those members of the fraternity who went there, who had resolved to respond to the summons of Maggs, entered the premises.

At that door it was that the man who took care of the house, rather too well for the worthy alderman who owned it, stationed himself, to see that none but the properly entitled persons gained admittance.

The first who arrived wore a cloak and a hat that entirely concealed all the upper part of his face. He tapped at the little oaken door, and Charley Lang, as the man was named who was within, opened a little square orifice in it, and said in a low tone—

'What's o'clock?"

"You can't see for the clouds," was the reply.

"Oh, all right—Can you walk in?"

"Yes; with a jemmy or picklock,"

"All's right," said Charley, as he flung open the door; "you are one of the right sort, at all events."

In this manner, and with the same amount of questioning, and getting the same answers, he, within the half-hour from half-past eleven to twelve o'clock, admitted to the garden about twenty persons.

The night was dark and lowering, although no rain was falling. Great masses of dark clouds seemed to have stooped from the sky to rest upon the tops of the tall old trees, and where there was the least additional shadow, the night was so intensely dark that it was impossible to see even dimly the ground at your feet.

"Has Maggs come?" said one of the last, who made an appearance at the oaken door in the wall.

"Why, no," said Charley. "and I wonder at it."

"So do I. He is generally punctual enough, and there goes twelve o'clock."

"Ah, there it goes, sure enough; and if he were here, I should not feel that it was any good staying at this gate."

"He is here."

"Is he? How do you make that out? Go and tell that to some one else. I have kept too good a watch here for that. No—no, he has not passed me."

"You are mistaken, Charley."

"Ah! that voice—"

"Is the voice of Maggs. Do you know me now?"

"The devil! Why, it is you, and I didn't know you a bit?"

"Of course not. Don't you remember now the last time I was here, we were talking about disguises, and you said that you would know anybody, through any disguise, that you had once seen sufficient of to say that you had had a good look at them?"

"I did—I did."

"Well, you know, old fellow, that I differed from you, and held to the contrary, and now I hope you are convinced, for you didn't know me."

"It was your voice that deceived me; I don't know how you could alter that so well."

"That's a secret; but I can do it."

"I know you can, Mr. Maggs; but don't say anything about my not knowing you to the 'family,' or else they will have a laugh at me, and I don't want that."

"Not a word," replied Maggs. "I only did it for a friendly joke between you and me, that was all, old chap, and I don't let it go any further; so, now you may fasten the door, for none of our sort will be here to-night, now, except those who have already come."

"No, it's all right," said Charley Lang, as he bolted and locked the door. "There's a pretty good muster of 'em, I can tell you, Mr. Maggs."

"Is there? How many?"

"Twenty-one with you."

"That will do. We don't like to go on without you, Charley; so you can let little Bill keep on the watch, while you come to the hall with the rest of us."

"Ay, ay," said Charley Lang. "Little Bill, though he is a chick of my own, and only a matter of nine years old, is a regular rum 'un, he is. Why, Mr. Maggs, I'd back that boy to keep watch, when a man couldn't do it. I'd wager he'd be on the look-out, and never wink once for twelve hours at a stretch."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, to be sure; and I do think he'd smell an officer half a mile off."

"He is invaluable."

"He is. Come this way, and I will rout him out. I daresay he is in the kitchen, as before, like a dog on the watch."

"No, I ain't, father," said a little squeaking voice. "Here I is."

"Lor bless us!" ejaculated Charley. "Here he is. There now, who would have thought it? I don't see you, Bill, though."

"No, father," squeaked the voice again. "'Cos it is so jolly dark, that is the reason you don't see me, father; but here I is."

"Murder!" said Charley, as he fell flat upon the grass in consequence of his son and heir making a bolt between his legs, to make his presence visible. "Oh, murder! I'm jolted to death almost. What the deuce did you do that for?"

"It's only me, father."

"Only you! Curse you, what do you mean by upsetting your father in this way, you little vagabond? Is this what you call honouring your parents? You will come to a bad end, that you will, Bill—you will come to a bad end."

"Perhaps, he didn't mean it," suggested Maggs.

"I don't suppose he did," said Charley, "or else, uncomfortable as such a thing would be to the feelings of a parent, I should have to skin him."

"Ha—ha!" laughed Bill.

"Hold your row!" said Charley. "Now mind, Bill, you keep watch all along o' this side of the garden, and let us know if there's any danger. Keep your ears and your eyes open, and your mouth shut, Bill, that's the way to keep a look out. Ain't it, Mr. Maggs?"

"Yes, I believe it is; but on such a night as this your eyes are not much good to you, I rather think, are they, Bill?"

"Oh, but he's like a cat," suggested Charley, "he can see in the dark."

"Can you, Bill?"

"A little," replied Bill. "Howsomdever, I'll keep a good look out, father, and if anybody comes here as shouldn't, I'll settle 'em."

"Oh—oh!" said Charley, as he walked to the house with Maggs. "He says he'll settle 'em. Did you ever hear such a rum 'un. But I'm glad to see you, Mr. Maggs, because, you see, I have a respect for your opinion, and I want to ask your advice."

"What about?"

"About Bill. I don't know what to bring him up to. I shouldn't like it to be anything low, you know, 'cos why, the boy has a kind of genius; and it mustn't be anything that wants bigness and strength. 'cos why, he's little and ain't got much. What do you think, Mr. Maggs, would be the best thing in life for Bill?"

"Upon my word, I hardly know."

"Well, but you does know a something of him, Mr. Maggs. Just think it over, now, in your quick way, and let us hear you opinion about him."

"Well, but, Charley, you are the best judge; you have thought the matter over in your own mind, no doubt. What is your idea upon the affair, eh?"

"Well, in course I have thought it over, and I'm divided, you see, in my opinion whether it's best to make a cracksman of him, a swell fogle-hunter and a snap-dragon, which you know means the grabbing of tickers and all them sort o' things, or to let him go on the road with some of the old hands."

"You mean, then, to bring him up to the old business?"

"In course."

"Well, I will turn it over in my mind, and let you know what I think about it when I see you again, Charley; but I don't think he'll do for the road. It strikes me as he is cut out for the smoking swindle."

"Well, perhaps he is. You think he'd be good at getting into houses when the people ain't at home, Mr. Maggs?"

"I do, if you can teach him the use of the tools well."

"Oh," said Charley, with a voice of conscious pride, "I tell you what, Mr. Maggs, I wouldn't say it before him on any account, 'cos why, it's a bad thing to make the young 'uns conceited afore their time—they will pick up that fast enough—but I'll say it to you, that that boy can pick a lock as well as you or I."

"You don't mean it?"

"I do—I do. It was only the other day that I wolloped him and locked him up in one of the old kitchens, and I thought he'd be a crying, so I got down close to the door and listened, and I heard a little kind o' rattling noise, and in a moment or two something fell on my back."

"Was it Bill?"

"No, it was the key that I had left sticking in the lock of the door, and he had first of all pushed it through, and when I found that, I began to guess what he was about. He was picking the lock, and in half a minute he did it too, and coming out right head over heels over me, he cried out—'Done the old 'un at last.'"

"Did he, though?"

"Yes. 'Done the old 'un at last,' says he. Oh, lor! You can imagine the feelings of a father. 'Done the old 'un at last,' says he, meaning me, you know. I was the old 'un. There's a boy for you, and only nine! What do you think o' that? There's a genius for you, Mr. Maggs. 'Done the old 'un at last,' says he. Oh, dear—oh, dear, I always laugh till the tears come into my eyes when I think on it. Oh, he'll be a rum 'un, he will. 'Done the old 'un at last," says he. Oh, dear—oh, dear. 'Done the old 'un at last.'"

CHAPTER CCXCV.

THE FAMILY COMES TO A RESOLUTION TO BEFRIEND CLAUDE DUVAL.

By the time Charley had concluded his choice little anecdote about the genius of Bill, a genius which promised as fairly as possible to conduct that precious young gentleman to the gallows, he and Maggs had reached the house; and passing through two rooms upon the ground floor, and then along a passage paved with stone, they reached a spacious apartment, which was called the hall.

This hall had at one time been a sort of great kitchen or servants' hall, but its size and the altitude of its roof had pointed it out to some modern improvers of the mansion as fit to be converted into the principal apartment upon the ground floor. With rather a questionable taste, since the rest of the building was not at all of that style, this hall had been fitted up according to the gothic notions of the Elizabethan era, and certainly very old fashioned and cosey it looked.

At one end there was an immense fireplace, with a tremendous carved chimney-piece above it, and at the other there was a kind of gallery, with huge carved oak balustrades, capable of holding some twenty people. The roof was supported by massive transverse beams of wood, and the walls were of oaken panelling. There was not much in the way of furniture to the room, but the thick and massive draperies of the windows still remained, and were to be sold with the house, and a large oaken table in the centre, about twelve feet in length and some six or eight in width, together with a number of old oaken seats, constituted the whole of the furniture of the place.

There was but one light burning in the immense room, which was forty feet in length and about twenty-five feet in width, and that solitary light was stuck between the outline of a stag's head that graced one of the panels.

The whole of the thieves who had responded to the call of Maggs were assembled in this hall. One of the oaken seats was placed upon the table, and was intended for the chairman, he who had called the meeting being usually placed in that seat of honour and office.

It was a strange thing to see the faces of the little throng of persons there assembled by the faint light of that one candle, and mark the different physiognomies, and yet see that there was throughout the whole, one prevailing expression of suspicion and cunning. There was an uneasy look, too, and a quick shifting glance about the greater number of them, that sufficiently betokened the unquiet life that they led, and the constantly present feeling that was in their minds, of not knowing but that some hand might be stretched out to capture them, and some one say in the customary phrase of the officers, "You are wanted."

And to hear these men speak, one would think they were all fascinated with the career of crime they had chosen, and that if they could they would not earn their bread by any of the ordinary channels of industry.

Perhaps, though, they all had a shrinking fear at their hearts—perhaps they all had their solitaray moments when they gave way to the horrors of remorse and all the fears of the untimely end they might well look forward to. Perhaps it was only when other eyes were upon them that they played the part of the bold, daring, reckless villain who would not be shackled in his notions of right and wrong by the laws of society.

Well, at all events, they gave Maggs a cheering welcome when he made his appearance in the hall, and he had to hold up his hand and say "Hush!" to stop the tumult of applause that they were inclined to bestow upon him, and it was quite a study now to see what a different man the Maggs of the thieves' meeting at West End, Hamstead, was to the Maggs of Newgate.

Here, amid his fellows, and away from those who thought not only that they were his masters, but he was their humble servant—he stood a good six inches high—his voice had a different tone, and he spoke, too, the English language with a tolerable amount of correctness; but at Newgate he played a part, and shuffled about half lost, and when he spoke he frequently made the most common and ridiculous grammatical errors, so that the turnkeys thought themselves just a little educated above poor Maggs, although they respected him for his very useful qualties.

What a strange life it was for that man to lead! Surely he had some secret motive for it, which will become apparent. We shall see.

"Bravo, Maggs!" cried one. "Here we are, old fellow, and I don't think there's one who saw the slate at the King's Head but is here now."

"Not one!" cried several together.

"Hush," said Maggs. "Caution. I do believe that we are about as safe here as it is very possible for us to be, but still, caution should ever be the word with us, comrades, and above all things, we should never presume upon our safety. We should always act, and speak, and think, as though the Philistines were about us."

This little speech acted as a kind of damper upon the spirits of the party. Several of them looked as if they could have said—"That is very true, but we would rather not hear it." However, after a pause, during which they looked about them with all the suspicions and uneasiness that the words of Maggs suggested, one said—

"Well, Maggs, get into the chair, and let's hear all about it."

"Ay—ay!" cried the others, but in subdued tones, "that's it."

Maggs, with more lightness and agility than any one, to look at him, would have been induced to give him credit for, vaulted on to the table and took his seat in the chair. It was quite evident that he gave himself something of the air of a captain over the others, for his first words were—

"Gentlemen all, I thank you for responding to my notice so readily. You all know that I am not a man to bring you here for nothing."

"No—no," said several,

"Very well, then. I may as well tell you at once that it is about Duval."

There was an ominous silence at this moment, but Maggs did not appear to be in the smallest degree disconcerted, for he continued quite calmly—

"I have thought over the matter in every shape and way, comrades, and I think it will be a great shame if we leave Claude Duval to the hangman. You all know him well—you all know that he never cared to keep a guinea if one among you wanted it. You know that he ever held his life as nothing when any of you were in danger. I don't mean to say that he came among you much, for he could not do so—his life was spent upon the road; but many is the guinea he has sent to the different cribs where he thought it was wanted; and when it happened that any one was hustled out of the world at Tyburn, didn't Duval ask the first family man he met if there was a wife or kids?"

"He did!" cried a voice.

"And if he heard there was, didn't he send all he had to them?"

"He did," said the voice again. "He sent fifty pounds to Jemmy Noakes's widow, and her two little girls."

"Is that Noakes as swung for the bank robbery?" said another.

"Yes."

"Oh, then, he didn't do it?"

"We all know that," said Maggs, "and we know that the man that did do it came forward at the Old Bailey and said as much, but they wouldn't believe him, cos they had another charge ready against him, and they hung them both."

There was a chilling silence of some few moments' duration now, and at length Maggs continued—

"What I want to know is, what sort of feeling you have in the matter? Are you, or are you not, inclined to strike a blow for Duval? If you are not, it's no use me saying any more, and the meeting is over; but if you are, hold up a hand each man."

Every hand was held up in silence.

"Good," said Maggs. "Does any one know where Dick Turpin is?"

"With the blackbirds," said one.

"No," said another; "if so, he's as dead as mutton. There's twenty nine dead bodies lying in a chalk-pit at Gravesend, now, for an inquest."

"He went off from that place," said another, "and there was one with him that none of the family don't seem to know how to tackle."

"How do you mean?" said Maggs.

"Why they say it's a ghost."

"And so it is," said one. "I was close to the cart when Sixteen-string Jack was turned off at Tyburn, and now they want some of them to make out that he is alive, and rides about with Duval and Turpin."

"It's true, too," said Maggs. "Mind you, I never said much about it, because I didn't know from Jack himself whether he would like to have the thing spoken of; but I know it's true that Sixteen-string Jack is in life. He was recovered after the hanging."

"Is that possible, Maggs?"

"Yes. It has been done in some three or four cases at the outside, but not more; I fancy, if it were tried in all, one in a thousand might come to life again; but certainly not more; but Sixteen-string Jack lives, I can assure you."

"He's been deuced, quiet, then."

"He has. He walked again; but when he did so, he was not the same man he was before. He lives, but he is the shadow of the bold highwayman that he had been. In that hour that he shut his eyes upon the world, he seemed to live twenty years, and Jack rose up again an old man."

"Poor fellow!"

"Yes, and he would have lain himself down and died again, but for one affection that he still clung to. It was his affection for Claude Duval, to whom he has clung, as the only thing left in this world to care for; and he has gone about with Claude, and at times, some speak of the old spirit that has blazed out in him; but, take him for all in all, he is wrecked, and I should say that it only wants the death of Duval to break his heart."

There was a murmur of conversation through the assemblage, and then one said, in a clear, distinct voice—

"Only say, Maggs, what's to be done, and I take my solemn oath, by my right hand and my left, and by my faith to the family, that I will do my best to do it."

"And I—and I—and I!" cried all those present.

"I am abundantly satisfied," said Maggs. "What I want to do is something that may be done by cool, determined, resolute men, without danger to life or limb to any one—I want to get Claude Duval out of the stone-jug."

"Hear! hear! We will have him out."

"I think we shall; but the first thing to do is to find Turpin, and if you find him, you will find Sixteen-string Jack with him. Now, what I ask of you all to set about is, to find them, for you know I am situated so that I can't go upon the hunt for them myself. I think, I am doing as much good to the family in Newgate, and more, too, than I could possibly out of it; so, you see, my hands are full."

"They are, Maggs. You are doing more good to us all being what you are, than any dozen of us beside can do," said one.

"Of course, he is," said the others, "and he knows it."

"Well, I do know it," said Maggs; "and so it is that I don't want to be detected in what I'm about, you see; and now, will you find Turpin and Jack, and bring them here as soon as you do?—If you are successful in so doing, you can leave word for me at the King's Head, and we will all meet here to morrow night at the same hour that we have met to-night."

"Agreed—agreed, Maggs, that will do."

A shrill whistle at this moment burst upon the ears of the assemblage from without, and in a moment every man was in an attitude of alarm.

"Quiet—quiet!" said Maggs—"quiet! Charley, what's that?"

"Bill."

"Then, something is amiss?"

"A few.—Stay here, all of you, while I go out and see. It isn't anything very bad, or else he'd whistle twice, and if it was more than bad, he'd whistle three times; but as he has only come the whistle dodge once, you see, it's a kind of a warning that's all. Keep quiet, till I come back to you."

"Yes, that is it," said Maggs. "Keep quiet till Charley comes back. Who has arms?"

"All."

It had an odd sound that "All," uttered as if it was by twenty men, each in a whisper. It was like a sudden rush of wind, and then all was still again.

Charley left the hall at once to proceed upon a reconnoitring expedition as to the cause of the clamour, and while he was gone the most intense stillness reigned in the place, for every one was most eager to catch the first sounds of his return with information concerning the warning that the sagacious and precocious Bill had thought it to be his duty to give.

Minute after minute, though, passed, and no appearance of the return of Charley took place. At last Maggs said, in a low tone—

"I don't much like this."

"Nor I—nor I," said some half dozen others.

"Mind you," said Muggs, "understand me. I don't mean for half a moment anything against Bill and Charley; but I can't help thinking that something may have happened to them, and in that case, you know, this isn't the nicest place in the world for us to stay in just now."

It was at this moment, when a general echo of the sentiments of Maggs came from the lips of the assembled throng, that the door of the hall through which Charley had passed opened, and he appeared.

The light was too dim and indifferent to permit of their seeing very well the expression of his face; but his manner was hurried and anxious, and before any questions could be put to him, he said—

"Their's only two of them, and they are getting over the wall."

"Who? Who?" cried everybody.

"Hush! Caution!" said Maggs.

In a moment all were still, and Charley was permitted to proceed with what he had to say to the assemblage.

"Two of the Bow-street lot," he added. "Bill heard 'em speaking on t'other side of the wall, and in course come and gave us an idea that something was up, you see; so that I soon got to where I heard 'em, too. By some means or another they have got upon the scent, and they fancy they have nothing to do but to walk in here and take everybody."

"Indeed?" said Maggs.

"Yes, that's their idea, I know it, for I heard them say as much."

CHAPTER CCXCVI.

THE DEATH AND THE BURIAL OF THE TWO POLICE SPIES.

It may appear at first sight strange, that two officers could be found who would be so apparently absurd as to say such a thing concerning an unknown number of men, that they would take them all into custody; but the history of police proceedings shows us, that, after all, it was by no means out of concurrence with ordinary practice.

It was a common thing for an officer to go alone into a thieves-house, as the public-houses they frequented were called, and from amid some thirty or forty of the profession, pull out one and inform him that he was wanted.

One would fancy it quite an incredible thing that the others, being in such force, would permit that one to be taken from amongst them all; but they did. A pair of handcuffs would be clapped upon the wrists of the wanted gentleman, and away he would go; and the mirth and jollity of the company, in the course of the next five minutes, would suffer no diminution on account of the little incident that had just taken place.

Such a proceeding, though, only took place among the ordinary depredators, and the officers had a much harder task when they fell in with such men as Claude Duval and his associates.

Upon the present occasion, too, there were some of the most determined spirits belonging to the family present, and as regarded Maggs, were he to be taken in such company, it would be as good as death to him.

Hence the information that Charley had brought caused a considerable sensation. It was a great thing, too, upon the part of the thieves, that their particular haunts, such as the one they were now in, should not be discovered by the officers; therefore, this unexpected visit from the enemy was doubly vexatious.

Maggs spoke clearly and distinctly.

"Family men," he said. "There are too many of us to find hiding places

A MIDNIGHT CAROUSE OF THE "FAMILY" MEN.

here, and, if not, the officers are as good at that sort of fun as we are, so it's hopeless nonsense to attempt it. I can tell you for one, though, that I don't intend to be taken."

"Douce the glim, and we're then off," said one.

"Yes; but they know of the crib here, and it's all up with Charley," said another.

"Never mind me," said Charley. "Do the best you can for all, and never mind me."

"That is very kind of you, Charley," said Maggs; "but, after all, we can't very well do without you or the crib either. I hardly know what to advise, my men, for the best. I am rather in a fix about it."

"They have got scent of this place as a place of meeting," said one; "and, therefore, it's all up as regards coming here any more."

It was quite evident, now, that there was a great deal of indecision about the party to know what they could be at; but at length Maggs spoke with a tone of decision, saying,

"Charley, where is Bill? Will he give us any other notice?"

"Yes; when you hear him whistle twice, you may be sure that the officers are upon the premises. They were coming over the wall."

"Very well, there is but one chance, and that is, for us all to try and get away. It is quite possible, then, that Charley may bamboozle them into an idea that they have been mistaken after all, and if so, why, the place may be good for us yet."

Charley shook his head, and Maggs saw the action. "You don't think that will do?" he said.

"No, I don't; but—"

"Well, go on."

"There's one thing to consider, and that is, that these two fellows have most likely made the discovery themselves, and kept it to themselves, for they don't tell each other, fool-like, from a kind of jealousy that's always raging among 'em."

"That is true," said Maggs.

"And so," added Charely, "if anything should happen, you see, to these two—any little accident, you see, family coves—why, then, here we are all right again."

There was not a soul present who did not fully understand what the proposal of Charley amounted to. It was neither more nor less than a hint to murder the two officers. A blank silence ensued, and no one seemed to like to take the responsibility of making a remark upon the subject.

Then, before Maggs, who at length opened his mouth to speak, could say a word, there came one clear distinct whistle from the outside, and then, before its echoes had died away, there came another.

"There they are," said Charley.

"No doubt of it," said Maggs. "Now, comrades, don't do anything in a hasty way, but keep quiet, and let us find out who they are before we speak. Out with that light."

A hat was thrown at the candle, that burnt dimly between the horns of the stag's head, and away it went. One could hardly have supposed that the extinguishing of that little light could have made such a difference to the hall, but the sudden darkness was truly profound and black, and the difference between no light and a small light was found to be immense indeed.

"Hush," said Maggs, as some faint murmer of voices came upon his ears. "Hush. Let us all listen, not speak."

All was still, and so continued for the space of nearly five minutes, and then a voice from the garden called out most startlingly—

"Halloa! halloa! If there is any family man here, let him have the goodness to give a shelter to a couple of the right sort, We have had the grabs at our heels, and happened to see Joe the Kiddy go in here, so we thought it might be a family crib."

"What's the meaning o' that?" said Charley.

"A death warrant," said Maggs.

"A what?"

There was a commotion among the thieves at these words, pronounced clearly and distinctly in the darkness, and then one said—"Listen to Maggs; he's going to expiflicate that ere to us."

"Go on, Maggs—go on."

"Comrades, I said, those words were a death warrant. I shouldn't like to shoot a man who came and said like a man, 'I'm an officer and must do my duty;' but when a fellow comes as a sneak"——

"Hear! Hear!"

"And a spy, and pretends to come among us—"

"Yes, yes, all's right."

"Then, I say, comrades, woe be to him, for by the laws of all nations he dies. Where is Joe the Kiddy?"

"Here, Mr. Maggs."

"Do you know anything of the fellow who just now spoke of you, Joe?"

"Not a jot. My idea is, that they have been on the watch, and have seen me come in here, and that they want to see all the faces present, and then they will take our measures nicely, and be down upon us next time we come here. I'm only a humble individual, and they call me Joe the Kiddy cos I wears a pair o' kid gloves in a crowd at the Opera, and nobody thinks as how I can pick a pocket with them on; but I have practised the dodge, and can come it famous, so, you see, Mr. Maggs, that's why the fellows call me Joe the Kiddy."

"Exactly," said Maggs. "Now my advice is, that we let these two fellows in, but in the dark mind you, and hear what they have to say."

"Agreed, agreed."

"Well, Charley, will you go and speak to them? Don't let them think for a moment but that we are quite as green as they can possibly wish us to be, and bring them into this room, and let them say their say. I'll speak to them."

"They will know your voice, Maggs, by seeing and hearing you so often at the stone-jug," said one.

"No thank you, I've got another voice always ready for such gentlemen," said Maggs, "as Charley knows well, don't you, Charley?"

"I do, and it got the better of me, I can tell you; and after that, if it don't do for a pair of the grabs, I'm a Dutchman, that's all."

At this moment the officers who were in the garden got impatient, and called out again—"Hilloa! it's all right, my coves, if there is any of the family here. We are of the right sort, and no mistake."

Charley hurried out to them, and so still did the thieves in the hall keep themselves that they heard quite distinctly every word that passed between Charley and the officers. The former, indeed, rather raised his voice, so that Maggs and his friends should have no difficulty in hearing what he said, and the officers, as people will do, took the tone of their voices from his, and spoke quite as loud.

"Who are you?" said Charley. "Where do you come from?"

"We are country hands," said the officer who was spokesman of the two; "we don't know much of the London family, but we are all right."

"Didn't you say you knew Joe the Kiddy?"

"Only by sight."

"Well, it's rather awkward. I don't know what to say to you. What line are you in?"

"A little of all sorts, but we do the footpad dodge when we can, although at times we crack a crib; and if nothing else turns up, we don't mind a little area sneaking, or we fumble with the fives, you see."

"Well, you seem to be the right sort, so come in, if you will; but I advise you both now, as I hear by the voices there's two on you, to be a little careful what you are about, for we will stand anything but nonsense here."

"We wouldn't deceive you for the world. If there's any one thing that we don't like more than another, it's a sneak."

"It's the same with us. Come this way. Can you see?"

"Not over well, but we can make our way by the sound of your voice, if you will say a word or two now and then. It a precious rum unfortunate sort of night, and the rain is a coming down above a bit now."

"Yes, it is. This way, mind the step—it's just before you."

"D—n it!"

The step that Charley had alluded to, was a step down, but the officer naturally enough thought that it was a step up, and he lifted his foot, fully expecting to find it, but as it was not there, down he went as though some deep hole were before him. His first impression was that such was the fact, but he quickly recovered himself, and only got as far as "d—n it," in his rage. The other officer cried out—

"Stand off—stand off! I am armed!"

"Of course you are," said Charley; "you would make but a poor hand at your business, if you wasn't, old fellow; but what is the matter?"

"Oh, I thought—that is, I had an idea that my comrade had fallen down some place or another, that was all."

"It's no matter," said the other; "confound it, I thought you meant a step up instead of a step down. But I haven't broken any bones."

"Only a little shaken, I suppose?" said Charley. "Lor, bless you, these sort of things do a man more good than harm in the long run. Come on, there's no other step either up or down."

"I'm glad to hear it," said the officer.

Charley led the way direct to the hall, where there was a death-like stillness, and at once opening the door, he said in a loud voice—

"Family men, here are two from the country, they say. They don't call themselves any one thing more than another, in particular; but they turns their hands to any little thing that comes uppermost."

"Yes, it's all right," said one of the officers. "We are the true sort."

"That's a comfort," said a voice—it was the voice of Maggs, but so completely different from any voice the thieves present had ever heard him speak in, that a rather anxious whisper passed among them of "Who is that?"

"It's very dark here," said the officer.

"Very," added his companion.

"Well, it's likely to continue so," said Charley, "for all I know to the contrary."

"How so? What do you mean when you say that?"

"I just mean what I do say, that it's dark now and likely to continue so. It's our way, you see, to meet in the dark, and so we say our say to each other without any sort of trouble; but if you don't like it, you can be off again, you know."

"Oh, no—no; only, you see, as we are strangers and from the country, it would have been a great thing for us to have had the pleasure of looking at some of the London coves of the right sort. But of course it is all right enough, and as we are only visitors, we ought to be the last to make any complaints, so we are quite content, gentlemen."

"If," said Maggs, in his peculiar voice, "the strangers are anxious for a light, why, of course, they can have one. I suppose they know our custom?"

"What custom?"

"The search warrant, we call it. Whenever any one comes to us and says he is a family man, we don't doubt him for a moment, but four of us search him."

"Oh, indeed; but you said something about a light."

"I did. Charley, my boy, get us a light if these gentlemen wish it."

"Directly," said Charley, and he left the room. He was not gone above three minutes when they all saw the flash of a light, and there he stood in the entrance of the hall, holding a torch that blazed away at a good rate above his head. The scene in the great old hall was now strange and picturesque. The thieves were grouped about the place in such a way that scacely one of their faces was visible, and Maggs still sat upon the chair that was on top of the table, but a half mask covered the whole of the upper part of his face.

"Well, now, are you satisfied?" said Maggs, in the same tone that had so puzzled the thieves. "Now you have a light."

"Yes; but—but——"

"But what?"

"We can see nobody."

"Why, what unreasonable men you must be. I thought you wanted to look at each other to make quite sure that neither of you was a spy and an officer of Bow Street in disguise. That was my idea."

These words were quite sufficient to convince the two officers that they were known, and in a moment they drew back to the door of the hall, and one of them took a short thick holster pistol from his breast-pocket, as he said—

"I am an officer, and I warn all here present that I am one who will stand no sort of nonsense. It was my duty to come here, and here I am. The man who makes the least question of resistance to me, that minute breathes his last!"

The positive boldness of such words as these from one man to no less than twenty, for a few moments had all the effect that the officers were accustomed to find resulted from the daring spirit in which they usually carried on their somewhat perilous profession.

CHAPTER CCXCVII.

DICK AND JACK GET NOTICE OF THE THIEVES' INTENTIONS REGARDING DUVAL.

UNDER ordinary circumstances, no doubt, the two officers would have managed to awe the assemblage of thieves sufficiently, at all events, to enable them to effect their own escape; but the circumstances then present were very far from ordinary, and those who were at the mansion felt that the very existence of one of their most secret and important places of meeting was at stake.

It was no uncommon thing for a Bow Street officer to go into a public-house, and with a pistol in his hand, pick out his man from amid thirty or forty of his companions; but that dodge, as Mr. Maggs called it, would not do there on any account.

It was Maggs who replied to the officer who had spoken so boldly to the assemblage.

"Well," he said, still speaking in that feigned voice which completely set at naught all ideas of detection—"well, what next?"

The others maintained a profound silence, and the officers thought that they really had it all their own way.

"We don't want any one in particular," said he who held the pistol in his hand; "but we know where to light upon a snug party of the family when we do want any one. Ha! ha!"

"Ha! ha!" echoed the other officer. "Come along, Bill."

"Yes, that's all very funny," said Maggs; "but what if we say No to your going?"

"Do you say it?"

"Well, I'm thinking of it."

"Who are you, then? Only tell me that, and I'll pop a pair of darbies on you like a flash of lightning, and take you to the nearest cage."

"You are a bold speaker," said Maggs.

"You are a bold performer, too. My name is Godfrey."

"Oh, I know that. I have often met you in Newgate. My name is Maggs."

As he spoke, Maggs took off his mask and sat quite composedly upon his chair upon the table, fully revealed to the sight of the two officers, who were as much astonished as if some apparition of some one whom they knew to be with the dead had risen up before their eyes.

A suppressed kind of murmur, like the drawing of a long breath among the thieves, might now be heard, for they all felt how completely Maggs was committing himself by this bold act, and they knew that he was not the likely man to do so without an object.

The officers glanced at each other, and then at Maggs again, in whose identity they seemed hardly able to believe.

"Is it possible?" said one.

"Quite possible," replied Maggs, in his natural tone, which startled them still more.

"Are you Maggs, the trusted odd man of Newgate?"

"Just so—the trusted odd man of Newgate—the extra——"

"The confidential supernumerary of the sheriff?"

"The confidential supernumerary of the sheriff!" repeated Maggs, with all the calmness in the world, as though nothing particular were amiss.

"And yet you are here?"

"And yet I am here."

"The companion—nay, the leader and the captain of this gang of the family of London."

"The companion—nay, the leader and the captain of this gang of the family of London," responded Maggs, with an imitation of the voice of the officer that produced a laugh among the thieves.

"Then may I be—Well, never mind that. There's no occasion to swear about it; but I'll have you in Newgate to-night, or I will know some better reason why than I do at present. Come along, Jenkins. We will take this fellow with us, at all events."

"Beware!" said Maggs, drawing his right hand from his breast, where it had been hidden, and showing that in it he held a double-barrelled pistol. "Beware I say, Mr. Godfrey; you are a bold man, but it won't go down here."

"Won't it? I summon you to surrender, Maggs."

"I decline."

"Take that, then"

Bang went the officer's pistol at the head of Maggs. Through the smoke the shot was returned, and with a shriek Godfrey, the officer, sprang up into the air, and then fell a corpse with a bullet in his brain.

The other officer made an ineffectual attempt to escape; but the sound of the shots seemed to have awakened any slumbering wild or angry passion in the breasts of the thieves. With a yell and a rush they threw themselves upon him, before he could take aim with the pistol that he had hastily produced, and he fell with his skull broken in, and his face covered with blood, by the side of his companion, to the floor of the room.

"Hold!" cried Maggs, as he stood up to his full height upon the top of the table. "Hush!—hush!"

The shout of triumph that had been half raised by the thieves, died away to a strange moaning sound, and then all was still.

"Hold, I say," added Maggs. "Are they dead?"

"Dead enough," said a voice.

"Dead as dust," said Charley.

There was, now, a pause of a moment or two's duration, and then Maggs proceeded, in a clear, distinct voice, to speak.

"Comrades," he said, "the world and the law will call this murder! Let us understand that quite clearly; but, thank God, they fired the first shot. They might or they might not have got else off, if they had behaved a little differently, but they tried to carry off the thing with a high hand, and it wouldn't do."

"No, it wouldn't do."

"Of course it wouldn't. The fellow fired at me. He had his chance, and I didn't flinch from the shot. It was my turn then, and there he is. Do you call this murder?"

"No—no—no!"

"Nor do I. They were spies, too, and, by all the laws that ever were, they deserved the death they have come by. But we did not kill them on that account. They were mad enough to suppose that they could come here and just, at the mere suggestion of their business, shoot whom they pleased. Are we brute beasts that we are to put up with that sort of thing? What sort of men did they suppose we were that from our fellow-men, just because they are called constables, we should put up with slaughter or imprisonment at their discretion?"

"Down with them, and all like them!"

"They are down enough, now," said Charley. "But, I say, Maggs, old boy, you have not come off scot-free, after all; you are covered with blood, and here it is running down you on to the table."

"That is nothing," said Maggs. "Godfrey was a pretty fair shot, and the only chance I had was that I was above his aim, rather; so, you see, the bullet just passed through my cheek, and a wound in the face is sure to bleed well. Give us a drop of cold water, Charley."

"Ay, that I will, Maggs. Never mind, old fellow, if you have got a scratch you went in and won, you know."

"He did!—he did!" cried the others. "A cheer for Maggs."

"No—no," said Maggs, "silence. We have still something to do. This is a bad and awkward job, to say the best of it, and it ain't over yet."

"Ain't it?" said one, as he touched the dead body of Godfrey with his foot. "It's over with this one, I rather think."

"And the t'other one, too," growled a herculean man, who had dealt with a small crow-bar the blow to Godfrey's companion that had stretched him dead by the side of his comrade. "I heerd his noddle go scrunch!"

"I don't mean with them," said Maggs; "but I mean that we have something yet to do. We must put them under ground, and that quickly too; and everything that belongs to them must go in the grave with them. We have then our secret in our own keeping, and if we blab it is our own look out."

"Yes—yes; bury them," said several. "We will soon manage that—Here's Charley with the water, Maggs."

Without another word, now, Maggs descended from the table and well washed the wound in his cheek, and then he wrapped a towel round it as well as he could so as to leave his mouth free, for the wound was in a very awkward place for bandaging at all.

The thieves watched him in silence until he had, with the assistance of Charley, completed the bandaging of his wounded face. It was quite evident that they looked entirely to him for directions what to do under the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed, and no one made the least movement to interfere with the dead bodies of the officers till he gave the word. It was in an odd muffled voice then that Maggs addressed his companions, for he found that if he spoke freely, the wound in his cheek bled sympathetically, and he already felt rather weakened by the excessive hermorage that had taken place.

They all listened to his words as though they were uttered by some oracle whose behests there was no such thing as gainsaying, and who was certain to advise its disciples to the best.

"I don't think," began Maggs—"I may, of course, be wrong; but, I say, I don't think it at all likely that anybody but ourselves has the least idea that these two men are here. It isn't the fashion of your regular Bow Street men to say much about the expeditions. If one hits upon what he thinks may turn out a good thing, he may tell another for the sake of having strength with him and companionship; but they will neither of them let it go any further; therefore, my idea is, that these two fellows will be just missed, and that's all."

The thieves nodded their acquiescence in this opinion.

"All we have to do, then," added Maggs, "is to put them out of sight as soon as we can, and then this old crib remains as good as ever to us, and, perhaps, better, for it may be a good while before there's another hand as keen as Godfrey to come prying about it."

"True, true enough that," said several.

"Charley, my boy, you know the garden well."

"Rather," said Charley; "and I can tell you of a nice place to put 'em. I wonder now if Bow Street officers is good manure for gooseberry-bushes?"

"For what?"

"Gooseberry-bushes, Mr. Maggs, 'cos the very best thing to do is to pop 'em both in the kitchen-garden, and rake 'em nice and smooth over, and pop in some slips of gooseberry-bushes over 'em, you see, and then the whole affair will look as natural as blazes."

What Charley meant precisely by a place looking as natural as blazes, it is rather hard to say, except that it was his mode of expressing the very height and acme of the natural, and so we must take it.

"Come on, then," said Maggs. "Let us set to work. I'm afraid I can only look on, for if I exert myself much I shall bleed to death. I am weakened enough as it is, but I will stay here, my lads, and see all snug."

"No—no," said one, "you go to town, Maggs, and see to your wound. We will take care that everything is right here."

"I couldn't do it," said Maggs. "I must see and know that nothing is left amiss, or I should feel too anxious for rest. It won't be a long job, though. Come on! There is not a window in the parish that looks into the garden of this house, that I know for a fact, so we can use lanterns to the work. Come on, Charley. There are four spades and a pick-axe or two, which will get through the work quickly."

"That's your sort," said Charley, "it's all right. Come this way!"

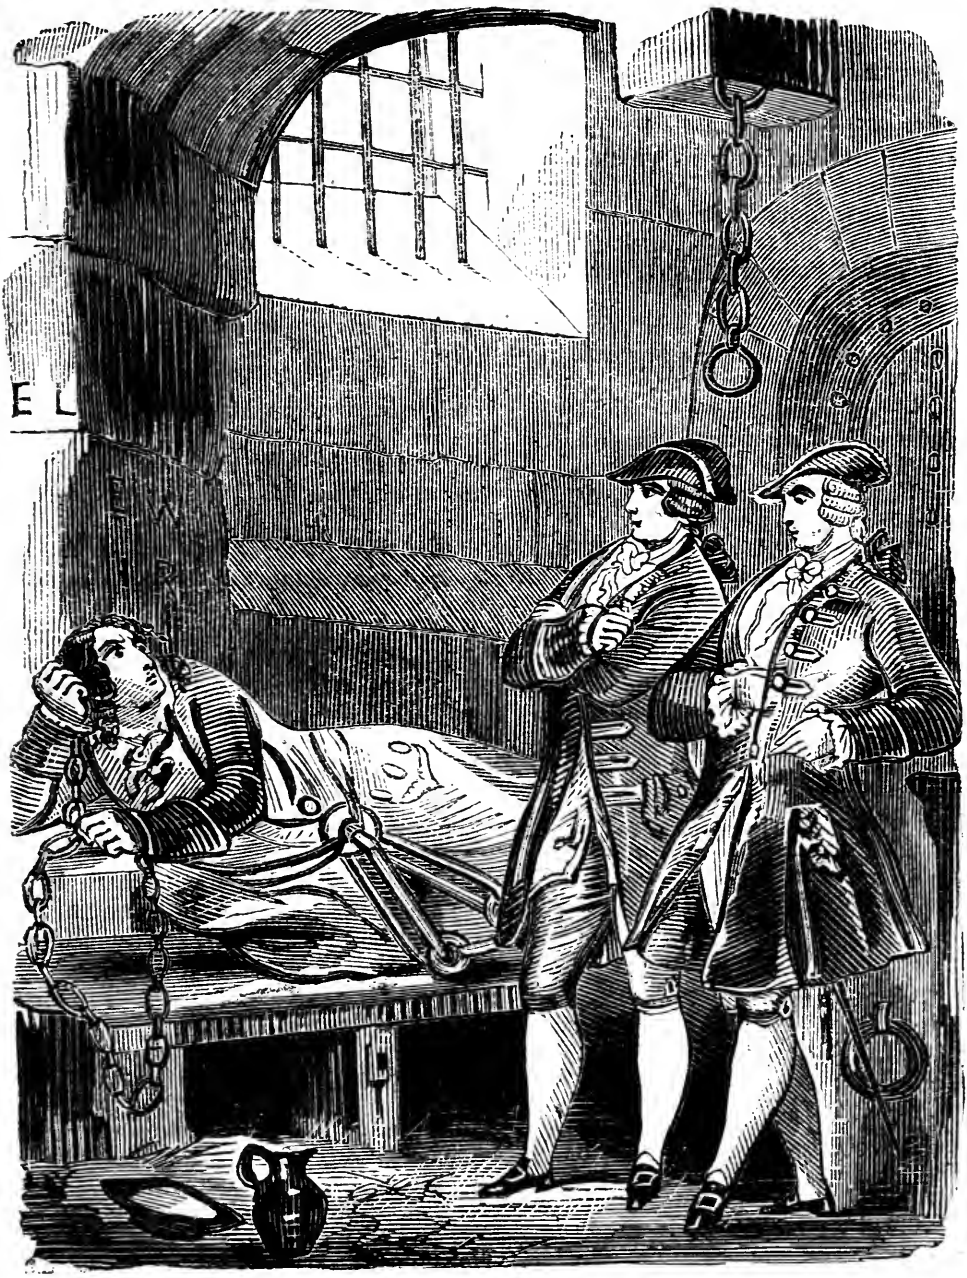
"One thing let me beg of you all to recollect," said Maggs, "and that is, silence. We may be free from eye, but we don't know how near some ear may be to us."

They now, with almost noiseless steps, and only making now and then a few short observations to each other in a whisper, proceeded to the garden after Charley. The rain was still coming down, but it came nearly straight, and had subsided into one of those small misty kinds of rain, which, when once set in, seem as if they would last for ever.

The thieves waited upon the grass-plat while Charley went to the kitchen for a couple of stable lanterns, with which he soon re-appeared. He then spread the tools that Maggs had mentioned, and in silence he led the way to the kitchen-garden.

"There," he said, "the ground is loose enough already, and there won't be much trouble about the job."

He proceeded to a large, and apparently well dug up bed, and placed the lanterns about six feet apart from each other.



"There," he said, "that will be the spot, and the best thing to do is to carry every shovelful of earth away for some time, and scatter it over the garden, for there will be lots to cover them up with."

"Yes, Charley, that's it."

It was a strange and awful-looking scene now that was being enacted in that garden amid the pattering of the rain. The space of ground did not admit of more than three persons working on it at once, one with the pick-axe, with which the soil was loosened in masses, and the other two with spades, by the aid of which they quickly moved it; but by turns, every one present, except Maggs, had a share of the labour, for they relieved each other at it.

In this way a grave, somewhat over six feet in length, and about three in width, began rapidly to appear, and by the constant fresh hands that were brought to bear upon it, they soon got it to about five feet in depth. They began then to find that each shovelful of earth they took out was replaced by an equal volume of water from some spring that they had touched upon, or from mere ground drainage.

CLAUDE HAS TWO UNEXPECTED VISITORS TO HIM IN NEWGATE.

"This will do," said Charley, as he threw down his spade. "We are deep enough. And now for the bodies."

"Yes," said Maggs, as he lifted one of the lanterns. "Now for the bodies. Who will go and get them? Don't speak all at once."

CHAPTER CCXCVIII.

SHOWS HOW TURPIN AND JACK PROCEEDED TO DO SOMETHING FOR CLAUDE DUVAL.

THIS was a part of the business from which the thieves shrunk back rather, and the tone of irony in which Maggs spoke was a result of his conviction that they would so shrink from that part of the job.

Nobody moved or spoke.

"Come. old friends," added Maggs, "I can answer myself for it that you are not at all afraid of a live officer. Don't let me think that you are afraid of a dead one."

"It's an ugly job," said one now, in a low tone, "but still, we all know that it must be done, so I won't shrink from it, for one."

"Nor I," said another.

"I will go with you," said Maggs, "so let us come on at once, old friends, and we shall soon have this part of the business over."

After it was found that Maggs intended to be of the party that was going for the bodies, there was no lack of volunteers, but Maggs said, with a good-tempered smile—

"No—no. Two will do, or four, at the outside—perhaps four will be better, as then they can be brought both at once, and that will save some trouble, certainly, so come on, four of you."

Maggs and Charley led the way. The latter carried one of the lanterns, and so they proceeded to the large hall, where the strife had taken place that had ended in the tragical death of the two officers who had thought proper to run the fearful risk of coming in the character of spies to the thieves' haunt.

Charley held up the light, and its rays fell upon the sickening spectacle below. The thieves again shrunk back with shudders; but Maggs, who saw this hesitation, and who knew how valuable time was in such a case, cried out—

"Up with them at once, my lads. It's like taking physic, this is. The sooner you get it over the better. Up with them."

Thus urged, the members of the "family," who would not at all have been particular about what they did in vice or daring, but who by no means liked to have anything to do with the dead, picked up the two bodies, and in silence followed Charley, while Maggs brought up the rear.

Those who were around the grave soon saw the others approaching with their ghastly burthens, and they moved aside as they came near.

"Pitch 'em in," said Charley.

With a heavy fall, the first body was cast into the grave.

"Now, the other."

Dash went the second; but they lay rather awkwardly, occupying much more room than as if they had been more carefully placed in that narrow and last home of theirs. Maggs pointed this out, saying—

"Will nobody go down and put them straight? I am afraid to jump it for fear of my wound breaking out afresh; but if nobody else will, why, I must."

"No," said Charley, "you be quiet, Maggs, or you will bleed to death. I'll do it."

They all looked at Charley with interest as he sprang down into the grave upon the bodies, and began to kick them straight. A few seconds completed that part of the job, and then he scrambled out.

"All's right. Fill in."

The thieves showed no lack of diligence, truly, in setting about that part of the work. The idea that they were once and for ever getting rid of a spectacle they none of them liked to look upon, inspired them with strength, and in the course of three minutes the grave was nearly level.

"Stamp it down," said Maggs. "Stamp it down, or upon the first rains that get through it you will have it all settling and sinking."

"Yes," said Charley, "and that wouldn't be so pleasant for me, as I stay here, if any one should choose to take any notice of it."

Some six or eight of them now stamped upon the fresh placed earth in the grave, and naturally reduced its height. More mould was then thrown upon the top of that, and then they stamped again, until even Charley was tolerably satisfied, and he said—

"Don't trouble yourselves any further. I'll plant the gooseberry bushes in the morning, and then the place will look as natural as possible."

"Then the job is over," said Maggs.

"Over quite," said the others; and then they stood in a throng by the side of the grave of the two officers. It was by no means the policy of Maggs, who had taken the initiative in this business, to allow the thieves just then any time for reflection; so he spoke at once about yet what was to be done.

"Attend to me, now, family men," he said. "What we want all of us is to find out where Dick Turpin and Sixteen string Jack are to be found, for if anything is to be done of much good for Claude Duval, they are the fellows to help us. Now I do think that if some half-dozen of you were to set about looking for them in earnest, they would surely be found."

"Oh, yes," said one. "If you, Maggs, will provide the horses, we will set off; but you know it would be a twelvemonth's job at the least to try it on foot."

"It would be more than that, ftiends, for I don't think you would ever come up with either of them in that way. I will give you every one to the extent of six a note to old Peter at the Bull Inn near Smithfield, and he will provide a horse for the love of it."

"I will go, Maggs," cried one. "And I—and I—I, too."

"Stop! Don't any of you try it that ain't a good horseman, for if you do you will just get into a scrape, and perhaps spoil old Peter's nags."

Several shrunk back upon this statement; but Maggs knew them all well, and had soon picked out six upon whom he knew he could depend quite well, and to them he gave the necessary order for horses.

"And now," he said, "I, for one, must bid you good-by, Charley, and the sooner you be off the better, I think, for it ain't very far off morning."

"Yes—yes, let us go."

"Go easy, though, and not all at once. You know where we meet again, and let me beg of you all to be something more than cautious now about this place, for after what has happened, we don't know what may happen. Good luck to you all, and good night."

The thieves were all soon gone, but Maggs managed to remain behind till the last, and then, placing his great rough hand upon the shoulder of Charley, he said—

"I say, old fellow, you won't like this crib now?"

Charley did not reply for a few moments, and when he did, it was rather in a confused tone that he said—

"I don't know, Maggs, that I should care to say as much to any one but you; but the truth is, I shouldn't like it."

"It is not natural that you should, old fellow; but all I ask of you is, to stay till this affair of Claude Duval is put into some sort of tune, and then I should say, 'pack up and be off at once;' but do stay till then, Charley."

"I will stay as long as you like. I daresay it's likely enough that at times, at night, mind you, when the wind is a howling, and the rain is pattering down, I may think of them two poor devils as lays yonder, so still and quiet now; but if I do, Maggs, I know better all the while, and when the sunshine comes again in the morning, and I see that it shines all the same on their graves as anywhere else, I shall laugh at myself for a fool for thinking anything of it."

"Never you mind that, Charley. It's natural you shouldn't like it, so depend upon me, old fellow, and I'll find you another crib before long. I tell you, Charley, I shouldn't like it myself, so how can I expect anyone else to do so?"

"You are a good fellow, Maggs, and I am obliged to you."

"Don't mention it. Good-night, now."

Charley held open the door in the garden-wall, and watched the retreating figure of Maggs, as it went through the darkness, until it was completely lost to him, and then, as he closed the door, he shaded his eyes with his hands, and looked round him as he never before had looked in that place.

He paused, and blew a shrill whistle by the aid of his fingers. It was soon answered, and then Bill stood before him.

"Well, father, it's all right, I suppose?" said Bill.

"Oh, very likely. Go to roost, Bill."

"Yes, I'm a going. Did they cook the goose of them nabs, father?"

"What?"

"I say, did they settle the hash of them fellows—eh?"

"Go to bed and don't ask such questions. Hark you, Bill. There's some things that the less you happen to know about the better for you, so don't you be too inquisitive now, old fellow."

"Well, but I only——"

"Be off, will you?"

Bill made a precipitate retreat, and then Charley, as he took his way to the kitchen, muttered to himself—

"Confound it, I shall be pestered by his curiosity now, I suppose, night and day. No, Maggs is right, I shall never like it. No—never."

Leaving Mr. Charley, now, to his own reflections, we will follow Maggs to London, whither he intended to walk on foot; for it was one of his maxims, whenever he was upon any secret expedition, to trust much rather to his own speed, than to make evidence of his having been upon any particular road, of the drivers of vehicles, whether public or private.

To be sure, in the Edgeward-road, for Maggs went home by Kilburn, he got a lift at the back of a carriage for a mile or two, before he was observed by the footman, in the rumble, and that saved him considerably.

It was about five o'clock in the morning when Maggs, looking as calm and cool as possible, and wearing rather a stolid, stupid look upon his face, ascended the steps of Newgate, and tapped at the wicket.

"Hilloa!" cried the half asleep turnkey, who was "on the look." "Hilloa! who's there? Mind, no tobacco or spirits to be brought into the prison."

"It's only me," said Maggs, in a mild tone.

"Oh, Maggs?"

"Yes, Mr. Moss, it's only me; but I'll come again if you thinks it's too soon, sir, only I thought I might be wanted, you see, so I thought I would tap at the wicket."

"Oh, ah, it's all right. Come in."

"Thank you."

"Oh, don't mention it; we are always glad to see you, you know, 'cos, arter all, you are a good-tempered chap."

"I tries to do my best," said Maggs, as he slipped through to wicket, which the turnkey just held open wide enough to an inch to let him in. "I always does all I can to oblige the authorities, Mr. Moss."

"So you do, Maggs. So you do. I say, old fellow."

"Yes, Mr. Moss?"

"Just step over the way and get a pot of half-and-half. I'm as thirsty as a coalheaver, I am, and there's nobody, you know, that one can trust to get it but you."

"Don't mention it, Mr. Moss. I'm only too happy to be of any service to a gentleman like you, you know. I'll go at once."

"Thank you. Don't hurry, now I know what a fellow you are when you are going an errand for anybody. You are so glad to do it, you are half ready to break your neck."

"Oh, no—no. I will take care. You like it with old ale?"

"I do—I do."

Maggs went over the way for the beer, and the turnkey shaking his head as he looked after him through the spikes at the top of the wicket-gate, said—

"He's the best tempered fellow as ever I came near, though he is a little soft. Lor, I don't know what he'd do if it wasn't for old Newgate. I do think he's attached to the very stones at the door, and if he isn't so bright as some folks, why, he's as faithful as an old mastiff dog, is Maggs, that he is; and here he comes with the half-and-half, a carrying of it as steady, so as there should be as good a head on it as ever was. Come in."

"All right, Mr. Moss. It's the oldest ale."

"Drink, Maggs."

"No, Mr. Moss, arter you, sir, is manners."

"Well, here's luck."

The turnkey did leave about a wine glass of half-and-half at the bottom of the pot for his worthy and esteemed friend, Maggs; but the latter drank it with quite a look of satisfied humility, and the turnkey stamped upon the stone pavement as though he would prettle the liquor in his stomach properly by so doing, as he said—

"By gosh, it's prime, that."

"Very good, sir."

"I say, Maggs, old boy—why—what's the matter with your face? You have got it tied up, old fellow."

"Ah, I do think as it was some of those horrid family coves, as they call themselves, that did that. I was just passing the end of Field Lane, when out came a couple of fellows, and one of 'em made a cut at me with something, and laid my cheek open, as you see it. I daresay, Mr. Moss, now, they knew as I came to the prison here, and did all I could for such gentlemen as you."

"I shouldn't wonder. It's a confounded shame, though; but my mind has been a little bit disturbed or so, Maggs, by a something that has happened here only about half an hour ago."

"Indeed, Mr. Moss, it would need to be something particular to disturb such a mind as you have, sir."

"Well, my good fellow, perhaps you are right there, and I will say, Maggs, that for real downright good judgment, at times, you beat any one that I ever heard of; but I'll just tell you."

"Do, Mr. Moss—oh do, sir."

"Well, I was sitting on this here chair a thinking of nothing at all, but I wasn't asleep—mind you, I never go to sleep while I am on the lock."

"You couldn't, Mr. Moss, cos it's contrary to the rules."

"Just so," said Moss, with a slight smile of pity for the simplicity of his friend Maggs. "Just so, as you say, I couldn't, for it's contrary to the rules. Well, here I was, wide awake, when some one came bang up the steps as if he owned all Newgate, and giving such a rattle at the wicket, that it was nigh enough to have it down, he cried out—

"'Hilloa, turnkey!—You fellow, th ere!'

"'Yes, sir,' says I, a running up to the wicket, for I thought, to be sure, it was some great man or another. 'Yes, sir,' says I.

"'How is Claude Duval?' he cried.

"'Better, sir,' says I.

"'Oh, very well, d—n you!' says he, and away he went, leaving me a staring like a stuck pig, and afore I could think of sending anybody to nab him, he was off, and out of all sight and hearing. Now, what do you think of that, Maggs?"

"I don't know what to think. If you can't think what it was, Mr. Moss, it ain't at all likely that I should."

"Well, there's something in that; but I'm regularly bothered by it, it was so cool. Well, it's no use plaguing oneself. Just step over the way, and get another pot, Maggs."

CHAPTER CCXCIX.

RETURNS TO DICK TURPIN AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK IN THE PARK AT GREENWICH.

While all these things were going on in London, Claude Duval being in his gloomy cell in Newgate, and Mr. Maggs doing all that was in his power to work out his release, Dick Turpin and Sixteen-string Jack were by no means idle.

It will be recollected that we left them in no very enviable position in the old park at Greenwich, where, if they had not in so strange and unexpected a manner overheard sufficient to convince them that they where in great danger from the treachery of the inn-porter, they would in all likelihood have fallen into the snare laid for them by that foolish individual.

Foolish he was, in every sense of the word, for in the first place, it is foolish to break faith with any one; and in the second place, he was foolish, even viewing the affair solely as regarded what he might get by it, and throwing all common feeling and honour overboard, for he would have got double and treble from Turpin and Jack, than ever he could hope to wrest from the cupidity of the officers, who would, of course, grudge him every penny-piece that he might take from them, even if the plan to apprehend Jack and Dick had been successful, of which the officers themselves could not help entertaining the gravest doubts.

When the fortunate discovery that the two adventurers made, assured them that they were all but caught in a trap, their first idea was not to leave the spot until they had taken some revenge upon the inn-porter.

"Jack," said Dick Turpin in a whisper. "Let us get back again the way we came, and be off at once."

"But that rascal?"

"Yes, we know that he is a rascal, but what can we do? You see, or rather you know without seeing, that the Philistines are in force about this spot, and you know that we have no chance with such a mob of them."

"No; and yet——"

"Yes, I know what you would say, it is a hard thing to let that rascal off, and I admit that it is; but of all things that keep well, Jack, command me to revenge, which, as long as you like to take care of it, never turns mouldy or sour."

"There is truth in that. Come on."

They surmounted the wall again, and were well pleased when they found their horses quite safe under its shadow. To tighten the girths, and to mount, was the work of a few moments, and then they lingered a little, and listened, for they could now hear plainly the tramp of horses feet upon the heath.

"By George! they have got some mounted men from Woolwich, I'd lay any money," said Dick.

"Then come—we have no time to lose."

"Not a moment. This way, Jack."

Dick was well enough acquainted with the heath, and he struck off to the right, keeping well under the shadow of the park wall. That is to say, supposing their foes to be to the wall, they went then to the right, which took them through the valley at the base of Shooter's Hill.

A quarter of an hour's riding brought them out by the river side, at some distance below Greenwich, but it was a very wild and desolate-looking spot of ground that they debouched upon. The river lay glistening before them, lazily heaving to and fro, looking thick and slimy, as it was just beginning only to feel the influence of the rising tide. On the opposite shore they could see a few dim lights, that seemed as vapours flitting there, and as they varied in intensity to be going out and in each passing moment. A keen whistling wind was blowing.

"Not a very comfortable prospect this, Jack," said Turpin.

"Far from it. Do you know the route by the river side?"

"Why, yes, I do, but I am thinking, as it leads direct into Greenwich, that it won't be the best for us to take Oh! if we could only get across the water now, Jack."

"Impossible."

"Nay, nothing is impossible of that kind. The only difficulty will be to get a craft that will hold the cattle."

"That is what I mean Dick, when, I say it is impossible. You don't think that a wherry would answer the purpose, do you, and you don't think of swimming the river, I suppose?"

"Neither, Jack; and yet I think there is a chance. You see, it is high water, and, in fact, it is only just on the turn. There then lies my hope of getting across; and now tell me if you see anything black about half-way between here and the middle of the stream?"

"Yes, a barge of some sort."

"Very good. There is generally but one man on board the Thames barges, or a man and a boy at most, so there will not be many people to pay, you see, and I don't think there will be any great difficulty in getting the horses on board."

"Well, if it can be done—"

"We will see.—Hilloa—boat here—boat!'

"Here you are, sir," said a waterman springing up from Heaven only knows where in a moment.

Dick dismounted, and whispered to Jack to hold his horse, and then turning to the man, he said,

"Can you row me to that barge out yonder?"

"Yes, sir, surely."

"Very well, do so; I will pay you as if it were for a large job."

Jack said nothing, but he could not think it possible that Dick Turpin should succeed in getting across the river with two horses. He did not fully estimate the magic power of gold, though, for in the course of five or six minutes Dick came back to him, and said, laughingly—

"He will do it. The waterman will help him, and he will pull the barge in, as it is high water, close enough for us to jump on board with the horses. If we had not the command of our cattle as we have, I don't mean to say it would be possible, but we can do it."

"Well done, Dick; it will be no bad thing, certainly, to place the Thames between us and certain parties."

"A capital thing. But here they are."

The barge lazily made its way by the aid of its long sweeps close enough to the bank, and then the man on board lit a lantern, as he called out—

"All's right, gentlemen. I suppose it's a lark or a wager of some sort; but I'll put you on shore, if your horses will do it."

"Put out the light, then," said Dick, "they won't jump towards the light."

"Very good, sir."

The lantern was at once extinguished, and then Dick said—

"It's loaded with potatoes, the barge, Jack, and there will be a good foothold for the cattle on the sacks. Don't jump till I tell you."

"No, I will manage all right."

The leap was nothing, but Dick turned his horse and took the whole breadth of the road-way first, and then just lifting him by the bridle, and giving a touch with the spur, the creature cleared the space easily and lit upon the potato sacks.

"Bravo!" cried the bargeman.

"Bray-vo!" sung out a little boy of about six years old, who was on board. "Bray——"

"Hold your row, will you?" said the man, throwing a potato at him.

"Now, Jack," cried Dick, "all's clear."

In another moment Jack was on board. His horse stumbled a little upon the potatoes, but quickly recovered, and both he and Dick then dismounted, and held the creatures by the head, and patted them into high good humour.

"Now off with you," said Dick to the bargeman, as he slipped a guinea into the hands of the waterman, who was highly delighted with his remuneration for such a little job, which altogether had not taken up ten minutes.

The barge lazily swept out into the river again, and the man in a voice of great deference, said—

"Land you where you likes, gentlemen; opposite or further on; it's just as you likes to say, gentlemen."

"All we want is to get across," said Dick, "so you can land us at any spot that is most convenient to yourself."

"Very good, sir."

The barge made a diagonal progress across the stream, and it must be recollected that the Thames was in a very different condition then to what it is now. There were no steamers to render the river-highway troublesome and intricate, nor were the banks so lined with buildings for the purposes of trade as they are now; therefore, it was much easier to perform such a feat as that performed by Dick Turpin and Jack upon the night in question, than it would be to do so at the present time.

There was a little wooden quay that jutted out into the water a short distance, and the bargeman pointing it out, observed, that if he just put his barge alongside of it, it would be the easiest thing in the world for the gentlemen to walk their horses on shore.

That will do, my good fellow," said Dick; "pull into there, and as we shall soon be on shore, there is your five guineas for the job."

"Many thanks to your honours. This here money will make me and my wife and little 'un a deal more comfortable this winter as is coming, than we should have been; so long life and good luck to you."

"Thank you."

The barge shot very gently alongside the old quay, and in a minute both Dick and Jack were on shore.

"This is well done," said Jack, "I admit. Good night to you, Mr. Bargeman, and it will be just as well that you say nothing about this little affair to any one."

"Not a word, sir. Lord bless you, sir, my master would set to abusing a fellow like a maniac if he know'd it. Good night to you both for a couple of real gents as you is."

Dick laughed.

"Oh, gold—gold," he said, "is it any wonder that men cheat, and swindle and cringe, and lie, and rob for you, when you are such an enchanter that a few bright pieces of your precious substance wins all hearts!"

"And creates a couple of highwaymen," said Jack, laughing "into two real gents."

"Just so. But how the deuce are we to get out of this?"

Jack whistled and then laughed again, for a brief glance at their position now showed them that they were in a sort of yard, enclosed on the two sides, with the river one way and a pair of great gates the other, so that they were completely shut in.

"Here's a fix," said Dick.

"A regular man-trap," said Jack. "You don't think this is a regular sell of our friend the bargeman?"

"Oh, no—no; and yet—"

"Yet, you don't know what to think?"

"No, I was not going to say that; I was going to add, that surely there could not be much difficulty in getting out. Let us try it. There is a way in here, and, consequently, there must be a way out, for everybody don't come here by the Thames, you may depend."

JADK AND DICK'S DESPERATE ENCOUNTER WITH THE POLICE OFFICERS.

"No, but there may be some chance against letting us out. This is a timber-yard, Dick, don't you see?"

They both rode forward through the yard, which was about a hundred feet in length, till they came to the two great gates, and then, through the chink left by their point of closing, they could plainly see a light shining. What that light meant, or whether it was in a street or leading to some private dwelling, they had no possible means of knowing. Dick here dismounted, and tried the gates, but they were evidently fast on the other side.

"Be careful, Dick," said Jack.

"Oh, yes, but we can't stay here, you know."

As he spoke, Dick gave the gate a couple of kicks, that made it shake again, and then a terrified voice called out from the other side—

"Murder and turf! what's that I see? Oh, bedad, I see nothing, but I mean hear it? Murder, what is it?"

"Open the gate."

"Is it the gate?"

"Open the gate, fellow."

"Oh, then, by the holy poker, it's a ghost of somebody ye is, surely!"

"No, it's all right; open the gate at once, or it will be worse for you."

"Worse for me, is it? I will, then; it can't be much worse for me than being a private watchman here, and only getting seven shillings a week and no perquisites from that same, any way."

"Well, here's a guinea for you; but you seem as if you didn't care about it by your keeping the gate between you."

"Is it a guinea? Then, murder! the gate shall not stand in the way, any how; and here it goes, bedad."

The gate swung on its heavy hinges, and the Irish watchman lifted up his lantern, and when he saw two mounted men, his mouth and eyes opened to such alarming widths, that it seemed very unlikely that they would ever close again.

"Well, what's the matter now?" said Dick. "Do you take us for a couple of ghosts?"

"Ghosts, is it, sir, you said?"

"Yes, stupid. What do you take us for?"

"Oh, bedad, then, did you come out of the river? or did you drop from the moon?"

Dick placed a guinea in the hand of the watchman, and said to him, with great solemnity of manner—

"A silent tongue shows a wise head. Good night."

"Eh?"

"Good night."

"A Y Z, did you say? A silent tongue and A Y Z? But murder and turf, where did you come from?"

Dick laughed, and put his horse to a trot, and Jack followed him. They heard a large bell begin to ring, and then they quickened their pace, and were soon a couple of miles from the wharf by the river side. It was Jack who drew rein just as they heard a clock strike four, and said—

"Dick, I have a fancy to call at Newgate."

"Call at Newgate? You are joking, Jack?"

"No. I think I should like to call and see how Claude Duval is. I am weary, and want some rest. We can put up our horses after that, you know, at the old place, where we shall be quite safe, in Barbican. But I feel as if I couldn't sleep a wink till I know that Claude is better."

"But, Jack, when you talk of visiting Newgate—Really, now——"

"I know what you would say. You think it a mad-headed plan, and that I must be out of my mind to dream of it; but nothing is easier. There will be only one man on the lock at the wicket gate, and if any one goes up to him suddenly with a bounce, he will be as civil as possible. You can wait for me at the corner of Newgate Street; for, of course, I will go on foot. I assure you, Dick, there is no danger in it whatever, and it may easily be done."

"If there were danger, Jack, you know, I am not exactly the fellow to shrink from any little enterprise on that account; but as you put it, I don't suppose there is any danger. The safety of these kind of things lies all in the way they are done."

"Just so, Dick. To hesitate, is to be lost."

"I know it. Will you let me do it?"

"Don't ask me, Dick, old fellow. I feel pretty sure that I can manage it, because my whole heart and soul are wrapt up in Claude's safety. I admit that my nerves are shaken, and that, under ordinary circumstances, you could do such a thing much better than I; but now the strong motive gives me power."

"Very good, Jack. Be it so."

They now rode on at a slashing pace to London, and it was in reality Jack who had so audaciously mounted the steps of Newgate, and asked the turnkey who was on duty, how Duval was.

It will be remembered that the turnkey had informed Maggs of the encounter, and Maggs, who at once guessed that it was either Jack or Turpin, felt very much vexed that he had not reached the prison a little sooner, for in that case he would have been able to tell which of them it was, and what was doing for Claude Duval.

CHAPTER CCC.

DICK AND JACK PUT UP AT THE OLD PUNCH BOWL IN BARBICAN.

Somewhat encouraged by the answer that the turnkey at the gate of Newgate had given to the inquiry concerning Claude Duval, Jack had joined Turpin at the corner of Newgate Street at once, and they both trotted towards Smithfield at a smart pace.

"He is better," said Jack.

"Glad to hear it," replied Dick. "You feel all the better, in consequence, don't you, Jack?"

"Indeed, I do."

"I thought you would; and now what you want, old fellow, is rest. I know that you will be much more efficient after a good ten or twelve hours' sleep than you can possibly be now, and although I know that I can do without rest as well as most men, yet I feel as if a good snooze would be rather a glorious thing."

"There is truth in what you say, Dick. I am quite willing to put up at the old quarters, in Barbican. I feel that nothing can be done for Claude just now, and with the conviction that he is better, which I suppose, after all, means that he is not dead, I will try to be content for a little time, at least; so let us push on."

A very few minutes sufficed now to take them across Smithfield, and then rapidly crossing Aldersgate Street, they made their way to Barbican, and drew rein at the low doorway of a public-house, adjoining to which was a livery stable.

"We both of us know this old crib well enough," said Dick, as he dismounted. "You have been here too often, I suppose?"

"Yes, Dick, often enough before you were thought of on the road."

"Like enough—like enough, Jack. Where the deuce is the bell? Oh, it is here. Ali's right! It is so covered with mud that I began to think it had gone, and that the old shop had got into other hands."

Dick Turpin had been feeling under the ledge made by the front of the old wooden step of the ancient doorway, and there at last he found a square piece of metal let into the wood-work, which, upon being smartly pressed, he knew rang a private bell that was in the bed-room of the landlord.

The bell, and the mode of ringing it, was only known to those who were in the thorough confidence of the landlord, and it was an understood thing there when it was rang he should attend to it immediately.

Three minutes had not elapsed when a voice, through a little wicket in the great door, that was about six inches wide, said—

"What is the caper?"

"Turpin," said Dick. "That's you, Ben, ain't it?"

"Rather. Come in, old fellow. Ha! who is with you?"

"Look at him."

"How can I look by this twixt and between sort of light? But it don't matter. Come in, both of you."

"What, on horseback?" said Jack.

"Bother take my head," said the landlord, "what am I thinking of? Wait half a minute, and I'll open one of the gates next door for you."

The name over the gate of the livery stables was not the same that appeared over the door of the public-house, but the whole concern was under one management, and in a few seconds one of the gates was opened, and Dick and Jack led in their horses to a very tidy kept and comfortable stable-yard. The gate was bolted and barred again, and then the landlord, as he speedily lighted a stable-lantern, turned sharply and said—

"Now then, Dick Turpin, who is your friend?"

"You don't mean to say that you don't know me?" said Jack.

"Why, Jack?"

"The same. It is true that I have not seen you for a couple of years now, but as you have seen me since that awful day when all the world believed me dead, you are not surprised that I still linger."

"Still linger? What do yo mean by talking of still lingering, Jack? We expect to see you, and hear of you, for many a long day to come. But I can guess what has brought you both up to London: it is about Claude."

"Yes, to be sure."

"Well, poor fellow, I am afraid he is booked at last."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, that they will keep him till he is of no use, now that they once have him safely."

"You mean that they will hang him," said Dick Turpin; "but there are two words to that bargain. We are going to try what can be done, and it is not a trifle that will stop us, either as to money or danger."

"Well, I can give you some news, too, and that is, that the 'family' have made up their minds to try their best."

"You don't say so!"

"Yes, I do. You have heard of Maggs?"

Both Dick and Jack shook their heads, and the landlord smiled as he added—

"You have heard of Colonel Blue?"

"To be sure; the dashing chap that used to be on the western road, some years ago; but there was a report that he was shot."

"So he was, but it did not kill him, though it laid him up, poor fellow, for nearly two years, and there I kept him in a little room in the top of this very house. I don't mean to say that there was much trouble in so keeping him, because nobody was after him. They all thought—that is, the nobs and the beaks—that he had been shot dead, and so they might well, for a bullet was in his chest for a fortnight, till a young fellow, a doctor that came to attend upon him for nothing, and was as kind to him as he could be, got it out."

"Poor fellow!"

"Yes, the getting of it out nearly killed him, for it was by only making a hole in his back that it was done, and he fainted away, and lay like a log for eighteen hours; but the young doctor chap—oh, he was a trump!—he sat by him all the while, and brought him through it at last."

"And what became, then, of Colonel Blue?"

"Why, when he got up again he was so altered, that nobody would have known him, and he was spoilt for the road quite."

"No doubt."

"Well, then, the family made a what-do-you-call-it—a subscription for him, and it came to three hundred pounds and more; but he would not have it, and he made a kind of a speech to 'em in this very house, in which he told 'em that though he would not take the money, cos, you see, he thought he could manage to keep himself, he thought as much of it as though he had, and as he could not go on the road, he would see, while he yet had to live, what he could do for them all."

"That was capital."

"Well, he took the name of Maggs, and what do you think he did?"

Dick and Jack both shook their heads.

"I'll tell you: he got acquainted with all the officers and turnkeys of the old stone-jug, and at last they thought so much of him that they let him go in and out just as often as he liked. The sheriffs place such a confidence in him, that they can't do without him, and in that kind of way he keeps his eyes open, you see, and does no end of good to the poor fellows of the family."

"No doubt of it."

While the landlord was giving this brief but interesting biography of poor Maggs, both Dick and Jack had placed their horses in stalls, and removed the saddles, and then Ben, the landlord, gave them an ample feed, after which he conducted his guests through a secret door in the hay-loft into the public-house.

"Now, my tulips," he said, "what's to be the first caper? Only say."

"Something to eat, and something to drink," said Dick.

"And then six or seven hours' sleep," said Jack.

"All's right, I thought as much. You don't look as if you have had much of that last article of late."

"Indeed we have not, Ben."

"Well, you may have a dose of it here, if you like, you know, and nobody will grudge it to you, I know. Come this way, and I will put as good a bottle of old wine before you as you would wish to see, and a couple of cold fowls."

"That will do," said Dick; "it is a feed fit for an emperor."

"Well, he might do worse, I think."

Ben was as good as his word. A little table was soon spread with the viands he had suggested, and both Dick and Jack made a hearty meal, after which Ben said to them—

"Now, tell me, 'cos, you see, upon that will depend where I put you: Do the beaks or the nobs know of your being hereabouts?"

"No, certainly not, so far as we are aware of it."

"Very good; then there's no need for cramming you both into the little room near the tiles, and you may as well have a comfortable sleep in a good bed-room. Come this way."

Ben took them to a large double-bedded room, and having shown them how the door could be fastened, so that it would be next to impossible for any force to break it open, and explained the use of a little bell that they could ring if they wanted him, and promising to call them in about six hours, he bade them good evening, and left them to themselves.

"Not bad quarters these, Jack," said Dick, as he flung off his coat and boots, and threw himself upon one of the beds.

"Far from it, Dick. My mind is full of poor Colonel Blue's fate."

"Yes, it is a sad one; but why was he called Colonel Blue for? I was going to be told several times, but something always happened to stop it."

"Oh, just because he wore, while on the road, a suit of light blue, that is all. Why he was called colonel by the family was, I suppose, just because they thought him a clever fellow, and chose to abide by his orders."

"Ah! just so. Good-night."

"Good-night, Dick. You have forgotten all about fastening the door."

"Dear me! so I have. Oh, dear, how precious sleepy—sleep—I—you——"

Dick Turpin was fast asleep. Jack fastened the door according to the directions that had been given by the landlord; and then, after looking to his pistols, and being satisfied that they were all right for immediate action, he laid them handily upon a chair by the bedside, and composed himself to rest. The sad story of Colonel Blue, however, gave a tone and colour to his dreams, and more than once he thought that he felt in his own breast the bullet that had been so nearly fatal to the highwayman.

How long they slept they had not the most distant idea of; but they thought the time was surely short, when they were awakened by a steady scratching at the door of their room.

"Who's there?" said Dick.

"Ben it is," said the voice of the landlord.

Dick sprang out of bed and let him in, and Jack laid his hand upon his pistols, for he thought that there might be some alarm. The landlord, when he made his appearance, said—

"A visitor for you both is below."

"You don't mean it?" said Dick.

"I will give him a warm reception," said Jack, as he took up one of his pistols.

"You mistake me," said the landlord; "it's a friend."

"We have not many of that sort," said Dick.

"Probably not; but this is one—it is Maggs."

"Ah, indeed?—Let him come up; but it would have been just as well if he had let us have another hour's sleep as well as the one we have had."

"Another hour's sleep, do you say? Why, goodness gracious! it's half-past eleven o'clock, and it wasn't six anything like when you came here."

"The deuce it is!"

"To be sure. Let me see. Twenty minutes to twelve. But still, I'm sorry I have disturbed you, at all events, and Maggs will come again."

"Oh, no—no!" said Jack; "it is time we should be up and stirring, Ben. I am very anxious to see him, for in its result his fate ain't far unlike my own. I am something like an old hulk that's past service; and if it had not been for him who now lies in a cell in Newgate, I don't think I should have encumbered the earth quite so long as I have."

"Don't say that, Jack," cried the landlord jocularly; "but I'll bring Maggs to you at once, and breakfast, too; for I suppose that will be as acceptable as any visitor, just now?"

"True, Ben," said Dick—"most true. Jack, I know, is always hungry, ain't you, Jack? Young blood, you know—eh?"

Jack shook his head rather mournfully, and the landlord left the room to bring up Maggs, who in a few minutes made his appearance, and was warmly welcomed by both Dick and Jack.

"Well, gentlemen," he said, "of course, my duty to the Sheriffs of London is now to run over to Newgate, and give notice that you are both here, so that they may send a posse of constables to take you."

"Not a doubt of it," smiled Dick, "that is your duty, Mr. Maggs; but your inclination is quite a different thing."

"We are delighted to see you, Colonel Blue," said Jack.

"Hush—oh, hush!"

Maggs sunk into a chair, and appeared to be taken suddenly ill, so that both Dick and Jack were rather alarmed, and would have gone for aid, but he raised his hand to them to remain, and spoke in a low voice—

"Don't call me by that name. It recalls too much of the past to me. I want to forget it. You don't know all my story. Nobody does, and I don't think that anybody ever will; but if you would spare me a pang such as this, never call me that."

"I deeply regret that, unknowingly, I have done so now," said Jack. "Accept my apologies, Mr. Maggs."

"Say no more about it. How could you possibly know? Ben forgot to tell you, no doubt; but it is passed now, and forgotten. Come, let us talk of something else."

"Of poor Claude, then—how is he?"

"Better, and hopeful."

"That is well. It gives me new strength to hear those words."

"Which of you was it who called at Newgate to inquire for him?"

"It was I," said Jack.

"Well, they are all furious about that. The governor was ready to tear his hair out by the roots when he heard of it, for he guessed at once that it was one of you, and he would, I know, have given a hundred pounds out of his own pocket to have nabbed you. It was rather a dangerous thing to do."

"Only in one way," said Jack. "If any of the officers who had been out had happened to come home just at that moment, there might have been danger; but as I went to ask a civil question only, I rather think if the turnkey had tried his chances, it would have been at his own risk."

"I understand you, Jack. The turnkey was a little in danger, then, I take it?"

"He was, but as the fellow was quite civil, it all ended well, as I thought it would."

"It has; but don't try it again. I can bring you better news of Duval than you can get at the gate of Newgate, and now listen to me, and while Ben is getting the breakfast, I shall be able to tell you what the family think of doing."

With this, Maggs, without concealing anything, related at length to Dick and Jack all that had happened at the thieves' haunt, at West End, Hampstead, and concluded by advising them both to attend the next meeting that was to take place there, which would be at the midnight that was coming.

"I will turn the matter over in my mind during the day," said Maggs, "and I hope and expect to be prepared with a distinct proposition to make some of the particulars of which must depend upon what happens in Newgate to-day. I would recommend you both to stay here and to keep close. If there should be any suspicion that you are so near at hand, I shall be pretty sure to hear of it, and will take some means of letting Ben know."

"A thousand thanks," said Dick "Cannot you breakfast with us?"

"No. I shall be wanted at the stone-jug, I am so very useful."

CHAPTER CCCI.

DICK AND JACK ATTEND THE MEETING AT WEST END, HAMPSTEAD.

Maggs shook hands with them both, and then left the public-house to attend to his duties at Newgate.

Jack and Dick were very much pleased with this visit of Maggs to them, and they really began to entertain a confident hope that something would result in Duval's favour from the meeting of the thieves that was to take place on that evening at the mansion by West End, Hampstead.

Of course, they decided to be present, and they thought it very desirable, indeed, to remain where they were until nightfall, when they intended to ride to the northern part of the metropolis at as early an hour after sunset as possible, and see if there was anything to be done upon the road before the meeting at the mansion at West End.

"We shall want, of course, as much money as we can possibly get together, Dick," said Jack, "for who knows but it may be necessary to pay everybody who may happen to stand in the way of our poor friend, Duval's, liberation."

"True enough; money does wonders, and as society has thought proper to put him into the stone-jug, we will levy what taxes we can upon society for the purpose of getting him out of it again."

"That's the proper philosophy of the thing."

The day passed rather gloomily to both Dick and Jack in the public-house, for they were anything but accustomed to such a life of inaction, and they were much pleased to see Maggs about half an hour before sunset.

"Well. How is Duval?" said Dick.

"He is much better. He won't believe that Cicely is killed. Alas, poor fellow!"

"But she is no more," said Jack.

"She is buried," said Maggs.

"That's conclusive enough. But why will not Duval give credence to the fact of her death?"

"He says that she has passed through so many dangers with him that he will not believe it, and he states that once at Winchester she was severely wounded."

"Ah, yes," said Jack, with a sigh. "Well do I remember that awful scene in the old cathedral. But, Maggs, will it not be better not entirely to dissuade Duval of such an idea? If he really thought her no more, it might have such an effect upon him that he would feel completely prostrated, and would not even second any attempt that we might make for his rescue."

"That is well thought of," said Dick.

"I did think of it," said Maggs, "so I left him in such a state of doubt that he may cherish what notions he pleases upon the subject, and yet he cannot say that he was led astray by any one. Of course, what the prison authorities say to him, he sets no account by at all."

"He knows, then, that you are a friend?"

"He does. I could not keep that knowledge from him any longer, so I told him all that had happened, and it made quite a change in him to hear it, though it touched me a little to hear him say—'I shall yet be happy with Cicely.'"

"Poor fellow!" said Jack, "he had better though awaken to a knowledge of the truth when he is with us, if we can but rescue him, than when surrounded by those who will have but little, if any, sympathy with his grief."

Maggs assented to this, and promised that he would not say anything to destroy all hope upon the part of Claude that Cicely still lived, and then he left Dick and Jack again, and they began to prepare themselves for the road.

The horses had had a capital rest, and they had been tended with so much care at the stables next door to the public-house, that they might be fairly expected to be in the very best condition, so that the two friends were anxious to mount, and be off at once.

The landlord went out himself and got them some powder, for they were nearly out of it, and by the aid of a tobacco pipe they cast themselves about a dozen bullets, each, to fit their pistols, and then they were quite ready.

"You will come back here, I suppose?" said the landlord.

"Why, yes," said Dick, gaily, "if the Philistines let us; of course, it will be all the better, whatever is done for Claude, that Jack and I should be near at hand, and I suppose something will be at least settled to-night; so now good-bye."

"Don't say, good-bye," said Jack; "it sounds too ominous. Good evening is better, as that looks as if we were sure to come again, you know, Dick."

"Well, then, good evening be it."

They had before starting determined upon which way they would go, and the route that Dick had suggested, and which they had adopted, was to proceed up St. John-street Road, and past the Angel at Islington, and up the Holloway Road to Highgate, from which place they could get down Swain's Lane to Hampstead Heath, past the estate of Lord Mansfield.

This course they thought better than going through Smithfield and up Holborn, which would have been the most direct way to Hampstead, but yet, perhaps, in reality, the longest, as they would have been much more liable to interruption from a number of the official persons connected with Newgate, who were always hanging about Fleet Market and Holborn Hill.

The evening was rather fresh and gusty, for a south west wind was blowing and threatening rain, although none had absolutely fallen yet, and not a star was to be seen. There would be a nearly full moon as the night advanced, but it would not rise until some half hour or so past midnight, so that there were some hours of gloom and darkness yet to look forward to upon that eventful night.

After the long confinement in the public-house, it was quite a treat to Dick and Jack to be in the open air again. They merely put their cattle to a gentle trot and soon got to Islington, and then passing the High-street they turned into the Holloway Road, which was then very little built upon, and they began to feel that they were in the country.

"Ah, Dick," said Jack, "I think if I were to be compelled to remain for very long in London, it would be the death of me after being accustomed to the open country so much."

"It's all habit, Jack."

"Well, it may be; and yet, of course, there can be no comparison in the quality even of the air and that which we have been breathing in the city. You admit that, Dick?"

"Yes, Jack; and I admit that ever since we left the Angel at Islington, we have been followed by a man with a cart."

"Eh? You don't say so?"

"Yes, I do, though. Don't look round; I have had my eyes about me, Jack, I assure you, and I have noticed that a covered cart, driven by a man dressed in a smock-frock, has accommodated itself to our pace, Jack. What do you think of that?"

"I don't know what to think; but I did think that for the last minute or so you were very wayward as regarded your peace, but now I understand it. You were experimenting upon our friend in the cart?"

"I was, Jack, and I did not like to say anything to you of it until I felt quite sure about it, but now there is no mistake. We are dogged by some one, but what for, I cannot take upon myself to say."

They both listened now intently for some time, with the hope of gathering some further information concerning the man, and the cart that was pursuing them, and they brought their horses to a walk, in order to see if the vehicle would pass them, which, indeed, it did in a few moments.

The cart was a covered one, such as might be used by a tradesman in the conveyance of goods of a perishable nature to his customers, and if the man who drove it was, indeed, a spy of the police, he certainly played his part very well, for he went on without paying the smallest apparent attention to Dick or Jack.

"Are we mistaken?" said Jack.

"Not a bit of it, my friend. He thinks that we are on our guard now, that is all."

"Well, we will continue so. Let us go on, but let us, till we come to some turning, keep the cart in advance of us, and then if we go down that turning a little way, we shall soon see if it follows us."

"Very good. There is the Seven Sisters' Lane just a little further on upon our right hand. Suppose we go down that, Jack, as though we intended to get to Tottenham."

"Agreed."

The man who was driving the cart did not pay the least attention to them, but went plodding on, apparently intent upon getting up to Highgate, and Dick and Jack turned down the Seven Sisters' Lane, and put their horses to a gallop for about half a mile, and then Dick said—

"Jack—Jack. Pull up."

"Yes, all's right."

"Here is a very low fence at this side of the road. Do you think your horse will take it?"

"To be sure he will, Dick."

"Then let us get over at once. You see, we are quite close to the corner of Hornsey Lane. I think if we stay in the meadow over yonder for a few minutes we shall see if our friend, the covered cart, approaches."

"Yes, but our horses' heads will be seen."

"Not a bit of it. There is a hay-stack yonder. Don't you see it? We will get over the other side of that, and dismount. The horses won't leave it while we creep back to the hedge and reconnoitre."

"That will do."

In another moment they were both over the hedge, for the cattle did the leap beautifully. The haystack was not twenty yards from the spot, and the horses were pulling hay out of it, and Dick and Jack were crouched down under the hedge, in the space of half a minute.

"This is what I call, diamond cut diamond," whispered Dick, "if that cart should be after us."

"Yes, but——"

"Hush, Jack—hush! What do you hear?"

"Wheels, by Jove!"

"I could have sworn it. Keep snug now, Jack, whatever you do. I know the sound of those wheels. It is the covered cart. Hush—hush!"

The cart was evidently coming on at good speed down the road, for they could hear the patter of the horse's feet above the sound of the wheels, which would not have been the case if it had been coming slowly. Besides, one fact was quite certain, and that was, that the cart must have been turned back to get down the lane at all, for it had passed the end of it before Dick Turpin and Jack went in that direction.

In about another minute and a half the cart stopped close to where they were, and a rough voice called out—

"I say, this won't do—I don't hear them."

"Nor I either," said another.

"Well, what would you have me do?" said the driver. "I advised you to nab them both at the turnpike, but you wouldn't, and you see now what has come of it."

"Oh, you don't know anything about it. The object was not to nab them till we knew where they were going; and here am I almost cramped to death in this infernal little cart, where you can't stretch your legs, and we have missed them after all."

"So it seems. What's to be done?"

"Oh, go on," cried another.

"No, what's the use? Where are we?"

"Close to the corner of Hornsey Lane."

"Then who is to know whether they have gone to the right, or to the left, or straight on?"

"To the left, I'll be bound," said the driver. "You see they only turned down here to get out of our way, that was quite clear, for I saw they had their suspicions, and that they were going north there is no doubt; my opinion is that they will take the Hornsey Road, and turn up to the left as soon as they can into Highgate."

"Well, that is likely, so let us get on as fast as we can. Put the horse to his speed, Andrews."

"All's right! But, you know, four of you in the cart make up no light weight, and he isn't used to it."

"Oh, get on—get on!"

The man laid the whip across the horse rather severely, and the animal went on at a kind of canter that must have been very distressing to those in the cart; but as speed was now their object, they put up with all contingent inconveniences philosophically enough, and the cart, with its freight of four officers, was speedily out of sight, and then out of hearing.

"Pleasant this," said Dick.

"Oh, very," said Jack. "But what does it all mean?"

"I cannot say for a certainty, but I hope that it only means we have been recognised in Islington or in St. John-street-road, by some of the traps, and that this is an expedition planned and drawed out by them on the spur of the moment, merely to see where we are going to."

"That would be a thousand times better than for them to have had a watch upon the public-house, and to have dogged us all the way from there; but, I suppose, now we cannot do better than be off."

"Yes, and as quickly as possible."

The horses were eating away at the loose hay, which each moment they tugged out of the stack, so that they had no inclination to stray from that spot, and Jack and Dick were soon mounted again. A leap similar to the one that had taken them from the road, now took them back to it, and then they galloped into Holloway again.

"Now," said Dick, "it won't do for us to go on any further this way, for if we do they will meet us, as safe as possible, just on the rise of the hill."

"No—no," said Jack. "Let us push on. They will be behind us if we lose no time. I know every inch of the road, and that distressing gallop they went at it is quite impossible they can keep up, while our cattle are fresh enough to trot even up the hill, steep as it is in some places."

CHAPTER CCCII.

DICK AND JACK ROB THE BARNET NIGHT-FLY.

Dick was not the one to shrink from anything that only required speed and courage to carry it out, and without making further reply to Jack than merely, "All's right," off he went at a gallop that got over the ground at quite an alarming rate.

Jack was not quite so well mounted, to tell the truth, as Turpin, but still his horse had great power and endurance, and carried him up the hill probably with less distress than the smaller animal which Dick bestrode.

They both reached the summit of the rise together, and Dick, turning in his saddle, cried out—

"Bravo, Jack! I don't know now but that for real service you are as well mounted as I am."

"I'll change with you, Dick."

"Why, no, thank you. The fact is, I am attached, as you know, to the creature, and should be loth indeed to part with her."

"I know it, Dick, and only jested when I made the proposal. But we are passing the end of Swain's-lane, are we not?"

"By George, yes—so we are. Come on. This is capital. I do think we have distanced our pursuers fairly. Hilloa! what's that in the hollow yonder?"

Swain's-lane, as is well known, no doubt, to many of our readers, commences on the high ground on the level of the High-street of Highgate, and gradually slopes down to a valley, after which it rises again to the height of the level of Hampstead-heath. The declivity is, however, but slight, although viewed from the top of the lane it looks, by the slanting of the road, rather considerable.

It was while pausing for a moment at the top of the lane, where there was a farrier's shop, that Dick Turpin and Jack saw, right down in the hollow, a light moving along the centre of the road-way, and swaying from side to side as some vehicle moved along with it.

"Is that our friend with the cart?" said Dick.

"Why, hardly. They surely would not hoist a light."

"I don't know that. They might do it to deceive us, you know; but suppose we inquire at the farrier's shop here? I can hear some one at work in it."

"Do so."

The half-door of the farrier's place had blown shut, but Dick pushed it open, leaning from his horse for the purpose of doing so, and called out to the man, saying—

"Have you seen a cart go by here a little time ago?"

"No, sir," said the man. "There's nothing been by but the Barnet night-fly, and it's in the lane now."

"Well; but how is it in the lane? That is not the route, is it?"

"No, sir. But they say there's highwaymen in the Holloway-road, so it was thought safer to go the round through Hampstead to-night. That's the reason, sir."

"And a very good one too. Come on, Mr. Trevellian, we shall be late at Lord Mansfield's, I am afraid."

"I am afraid so too, my lord," said Jack; and then they both went at a trot down the lane, having thoroughly mystified the farrier, who said to his boy, when the clatter of their horses' feet had died away—

"Ah! there's a couple of the nobs, I take it, a-going to Mansfield Park."

"Jack," said Dick, thoughtfully, "don't you think, old friend, that the Barnet night-fly, as the old rickety coach is called, that travels between Barnet and the Old Bull in Holborn, has some very particular reason for going out of the way to-night?"

"Not a doubt of it."

"Ah, well, I think so, too. Perhaps there is something rather more than usual to-night among its luggage."

Jack laughed.

"I know what you mean, Dick," he said. "You want to stop the night-fly. I stopped it once five years ago, and I don't think I have clapped eyes upon the old rumbling vehicle since; but if you have any fancy for the fun, let us try our luck with it, for the sake of poor Claude."

"We will."

Now, the fact was, that the Barnet night-fly had been induced to change its route upon this occasion, owing to a report that a couple of highwaymen, named respectively Captain Hawk and Crow, were waiting for it in Holloway, at a very unfrequented part of the road; but those who travelled by it little suspected that they were, in a manner of speaking, getting out of the frying-pan into the fire, and that in escaping two men, who, perhaps, were really far enough off, they were coming right into the way of the two others, who, probably, were much more determined than the others.

To the modern reader it probably often appears astonishing how a number of people in a stage-coach allowed themselves in old times to be stopped and robbed by one or two highwaymen; but, upon a little consideration, the wonder vanishes.

In the first place, people who travelled in those days never carried money or valuables with them, unless they were obliged to do so from special circumstances; and then, again, there was no certainty of being stopped, so there was no unity of design upon the part of the passengers in adopting a system of defence, and no one liked to be the victim for the sake of others who would not assist him.

Thus it was that some preferred to give a few pounds to getting into a broil, and others even who had more to lose, and more courage, felt that they would have single-handed to fight a bold, reckless man, who made a trade of risking his life, and who was much more likely to get the advantage in the encounter, and so very prudently declined it.

But then, it will be said, that most of the coaches even for short distances had guards. Granted they had; but the guard was generally some idle, drunken fellow, whose fire-arms were out of order always when they should be in order, and in some cases there is very little doubt but that he was bought over by the thieves and by the landlords of the inns that were on the road frequented by the highwaymen, so that only the shadow of a resistance was made when the passengers wanted the real substance of it.

In fact, highway robbery was then a complete business, and was then carried on upon such a system that when a coach was stopped, and the affrighted passengers heard the ominous sounds of "Stand and deliver!" they had no means of knowing the real extent of the attack upon their property.

The reader is well aware, though, that under the present circumstances, Jack and Dick have no accomplices, and simply run this risk of stopping the Barnet night-fly for what they can get, and at the chance of whatever kind of contest it might lead them into; but the passengers could not know that.

"Now," said Jack, "I hope that there will be no fool who will show fight for the sake of saving his few pounds; but if there be, Dick, don't be hasty, whatever you do."

"I never am hasty, Jack. I have taken many a shot without a thought of returning it; for, you see, in some sort, I cannot blame people for doing their best; but still, it won't do to stand too much nonsense, you know."

"Certainly not. Come on, then. I will go to the horse's heads, if you like, Dick, while you see to the passengers, or vice versa, just as you please."

"You stop the machine then, Jack, and I will see after the swag, if there is any to be got."

"Very good. The sooner, then, we get the affair over the better, for we don't know, now, but our friends in the cart may take it into their wise heads to come this way."

The old vehicle continued its lumbering course along Swains-lane, and those who were within it were congratulating themselves upon having played such a trick upon the highwaymen, whom they supposed were waiting for them in Holloway.

"I tell you what it is, ma'am," said a man who sat with his back to the horses, and who had been very much alarmed at coming through Highgate, because the coach had stopped there to take upon a passenger. "I tell you what it is, ma'am. For my own part, I would not let the whole fraternity of highwaymen rob me; but it's the duty of a gentleman, when there are ladies present, to be as quiet as possible."

"Oh, but, sir," said the lady, to whom he had addressed this speech, "I'm sure no lady would mind a gentleman making a little noise in beating off a robber."

"Oh, dear, no, certainly not—eugh! eugh!" caughed and wheezed an old man. "I hope, sir, as you will be so good as to kill all the robbers, not but that I, so help me Abraham! am so poor that they cannot rob me."

As he spoke, this old man, who was of the Jewish persuasion as it is called, clutched tighter a square mahogany box that he had with him.

"Why, sir," said the first speaker, "I heard you promise the coachman a guinea for coming this way."

"Did I, sir?"

"To be sure, you did," said the lady, "and I heard you likewise. Lucy, my dear, didn't you hear it too?"

"Yes, aunt," said a young girl, "but I wish you wouldn't speak about highwaymen and robbers, for it makes me feel quite cold to listen to you all, that it does."

"You need be under no apprehension," said the first speaker. "If the ladies wish it, of course, I should feel myself quite justified in shooting, or otherwise slaying and disposing of any one who had the unparalleled audacity to stop the Barnet night-fly."

"Well," said the lady, "it's a great comfort to me, and has been so ever since I read it in the St. James's Chronicle this morning, to find that that dreadful Claude Duval is in Newgate, and hanged at last. That is something."

"But he is not hanged, aunt, yet," said the young lady.

"No, my dear, but he will be, so it's much the same thing. The monster, they do say, that if any young lady gave him a kiss, he would let her keep her rings, and watch, and money, and, in fact, never rob her at all."

"Oh, how nice—no, I don't mean that——"

"Lucy! How dare you?"

"Oh, aunt, indeed, I didn't mean it, and, of course, I would rather be robbed twenty times than kissed by a highwayman; and if I did kiss him, it would only be to preserve the property of others, you know, aunt, for don't I look upon all I have as yours?"

"Hold your tongue, will you, Lucy. How dare you talk of kissing in that way, and men present too?"

"But, my dear young lady," said the Jew, in an insinuating tone of voice, "my dear young lady?"

"Yes, sir."

"If we should now—oh, dear, I hope it is not at all likely!—but if we should be stopped by a highwayman, and he should offer to let you keep all your things if you will give him a kiss, will you be so good as to say this box is yours?"

"No, sir."

"Oh, dear, she won't do it!"

"No, sir; I would scorn to tell a falsehood even to a highwayman."

"Oh, dear, I was never so particular."

"Have you anything, then, valuable in the box?" said the man.

"Oh, no—no—no! Not at all. Nothing but some bits of woollen stuffs, you understand, with the prices of the wholesale manufacturers marked to them, that is all. I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, that I have only half a guinea and one shilling with me, for I never carry about money, and, indeed, I am rather a poor man than otherwise."

"Oh, indeed."

"But you will, my dear young lady—you will promise me that if we are stopped, you will take my box on your lap, and say it is yours?"

"I will do no such thing."

"Sir," said the aunt, "when you expect my niece to put a box on her lap you insult me, sir."

"Oh, well, I don't much care; so help me, Abraham, we are half way down the lane now, and I don't think there is any likelihood of being robbed; but I would have given you a little ring for your finger, miss, if you had promised what I asked you. I have just a few in the box."

"Oh," she said, "then, in fact, the box is full of valuable jewellery?"

"Oh, no—oh, no—Oh, don't say that—gracious me, oh—oh!"

In his anxiety to make the passengers believe that the box contained nothing of value, the Jew dropped it off his lap on to the floor of the coach, and it made such a musical jingle of gold, that everybody burst out laughing, and then the man said—

"Woollen cloth makes a funny noise, don't it?"

"Oh, very," said the lady.

"Ah!" said the young lady, "I thought as much; but I won't be kissing highwaymen to save all your money."

"Is it all gold?" added the man.

"Oh, oh," groaned the Jew, "you will drive me mad! Don't speak in that way—don't mention gold—you don't know who may hear you, and we may all get our throats cut, because I have some—some brass medals, you understand, in this box."

"Brass medals?—Oh, oh! What are they worth?"

"About thirty shillings, upon my soul."

"Then, I will give you two pounds for them at once."

"Oh, no—no"

Everybody laughed again at this, and the Jew was terribly disconcerted; but still he had one comfort and that was that the Barnet night-fly was getting over the ground at the rate of five miles an hour, and that, under such circumstances, another hour or so must bring it into London.

"Ha!—ha!" said the Jew after a time, allowing his anger to get the better of his judgment. "I have no doubt, miss, but you would have been kind enough to have offered to save my box for me, but for one little reason? Ha!—ha"

"And what may that be?" said the young lady.

"Why, highwaymen take a good look at those they ask a kiss from, and they don't care about it when they see red hair and a squint, so that you would not be put to the trouble of kissing him at all. Ha!—ha!"

"You odious wretch!" screamed the young lady. "Me squint?"

"Ha!—ha!"

"Well, I do hope now that some highwaymen may stop the Barnet fly, just to give me an opportunity of saying—"

What the young lady meant to say was put abruptly to an end, by the sudden stoppage of the Barnet fly, and then a loud voice—it was the voice of Jack, aggravated to a high pitch—cried—

"Move your cattle on another foot, and you are a dead man!"

CHAPTER CCCIII.

DICK AND JACK REACH THE THIEVES' MEETING HOUSE WITH A GOOD BOOTY.

These words, addressed to the driver of the Barnet fly, were quite conclusive to the passengers of the fact, that the coach was stopped by highwaymen.

The effect produced was various. The valorous person who would be so ready, but for the presence of females, almost to kill and eat a highwayman, slid down at once among the straw at the bottom of the coach, calling out—

"Good Lord, deliver us!"

The Jew uttered a cry of terror, and clung to his box as though he were in a ship at sea, which was expected each moment to go down, and that was the only loose plank that could be got hold of as offering the smallest chance of safety.

The two ladies were alarmed, but certainly not nearly so much so as their male companions, and, probably, the younger of the two felt anything but sorry that she had an opportunity of repaying the Jew for the very ungallant manner in which he had spoken of her personal attractions only a few moments before.

They heard the driver speak.

"Oh, don't shoot a poor fellow, good sir. I won't move on; but if the 'osses should go 'or to come to get rather restive, don't say it was me, sir."

"Hold hard, on your life," said Jack.

Then Dick Turpin rode to the side of the coach, and let down the windows, as he cried out—

"Hilloa! Who have we here?"

"Nobody, good sir," said the valorous person in the straw, "nobody, my dear sir, if you please."

"So help me Abraham, only two poor men, I declares," said the Jew.

"Don't murder innocent people," said the old lady, "but go along at once, do."

"I shall not detain you long, madam," said Dick. "Has any one spoken?"

"No, sir," said the young lady.

"Oh, a young lady, and a pretty one, I'll be bound, by the tone of her voice. I hope you are not frightened, my dear?"

"Oh, no, sir."

"Well, that's right. We won't trouble you for your money, but as there are two gentlemen here, why, I will just politely ask them for their money, watches, and valuables."

"Oh—oh—oh!" groaned the man in the straw.

"My excellent shir," said the Jew, "I assure you as we are poor peoples—oh, excellent shir, I assure you that three and sixpence is all I have, my dear shir. I wish it was more, but here it is, quite at your service."

"Three and sixpence, Moses?"

"Oh, sir, my name ish Aaron."

"I don't care whether it be Aaron or Moses, but if you want to persuade me that all you have is three and sixpence, you are very much mistaken indeed, for that won't do at any price."

There was now a strange clicking noise at the door of the carriage, and the Jew said—

"So help me, what ish he a doing?"

"Only hammering the flint of one of my pistols," said Dick, "that's all, as I see that nothing will bring you to your senses but a bullet. I suspected as much from the first."

THE FEARFUL LEAP OF TURPIN'S BLACK BESS.

"Oh, no—no. Good gracious, no, I have found a guinea in one pocket that I forgot."

"Indeed."

"Noble sir," returned the man in the straw. "Noble, and most merciful ndividual, I hope that you will have the extreme goodness to accept of the eighteen and threepence that I have about me, and I promise that the next time I pass this way to take care to have more money, for it is quite a pleasure to be even robbed by so great and gentlemanly a man."

This voice sounded so odd and smothered to Turpin, that he cried out—

"Where is that Methodist parson, who keeps on preaching in such a ridiculous strain?"

"He's among our feet," said the young lady, "and it's exceedingly inconvenient, I declare."

"Confound his impudence," said Dick, as he swung open the carriage-door, and put in his hand. "Where the d—l are you, sir? Oh, here's somebody's leg, at all events."

"Murder! dear sir—it's mine."

"All's right, then."

With one pull, Dick got him out on to his back in the road, where he lay as if dead.

"You be quiet now for a few moments, will you?" said Dick, "or I will request my horse to stand upon you. Now, Mr. Abraham, be quick."

"Oh—oh, so help me, here ish the guinea."

"What, you still keep at that tune, do you? Ladies, be so good as to keep your heads as far back out of range as you conveniently can, for I am about to shoot this Jew."

"Murder—murder! I will give up twenty pounds."

"Give up your box at once, with all the money in it," said the young lady, "and don't be getting us all shot just because you don't care for your life, you ugly wretch!"

"No—no, I have got no box."

Bang fell the box on to the old lady's toes.

"Drat it," she cried, "it has lamed me almost. Mr. Highwayman, it is a mahogany box, full of money, I do believe, and here it is on the floor of the coach."

The Jew got desperate, and flung himself down upon the box, but Dick Turpin got hold of him by one arm and pulled him out of the coach, box and all.

"Jack?" he called out.

"Yes, Dick?"

"Come here, and take possession of a box. It is not too big to strap behind you with the vallise. Tell the coachman that if he moves on we will overtake him in a minute and put half-a-dozen slugs into him."

"Oh, lor! I'll get down," said the coachman.

"No," said Jack, "stay where you are, but hold hard."

The Jew's box was wrested from him, and Jack strapped it to the back of his horse, and then the Jew, turning round, fled towards Highgate again, calling out with all his might—

"Thieves!—thieves! Murder! Robbery! Fire!"

"Confound the fellow, he will raise the country," said Jack.

"It can't be helped; hold my horse a moment; here's a sneaking rascal on his back in the road."

"No—no," said the man, rising to a sitting posture and holding out both his hands, in one of which was a watch and in the other a purse of money. "No—no! Take all I have, and spare my life."

"Bother your life," said Dick, as he took the purse and money, "what is it to us?"

"Oh, thank you, gentlemen—thank you!"

Jack now got one of the carriage lamps out of the proper place, and looked into the coach by its aid. The two females were there, trembling.

"Don't be alarmed," he said.

"Oh, but we are," said the old lady.

"We can't help it," said the young one. "Here is all the money aunt and I have got."

"Never mind, keep it," said Jack, as he shut the door. "You need not be at all frightened, ladies. We have the honour and the pleasure of bidding you good-night."

"You are not Claude Duval?" said the young lady to Dick Turpin.

"No, my dear, poor Claude's in Newgate."

"But I thought he might have escaped, only I know that you are not him."

"Why do you know that?"

"Oh, because he—he—they do say that he always kisses any young lady he meets in a coach that he stops."

"Well, my dear, Dick Turpin often does the same," said Dick, as he saluted her.

"Oh, gracious," said the aunt, "are you Richard Thingummy."

"Turpin, madam. Good-night."

"He's rather a nice man," said the young lady.

"Hold your tongue, do," said the aunt. "I'm petrified at you."

"Forward, Jack," said Dick.

They were off in a moment, leaving the Barnet fly to get on the best way it could, for the driver was too much terrified to use his skill in guiding the cattle, and they were so old that they felt quite delighted at the rest they were getting, and one of them had fairly dropped asleep.

Dick and Jack felt all the awkwardness of the fact that the coach would be, when it did start again, travelling in the same direction with themselves, nor did they doubt but that the Jew would soon, from Highgate, procure an armed and mounted force to follow them down the lane; but still, they relied upon the speed of their horses, and with the fact that if they met with no interruption they would be stowed in the mansion at West-end within the next twenty minutes at the very outside.

"Come on, Jack; let us make speed," said Dick.

"What the deuce made you take this box?" said Jack. "Do you think there is anything in it worth the having?"

"Yes, I do, or I would not trouble you with it, Jack. It belonged to one who was far too anxious to retain it for it to be worthless. I make no doubt in the world, but that it contains a rich booty, and that it will be about the best piece of swag that we have picked up upon the road."

"Very good," said Jack, "then I have all the less objection to the corner of it sticking into my back in the way that it does.—Hark! I think I hear horses feet."

"And I know I do."

"After us?"

"Yes, on the same road, and so after us; but whether accidentally merely or in pursuit of us, I can't say. It don't seem at all likely that the Jew could have got assistance so promptly."

"No, unless he met any mounted men on the road, and got them at once to aid him."

"Never mind. Here's the heath."

They had now got fairly on to Hampstead Heath, and, of course, their object was to get to the right towards West-end as soon as possible.

"Dare we cross the heath?" said Dick.

"No. By no means."

"Is there no path?"

"None that way, and if we were to try to cross it, there are so many holes made by the inhabitants of the parish to get sand, that we should go down horse and man to a certainty."

"That would be awkward."

"It would be destruction to us quite now. There is no resource upon this spot but to take the regular roads, Dick. I know ever one of them intimately."

"Then you go in advance, Jack, and push on as hard as you can; I will follow you easily, you may be assured. Time is everything with us now, for by the clatter those who are on the road are making, it seems to me as if they had a very special object."

"Not a doubt of it. This way."

Dick let Jack get about a dozen strides of the horse in advance of him, and then followed. Jack led the way right along the regular road until he got past the locality which is now called the Vale of Health, and then he turned to the right, taking a much narrower path, that led under the shadow of a row of trees.

At the rate they were travelling, they now made less noise than even if they had kept at a trot; and after going on about half a mile, Jack paused, and said, in a low tone—

"Let us listen a bit, Dick."

"With all my heart."

They both now drew up, and their horses stood as still as death, while they listened to any noises that might come upon the night air indicative of the fact of their being pursued by those who hunted them from the haunts of civilised men, and who would have shed their blood for gold.

We say this not in defence of Dick Turpin, or of Sixteen-string Jack, but just because we know that at that time the whole of the executive police was in the hands of men who only looked upon it as a business by which money might be made, and who cared nothing for the higher objects that should actuate them.

For example: they would avoid a highwayman who showed symptoms of great boldness and daring until he had committed some robbery of importance, which would induce the authorities to offer a higher reward for him, and then, and not till then, would they seek to apprehend him in earnest.

It is reported of a highwayman, named Robert the Highflyer, that once meeting on Clapham Common with three officers, he was stopped, and in the language of the profession was told that he was "Wanted."

"What!" he said; "you will not be such fools as to take me now, surely?"

"And why not?" said one of the officers.

"Why, there is only a reward of fifty pounds against me now, and if you wait three months longer, I shall do enough to make it three hundred."

"There is reason in that," said the officer. "Be off with you. You are not wanted just yet."

Now, whether or not such an anecdote, in all its details, is strictly true or not, hardly matters. It only shows that there was such a feeling abroad at the time, or it would never have got currency at all as an illustration of the way in which such matters were managed.

We do not mean to say that the police now are all immaculate—it is not in human nature that such should be the case; but certainly the system is to a great extent reformed, and what abuses there are now have no sort of comparison to those which existed in the days when such men as Turpin, Duval, and Sixteen-string Jack sought celebrity upon the road.

But this is a digression, although an apropos one, and we are keeping Dick and Jack upon the road while we make it; so we now return to them and their actions.

CHAPTER CCCIV.

A BOLD PLAN FOR THE RESCUE OF DUVAL IS DETERMINED UPON.

"I THINK," said Jack, "that we have given them the go-by, Dick, for I can hear nothing."

"Listen again. Perhaps it is only fancy. But, do you know, I thought I heard a sound far over there upon the heath."

"Some stray donkey, perhaps."

"Possibly enough; but it seemed to me to be associated with voices."

"A current of air might bring a sound to your ears, Dick, and deny it to mine. I should hardly think it possible that they would venture out upon the open heath."

"There is no saying. The thirst for our capture is such that they might adventure anything in the shape of a rough road. Just lay a hand upon the bridle of my steed while I place my ear a little closer to the ground to listen."

Jack did so, and Dick Turpin flung himself right on to the ground, and placed his ear against it. It was astonishing how clearly then he could hear footsteps and voices upon the heath, that before came so very faintly, as hardly to be said to come at all to his senses.

"What is it, Dick?"

"I hear it, Jack. By some means or another it is quite clear to me that they guess the route we have taken, and they are crossing the heath, amid the furze-bushes, with the hope of getting ahead of us, and so interrupting us."

"But they will be down, to a certainty, in some of the holes with which the heath abounds."

"They are leading their cattle."

"Ah, they may do that."

"Yes, Jack, and so, you see, if they happen to have got a really good guide, which they may get from some of the blackguards who almost live upon the heath, passing their time in snaring the rabbits, they may get on very well, indeed."

"That is all true."

"Well, Jack, what do you propose then that we should do, in order to meet this new state of things?"

"Our course is easy, Dick."

"I am glad of it. It is not to go on, I take it."

"Certainly not. Let our foes take their road, and remain in ambush upon it as long as they like. I wish them no better luck than to do so. We will ride through the town, and take the route by the back of the church to the place of meeting with the family."

"Come on, then."

"Let us go as softly as foot can fall, Dick, for we don't know yet but that they may be on the listen."

"Then suppose we try their game, Jack, and dismount and lead our cattle a little way. It will stretch our limbs a little, and we can then keep the animals at such a foot pace that it will be next thing to impossible for them to be heard by any one."

"It is a good thought, Dick."

They now both dismounted and led their horses, and Jack, who was so well acquainted with the environs of Hampstead that it was quite out of the question for him to lose his way by day or by night, led Dick down a very narrow turning that led to Holly-bush Hill, from whence they proceeded right on towards the old church of Hampstead.

Without the least interruption they got down the steep incline which in bad weather it was ever so perilous a thing to ride down, and turning sharply into Church Row, they got past the churchyard, and so on down the narrow lane that would lead them as directly to West-end as need be.

"This is rather an intricate navigation," said Dick.

"It looks so at night," replied Jack, "but it is all clear enough when once you know it. Indeed, unless you were determined to go out of the way by turning to the right, it would be difficult to do so, and here we are getting on nicely, and I do think we may mount and trot it."

"So do I; and as for those fellows who are in ambush, it is to be hoped by this time, in the lane, the only thing I very sincerely wish them is, patience."

"Yes," laughed Jack, "that will suit us for them to possess for once in a way, although it is not always the quality that I would wish my foes to be possessed of."

They mounted, and rode on, and in the course of about seven or eight minutes more they emerged up West-end, quite close to the wall of the mansion which was their place of destination for the night.

"Here we are," said Jack. "Maggs promised to be upon the look out for us, but I expect that we are a little early."

"But not a bit too soon for all that," said a voice, as a dark figure stepped out from the shadow of the wall.

"Ah, is it you, Maggs?" said Dick.

"That same am I," said Maggs. "Follow me, both of you. Do you know, I have a little suspicion?"

"Of what?"

"Why, that there are some bad characters about the place to-night, so be cautious."

"I shouldn't wonder," said Jack, with a slight laugh, "if there were a good many of that sort, friend Maggs."

"Nay," said Maggs, "I didn't mean it as a joke, in good truth; but I really think the house is watched."

"That is bad news."

"It is; but still there are too many of us to be in much danger; and as this is the last time any of the family will meet at this crib, why, I don't know that it matters very much."

"Is it going to be given up, then?"

"Yes. But come through the gate. That will do. Now, I should say, let your cattle take it easy here, for they can't get away, and there is some nice little fresh picking of young grass under the fruit trees. This is the orchard."

"Very good. But why is the old place to be deserted?"

"For a foolish reason enough. The man who keeps it says, that there have been all night long a couple of ghosts in the kitchen garden. He will have it that they stand upon one particular spot, linked arm in arm, and that their eyes glare like two stars in the darkness. He says they are as plain to be seen as possible, although you can see, at the same time, the trees and the bushes through them."

"How absurd," said Dick.

"If he thinks it," said Jack, "why, to him it is true, and so it must be a horrible truth."

"No doubt of that," said Maggs; "fancy or not fancy, it is all the same to him; so he goes with us to-night, for he says he wouldn't be an hour in the place when we are gone for a thousand pounds."

"Well—well; be it so."

"Follow me closely."

"Stop," said Jack. "I should like to go round by the kitchen garden, and see if there is really anything to lead to the delusion that the man speaks of. It will not delay us a minute."

"No—nor half a minute. Come this way, and I will take you to the spot where a certain grave holds two bodies that you wot of."

"Yes," said Dick, "and the least that any one says about that affair the better it may be for the family in the long run. He will be no friend to himself, or to his brethren, who first preaches about that little transaction."

Maggs led the way along a narrow path that was so much overgrown by wild plants, and so obstructed by the long shoots of ivy that spread out from the wall to the right hand, which was covered with that green mantle, that it was anything but an easy thing to get along.

That path was short, however, and they struggled through it in the course of two or three minutes.

"Stop!" said Maggs.

"Yes—yes. Is this the place?"

"Look right along by those palings. There is the spot. By Heavens! what is that?"

"I see something white," said Dick.

"And so do I," cried Jack. "Something moves, too."

"Hush! oh, hush!" said Maggs. "Don't speak in that tone, Jack. Why—why, what on earth can it be? It is exactly over the grave of the two officers, too. There is, or there was to be, a gooseberry bush or two planted there."

"Stay where you are, both of you," said Dick. "I am not going to stand any nonsense—I will advance up to it."

"Oh, no, Dick, don't."

"Why not?"

"If it were a mortal foe, Dick, I should be the last person to say, 'Hold,' to you."

"Oh, stuff."

"But it is not, you know, and you talk of advancing upon a creature, or an existence, of the powers of which you know nothing! Let me beg of you to pause."

"No, Jack, for my own sake, as well as for yours, I will test the unknown powers of the being who keeps such silent watch over that spot. I never yet gave way to terrors of this description, and I am not going to begin now."

"Stop him, Maggs."

"Not I," said Maggs. "Let him go. Those who have the courage to face these things are the proper persons to do so, and they should not be stopped."

'That's it," said Dick.

As he spoke he cocked one of his pistols, and while Jack looked after him with eyes of terror, and even Maggs, shading his vision with his hand, tried to keep him well in sight. Dick strode on at an even pace, neither very quick nor very slow, towards the white object.

"He has nerve," said Maggs.

"He has indeed," answered Jack. "He does not pause either, nor draw back as he nears it."

"True—true. There, he reaches the spot."

"Yes, he is there."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Dick Turpin, "Come on. This is too good. Come on both of you, and be introduced to the ghost, if you will be so good as to allow me to have the honour of performing that ceremony."

These words from Dick were quite sufficient to convince both Maggs and Jack that there was nothing supernatural in the object to which he had advanced with so much real courage. If they were not sufficient for that object, they most certainly ought to have been so.

"I think," said Maggs, "that Turpin will have the laugh at us both, Jack. But come on."

"Are you coming?" said Dick.

"Yes—yes."

They both reached the spot in a moment or two, and then Dick said, with all the gravity imaginable—

"Allow me, gentlemen, to introduce to you a flannel petticoat, as the object of a supernatural character, upon the gooseberry bush, and to a pea-stick, with a piece of rag at the end of it, to frighten the birds from, I suppose, an onion plantation, as the supernatural face that kept moving about with such horrible and strange significance as we looked at it from yonder."

"Is that the fact?" said Maggs.

"You don't say so?" said Jack.

"Yes, it is a fact, and I am very happy to say so; and I may add, that I strongly suspect most supernatural appearances to be composed of about as simple elements."

"The deuce take it!" muttered Jack. "How glad I am, Dick, that you had more courage than I in this matter."

"And than I," said Maggs.

"Now," said Dick, "I know what you both suspect, and that is, that I am very far sighted, and saw that something of this sort composed the ghost."

"No—no!" they both said.

"Well, then," added Dick, with a laugh, "I say yes, for I am very long-sighted, indeed, and able to see extremely well in the dark, and the moment I looked upon the object here, I thought that it was something like what it turns out to be. Now, you see, how the merit and the chivalry of my courage fades away. The probability is, that if I really thought it had been anything supernatural, I might have been as loth as either of you to have thrown myself in the way of it so recklessly."

"Well," said Maggs, "that will do. Let us come now to the great room, for I think we shall find our friends there. My mission on the outside of the house, by the bridle road, was specially to look for you two."

They now made their way into the large apartment in which the thieves had met upon that eventful night, when the two officers had with such singular imprudence sacrificed their lives to the vengeance of the "family." There were assembled nearly every one who had been at the meeting on the former occasion.

The entrance of Dick Turpin and Sixteen-string Jack was the signal for a cheer, which Maggs, however, as soon as possible, repressed, reminding them of the danger of any unusual noise, situated as they were in a house that, in all likelihood, was suspected by the police.

"I don't speak to delay business, or to give anything like an alarm to any one here," said Maggs; "but I say it honestly, that I do think the house is watched."

"It's more than likely," said a voice.

"Well, so say I. And now let us to business, and make up our minds what we mean to do, and then let us all get away as quickly as we possibly can."

"Yes—yes, that's it," said several.

"Allow me, then," said Jack, as he took off his hat, and stood upon a chair so as to make himself plainly visible to all present—"allow me to thank every one here for the kind interest shown in the fate of Claude Duval. I am his oldest and most constant friend, I believe I may say, and I thank you all from my heart, both in my own name and in his."

"Bravo, Jack!"

"And I, too," said Dick Turpin, lifting his hat, and exhibiting that nearly completely bald head, by which he was so well known, and which, when he took off his hat, made him look at the least fifteen years older than when he had it on—"I, too, have to thank you all; and I only hope that if anything is determined upon to-night in favour of Duval, that you will let me take the post of danger, be it what it may, in the enterprise."

CLAUDE DUVAL'S DREAM IN NEWGATE.

CHAPTER CCCV.

THE DISPERSION OF THE THIEVES, AND THE DEATH OF THE SCOUT IN THE LANE.

This declaration from Dick Turpin, spoken as it was with a sincerity of which here could be no possible doubt, was pleasing enough to those who were assembled in that large apartment.

A murmur of satisfaction arose from them at the statement of his wishes, and one then cried out—

"We will all do what we can for Duval; but Maggs is the man who will tell us what to do."

"Yes—yes!" cried the others, "Maggs is the man—Maggs is the man! He will say what must be done."

"Well," said Maggs, rising, "if you will have it so, all of you, I will say what I think it ought to be; but as regards the doing part of it or not, that will b for all you to decide, you know, not me."

"Go on, Maggs."

"We shall all," said Jack, "I am sure, listen to Maggs with that attention that any suggestion from him merits, and I, for one, have no doubt in the world but that what he recomends will be found to be the very best course we can all of us pursue."

"No doubt of that at all," said Dick.

Maggs was now hoisted up upon one of the tables, so that by a light that hung from a rusty chain fastened to the ceiling, he was plainly visible to all present. There was a bandage still round his face where he had been wounded by one of the officers, who now lay in the garden so calm and so still, and through the folds of that bandage a few drops of blood had oozed.

This gave him the appearance of ferocity, which was very far, in deed, from being in accordance with Maggs' real character, for he was anything but a man of violent passions.

"Hear him! Hear Maggs!" cried one.

"Won't you take a drop of ale before you begin?" said another.

"Silence!" cried a third.

"Thank you all," said Maggs, "I will take the ale when I have done; but not now."

"All's right. Go on."

"You all know," said Maggs, "that I speak nothing more than the truth when I say, that by the situation I have held in the old stone-jug in the Bailey, I have been able to do some good to the family."

"Lots of good!" cried half-a-dozen voices.

"Well, I don't mention that in any way to make a boast of it, mind you."

"We know that, Maggs."

"I only say it, you see, because it is a fact that there is no need to dispute, and because it brings me to the first part of what I am going to say to-night, and that first part is, that I rather think something may be done for Claude Duval; but that something will have the effect of preventing me showing my face in Newgate again; so I shall be of no more use."

The thieves were silent at this, and looked ruefully at each other.

"Mind you," added Maggs, "I don't mean to say that it will positively have that effect, but it may. I will try and manage that it shall not, if we carry out the plan at all; but still, you know what my opinion is; and that is, that it will."

"A bad job that for the family," said a voice.

"Very," said several others.

"Before our friend Maggs goes any further, then," said Jack, "allow me to say that, upon the part of Claude Duval, I should refuse to sanction any enterprise that brought Maggs into trouble, or injured so much as the hair of his head."

"And I," cried Dick.

"Bravo! Bravo!" shouted the others.

"Silence!" said Maggs. "Do you forget where you are? You are not in one of the old kens in the city underground, and so well shut in that you may make as much noise as you like, and no chance of any one hearing you."

"All's right, Maggs; go on."

"Well, there's no chance, as far as I can see, of any harm coming to me by the job. All I think is, that the sheriffs may be rather suspicious that I had sold them, and so they might think it would be just as well to dispense with my services as odd man at Newgate, you see."

"Let's know the plan, Maggs."

"It is a bold one."

"Of course," said Dick.

"That was to be expected," said Jack, "and in that lies the principal chance of its success."

"You are right," added Maggs. "What I know of the position of Claude Duval enables me to say that, by hook or by crook, the authorities have made up their minds to hang him, and he will be tried upon indictment after indictment, till they get a verdict of guilty, and then they will take good care to put him out of this world, you may depend."

"Shame—shame!"

"Well, it is a shame, when, in the name of justice, there is anything that looks like persecution, for, after all, there is many a worse fellow than Claude Duval who has escaped scot-free. But that's not our look out. We want to save him, right or wrong, I take it."

"Yes, Maggs, that's it."

"Then this is the plan. I expect to-morrow night to be on duty by Claude's cell, you see, and when that is the case, the regular turnkeys don't give themselves a great deal of trouble. Mind you, I shall be outside his cell, but that won't make any difficulty."

"But you don't mean to say, Maggs," said Dick, "that you can walk him out of Newgate?"

"No—not exactly; but if half a dozen courageous men will take possession of the lobby, I can bring him there, I rather think, and then the thing will be done."

"That is bold, indeed."

"Let me explain to you how the affair will stand. In the lobby you will find three men, one on the lock, as it is called, and two officers on night duty. Well, between Claude's cell and the lobby there are two turnkeys to pass, who are well armed, so that there are five men to conquer in all."

"That's easy," said a voice.

"Stop a bit—not so easy. First of all, it is necessary that they should be conquered without noise or the discharge of fire-arms of any kind. If an alarm is given, the whole force of the establishment will hasten to the spot, and we are lost."

"But still," said Jack, "I can conceive how it may be done."

"Yes," added Maggs. "In this wise I think it may. Exactly at half-past two o'clock I will come into the lobby, and then I would have some one of you come to the wicket-gate with a letter in your hand, and say in a voice as of one in authority—'A letter from the Under-Secretary of State to the Governor.' Well, upon that, the man on the lock will open the door and let you in, but the moment you get in, another of you must come and tap at the wicket, and say—'The Lord Mayor will be here in five minutes. He has sent me to request that the governor will rise at once.' Well, they will let him in, likewise, for nothing throws such men so much off their guard as the use of high names and dignities."

"I see," said Dick.

"Then there will be two of you in the lobby, and you must fall upon the officer who remains and the man on the lock, for one of them will be gone with the mock letter to the governor, you understand."

"Precisely."

"The moment you have gagged and bound them, and, of course, you will take care to have everything handy for such a purpose, you can open the wicket and let in half a dozen more, and then you will affect to have seized me, likewise, and to threaten me with instant death, if I do not show you the way to Claude Duval's cell."

"It will do, I think," said Dick.

"Yes," said Jack, "but it is a ticklish affair."

"I cannot conceal from myself that it is so," said Maggs, "but I have a pretty good idea that there will be success. Of course the two men in the passage must be treated the same as those in the lobby, and I will take you direct to Claude's cell, and open the door for you pretty quickly, and in two minutes, out he ought to be. His horse, or one as good, shall be in the Old Bailey, and off you all go."

"Hurrah!"

"Silence, for the love of safety. You, Jack, the old and kind friend and associate of Claude Duval, you tell us first what you think of this scheme for his preservation?"

All eyes were now turned upon Jack, who, without one moment's hesitation, replied in a firm, clear voice—

"I say, yes, to the plan, and I like it for its very boldness."

"You, Dick—what say you?"

"I echo Jack's sentiments, and he and I will disguise ourselves, and carry out the first part of the enterprise, if some half dozen of those here present will volunteer to aid us."

"I will—I will—I—I!" cried some dozen of voices.

"Six will be ample," said Maggs; "and I hope, that without any offence to those who would go and do the thing well, I may be permitted to pick out the six I should like to head it."

"To be sure, Maggs."

"Then may we," said Jack, in a voice full of hopefulness, "may we consider that as settled?"

"Quite settled," cried the thieves, "We will do it."

"There is now one thing to look to," said Maggs. "Money will be wanted. Every one must be well disguised, well armed, and well mounted, and the person who is supposed to come from the secretary of state must have a handsome private carriage, as that will materially help in the delusion."

"Make yourself easy upon that score," said Dick Turpin. "Jack and I have it in our power to furnish every guinea that will be wanted in the affair, and if you, Maggs, will superintend the arrangements, all will be well."

"It will be a five hundred pound job, if a bit," said Maggs; "for everything must be bought, you see, coach and all."

"I don't think," said Dick, "that we have made a bad night's work of it to-night, however, Jack."

"Well, we have a mahogany-box that feels heavy; but I don't know what's in it."

"Where is it, Jack?"

"Here, Dick. I brought it off the horse's back when we dismounted, and kept it in my hand till now. Shall we open it?"

"To be sure."

"Where did it come from?" said Maggs.

"I think they called the conveyance the Barnet fly," said Dick; "and this box we took from a Jew who was a passenger, and who seemed to set no small store by it."

The thieves gathered closely round Jack as he tried, for some few moments, in vain to open the desk.

"Let me try it," said a voice.

"Ah, let the game cracksman have a try at it," said the thieves. "He will open it."

"I will try," said a small, active-looking man, stepping forward, and taking a glance at the lock.

Rummaging, then, in his pocket for a moment or two, the cracksman took out a small pick-lock, and casting his eyes up to the ceiling as if in deep thought, he inserted it into the keyhole.

Click went the lock.

"It's a good one," he said, "and one of the newest patents; but I know all about it."

"Can you open it, though?"

"It is open."

Jack placed his hand upon the lid of the Jew's box, and it opened in a moment. The practised hand of the cracksman had made short work of the last new patent lock, which was to defy all attempts to pick it.

The brief delay that had taken place in opening the Jew's box, had had the effect of wonderfully arousing the curiosity that actuated all the thieves concerning it, and there was some inconvenient pressure around Jack as it was at length fairly opened.

"Nothing," said Jack.

"Nothing?" replied everybody.

"No; only papers, as you all see."

Jack laughed as he spoke, and turned out a lot of letters and memoranda that reached apparently to the bottom of the mahogany-box, and then he said—

"I wonder if any one here has a chisel or a small jemmy?"

"Here," said the cracksman, "is the sort of thing you want. That box has a false bottom to it."

"Well, so I suppose, and here it goes."

There was a slight crash, and then the false bottom of the box came out, disclosing a space of about four inches in depth beneath it, in which there was a quantity of small packs of something.

"What is it?" said Dick.

"Money and jewellery, all done up closely so as not to rattle in the coach. Ah, I see how it has been managed: every article of jewellery that has been sold has left room for the price of it in the little box of wool that had contained it."

"Then we are all right."

"I hope so. We will see what there is here."

Jack counted the money and found somewhere about two hundred guineas in gold, and then there was some silver, and some jewellery that looked very good.

"I tell you what it is, Maggs," said Dick, "you had better take the box with its contents and do the best you can with it. It came from a Jew, and, no doubt, another of the children of Israel will buy it."

"Of ceurse, there is no difficulty in that at all. But what's that? I heard a shot or something very like one."

CHAPTER CCCVI.

THE THIEVES ESCAPE, AND DICK AND JACK GET BACK TO THE PUBLIC-HOUSE.

THERE could be no possible mistake concerning the fact that a pistol shot had been fired somewhere outside ths mansion, but no one could say whether it was a signal from the scout that they had in the lane, or some accidental shot from some one else, which might not in any way or manner concern them.

Not for long, however, were they left in suspense upon that part of the subject.

Suddenly there came into the room a man covered with blood, and fell half fainting to the floor, as he gasped out in frightful accents—

"The traps—the traps! They have done for me."

"Why, it's Downy Ned," said Maggs, "who was keeping watch in the lane."

"What has happened, Ned?" cried everybody.

"Don't you see, they have done my business for me."

"Yes, but who and what are they?"

"I'll tell you—if—I can—water—water!"

They hurriedly brought some water and placed it to his lips. It was as much as he could do, for a spasm that seized him, to drink any of it, but he did contrive to take a little, and it had evidently the effect of reviving him, so that in a few moments he could speak a little more easily.

"I was in the lane, when I saw a couple of dozen of them coming—coming——"

"A couple of dozen?"

"Quite—quite. They were mounted, and they came creeping on as though they knew the crib they meant to be at well enough, so I started to get into the garden through the small door in the wall, but one of them saw me and had a crack at me, and hit me."

"But not badly, I hope, Ned?" said Maggs.

"Badly—not badly?"

"Well, Ned, you don't seem to be bleeding."

"Inwards—inwards!" gasped the scout, and his head fell back.

"He is dead," said one.

"As mutton," said another. Poor Ned!"

A violent ring at the bell of the garden gate at this moment came upon the ears of the thieves.

"My horse?" said Dick, "I forgot him."

"And mine?" said Jack.

"All's right," said Maggs, "all's right. I have been over this place, and I know how to take you all out in such an emergency as this. Follow me."

"Won't we! Only you keep to that, Maggs, and we will follow you fast enough, old fellow."

"Listen first, and don't be in a state of trepidation any of you. The officers can't get in for some time, and if we have ten minutes to spare it is all right. This house, you know, has its back against West-end Lane, and there's nothing but a clear wall there, and no such thing as even a window, so that's where we must get out by."

"A queer way of getting out," said one.

"Not at all. Come on. You, Dick and Jack, will find your cattle as we go along, no doubt. It is a good thing, now, that Bill sent his wife and kids away from here before now."

"Yes," said Bill, "the place would have been a good deal too hot to hold me, I take it, if I hadn't."

"No doubt."

The thieves numbered about twenty two persons, but it was quite surprising how noiselessly they managed to follow Maggs into the garden. The officers were still ringing at the gate-bell, no doubt with the intention of shooting the first one who should make an appearance at it, or, perhaps, they rung there in order to cloak some attack of a more insidious character that they were intent upon making at another part of the building.

Be that how it might, however, one thing was quite evident, and that was, that the family, as they called themselves, had no time to lose.

By good luck, both Dick and Jack lit upon their cattle close to the door through which they had emerged into the garden, and they were about to mount, but Maggs advised that they should not, so they led the animals.

After going half round the house, Maggs paused at the door of a little out-house, and spoke.

"This is the tool-house," he said. "Who can use a pick-axe well among you?"

"I, and I," said several.

"Take, then, what you want out of them, for I believe it is pretty well stocked with rough tools."

They lit a match inside the tool-house for a few moments, so that they might see what they were about, and in the course of a few moments they were well enough provided with tools to work with.

"Now," said Maggs, "this is the way we must go into the house again."

The way he led them was through a little scullery, and then across a kitchen, and so on to a room, in which there had been a billiard-table, and in which there was only a borrowed light. The wall of that room was hung with fancy drapery, and Maggs, as he pointed to it, said—

"Now, my family men, that is the only road to the open air, that I should say it will be safe for any of us to take to-night. Through that wall is West-end Lane. There is a hedge just on the other side, and a water-course, but these are not impediments that will stop us, I daresay."

The thieves now perfectly understood, if they had only guessed before, what it was that they had to do, and those who were armed with the pick-axes at once began operations upon the wall with right good will.

"Work as silently as you can," said Maggs.

Dick and Jack had had some difficulty in getting their horses through the scullery and kitchen into the billiard-room, but they did at last succeed in so doing; and as the mortar began to fly about, they each tied a pocket-handkerchief over the eyes of his steed.

The door of the room was a strong one, and as a measure of precaution against a sudden rush of the officers at the last moment, Maggs locked it and bolted it, but they heard nothing more as yet of the strong force which had been by the scout reported as close at hand.

In the course of five minutes an opening was made in the wall, and when that was once the case, the rest of the work proceeded with much greater speed, so that a practicable breach through which a man might make his way was soon established.

"I will go and have a look out," said Maggs.

In a moment he pushed himself through the opening, and they heard him fall with a splash into the water course that was under the hedge. Dick Turpin looked anxiously through the opening, but all was darkness as well as silence.

"Come on," said Maggs, in a whisper.
